(1) An illegal session.—Meanwhile a company of the Sanhedrin had assembled (23 sufficed for a quorum), and Jesus was brought before this tribunal, which was presided over by Caiaphas. A hurried search had been made for witnesses (this, like the night session, was illegal), but even the suborned testimony thus obtained ("false witnesses") was found useless for the purpose of establishing, constructively or directly, a charge of blasphemy against Jesus. At length two witnesses were produced who gave a garbled version of the early saying of Jesus (Jn 2 19) about destroying the temple and rebuilding it in three days. To speak against the temple might be construed as speaking against God (cf Mt 23 16.21; Acts 6 13.14), but here too the witnesses broke down through lack of agreement. At all costs, however, must Jesus be condemned: the unprecedented course therefore was taken of seeking a conviction from the mouth of the accused Himself. Rising from his seat, the high priest adjured Jesus by the living God to tell them whether He was the Christ, the Son of God (in Mk, "Son of the Blessed"). In using this title, Caiaphas had evidently in view, as in Jn 5 18; 10 33, a claim to equality with God. The supreme moment had come, and Jesus did not falter in His reply: "Thou hast said." Then, identifying Himself with the Son of Man in Daniel's vision (7 13.14), He solemnly added, "Henceforth [from His resurrection on] ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven." It was enough. Without even the pretense of inquiry into the truth or falsehood of the claim, the high priest rent his garments, exclaiming, "He hath spoken blasphemy," and by assent of all Jesus was adjudged worthy of death. Abuse and insult followed. The minions of the Sanhedrin were permitted to spit on the condemned One, smite Him, blindfold and mock Him, saying, "Prophecy unto us, thou Christ: who is he that struck thee?" Then, with further blows, He was led away (Mt 26 68).

(2) A morning confirmation.—To give color of judicial sanction to these tumultuous and wholly irregular night proceedings, a more formal meeting of the Sanhedrin was convened as soon as day had dawned (Mt 27 1; Mk 15 1; Lk 22 66-71). Probably the irregularities were held to be excused by the urgency of the occasion and the solemnities of the feast. Jesus was again brought forward; new questions were put which He declined to answer. Possibly a new avowal of His Messiahship was made (more probably Luke includes in this scene, the only one he records, some of the particulars of the earlier proceedings). The judgment of the past night was confirmed.

While this greatest moral tragedy of the trial and condemnation of Jesus was in process, a lesser, but still awful, tragedy in the history of a soul was being enacted in the court of the same building (from this the chamber in which the Sanhedrin sat was visible), in the threefold denial of his Master by the apostle Peter. Peter, who had followed "afar off" (Lk), had gained access to the court through an unnamed disciple, whom it is easy to identify with John (Jn 18 15). As he stood warming himself at a fire which had been kindled, the maid who had admitted them (Jn), gazing attentively at Peter, said boldly, "Thou also wast with Jesus the Galilean" (Mt 26 69). Unnerved, and affrighted by his surroundings, Peter took the readiest mode of escape in denial. "I know him not."

His heart must have sunk within him as he framed the words, and the crowing of a cock at the moment (Mk—perhaps an hour after midnight), reminding him of his Master's warning, completed his discomfiture. Guiltily he withdrew to the porch, only a little after to be accosted by another (the maid had spoken to her neighbors, Mk), with the same charge. More afraid than ever, he declared again, "I know not this man," and, seeing he was not believed, strengthened the denial with an oath. Yet a third time, an hour later, a bystander (or several, Mk), this time founding on his Galilean speech, pronounced, "Of a truth thou art one of them." Peter, to clear himself, cursed and swore, anew disclaiming knowledge of his Lord. To this depth had the boastful apostle fallen—as low, it might seem, as Judas! But there was a difference. As Peter spoke the cock again crew—the cockerow which gives its form to three of the narratives (Mk alone mentions the double cockcrowing). At the same instant, either from within, or as He was being led forth, Jesus turned and looked on His erring disciple. That look—so full of pity, sorrow, reproach—could never be forgotten! Its effect was instantaneous: "Peter went out, and wept bitterly."

Peter's heartfelt repentance has its counterfoil in the remorse of Judas, which, bitter as it also was, cannot receive the nobler name. First,

c) Remorse and Suicide of Judas Judas sought to return the 30 shekels paid him as the price of blood ("I betrayed innocent blood"); then, when callously rebuffed by the priests and elders, he flung down the accursed money in the sanctuary, and went and hanged himself. Mt and Acts seem to follow slightly divergent traditions as to his end and the purchase of the potter's field. The underlying facts probably are that the priests applied the money, which they could not put into the treasury (Mt), to the purchase of the field, where, either before or after the purchase, Judas destroyed himself (Acts: falling and bursting asunder), assigning it as a place to bury strangers in. Its connection with Judas is attested by its name, "Akeldama," "the field of blood."

The Jews might condemn, but they had no power to execute sentence of death (Jn 18 31). This power had been taken from them by the Romans, and was now vested in the Rom governor. The procurator of Judaea was Pontius Pilate, a man hated by the Jews for his ruthless tyranny (see PILATE), yet, as the Gospels show him, not without a sense of right, but vacillating and weak-willed in face of mob clamor, and risk to his own interests. His residence in Jerus ("Praetorium," ERV "palace") was probably Herod's former palace (thus Schürer, G. A. Smith, etc), on the tessellated pavement (Jn 19 13) in the semicircular front of which was placed the tribunal (bēma) from which judgments were delivered. It was to this place Jesus was now brought. The events took place when it was "early" (Jn 18 28), probably between 6 and 7 AM (cf 19 14, Rom computation).

Jesus was taken within the Praetorium, but His accusers were too scrupulous about defilement at the Passover festival (Jn 18 28) to a) Attitude of the Accusers enter the building. Pilate therefore came out to hear their accusation. They would fain have had him endorse their condemnation without further inquiry, but this he would not do. They would not have it that it was a simple question of their law, yet had to justify their demand for a death sentence (ver 31). They based, therefore, on the alleged revolutionary character of Christ's teaching, His forbidding to pay tribute to Caesar (a false charge), His claim to be a king (Lk 23 2.5), to all which charges Jesus answered not a word (Mk 15 3.5).

At a later stage, after Pilate, who knew very well that no mere sedition against the Rom power had called forth all this passion (witness the choice of Barabbas), had repeatedly declared that he found no crime in Jesus (Mk 15 14; Lk 23 4.14.22; Jn 18 38; 19 4.6), the real spring of their action was laid bare: "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God" (Jn 19 7). When it was seen how this declaration made Pilate only the more unwilling to yield to their rage, return was made to the political motive, now in the form of personal threat: "If thou release this man, thou art not Caesar's friend" (ver 12). This was Pilate's weak point, and the Jews knew it. The clamor grew ever louder, "Crucify him, crucify him." Hate of Jesus and national degradation could go no farther than in the cry, "We have no king but Caesar" (ver 15).

Pilate was from the first impressed with the innocence of Jesus, and was sincerely anxious, as his actions showed, to save Him from the

b) The Attitude of Pilate terrible and ignominious death His implacable enemies were bent on inflicting upon Him. His crime was that, as Rom judge, he finally, against his own convictions, through fear of a charge of disloyalty to Caesar, yielded up to torture and death One whom he had pronounced guiltless, to gratify the brutal passions of a mob. By Pilate's own admissions, Christ's death was, not a punishment for any crime, but a judicial murder. First, through private examination, Pilate satisfied himself that the kingship Jesus claimed ("Thou sayest") carried with it no danger to the throne of Caesar. Jesus was a king indeed, but His kingdom was not of this world; was not, like earthly kingdoms, supported by violence; was founded on the truth, and gathered its subjects from those that received the truth (Jn 18 36.37). The indifference to the name of truth which the jaded mind of Pilate confessed ("What is truth?") could not hide from him the nobility of soul of the Holy One who stood before him. He declared publicly, "I find no fault in this man," and thereafter sought means of saving Him, at least of shifting the responsibility of His condemnation from himself to others.

(1) Jesus sent to Herod.—Hearing in the clamor round the judgment seat that Jesus was a Galilean, and remembering that Herod Antipas, who had jurisdiction in that region, was in the city, Pilate's first expedient was to send Jesus to Herod, to be examined by him (Lk 23 6-11). This act of courtesy had the effect of making Herod and Pilate, who had been at enmity, again friends (ver 12); otherwise it failed of its object. Herod was pleased enough to see One he had so often heard about—even thought in his flippancy that a miracle might be done by Him—but when Jesus, in presence of "that fox" (Lk 13 32), refused to open His mouth in answer to the accusations heaped upon Him, Herod, with his soldiers, turned the matter into jest, by clothing Jesus in gorgeous apparel, and sending Him back as a mock-king to Pilate.

(2) "Not this man, but Barabbas."—Pilate's next thought was to release Jesus in pursuance of a Jewish custom of setting free a prisoner at the feast, and to this end, having again protested that no fault had been found in Him, offered the people the choice between Jesus and a notorious robber and murderer called Barabbas, then in prison. Just then, as he sat on the judgment seat, a message from his wife regarding a dream she had ("Have thou nothing to do with that righteous man," Mt 27 19) must strongly have influenced his superstitious mind. Pilate could hardly have conceived that the multitude would prefer a murderer to One so good and pure; but, instigated by the priests, they perpetrated even this infamy, shouting for the release of Barabbas and the crucifixion of Jesus.

(3) "Ecce Homo."—Pilate's weakness now began to reveal itself. He proposed to "chastise" (scourge) Jesus—why "chastise," if He was innocent?—then release Him. But this compromise, as was to be anticipated, only whetted the eagerness for blood, and the cries grew ever louder, "Crucify him." Pilate, however, as if yielding to the storm, did deliver Jesus to be scourged (scourging—a fearful infliction—preceded crucifixion), the cruelty being aggravated by the maltreatment of the soldiers, who, outstripping former mockeries, put on His head a crown of thorns, arrayed Him in a purple robe, and rained blows upon His bleeding face and form. It seems to have been a design of Pilate to awake pity, for once again he brought Jesus forth, and in this affecting guise, with new attestation of His innocence, presented Him to the people in the words, "Behold, the man!" (Jn 19 5). How hideous the mockery, at once to declare of such an one, "I find no crime in him," and to exhibit Him to the crowd thus shamefully abused! No pity dwelt in these hearts, however, and the shouts became still angrier, "Crucify him."

(4) A last appeal—Pilate yields.—The words of the leaders, "He made himself the Son of God," spoken as a reason for putting Jesus to death (Jn 19 7), struck a new fear into the heart of Pilate. It led him again to enter the Praetorium, and inquire of this strange prisoner, unlike any he had ever seen, "Whence art thou?" Jesus was silent. "Knowest thou not," asked Pilate, "that I have power to release thee, and have power to crucify thee?" Jesus answered only that he, Pilate, had no power over Him at all save what was given him of God; the greater therefore was the crime of those who had subjected Him to this abuse of Divinely given power. Again Pilate went out and sought to release Him, but was met by the fierce cries that foreboded complaint to Caesar (Jn 19 12). A tumult seemed imminent, and Pilate succumbed. Here probably (though possibly after the choice of Barabbas) is to be placed the washing of his hands by Pilate—a vain disclaiming of his responsibility—recorded in Mt 27 24, and the awful answer of the people, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (ver 25).

Pilate now ascends the judgment seat, and, fully conscious of the iniquity of his procedure, pronounces the formal sentence which dooms Jesus to the cross. The trial over, Jesus is led again into the Praetorium, where the cruel mockery of the soldiers is resumed in intensified form. The Holy One, thorn-crowned, clad in purple, a reed thrust into His hand, is placed at the mercy of the whole band, who bow the knee in ridicule before Him ("Hail, King of the Jews"), spit upon Him in contempt, smite Him on the head with the reed (Mt, Mk). Then, stripped of the robe, His own garments are put on Him, in preparation for the end.

In all this hideous scene of cruelty, injustice, and undeserved suffering, the conspicuous feature in the bearing of Jesus is the absolute calmness, dignity and meekness with which He endures the heaviest wrongs and insults put upon Him. The picture in Isa 53 7.8 is startling in its fidelity: "When he was afflicted he opened not his mouth; as a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before its shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. By oppression and judgment he was taken away," etc. There is no return of the perturbation of Gethsemane. As if the strength won there had raised Him into a peace that nothing could shake, He passed through the frightful physical exhaustion, mental strain, agony of scourging, suffering from wounds and blows, of that terrible night and morning, with unbroken fortitude and unembittered spirit. Not a word of complaint passes His lips; He makes no reply to accusations; when reviled, He reviles not again; He takes all with submission, as part of the cup the Father has given Him to drink. It is a spectacle to move the stoniest heart. Well to remember that it is the world's sin, in which all share, that mingled the bitter draught!

III. The Crucifixion and Burial.—Crucifixion was the form of punishment reserved by the Romans for slaves, foreigners and the vilest criminals, and could not be inflicted on a Rom citizen. With its prolonged and excruciating torture, it was the most agonizing and ignominious death which the cruelty of a cruel age could devise. Jewish law knew nothing of it (the 'hanging on a tree' of Dt 21 22. 23, was after death; cf Gal 3 13), yet to it the Jewish leaders hounded Pilate on to doom their Messiah. The cross was no doubt of the usual Rom shape (see Cross). The site of Golgotha, "the place of a skull" (in Lk "Calvary," the Latinized form), is quite uncertain. It may have been a slight mound resembling a skull (thus Meyer, Luthardt, Godet, etc), but this is not known. It is only plain that it was outside the wall, in the immediate vicinity of the city (see note below on sepulcher). The time of the crucifixion was about 9 AM (Mk 15 25). The day (Friday) was the "preparation" for the Sabbath of the Passover week (Mt, Mk, Lk; cf Jn 19 14.31).

It was part of the torment of the victim of this horrible sentence that he had to bear his own cross (according to some only the patibulum, or transverse beam) to the place of execution. As Jesus, staggering, possibly fainting, under this burden, passed out of the gate, a stranger coming from the country, Simon, a man of Cyrene, was laid hold of, and compelled to carry the cross (such an one would not be punctilious about rabbinical rules of travel, especially as it was not the regular Sabbath). Jesus, however, was not wholly unpitied. In the crowd following Him were some women of Jerus, who bewailed and lamented Him. The Lord, turning,

c) The Attitude of Jesus

bade these weep, not for Him, but for themselves and for their children. "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" (Lk 23 27-31).

Golgotha being reached, the crucifixion at once took place under the care of a centurion and a quaternion of soldiers. With ruthless

b) Between the Thieves blows, hands and feet were nailed to the wood, then the cross was reared—the (the perpendicular part may, as some Superscription—the think, have first been placed in position). As if to emphasize, from Pilate's Seamless Robe point of view, the irony of the proceedings, two robbers were crucified with Jesus, on right and left, an undesigned fulfilment of prophecy (Isa 53 12). It was doubtless when being raised upon the cross that Jesus uttered the touching prayer—His 1st word on the cross (its genuineness need not be questioned, though some ancient MSS omit)—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Lk).

Above His head, according to custom, was placed a tablet with His accusation, written in three languages, Heb, Gr and Lat. The chief priests took offence at the form, "This is the King of the Jews," and wished the words changed to, "He said, I am King," etc, but Pilate curtly dismissed their complaint: "What I have written I have written" (Jn). Whether Jesus still wore the crown of thorns is doubtful. The garments of the Crucified were divided among the soldiers, but for His inner garment, woven without seam, they cast lots (cf Ps 22 18). A draught of wine mingled with an opiate (gall or myrrh), intended to dull the senses, was offered, but refused.

The triumph of Christ's enemies now seemed complete, and their glee was correspondingly unrestrained. Their victim's helplessness was to them a disproof of His claims.

c) The Mocking—the Penitent Thief Railing, and wagging their heads, they taunted Him, "If thou art the Son of God, come down from the cross"; "He saved others; himself he cannot save." At first the robbers who were crucified with Him (possibly only one) joined in this reproach, but ere long there was a change. The breast of one of the malefactors opened to the impression of the holiness and meekness of Jesus, and faith took the place of scorn. He rebuked his neighbor for reviling One who had "done nothing amiss"; then, addressing Jesus, he prayed: "Jesus, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." The reply of Jesus—His 2d word on the cross—surpassed what even the penitent in these strange circumstances could have anticipated, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Lk). A not less touching incident followed—perhaps preceded—this rescue of a soul in its last extremity. Standing near the cross was a group of holy women, one of them the mother of Jesus Himself (Jn 19 25: Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas—some identify the two latter—Mary Magdalene). Mary, whose anguish of spirit may be imagined, was supported by the disciple John. Beholding them—His 3d word from the cross—Jesus tenderly commended His mother to the care of John; to Mary, "Woman, behold, thy son"; to John, "Behold, thy mother." From that time Mary dwelt with John.

Three hours passed, and at noon mocking was hushed in presence of a startling natural change. The sun's light failed (Lk), and a deep darkness, lasting for 3 hours, settled over the land. The darkness was preternatural in its time and occasion, whatever natural agencies may have been concerned in it. The earthquake a little later (Mt) would be due to the same causes. It was as if Nature veiled itself, and shuddered at the enormity of the crime which was being perpetrated. But the outer gloom was only the symbol of a yet

d) The Great Darkness—the Cry of Desolation more awful darkness that, toward the close of this period, overspread the soul of Jesus Himself. Who shall fathom the depths of agony that lay in that awful cry—the 4th from the cross—that burst loudly from the lips of Jesus, "Ēli, Ēli, lamā sabachthāni"—"My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me" (or, "Why didst thou forsake me?")—words borrowed from Ps 22 1! It was before remarked that death was not a natural event to Jesus, but ever had in it to His mind its significance as a judgment of God on sin. Here it was not simply death that He experienced in its most cruel form, but death bereft of the sensible comforts of the Father's presence. What explanation of that mystery can be found which does not take into account with Isa 53 (cf Jn 1 29) His character as Sin-Bearer, even as the unbroken trust with which in His loneliness He clings to God ("My God") may be felt to have in it the element of atonement? On this, however, the present is not the place to dwell.

The end was now very near. The victim of crucifixion sometimes lingered on in his agony for days; but the unexampled strain of body and mind which Jesus had undergone since the preceding day brought an earlier termination to His sufferings. Light was returning, and with it peace; and in the consciousness that all things were now finished (Jn 19 28), Jesus spoke again—the 5th word—"I thirst" (Jn). A sponge filled with vinegar was raised on a reed to His lips, while some who had heard His earlier words ("Ēli, Ēli," etc), and thought He called for Elijah, said, "Let us see whether Elijah cometh to save him" (Mt). With a last effort, Jesus cried aloud—6th and memorable word—"It is finished," then, in a final utterance—the 7th—commended His spirit to God: "Father into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Lk). Following on this word, bowing His head, He surrendered Himself to death. It will be seen that of the 7 words spoken from the cross, 3 are preserved by Lk alone (1st, 2d, 7th), 3 by Jn alone (3d, 5th, 6th), while the 4th cry ("Ēli, Ēli," etc) occurs only in the first 2 evangelists (Mt and Mk, however, speak of Jesus "crying with a loud voice" at the close).

Jesus had died; the malefactors still lived. It was now 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and it was desired that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the approaching Sabbath. Permission was therefore obtained from Pilate for the soldiers to break the legs of the crucified (crurifragium), and so hasten death. When it was discovered that Jesus was already dead, a soldier, possibly to make sure, pierced His side with a spear, and John, who was present, notices as a special fact that "there came out blood and water" (19 34). Whether this means, as Stroud and others have contended, that Jesus literally died of rupture of the heart, or what other physiological explanation may be given of the phenomenon, to which the apostle elsewhere attaches a symbolical significance (1 Jn 5 6), need not be here discussed (see BLOOD AND WATER). This, however, was not the only startling and symbolically significant fact attending the death of Jesus. A great darkness had precluded the death; now, at the hour of His expiry, the veil of the temple (i.e. of the inner shrine) was rent from top to bottom—surely a sign that the way into the holiest of all was now opened for mankind

(He 9 8.12)—and a great earthquake shook the city and rent the rocks. Mt connects with this the statement that from the tombs thus opened "many bodies of the saints . . . were raised; and coming forth out of the tombs after his resurrection they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many" (27 52.53). There is nothing in itself improbable, though none of the other evangelists mention it, in such an early demonstration being given of what the Lord's death and resurrection meant for believers. In other ways the power of the cross was revealed. A dying robber had been won to penitence; now the centurion who commanded the soldiers was brought to the avowal, "Truly this was the Son of God" (Mt, Mk; in Lk, "a righteous man"). The mood of the crowd, too, was changed since the morning; they "returned, smiting their breasts" (Lk 23 48). "Afar off," speechless with sorrow, stood the women who had followed Jesus from Galilee, with other friends and disciples. The evangelists name Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of James and Joses, Salome (Mk), and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk).

Jesus had conquered hearts on His cross; now His death reveals friends from the wealthier classes, hitherto kept back by fear (Jn 19 38.39), who charge themselves with His honorable burial. One was Joseph of Arimathea, a just man, "looking for the kingdom of God," of whom the interesting fact is recorded that, though a member of the Sanhedrin, 23:50-56; "he had not consented to their counsel and deed" (Lk); the other was Nicodemus, he who came to Jesus by night (Jn 3 1.2; 19 39), mentioned again only in Jn 7 50-52, where, also as a member of the Sanhedrin, he puts in a word for Jesus.

Joseph of Arimathea takes the lead. "Having dared," as Mk says (16 43, Gr), he begged the body of Jesus from Pilate, and having obtained it, bought linen cloth wherein

a) The New Tomb to wrap it, and reverently buried it in a new rock-tomb of his own (Mt, Mk), "where never man had yet lain" (Lk). Jn furnishes the further particulars that the tomb was in a "garden," near where Jesus was crucified (19 41.42). He tells also of the munificence of Nicodemus, who brought as much as 100 pounds (about 75 lbs. avoird.) of spices—"a mixture of myrrh and aloes" (ver 39), with which to enwrap the body of Jesus. This is not to be thought of as an "anointing": rather, the spices formed a powder strewn between the folds of the linen bandages (cf Luthardt, Comm. on Jn 19 40). The body, thus prepared, was then placed in the tomb, and a great stone rolled to the entrance. The burial was of necessity a very hurried one, which the holy women who witnessed it—Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses are specially mentioned (Mt, Mk)—purposed to supplement by an anointing when the Sabbath was past (cf Lk 23 56).

Though Jesus was dead, the chief priests and Pharisees were far from easy in their minds about Him. Mysterious words of His had been quoted about His building of the temple in three days; possibly Judas had told something about His sayings regarding His death and rising again on the 3d day; in any case, His body was in the hands of His disciples, and they might remove it, and create the persuasion that He had risen. With this plea they went to Pilate, and asked from him a watch of soldiers to guard the tomb. To make assurance doubly sure, they sealed the tomb with the official seal. The result of their efforts was only, under Providence, to provide new evidence of the reality of the resurrection!

The uncertainty attaching to the site of Golgotha attaches also to the site of Joseph's rock-tomb. Opinion is about equally divided in favor of, and against, the traditional site, where the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands. A principal ground of uncertainty is whether that site originally lay within or without the second wall of the city (cf Stanley, Sinai and Pal. 457 ff; G. A. Smith, Jerus. II, 576; a good conspectus of the different opinions, with the authorities, is given in Andrews, Part VII).

F. THE RESURRECTION AND ASCENSION

The resurrection of Jesus, with its completion in the ascension, setting the seal of the Father's acceptance on His finished work on earth, and marking the decisive change from His state of humiliation to that of exaltation, may be called in a true sense the corner stone of Christianity (cf 1 Cor 15 14.17). It was on the preaching of Christ crucified and risen that the Christian church was founded (e.g. Acts 2 32-36; 1 Cor 15 3.4). Professor Harnack would distinguish between "the Easter faith" (that Jesus lives with God) and "the Easter message," but the church never had any Easter faith apart from the Easter message. The subversion of the fact of the resurrection is therefore a first task to which unbelief addresses itself. The modern spirit rules it out a priori as miraculous. The historical fact is denied, and innumerable theories (imposture, theories of swoon, of hallucination, mythical theories, spiritualistic theories, etc) are invented to explain the belief. None of these theories can stand calm examination (see the writer's work, The Resurrection of Jesus). The objections are but small dust of the balance compared with the strength of the evidence for the fact. From the standpoint of faith, the resurrection of Jesus is the most credible of events. If Jesus was indeed such an One as the gospel history declares Him to be, it was impossible that death should hold Him (Acts 2 24). The resurrection, in turn, confirms His claim to be the Son of God (Rom 1 4).

With the narratives of the resurrection here included, as inseparably connected, those of the appearances of Jesus in Jerus and Galilee. The accounts will show that, while the body of Jesus was a true body, identical with that which suffered on the cross (it could be seen, touched, handled), it exhibited attributes which showed that Jesus had entered, even bodily, on a new phase of existence, in which some at least of the ordinary limitations of body were transcended. Its condition in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension was an intermediate one—no longer simply natural, yet not fully entered into the state of glorification. "I am not yet ascended . . . I ascend" (Jn 20 17); in these two parts of the one saying the mystery of the resurrection body is comprised.

The main facts in the resurrection narratives stand out clearly. "According to all the Gospels," the arch-skeptic Strauss concedes,

a) The Easter Morning—the Open Tomb "Jesus, after having been buried on the Friday evening, and lain during the Sabbath in the grave, came out of it restored to life at daybreak on Sunday" (New Life of Jesus, I, 397, ET).

Discrepancies are alleged in detail as to the time, number, and names of the women, number of angels, etc; but most of these vanish on careful examination. The Synoptics group their material, while Jn gives a more detailed account of particular events.

(1) The angel and the keepers.—No eye beheld the actual resurrection, which took place in the early morning, while it was still dark. Mt records that there was "a great earthquake," and tells of the descent of an angel of the Lord, who rolled away the stone, and sat upon it. Before his dazzling aspect the keepers became as dead men, and afterward fled. The chief priests bribed them to conceal the facts, and say the body had been stolen (Mt 28 2-4.11-15).

(2) Visit of the women.—The first intimation of the resurrection to the disciples was the discovery of the empty tomb by the women who had come at early dawn (Mt 28 1; Mk 16 2; Lk 24 1; Jn 20 1) with spices, prepared to anoint the body of Jesus (Mk 16 1; cf Lk 23 56). Apparently ignorant of the guard, the women were concerned on their way as to who should roll away the stone from the door of the tomb (Mk 16 3), and were much surprised to find the stone rolled away, and the tomb open. There is no need for supposing that the women mentioned all came together. It is much more probable that they came in different groups or companies—perhaps Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, or these with Salome, first (Mt, Mk; cf the "we" of Jn 20 2); then Joanna and other members of the Galilean band (Lk). (On the appearance of Jesus to Mary, see below.)

(3) The angelic message.—As the women stood, perplexed and affrighted, at the tomb, they received a vision of angels (Mt and Mk speak only of one angel; Lk and Jn mention two; all allude to the dazzling brightness), who announced to them that Jesus had risen ("He is not here; for he is risen; . . . come, see the place where the Lord lay"), and bade them tell His disciples that He went before them to Galilee, where they should see Him (Mt, Mk; Lk, who does not record the Galilean appearances, omits this part, and recalls the words spoken by Jesus in Galilee, concerning His death and resurrection; cf Mt 16 21). The women departed with "trembling and astonishment" (Mk), yet "with great joy" (Mt). Here the original Mk breaks off (ver 8), the remaining vs being an appendix. But it is granted that Mk must originally have contained an account of the report to the disciples, and of an appearance of Jesus in Galilee.

The narrative in Jn enlarges in important respects those of the Synoptics. From it we learn that Mary Magdalene (no companion is named, but one at least is implied in the "we" of ver 2), concluding from the empty tomb that the body of Jesus had been removed, at once ran to carry the news to Peter and John ("They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we know not where they have laid him"). These apostles lost no time in hastening to the spot. John, who arrived first, stooping down, saw the linen cloths lying, while Peter, entering, beheld also the napkin for the head rolled up in a place by itself. After John likewise had entered ("He saw, and believed"), they returned to their home. Meanwhile Mary had come back disconsolate to the tomb, where, looking in, she, like the other women, had a vision of two angels. It was then that Jesus addressed her, "Why weepest thou?" At first she thought it was the gardener, but on Jesus tenderly naming her, "Mary," she recognized who it was, and, with the exclamation, "Rabboni" ("Teacher"), would have clasped Him, but He forbade: "Touch me not," etc (ver 17, m "Take not hold on me"), i.e. "Do not wait, but hasten to tell my disciples that I am risen, and ascend to my Father" (the resurrection-life had already begun, altering earlier relations).

Report to the disciples—incrédulity.—The appearance of Jesus to the other women (Mt 28 9.10) is referred to below. It is probable that, on the way back, Mary Magdalene rejoined her sisters, and that the errand to the disciples—or such of them as could be found—was undertaken together. Their report was received with incredulity (Lk 24 11; cf Mk 16 11). The visit of Peter referred to in Lk 24 12 is doubtless that recorded more precisely in Jn.

Ten appearances of Jesus altogether after His resurrection are recorded, or are referred to; of these five were on the day of resurrection.

c) Other Easter-Day Appearances They are the following:

(1) The first is the appearance to Mary Magdalene above described. (2) The second is an appearance to (Emmaus, the women as they returned from the Jerusalem) tomb, recorded in Mt 28 9.10. Jesus met them, saying, "All hail," and as they took hold of His feet and worshipped Him, He renewed the commission they had received for the disciples. Some regard this as only a generalization of the appearance to Mary Magdalene, but it seems distinct.

(3) An appearance to Peter, attested by both Lk (24 34) and Paul (1 Cor 15 5). This must have been early in the day, probably soon after Peter's visit to the tomb. No particulars are given of this interview, so marked an act of grace of the risen Lord to His repentant apostle. The news of it occasioned much excitement among the disciples (Lk 24 34).

(4) The fourth was an appearance to two disciples on their way from Jerus to Emmaus—a village about two hours distant (Lk 24 12-35; Mk 16 12.13). They were conversing on the sad events of the last few days, and on the strange tidings of the women's vision of angels, when Jesus overtook them, and entered into conversation with them. At first they did not recognize Him—a token, as in Mary's case, of change in His appearance—though their hearts burned within them as He opened to them the Scriptures about Christ's sufferings and glory. As the day was closing, Jesus abode with them to the evening meal; then, as He blessed and brake the bread, "Their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight" (Lk 24 30.31). They hastily rose, and returned to the company of disciples at Jerus. According to Mk 16 13, their testimony, like that of the women, was not at first believed.

(5) The fifth appearance was that to "the eleven," with others, in the evening—an appearance recorded by Luke (24 36 ff), and John (20 19-23), and alluded to by Paul (1 Cor 15 5). The disciples from Emmaus had just come in, and found the company thrilling with excitement at the news that the Lord had appeared to Simon (Lk). The doors were closed for fear of the Jews, when suddenly Jesus appeared in their midst with the salutation, "Peace be unto you" (Lk, Jn; doubt is unnecessarily cast on Lk 24 36.40, by their absence from some Western texts). The disciples were affrighted; they thought they had seen a spirit (Lk); "disbelieved for joy" (Lk 24 41). To remove their fears, Jesus showed them His hands and His feet (in Jn, His side), and ate before them (Lk). He then breathed on them, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit," and renewed the commission formerly given to remit and retain sins (Jn; cf Mt 18 17.18). The breathing was anticipative of the later effusion of the Spirit at Pentecost (cf Jn 7 39; Acts 2); the authority delegated depends for its validity on the possession of that Spirit, and its exercise according to the mind of Christ (cf e.g. 1 Cor 5 3). The incident strikingly illustrates at once the reality of Christ's risen body, and the changed conditions under which that body now existed.

Eight days after this first appearance—i.e. the next Sunday evening—a second appearance of Jesus to the apostles took place in the same

d) The Second Appearance to the Eleven—of Thomas chamber and under like conditions ("the doors being shut"). The peculiar feature of this second meeting was the removal of the doubt of Thomas who, it is related, had not been present on the former occasion. Thomas, devoted (cf Jn 11 16), but of naturally questioning temperament (14 5), re-refused to believe on the mere report of others that the Lord had risen, and demanded indubitable sensible evidence for himself. Jesus, at the second appearance, after salutation as before, graciously gave the doubting apostle the evidence he asked: "Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands," etc (Jn 20 27), though, as the event proved, the sign was not needed. The faith and love of the erstwhile doubter leaped forth at once in adoring confession: "My Lord and my God." It was well; but Jesus reminded him that the highest faith is not that which waits on the evidence of sense ("Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed," ver 29).

The scene now shifts for the time to Galilee. Jesus had appointed to meet with His disciples in e) The Galilean Appearances Galilee (Mt 26 32; Mk 16 7; cf Mk 14 28). Prior, however, to this meeting—that recorded in Mt 28 16–20, probably to be identified with the appearance "to above five hundred brethren at once," mentioned by Paul

(1 Cor 15 6)—there is another appearance of Jesus to seven disciples at the Lake of Galilee, of which the story is preserved in Jn 21 1–23.

(1) At the Sea of Tiberias—the draught of fishes—Peter's restoration.—The chapter which narrates this appearance of Jesus at the Lake of Galilee ("Sea of Tiberias") is a supplement to the Gospel, but is so evidently Johannine in character that it may safely be accepted as from the pen of the beloved disciple (thus Lightfoot, Meyer, Godet, Alford, etc). The appearance itself is described as the third to the disciples (ver 14), i.e. the third to the apostles collectively, and in Jn's record seven disciples are stated to have been present, of whom five are named—Peter, Thomas, Nathanael (probably to be identified with Bartholomew), and the sons of Zebedee, James and John. The disciples had spent the night in fishing without result. In the morning Jesus—yet unrecognized—appeared on the beach, and bade them cast down their net on the right side of the boat. The draught of fishes which they took revealed to John the presence of the Master. "It is the Lord," he said to Peter, who at once flung himself into the lake to go to Jesus. On landing, the disciples found a fire of coals, with fish placed on it, and bread; and Jesus Himself, after more fish had been brought, distributed the food, and, it seems implied, Himself shared in the meal. Still a certain awe—another indication of a mysterious change in Christ's appearance—restrained the disciples from asking openly, "Who art thou?" (ver 12). It was not long, however ("when they had broken their fast"), before Jesus sufficiently disclosed Himself in the touching episode of the restoration of Peter (the three-fold question, "Lovest thou me?" answering to the three-fold denial, met by Peter's heartfelt, "Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee," with the words of reinstatement, "Feed my lambs," "Feed my sheep"). In another way, Jesus foretold that Peter would have the opportunity of taking back his denial in the death by which he should glorify God (vs 18, 19; tradition says he was crucified head-downward). Curious inquiries were set aside, and attention recalled to duty, "Follow thou me" (ver 22).

(2) On the mountain—the Great Commission—baptism.—Though only the eleven apostles are named in Matthew's account (28 16), the fact of an 'appointment' for a definite time and place ("the mountain"), and the terms in which the message was given to the "disciples," suggests a collective gathering such as is implied in Paul's "above five hundred brethren at once" (1 Cor 15 6). The company being assembled, Jesus appeared; still, at first, with that element of mystery in His appearance, which led some to doubt (ver 17). Such doubt would speedily vanish when the Lord, announcing Himself as clothed with all authority in heaven and earth, gave to the apostles the supreme commission to "make disciples of all the nations" (vs 18–20; cf Mk 16 15, "Go ye into all the world," etc). Discipleship was to be shown by baptism "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (one name, yet threefold), and was to be followed by instruction in Christ's commands. Behind the commission, world-wide in its scope, and binding on every age, stands the word of never-failing encouragement, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Doubts of the genuineness of these august utterances go as a rule with doubt of the resurrection itself.

It will be noticed that the Lord's Supper and Baptism are the only sacraments instituted by Jesus in His church.

Paul records, as subsequent to the above, an appearance of Jesus to James, known as "the Lord's brother" (1 Cor 15 7; cf Gal 1 19).

f) Appearance to James No particulars are given of this appearance, which may have occurred either in Galilee or Jerus. James, so far as known, was not a believer in Jesus before the crucifixion (cf Jn 7 3); after the ascension he and the other brethren of Jesus are found in the company of the disciples (Acts 1 14), and he became afterward a chief "pillar" of the church at Jerus (Gal 1 19; 2 9). This appearance may have marked the turning-point.

The final appearance of Jesus to the apostles (1 Cor 15 7) is that which Luke in the closing

g) The Last Meeting verses of his Gospel (44–53), and in Acts 1 3–12, brings into direct relation with the ascension. In the Gospel Luke proceeds without a break from the first appearance of Jesus to "the eleven" to His last words about "the promise of my Father"; but Acts 1 shows that a period of 40 days really elapsed during which Jesus repeatedly "appeared" to those whom He had chosen. This last meeting of Jesus with His apostles was mainly occupied with the Lord's exposition of the prophetic Scriptures (Lk 24 44–46), with renewed commands to preach repentance and remission of sins in His name, "beginning from Jerus" (vs 47, 48; cf Acts 1 8), and with the injunction to tarry in Jerus till the Spirit should be given (ver 49; cf Acts 1 4, 5). Then He led them forth to Olivet, "over against Bethany," and, while blessing them, "was carried up into heaven" (vs 50, 51; cf Acts 1 10, 12).

Jesus had declared, "I ascend unto my Father" (Jn 20 17), and Luke in Acts 1 narrates the circumstances of that departure. Jesus

2. The Ascension might simply have "vanished" from the sight of His disciples, as on previous occasions, but it was His will to leave them in a way which would visibly mark the final close of His association with them. They are found, as in the Gospel, "assembled" with Him at Jerus, where His final instructions are given.

Then the scene insensibly changes to Olivet, where the ascension is located (Acts 1 12). The disciples inquire regarding the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (even yet their minds are held in these temporal conceptions), but Jesus tells them that it is not for them to know times and seasons, which the Father had set within His own authority (ver 7). Far more important was it for them to know that within the next days they should receive power from the Holy Spirit to be witnesses for Him to the uttermost part of the earth (ver 8). Even as He spake, He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight (ver 9). Then, as the apostles stood gazing upward, two heavenly messengers appeared, who comforted them with the assurance that in like manner as they had seen Jesus ascend into heaven, so also would He come again. For that return the church still prays and waits (cf Rev 22 20). See, further, ASCENSION.

Retracing their steps to Jerus, the apostles joined the larger company of disciples in the "upper room" where their meetings seem to have been habitually held, and there, with one accord, to the number of about 120 (Acts 1 15), they all continued steadfastly in prayer till "the promise of the Father" (Lk 24 49; Acts 1 4) was, at Pentecost, bestowed upon them.

PART IV. EPILOGUE: THE APOSTOLIC TEACHING

The earthly life of Jesus is finished. With His resurrection and ascension a new age begins. Yet the work of Christ continues. As Luke

1. After the Ascension the Gospels are but the records of "all that Jesus began both to do and to teach, until the day in which he was received up." It is beyond the scope of this art. to trace the succeeding developments of Christ's activity through His church and by His Spirit; in order, however, to bring the subject to a proper close, it is necessary to glance, even if briefly, at the light thrown back by the Spirit's teachings, after the ascension, on the significance of the earthly life itself, and at the enlargement of the apostles' conceptions about Christ, consequent on this, as seen in the Epistles and the Apocalypse.

It was the promise of Jesus that, after His departure, the Spirit would be given to His disciples, to teach them all things, and bring to their remembrance all that He had said to them (Jn 14 26). It was not the Spirit a new revelation they were to receive, but illumination and guidance of their minds into the meaning of what they had received already (Jn 16 13-15). This promise of the Spirit was fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2). Only a few personal manifestations of Jesus (Acts 7 55,56; 22 17,18; 23 11) are recorded after that event—the two chief being the appearance to Paul on the way to Damascus (1 Cor 15 8; cf Acts 9 3 ff, etc), and the appearance in vision to John in Patmos (Rev 1 10 ff). The rest was internal revelation (cf Gal 1 12,16; Eph 1 17; 3 3-5). The immense advance in enlargement and clearness of view—aided, no doubt, by Christ's parting instructions (Lk 24 44-48; Acts 1 2)—is already apparent in Peter's discourses at Pentecost; but it is not to be supposed that much room was not left for after-growth in knowledge, and deepened insight into the connection of truths. Peter, e.g., had to be instructed as to the admission of the Gentiles (Acts 10 11); the apostles had much gradually to learn as to the relations of the law (cf Acts 15; 21 20 ff; Gal 2, etc); Paul received revelations vastly widening the doctrinal horizon; both John and Paul show progressive apprehension in the truth about Christ.

It is therefore a question of much interest how the apostolic conceptions thus gained stand related to the picture of Jesus we have been

3. Gospels studying in the Gospels. It is the command and Epistles tention of the so-called "historical" (anti-supernaturalistic) school of the day that the two pictures do not correspond. The transcendental Christ of Paul and John has little in common, it is affirmed, with the Man of Nazareth of the Synoptic Gospels. Theories of the "origins of Christianity" are concocted proceeding on this assumption (cf Pfeleiderer, Weizsäcker, Bousset, Wernle, etc). Such speculations ignore the first conditions of the problem in not accepting the self-testimony of Jesus as to who He was, and the ends of His mission into the world. When Jesus is taken at His own valuation, and the great fact of His resurrection is admitted, the alleged contradictions between the "Jesus of history" and the "Christ of faith" largely disappear.

It is forgotten how great a change in the center of gravity in the conception of Christ's person and work was necessarily involved in the facts of Christ's death, resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of power.

4. Fact of Christ's Lordship The life is not ignored—far from it. Its influence breathes in every page, e.g. of Paul's epistles. But the weakness, the limitations, the self-suppression—what Paul in Phil 2 7 calls the "emptying"—of that earthly life have now been left behind; the rejected and crucified One has now been vindicated, exalted, has entered into His glory. This is the burden of Peter's first address at Pentecost: "God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified" (Acts 2 36). Could anything look quite the same after that? The change is seen in the growing substitution of the name "Christ" for "Jesus" (see at beginning of art.), and in the habitual speaking of Jesus as "Lord."

With belief in the lordship of Jesus went necessarily an enlarged conception of the significance of

5. Significance of Christ's Person His person. The elements were all there in what the disciples had seen and known of Jesus while on earth (Jn 1 14; 1 Jn 1 1-3), but His exaltation not only threw back light upon His claims while on earth—confirmed, interpreted, completed them—but likewise showed the ultimate ground of these claims in the full Divine dignity of His person. He who was raised to the throne of Divine dominion; who was worshipped with honors due to God only; who was joined, with Father and with Holy Spirit as, coördinately, the source of grace and blessing, must in the fullest sense be Divine. There is not such a thing as honorary Godhead. In this is already contained in substance everything taught about Jesus in the epistles: His preëxistence (the Lord's own words had suggested this, Jn 8 58; 17 5, etc), His share in Divine attributes (eternity, etc), in Divine works (creation, etc, 1 Cor 8 6; Col 1 16,17; He 1 2; Rev 1 8; 3 14, etc), in Divine worship (Phil 2 9-11; Rev 5 11,12, etc), in Divine names and titles (He 1 8, etc). It is an extension of the same conception when Jesus is represented as the end of creation—the "Head" in whom all things are finally to be summed up (Eph 1 10; cf He 2 6-9). These high views of the person of Christ in the Epistles are everywhere assumed to be the possession of the readers.

Jesus had furnished His disciples with the means of understanding His death as a necessity of His Messianic vocation, endured for the salvation of the world; but it was the resurrection and exaltation which shed light on the utmost meaning of this also. Jesus died, but it was for sins. He was a propitiation for the sin of the world (Rom 3 25;

1 Jn 2 2; 4 10). He was 'made sin' for us (2 Cor 5 21). The strain of Isa 53 runs through the NT teaching on this theme (cf 1 Pet 1 19; 2 22-25, etc). Jesus' own word of the "ransom" is reproduced by Paul (1 Tim Cross and 2 6). The song of the redeemed is, "Thou didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe," etc (Rev 5 9). Is it wonderful, in view of this, that in the apostolic writings—not in Paul only, but in Pet, in Jn, in He, and Rev, equally—the cross should assume the decisive importance it does? Paul only works out more fully in relation to the law and the sinner's justification a truth shared by all. He himself declares it to be the common doctrine of the churches (1 Cor 15 3.4).

The newer tendency is to read an apocalyptic character into nearly all the teaching of Jesus (cf Schweitzer, Quest of the Historical Jesus). This is an exaggeration, but the Advent that Jesus taught His disciples to look for His coming again, and connected with that coming the perfection of His kingdom, is plain to every reader of the Gospels. It will not be denied that the apostolic church retained this feature of the teaching of Jesus. In accordance with the promise in Acts 1 11, it looked for the glorious reappearing of its Lord. The Epistles are full of this hope. Even Jn gives it prominence (1 Jn 2 28; 3 2). In looking for the parousia as something immediately at hand, the early believers went even beyond what had been revealed, and Paul had to rebuke harmful tendencies in this direction (2 Thess 2). The hope might be cherished that the coming would not long be delayed, but in face of the express declarations of Jesus that no one, not the angels, not even the Son, knew of that day and hour (Mt 24 36; Mk 13 32), and that the Father had set these things in His own authority (Acts 1 7; cf also such intimations as in Mt 13 30; 24 14; 25 19; 28 19; Lk 19 11, etc), none could affirm this with certainty. Time has proved—proved it even in the apostolic age (2 Pet 3 3.4)—that the Advent was not so near as many thought. In part, perhaps, the church itself may be to blame for the delay. Still to faith the Advent remains the great fixed event of the future, the event which overshadows all others—in that sense is ever near—the polestar of the church's confidence that righteousness shall triumph, the dead shall be raised, sin shall be judged and the kingdom of God shall come.

LITERATURE.—The lit. on the life and teaching of Jesus is so voluminous, and represents such diverse standpoints, that it would be unprofitable to furnish an extended catalogue of it. It may be seen prefixed to any of the larger books. On the skeptical and rationalistic side the best account of the lit. will be found in Schweitzer's book, From Reimarus to Wrede (ET, Quest of the Historical Jesus). Of modern believing works may be specially named those of Lange, Weiss, Ellcott, Edersheim, Farrar, D. Smith. Dr. Sanday's book, The Life of Christ in Recent Research, surveys a large part of the field, and is preparatory to an extended Life from Dr. Sanday's own pen. His art. in HDB has justly attracted much attention. Schürer's Hist of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (ET, 5 vols; a new German ed has been published) is the best authority on the external conditions. The works on NT Bib. theology (Reuss, Weiss, Schmid, Stevens, etc) deal with the teaching of Jesus; see also Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus (ET). Works and arts. on the Chronology, on Harmony of the Gospels, on geography and topography (cf esp. Stanley, G. A. Smith) are legion. A good, comprehensive book on these topics is Andrews, Life of Our Lord (rev. ed). The present writer has published works on The Virgin Birth of Christ and The Resurrection of Jesus. On the relations of gospel and epistle, see J. Denney, Jesus and the Gospel. This subject is of special interest, not only on account of its inherent importance, but more particularly on account of its immediately preceding, and leading directly up to what is the greatest tragedy in human history, the crucifixion of Our Lord. It has also the added interest of being the only proceeding on record in which the two great legal systems of antiquity, the Jewish and the Roman, which have most largely influenced modern legislation and jurisprudence, each played a most important part.

The coexistence of these two systems in Judaea, and their joint action in bringing about the tremendous results in question, were made possible by the generous policy pursued by Rome in allowing conquered nations to retain their ancient laws, institutions and usages, in so far as they were compatible with Rom sovereignty and supremacy. Not only so, but, in a large degree, they permitted these laws to be administered by the officials of the subject peoples. This privilege was not granted absolutely, but was permitted only so long as it was not abused. It might be withdrawn at any time, and the instances in which this was done were by no means rare.

Of the matters considered in this article, the arrest of Jesus and the proceedings before Annas, Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin took place professedly under Jewish law; the proceedings before Pilate and the reference to Herod, under Rom law.

It is very difficult to construct from the materials in the four Gospels a satisfactory continuous record of the arrest, and of what may be called the twofold trial of Jesus. The Gospels were written from different viewpoints, and for different purposes, each of the writers selecting such particulars as seemed to him to be of special importance for the particular object he had in view. Their reports are all very brief, and the proper chronological order of the various events recorded in different Gospels must, in many cases, be largely a matter of conjecture. The difficulty is increased by the great irregularities and the tumultuous character of the proceedings; by our imperfect knowledge of the topography of Jerus at this time (29 AD); also by the fact that the reports are given mainly in popular and not in technical language; and when the latter form is used, the technical terms have had to be tr<sup>d</sup> into Gr, either from the Heb or from the Lat.

For instance, opinions are divided as to where Pilate resided when in Jerus, whether in the magnificent palace built by Herod the Great, or in the castle of Antonia; as to where was the palace occupied by Herod Antipas during the Passover; whether Annas and Caiaphas occupied different portions of the same palace, or whether they lived in adjoining or different residences; whether the preliminary examination of Jesus, recorded by John, was before Annas or Caiaphas, and as to other similar matters. It is very satisfactory, however, to know that, although it is sometimes difficult to decide exactly as to the best way of harmonizing the different accounts, yet there is nothing irreconcilable or contradictory in them, and that there is no material point in the history of the very important proceedings falling within the scope of this article which is seriously affected by any of these debatable matters.

3. Illustrations of Difficulties

For a clear historical statement of the events of the concluding day in the life of Our Lord before His crucifixion, see the article on JESUS CHRIST. The present article will endeavor to consider the matters relating to His arrest and trial from a legal and constitutional point of view.

1. The Arrest.—During the last year of the ministry of Jesus, the hostility of the Jews to Him had greatly increased, and some six months before they finally succeeded in accomplishing their purpose, they had definitely resolved to make away with Him. At the Feast of Tabernacles they sent officers (the temple-guards) to take Him while He was teaching in the temple (Jn 7 32); but these, after listening to His words, returned without having made the attempt, giving as a reason that "never man so spake" (ver 46).

After His raising of Lazarus, their determination to kill Him was greatly intensified. A special meeting of the council was held to consider the matter. There Caiaphas, the high priest, strongly advocated such a step on national grounds, and on the ground of expediency, quoting in support of his advice, in a cold-blooded and cynical manner, the Jewish adage that it was expedient that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. Their plans to this end were frustrated, for the time being, by Jesus withdrawing Himself to the border of the wilderness, where He remained with His disciples (Jn 11 47-54).

On His return to Bethany and Jerus, six days before the Passover, they were deterred from carrying out their design on account of His manifest popularity with the people, as evidenced by His triumphal entry into Jerus on the first day of the Passover week (Palm Sunday), and by the crowds who thronged around Him, and listened to His teachings in the temple, and who enjoyed the discomfiture of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Herodians, as they successively sought to entangle Him in His talk.

Two days before the Passover, at a council meeting held in the palace of Caiaphas, they planned to accomplish their purpose by subtlety, but "not during the feast, lest a tumult arise among the people" (Mt 26 3-5; Mk 14 1.2). While they were in this state of perplexity, to their great relief Judas came to them and agreed to betray his Master for money (Mt 26 14-16; Mk 14 10.11).

This time they determined not to rely solely upon their own temple-guards or officers to execute their warrant or order of arrest, fearing that

1. Preparatory Steps—these officials, being Jews, might again be fascinated by the strange influence which Jesus exercised over His countrymen, or that His followers might offer resistance. They therefore applied to Pilate, the Rom procurator (governor), for the assistance of a band of Rom soldiers. He granted them a cohort (Gr speira, 400 to 600 men) from the legion then quartered in the castle of Antonia, which adjoined and overlooked the temple-area. The final arrangements as to these would probably be completed while Judas was at the supper room. It has been suggested that the whole cohort would not go, but only a selection from them. However, it is said that Judas "received the band [cohort] of soldiers" (Jn 18 3), and that they were under the command of a chief captain (Gr chiliarch, Lat tribune, ver 12). If there had not been more than 100 soldiers, they would not have been under the command of a captain, but the chief officer would have been a centurion. The amazing popularity of Jesus, as shown by His triumphal entry into the city, may have led the authorities to make such ample provision against any possible attempt at rescue.

The Garden of Gethsemane, in which Judas knew that Jesus would be found that night, was well known to him (Jn 18 2); and he also knew the time he would be likely to find his Master there. Thither at the proper hour he led the band of soldiers, the temple officers and others, and also some of the chief priests and elders themselves; the whole being described as "a great multitude with swords and staves" (Mt 26 47). Although the Easter full moon would be shining brightly, they also carried "lanterns and torches" (Jn 18 3), in order to make certain that Jesus should not escape or fail to be recognized in the deep shade of the olive trees in the garden.

On their arrival at the garden, Jesus came forward to meet them, and the traitor Judas gave them the

2. The Arrest in the Garden—the appointed signal by kissing Him. As the order or warrant was a Jewish one, the temple officers would probably be in front, the soldiers supporting them as reserves. On Jesus announcing to the leaders that He was the one they sought, what the chief priests had feared actually occurred. There was something in the words or bearing of Jesus which awed the temple officers; they were panic-stricken, went backward, and fell to the ground. On their rallying, the impetuous Peter drew his sword, and cut off the ear of one of them, Malchus, the servant of the high priest (Jn 18 6-10).

On this evidence of resistance the Rom captain and soldiers came forward, and with the assistance of the Jewish officers bound Jesus. Under the Jewish law this was not lawful before condemnation, save in exceptional cases where resistance was either offered or apprehended.

Even in this trying hour the concern of Jesus was more for others than for Himself, as witness His miracle in healing the ear of Malchus, and His request that His disciples might be allowed their liberty (Jn 18 8). Notwithstanding His efforts, His followers were panic-stricken, probably on account of the vigorous action of the officers and soldiers after the assault by Peter, "and they all left him and fled" (Mk 14 50).

It is worthy of note that Jesus had no word of blame or censure for the Rom officers or soldiers who were only doing their sworn duty in supporting the civil authorities; but His pungent words of reproach for not having attempted His arrest while He was teaching openly in the temple were reserved for "the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and elders" (Lk 22 52), who had shown their inordinate zeal and hostility by taking the unusual, and for those who were to sit as judges on the case, the improper and illegal course of accompanying the officers, and themselves taking part in the arrest.

The whole body departed with their prisoner for the city. From the first three Gospels one might infer that they went directly to the palace.

3. Taken to the City—the place of Caiaphas, the high priest. In the Fourth Gospel, however, we are told that they took him first to Annas (Jn 18 13).

Why they did so we are not informed, the only statement made being that he was the father-in-law of Caiaphas (ver 13). He had been the high priest from 7 AD to 15 AD, when he was deposed by Valerius Gratus, the Rom procurator. He was still the most influential member of the Sanhedrin, and, being of an aggressive disposition, it may be that it was he who had given instructions as to the arrest, and that they thought it their duty to report first to him.

Annas, however, sent Jesus bound to Caiaphas (ver 24). Having delivered over their prisoner, the Rom soldiers would proceed to their quarters in the castle, the temple officials retaining Jesus in their charge.

Meanwhile, the members of the Sanhedrin were assembling at the palace of the high priest, and the preliminary steps toward the first or Jewish trial were being taken.

II. The Jewish Trial.—It is the just boast of those countries whose jurisprudence had its origin in the common law of England, that their

1. The Jewish Law—system of criminal law is founded upon the humane maxims that everyone is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and that no one is bound to criminate himself. But the Jewish law went even farther in the safeguards which it placed around an accused person. In the Pent it is provided that one witness shall not be sufficient to convict any man of even a minor offence. "One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall a matter be established" (Dt 19 15).

These principles of the Mosaic law were elaborated and extended in the system which grew up after the return from Babylon. It was begun by the men of the Great Synagogue, and was afterward completed by the Sanhedrin which succeeded them. Up to the time of Our Lord, and for the first two centuries of the Christian era, their rules remained largely in an oral or unwritten form, until they were compiled or codified in the Mish by Rabbi Judah and his associates and successors in the early part of the 3d cent. It is generally conceded by both Jewish and Christian writers that the main provisions, therein found for the protection of accused persons, had been long incorporated in the oral law and were recognized as a part of it in the time of Annas and Caiaphas.

The provisions relating to criminal trials, and esp. to those in which the offence was punishable by death, were very stringent and were all framed in the interest of the accused. Among them were the following. The trial must be begun by day, and if not completed before night it must be adjourned and resumed by day; the quorum of judges in capital cases was 23, that being the quorum of the Grand Council; a verdict of acquittal, which required only a majority of one, might be rendered on the same day as the trial was completed; any other verdict could only be rendered on a subsequent day and required a majority of at least two; no prisoner could be convicted on his own evidence; it was the duty of a judge to see that the interests of the accused were fully protected.

3. Criminal Trials—The modern practice of an information or complaint and a preliminary investigation before a magistrate was wholly unknown to the Jewish law and foreign to its genius. The examination of the witnesses in open court was in reality the beginning of a Jewish trial, and the crime for which the accused was tried, and the sole charge he had to meet, was that which was disclosed by the evidence of the witnesses.

Let us see how far the foregoing principles and rules were followed and observed in the proceedings before the high priest in the present instance. The first step taken in the trial was the private examination of Jesus by the high priest, which is recorded only in Jn 18 19-23. Opinions differ as to whether this examination was conducted by Annas at his residence before he sent Jesus to Caiaphas (ver 24), or by the latter after Jesus had been delivered up to him.

Caiaphas was actually the high priest at the time, and had been for some years. Annas had been deposed from the office about 14 years previously by the Rom procurator; but he was still accorded the title (Acts 4 6). Many of the Jews did not concede the right of the procurator to depose him, and looked upon him as still the rightful high priest. He is also said to have been at this time the vice-president of the Sanhedrin. The arguments as to which of them is called the high priest by John in this passage are based largely upon two different renderings of Jn 18 24. In AV the verse reads "Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest," a reading based upon the TR which implies that Jesus had been sent to Caiaphas before the examination. On the other hand, RV, following the Gr text adopted by Nestle and others, reads, "Annas therefore sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest," implying that Annas sent him to Caiaphas on account of what had taken place in the examination.

However, it is not material which of these two leading members of the Sanhedrin conducted the examination. The same may also be said as to the controversy regarding the residence of Annas at the time, whether it was in some part of the official palace of the high priest or elsewhere. The important matters are the fact, the time, and the manner of the examination by one or other of these leading members of the council, not the precise place where, or the particular person by whom, it was conducted.

The high priest (whether Annas or Caiaphas) proceeded to interrogate Jesus concerning His disciples and His doctrine (Jn 18 19).

5. The Preliminary Examination—Such a proceeding formed no part of a regular Jewish trial, and was, moreover, not taken in good faith; but with a view to entrapping Jesus into admissions that might be used against Him at the approaching trial before the council. It appears to have been in the nature of a private examination, conducted probably while the members of the council were assembling. The dignified and appropriate answer of Jesus pointedly brought before the judge the irregularity he was committing, and was a reminder that His trial should begin with the examination of the witnesses: "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said" (vs 20,21 AV). The reply to this was a blow from one of the officers, an outrageous proceeding which appears to have passed unrebuked by the judge, and it was left to Jesus Himself to make the appropriate protest.

The next proceeding was the trial before the council in the palace of Caiaphas, attended at least by the quorum of 23. This was an

6. The Night Trial—illegal meeting, since a capital trial, as we have seen, could not either be begun or proceeded with at night.

Some of the chief priests and elders, as previously stated, had been guilty of the highly improper act for judges, of taking part in and directing the arrest of Jesus. Now, "the chief priests and the whole council" spent the time intervening between the arrest and the commencement of the trial in something even worse: they "sought false witness against Jesus, that they might put him to death" (Mt 26 59). This, no doubt, only means that they then collected their false witnesses and instructed them as to the testimony they should give. For weeks, ever since the raising of Lazarus, they had been preparing for such a trial, as we read: "So from that day forth they took counsel that they might put him to death" (Jn 11 53).

Caiaphas, as high priest and president of the Sanhedrin, presided at the meeting of the council. The oath administered to witnesses in a Jewish court was an extremely solemn invocation, and it makes one shudder to think of the high priest pronouncing these words to perjured witnesses, known by him to have been procured by the judges before him in the manner stated.

But even this did not avail. Although "many bare false witness against him," yet on account of their having been imperfectly tutored by their instructors, or for other cause, Witnesses "their witness agreed not together" (Mk 14 56), and even these prejudiced and partial judges could not find the concurring testimony of two witnesses required by their law (Dt 19 15).

The nearest approach to the necessary concurrence came at last from two witnesses, who gave a distorted report of a figurative and enigmatic statement made by Jesus in the temple during His early ministry: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn 2 19). The explanation is given: "He spake of the temple of his body" (ver 21). The testimony of the two witnesses is reported with but slight variations in the two first Gospels as follows: "This man said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days" (Mt 26 61); and "We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another made without hands" (Mk 14 58). Whether these slightly different statements represent the discrepancies in their testimony, or on account of some other variations or contradictions, the judges reluctantly decided that "not even so did their witness agree together" (ver 59).

Caiaphas, having exhausted his list of witnesses, and seeing the prosecution on which he had set his heart in danger of breaking down for the lack of legal evidence, adopted a blustering tone, and said to Jesus, 8. A Brow-beating Judge "Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? But Jesus held his peace" (Mt 26 62,63), relying on the fact that the prosecution had utterly failed on account of the lack of agreement of two witnesses on any of the charges. As a final and desperate resort, Caiaphas had recourse to a bold strategic move to draw from Jesus an admission or confession on which he might base a condemnation, similar to the attempt which failed at the preliminary examination; but this time fortifying his appeal by a solemn adjuration in the name of the Deity. He said to Jesus: "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" (vs 63,64). Caiaphas, although knowing that under the law Jesus could not be convicted on His own answers or admissions, thereupon in a tragic manner "rent his garments, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? Jesus answered and said, He is worthy of death" (vs 65,66).

The night session then broke up to meet again after daybreak in order to ratify the decision just come to, and to give a semblance of legality to the trial and verdict. The closing scene was one of disorder, in which they spat in their prisoner's face and buffeted him (vs 67,68; Lk 22 63-65).

The following morning, "as soon as it was day," the council reassembled in the same place, and Jesus was led into their presence (Lk 22 66). There were probably a number of the council present who had not attended the night session. For the benefit of these, and perhaps to give an appearance of legality to the proceeding, the high priest began the trial anew, but not with the examination of witnesses which had proved such a

9. The Morning Session failure at the night session. He proceeded at once to ask substantially the same questions as had finally brought out from Jesus the night before the answer which he had declared to be blasphemy, and upon which the council had "condemned him to be worthy of death" (Mk 14 64). The meeting is mentioned in all the Gospels, the details of the examination are related by Luke alone. When asked whether He was the Christ, He replied, "If I tell you, ye will not believe: and if I ask you, ye will not answer. But from henceforth shall the Son of man be seated at the right hand of the power of God" (Lk 22 67-69). This answer not being sufficient to found a verdict of blasphemy upon, they all cried out, "Art thou then the Son of God?" To this He gave an affirmative answer, "Ye say that I am. And they said, What further need have we of witness? for we ourselves have heard from his own mouth" (vs 70,71).

It will be observed that neither at the night nor at the morning session was there any sentence pronounced upon Jesus by the high priest.

10. Powers of the Sanhedrin There was on each occasion only what would be equivalent to a verdict of guilty found by a jury under our modern criminal practice, but no sentence passed upon the prisoner by the presiding judge. When Judaea lost the last vestige of its independence and became a Rom province (6 AD), the Sanhedrin ceased to have the right to inflict capital punishment or to administer the law of life and death. This jurisdiction was thenceforth transferred to the Rom procurator. The Sanhedrin submitted very reluctantly to this curtailment of its powers. A few years later it exercised it illegally and in a very riotous manner in the case of Stephen (Acts 7 58). Annas, however, of all men, had good reason not to violate this law, as his having done so during the absence of the procurator was the cause of his being deposed from the office of high priest by Valerius Gratus (15 AD).

The proceedings may have been taken before the high priest in the hope that Pilate might be induced to accept the verdict of the Sanhedrin as conclusive that Jesus had been guilty of an offence punishable by death under the Jewish law.

Now what was the precise crime or crimes for which Jesus was tried at these two sittings of the council? The first impression would probably be that there was no connection between the charge of destroying the temple and building another in three days, and His claiming to be the Son of God. And yet they were closely allied in the Jewish mind. The Jewish nation being a pure theocracy, the overthrow of the temple, the abode of the Divine Sovereign, would mean the overthrow of Divine institutions, and be an act of treason against the Deity. The profession of ability to build another temple in three days would be construed as a claim to the possession of supernatural power and, consequently, blasphemy. As to the other claim which He Himself made and confessed to the council, namely, that He was the Christ, the Son of God, none of them would have any hesitation in concurring in the verdict of the high priest that it was rank blasphemy, when made by one whom they regarded simply as a Galilean peasant.

To sum up: The Jewish trial of Our Lord was absolutely illegal, the court which condemned Him being without jurisdiction to try a capital offence, which blasphemy was under the Jewish law. Even if there had been jurisdiction, it would have been irregular, as the judges had rendered themselves incompetent to try the case, having been guilty of the violation of the spirit of the law that required judges to be unprejudiced and impartial, and carefully to guard the interests of the accused. Even the letter of the law had been violated in a number of important respects. Among these may be mentioned: (1) some of the judges taking part in and directing the arrest; (2) the examination before the trial and the attempt to obtain admissions; (3) endeavors of the judges to procure the testimony of false witnesses; (4) commencing and continuing the trial at night; (5) examining and adjuring the accused in order to extort admissions from Him; (5) rendering a verdict of guilty at the close of the night session, without allowing a day to intervene; (7) holding the morning session on a feast day, and rendering a verdict at its close; and (8) rendering both verdicts without any legal evidence.

III. The Roman Trial.—Early on the morning of Friday of the Passover week, as we have already seen, "the chief priests with the elders and scribes, and the whole council" held a consultation (Mk), in the palace of the high priest; and after the examination of Jesus and their verdict that He was guilty of blasphemy, they took counsel against Him "to put him to death" (Mt), this being, in their judgment, the proper punishment for the offence of which they had pronounced Him guilty.

For the reasons already mentioned, they came to the conclusion that it would be necessary to invoke the aid of the Rom power in carrying out this sentence. They thereupon bound Jesus, and led Him away and delivered Him up to Pilate, who at this time probably occupied, while in Jerus, the magnificent palace built by Herod the Great. Jesus was taken into the judgment hall of the palace or Praetorium; His accusers, unwilling to defile themselves by entering into a heathen house and thereby rendering themselves unfit to eat the Passover, remained outside upon the marble pavement.

1. Taken before Pilate thereupon bound Jesus, and led Him away and delivered Him up to Pilate, who at this time probably occupied, while in Jerus, the magnificent palace built by Herod the Great. Jesus was taken into the judgment hall of the palace or Praetorium; His accusers, unwilling to defile themselves by entering into a heathen house and thereby rendering themselves unfit to eat the Passover, remained outside upon the marble pavement.

The proceedings thus begun were conducted under a system entirely different from that which we have thus far been considering, both in its nature and its administration. The Jewish law was a part of the religion, and in its growth and development was administered in important cases by a large body of trained men, who were obliged to follow strictly a well-defined procedure. The Rom law, on the other hand, had its origin and growth under the stern and manly virtues and the love of justice which characterized republican Rome, and it still jealously guarded the rights and privileges of Rom citizens, even in a conquered province. Striking illustrations of this truth are found in the life of St. Paul (see Acts 16 35-39; 22 24-29; 25 10-12). The lives and fortunes of the natives in an imperial province like Judaea may be said to have been almost completely at the mercy of the Rom procurator or governor, who was responsible to his imperial master alone, and not even to the Rom senate. Pilate therefore was well within the mark when, at a later stage of the trial, being irritated at Jesus remaining silent when questioned by him, he petulantly exclaimed: "Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to release thee, and have power to crucify thee?" (Jn 19 10). While, however, the procurator was not compelled in such cases to adhere strictly to the prescribed procedure, and had a wide discretion, he was not allowed to violate or depart from the established principles of the law.

On this occasion, Pilate, respecting the scruples of the chief priests about entering the palace, went outside at their request, apparently leaving Jesus in the Praetorium. He asked them the usual formal question, put at the opening of a Rom trial: "What accusation bring ye against this man?"

3. Full Trial Not Desired They answered and said unto him, If he were not an evil-doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee" (Jn 18 29 f AV). Pilate could see at once that this was a mere attempt to evade the direct question he had asked, and was not such an accusation as disclosed any offence known to the Rom law. Affecting to treat it with disdain, and as something known only to their own law, he said, "Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law. The Jews said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (ver 31).

Perceiving that Pilate would not gratify their desire to have Jesus condemned on the verdict which they had rendered, or for an offence against their own law only, 4. Final Accusation "they began to accuse him, saying, We found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Lk 23 2).

This was an accusation containing three charges, much like a modern indictment containing three counts. Pilate appears to have been satisfied that there was nothing in the first two of these charges; but the third was too serious to be ignored, esp. as it was a direct charge of majestas or treason, the greatest crime known to the Rom law, and as to which the reigning emperor, Tiberius, and his then favorite, Sejanus, were particularly sensitive and jealous. The charges in this case were merely oral, but it would appear to have been in the discretion of the procurator to receive them in this form in the case of one who was not a Rom citizen.

The accusers having been heard, Pilate returned to the Praetorium to examine Jesus regarding the last and serious accusation. The Four

5. Examination, Defence and Acquittal Gospels give in the same words the question put to him by Pilate, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" The first three record only the final affirmative answer, "Thou sayest," which if it stood alone might have been taken as a plea of guilty; but John gives the intervening discussion which explains the matter fully. He tells us that Jesus did not answer the question directly, but asked Pilate, "Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee concerning me?" (Jn 18 34) (apparently not having been outside when the charges were made). On being told that it came from the chief priests, He went on to explain that His kingdom was not of this world, but was a spiritual kingdom. Being again asked if He was a king, He replied in effect, that He was a king in that sense, and that His subjects were those who were of the truth and heard His voice (vs 35-37). Pilate, being satisfied with His explanation, "went out again unto the Jews," and apparently having taken Jesus with him, he mounted his judgment seat or movable tribunal, which had been placed upon the tessellated pavement, and pronounced his verdict, "I find in him no fault at all" (ver 38 AV, RV "I find no crime in him").

According to the Rom law, this verdict of acquittal should have ended the trial and at once secured the discharge of Jesus; but

6. Fresh Accusations instead it brought a volley of fresh accusations to which Jesus made no reply. Pilate hesitated, and hearing a charge that Jesus had begun His treasonable teaching in Galilee, the thought occurred to him that he might escape from his dilemma by sending Jesus for trial to Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee, who was then in Jerus for the feast, which he accordingly did (Lk 23 7).

Herod had long been desirous to see Jesus—"hoped to see some miracle done by him," and

7. Reference to Herod "questioned him in many words; but he answered him nothing." The chief priests and scribes, who had followed him from the Praetorium to the Maccabean palace, which Herod was then occupying, "stood, vehemently accusing" Jesus (vs 8-10). "That fox," however, as Jesus had called him (Lk 13 32), was too astute to intermeddle in a trial for treason, which was a dangerous proceeding, and possibly he was aware that Pilate had already acquitted Him; in which case a retrial by him would be illegal. He and his soldiers, probably irritated at the refusal of Jesus to give him any answer, mocked Him, and arraying Him in a gorgeous robe, no doubt in ridicule of His claim to be a king, sent Him back to Pilate. This reference to Herod in reality formed no effective part of the trial of Jesus, as Herod declined the jurisdiction, although Pilate sought to make use of it in his subsequent discussion with the chief priests. The only result was that Herod was flattered by the courtesy of Pilate, the enmity between them ceased, and they were made friends (Lk 23 11.12.15).

On their return, Pilate resumed his place on the judgment seat outside. What followed, however,

8. Jesus or Barabbas properly formed no part of the legal trial, as it was a mere travesty upon law as well as upon justice. Pilate resolved to make another attempt to secure the consent of the Jews to the release of Jesus. To this end he summoned not only the chief priests and the rulers, but "the people" as well (Lk 23 13), and after mentioning the failure to prove any of the charges made against Jesus, he reminded them of the custom of releasing at the feast a prisoner selected by them, and offering as a compromise to chastise or scourge Jesus before releasing Him. At this point Pilate's anxiety to release Jesus was still further increased by the message he received from his wife concerning her disturbing dream about Jesus and warning him to "have . . . nothing to do with that righteous man" (Mt 27 19). Meanwhile, the chief priests and elders were busily engaged in canvassing the multitude to ask for the release of Barabbas, the notable robber, and destroy Jesus (ver 20). When Pilate urged them to release Jesus, they cried out all together, "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas"; and upon a further appeal on behalf of Jesus they cried, "Crucify, crucify him." A third attempt on his part met with no better result (Lk 23 18-23).

The Fourth Gospel alone records a final attempt on the part of Pilate to save Jesus. He scourged

9. Behold the Man! Him, it has been suggested, with a view to satisfying their desire for His punishment, and afterward appealing to their pity. He allowed his soldiers to repeat what they had seen done at Herod's palace, and place a crown of thorns upon His head, array Him in a purple robe, and render mock homage to Him as king of the Jews. Pilate went out to the Jews with Jesus thus arrayed and bleeding. Again declaring that he found no fault in Him, he presented Him, saying, "Behold, the man!" This was met by the former cry, "Crucify him, crucify him." Pilate replied, "Take him yourselves . . . for I find no crime in him." The Jews referred him to their law by which He deserved death because He made Himself the Son of God. This alarmed Pilate's superstitious fears, who by this time appears to have wholly lost control of himself. He took Jesus into the palace and said to Him, "Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer." Irritated at His silence, Pilate reminded Him of his absolute power over Him. The mysterious answer of Jesus as to the source of power still further alarmed him, and he made new efforts to secure His discharge (Jn 19 1-9).

The Jews were well aware that Pilate was arbitrary and cruel, but they had also found that he

10. Pilate Succumbs to Threats was very sensitive as to anything that might injuriously affect his official position or his standing with his master, the emperor. As a last resort they shouted to him, "If thou release this man, thou art not Caesar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Caesar" (ver 12). The prospect of a charge of his aiding and abetting such a crime as treason, in addition to the other charges that a guilty conscience told him might be brought against him, proved too much for the vacillating procurator. He brought Jesus out, and sat down again upon the judgment seat placed upon the pavement. He made one more appeal, "Shall I crucify your King?" The chief priests gave the hypocritical answer, "We have no king but Caesar" (ver 15). Pilate finally succumbed to their threats and clamor; but took his revenge by placing upon the cross the superscription that was so galling to them, "THE KING OF THE JEWS."

Then occurred the closing scene of the tragedy, recorded only in the First Gospel, when Pilate

11. Pilate Washes His Hands (a Jewish custom), saying to them, "I am innocent of the blood of this righteous man; see ye to it." The reply was that dreadful imprecation, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (Mt 27 24.25).

Pilate resumes his place upon the judgment seat, the fatal sentence at last falls from his lips, and Jesus is delivered up to be crucified.

12. The Sentence Now, how far were these proceedings in accordance with the Rom law under which they purported to have been taken and conducted? In the first place, Pilate, as procurator, was the proper officer to try the charges brought against Jesus.

13. Review In the next place he acted quite properly in declining to entertain a charge which disclosed no offence known to the Rom law, or to pass a sentence based on the verdict of the Sanhedrin for an alleged violation of the Jewish law. He appears to have acted in accordance with the law, and indeed in a judicial and praiseworthy manner in the trial and disposition of the threefold indictment for treason (unless it be a fact that Jesus was not present when these accusations were brought against Him outside the Praetorium, which would be merely an irregularity, as they were made known to him later inside). Pilate's initial mistake, which led to all the others, was in not discharging Jesus at once, when he had pronounced the verdict of acquittal.

All the subsequent proceedings were contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the law. Although Pilate took his place upon the judgment seat, his acts, properly speaking, were not those of a judge, and had no legal force or value; but were rather the futile attempts of a weak and vacillating politician to appease an angry mob thirsting for the blood of an innocent countryman. The carrying out of a sentence imposed in such circumstances, and under such conditions, may not inaptly be described as a judicial murder.

JESUS JUSTUS, jē'zus jus'tus (Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Ἰουστὸς, Iēsoús ho legómenos Ioustos, "Jesus that is called Justus," Col 4 11):

1. A Jew One of three friends of Paul—the by Birth others being Aristarchus and Mark—whom he associates with himself in sending salutations from Rome to the church at Colossae. Jesus Justus is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT, and there is nothing more known about him than is given in this passage in Col, viz. that he was by birth a Jew—"of the circumcision"—that he had been converted to Christ, and that he was one of the inner circle of intimate friends and associates of the apostle during his first Rom captivity.

The words also contain the information that at a stage in Paul's imprisonment, when the welcome extended to him by the Christians in Rome on his arrival there had lost its first warmth, and when in consequence, probably, of their fear of persecution, most of them had proved untrue and were holding aloof from him, J. J. and his two friends remained faithful. It would be pressing this passage unduly to make it mean that out of the large number—hundreds, or perhaps even one or two thousands—who composed the membership of the church in Rome at this time, and who within the next few years proved their loyalty to Christ by their steadfastness unto death in the Neroic persecution, all fell away from their affectionate allegiance to Paul at this difficult time. The words cannot be made to signify more than that it was the Jewish section of the church in Rome which acted in this unworthy manner—only temporarily, it is to be hoped. But among these Jewish Christians, to such dimensions had this defection grown that Aristarchus, Mark and J. J. alone were the apostle's fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God. These three alone, at that particular time—from among the Jewish Christians—were helping him in the work of the gospel in Rome. That this defection refers to the Jewish section of the church and not to the converts from among the Gentiles, is evident from many considerations. It seems to be proved, for example by ver 14 of the same chapter (i.e. Col 4 14), as well as by Philm ver 24, in both of which passages Paul names Demas and Luke as his fellow-laborers; and Luke was not a Jew by birth. But in the general failure of the Christians in Rome in their conduct toward Paul, it is with much affection and pathos that he writes concerning Aristarchus, Mark, and J. J., "These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, men that have been a comfort unto me."

(1) Ex 4 18 RVm, AVm. See JETHRO.

(2) Gideon's eldest son (Jgs 8 20), who was called upon by his father to slay Zebah and Zalmunnah, but "feared, because he was yet a youth." The narrative there (8 4 ff) should be connected with that of 6 34, where Gideon is followed by his clan, and not with that of ch 7, where he has 300 picked men. The captives would be taken to Orpah, Gideon's home, and slain there.

(3) Father of Amasa (1 K 2 5.32); he was an Ishmaelite according to 1 Ch 2 17="Ithra, the Israelite" of 2 S 17 25, where "the Ishmaelite" should be read for "the Israelite."

(4) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 32 bis).

(5) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 17).

(6) A man of Asher (1 Ch 7 38)="Ithran" of ver 37.

JETHETH, jē'theth (יֶתֶת, yēthēth, meaning unknown): A chief (or clan) of Edom (Gen 36 40 || 1 Ch 1 51), but probably a mistake for "Jether"="Ithran" (Gen 36 26).

JETHLAH, jeth'la (יֶתְלָה, yithlāh). See ITHLAH.

JETHRO, jeth'rō, jē'thrō (יֶתְרוֹ, yithrō, "excellence," Ex 3 1; 4 18b; 18 1-12 [in 4 18a, probably a textual error, יֶתֶר, yether, "Iether," AVm, RVm]; LXX always Ἰεθόρ, Iethór): The priest of Midian and father-in-law (hōthēn) of Moses.

It is not easy to determine the relation of J. to Reuel and Hobab. If we identify J. with Reuel as in Ex 2 18; 3 1 (and in Ant, III, iii; V, ii, 3), we must connect "Moses' father-in-law" in Nu 10 29 immediately with

1. His Relation to Reuel and Hobab "Reuel" (AV "Raguel"), and make Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses. But while it is possible that hōthēn may be used in the wider sense of a wife's relative, it is nowhere trā "brother-in-law" except in Jgs 1 16; 4 11 ("father-in-law," AV, RVm). If we insert, as Ewald suggests (HI, II, 25), "Jethro son of" before "Reuel" in Ex 2 18 (cf LXX ver 16, where the name "Jethro" is given), we would then identify J. with Hobab, the son of Reuel, in Nu 10 29, taking "Moses' father-in-law" to refer back to Hobab. Against this identification, however, it is stated that J. went away into his own country without any effort on the part of Moses to detain him (Ex 18 27), whereas Hobab, though at first he refused to remain with the Israelites, seems to have yielded to the pleadings of Moses to become their guide to Canaan (Nu 10 29-32; Jgs 1 16, where Kittel reads "Hobab the Kenite"; 4 11). It may be noted that while the father-in-law of Moses is spoken of as a "Midianite" in Ex, he is called a "Kenite" in Jgs 1 16; 4 11. From this Ewald infers that the Midianites were at that time intimately blended with the Amalekites, to which tribe the Kenites belonged (HI, II, 44).

When Moses fled from Egypt he found refuge in Midian, where he received a hearty welcome into the household of J. on account of the courtesy and kindness he had shown to the priest's 7 daughters in helping them to water their flock. This friendship resulted in J. giving Moses

2. His Hearty Reception of Moses his daughter, Zipporah, to wife (Ex 2 15-21). After Moses had been for about 40 years in the service of his father-in-law, the angel of the Lord appeared to him in the burning bush as he was keeping the flock at Horeb, commanding him to return to Egypt and deliver his enslaved brethren out of the hands of Pharaoh (3 1 ff). With J.'s consent Moses left Midian to carry out the Divine commission (4 18).

When tidings reached Midian of "all that God had done for Moses, and for Israel" in delivering them from Egypt bondage, J., with a natural pride in the achievements of his relative, set out on a visit to Moses, taking Zipporah and her two sons with him (Ex 18 1-12). On learning of his father-in-law's arrival at the "mount of God," Moses went out to meet him, and after a cordial exchange of courtesies they retired to Moses' tent, where a pleasant interview took place between them. We are told of the interest J. felt in all the particulars of the great deliverance, how he "rejoiced for all the goodness which Jeh had done to Israel," and how the conviction was wrought within him that Jeh was "greater than all gods; yea, in the thing wherein they dealt proudly against them" (ver 11). In this condition so expressed there is evidently a reference to the element by which the Egyptians thought in their high-handed pursuit they would be able to bring back Israel into bondage, but by which they were themselves overthrown.

It is worth noting that in the religious service in which J. and Moses afterward engaged, when J., as priest, offered a burnt offering, and Aaron with all the elders of Israel partook of the sacrificial feast, prominence was given to J. over Aaron, and thus a priesthood was recognized beyond the limits of Israel.

This visit of J. to Moses had important consequences for the future government of Israel (Ex 18 13-27). The priest of Midian

4. His Wise Counsel became concerned about his son-in-law when he saw him occupied from morning to night in deciding the disputes that had arisen among the people. The labor

this entailed, J. said, was far too heavy a burden for one man to bear. Moses himself would soon be worn out, and the people, too, would become weary and dissatisfied, owing to the inability of one judge to overtake all the cases that were brought before him. J., therefore, urged Moses to make use of the talents of others and adopt a plan of gradation of judges who would dispose of all cases of minor importance, leaving only the most difficult for him to settle by a direct appeal to the will of God. Moses, recognizing the wisdom of his father-in-law's advice, readily acted upon his suggestion and appointed "able men out of all Israel, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens." Thereafter, J. returned to his own country.

The story of J. reveals him as a man of singular attractiveness and strength, in whom a kind, considerate disposition, a deeply religious spirit, and a wise judgment all met in happy combination. And this ancient priest of Midian made Israel and all nations his debtors when he taught the distinction between the legislative and the judicial function, and the importance of securing that all law be the expression of the Divine will, and that its application be entrusted only to men of ability, piety, integrity and truth (Ex 18 21).

JETUR, jē'tur (יֶטֶר, yē'tūr, meaning uncertain): A "son" of Ishmael (Gen 25 15, 1 Ch 1 31); against this clan the two and a half tribes warred (1 Ch 5 18 f.); they are the Ituraeans of NT times. See ITURAEA.

JEUEL, jē-ū'el, jū'el (יְעֻֿל, yē'ū'el, meaning unknown):

(1) A man of Judah (1 Ch 9 6); the name is not found in the of Neh 11 24.

(2) A Levite, AV "Jeiel" (2 Ch 29 13).

(3) A companion of Ezra, AV "Jeiel" (Ezr 8 13).

(4) The name occurs also as K'thibh in 1 Ch 9 35; 2 Ch 26 11. See JEIEL, (2), (6).

JEUSH, jē'ush (יְעֻֿשׁ, yē'ūsh, probably "he protects," "he comes to help"; see HPN, 109; K'thibh is יְעֻֿשׁ, yē'ūsh, in Gen 36 5.14; 1 Ch 7 10):

(1) A "son" of Esau (Gen 36 5.14.18; 1 Ch 1 35). "The name is thought by some to be identical with that of an Arabian lion-god Yağut . . . , meaning 'helper,' whose antiquity is vouched for by inscriptions of Thamud" (Skinner, Gen, 432).

(2) A Benjamite (1 Ch 7 10), but probably a Zebulunite. See Curtis, Ch, 145 ff.

(3) A descendant of King Saul, AV "Jehush" (1 Ch 8 39).

(4) A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23 10.11).

(5) A son of King Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 19).

JEUZ, jē'uz (יְעֻֿז, yē'ūz, "he counsels"): The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8 10).

JEW, jū, jōō, JEWESS, JEWISH, jū'ish, jōō'ish (יְהוּדִי, yēhūdī, pl. יְהוּדִיִּם, yēhūdīm; Ioudaioi, Ioudaioi; adj. f. יְהוּדִיָּה, yēhūdīh; Ioudaïkós, Ioudaïkós): "Jew" denotes originally an inhabitant of Judah (2 K 16 6 applies to the two tribes of the Southern Kingdom), but later the meaning was extended to embrace all descendants of Abraham. In the OT the word occurs a few times in the sing. (Est 2 5; 3 4, etc.; Jer 34 9; Zec 8 23); very frequently in the pl. in Ezr and Neh, Est, and in Jer and Dnl. The adj. in the OT applies only to the "Jews' language" or speech (2 K 18 26.28 || Neh 13 24; Isa 36 11.13). "Jews" (always pl.) is the familiar term for Israelites in the Gospels (esp. in Jn), Acts, Epp., etc. "Jewess" occurs in 1 Ch 4 18; Acts 16 1; 24 24. In Tit 1 14 a warning is given against "Jewish fables" (in Gr the adj. is found also in Gal 2 14). The "Jews' religion" (Ioudaïsmós) is referred to in Gal 1 13.14. JEWEL, jū'el, jōō'el: An ornament of gold, silver or of precious stones in the form of armlet, bracelet, anklet, nose-ring, etc. Oriental dress yields itself freely to such adornment, to which there are many allusions in Scripture. A frequent term in Heb is k'li ("utensil," "vessel"), coupled with mention of "gold" or "silver" or both (Gen 24 53; Ex 3 22; 11 2; 12 35; 35 22; 1 S 6 8.15, etc.; RV in 2 Ch 32 27 trs "vessels"). In Cant 1 10, where AV has "rows [of jewels]," RV has "plaits [of hair]"; in 7 1, the word is from a root hālāh, meaning "to adorn." In 3 instances in AV "jewel" represents the Heb nezem (Prov 11 22; Isa 3 21; Ezk 16 12); ARV changes Prov 11 22 to "ring" (LXX here="earring"), and both ERV and ARV have "ring" in Ezk 16 12. The familiar phrase in Mal 3 17, "in that day when I make up my jewels," becomes in ERV, "in the day that I do make, even a peculiar treasure" (m "or, wherein I do make a peculiar treasure"), and in ARV, "even mine own possession, in the day that I make" (m "or, do this"). JEWRY, jū'ri, jōō'ri: In Dnl 5 13 AV, where RV has "Judah"; in the NT, in two places in AV, Lk 23 5; Jn 7 1, where RV has correctly "Judaea" (Ioudaia) (q.v.).

JEWS, jūz, jōōz. See JEW.

JEZANIAH, jēz-a-nī'a (יְזַנְיָהוּ, yēzanyāhū, probably "Jeh hears"; cf JAAZANIAH): In Jer 40 8, and also 42 1 where LXX has "Azariah," as in 43 2 (see Driver, Jer)=JAAZANIAH, (1) (q.v.).

JEZEBEL, jēz'ē-bel (יְזַבְעֵל, yēzēbel, "unexalted," "unhusbanded" [?]; יְזַבְעֵל, yēzēbel; see BDB; 1 K 16 31; 18 4.13.19; 19 1.2; 21 5 ff; 2 K 9 7 ff.30 ff; Rev 2 20): Daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, i.e. Phoenicians, and queen of Ahab, king of Northern Israel. Ahab (c 874-853 BC) carried out a policy, which his father had perhaps started, of making alliances with other states. The alliance with the Phoenicians was cemented by his marriage with J., and he subsequently gave his daughter Athaliah in marriage to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. His own union with Jezebel is regarded as a sin in 1 K 16 31, where the MT is difficult, being generally understood as a question. The LXX trs: "And it was not enough that he should walk in the sins of Jeroboam ben Nebat, he also took to wife Jezebel." etc. The Heb can be pointed to mean, "And it was the lightest thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam ben Nebat, he also took to wife Jezebel, and went and served Baal and worshipped him," i.e. all the other sins were light as compared with the marriage with Jezebel and the serving of Baal (cf Mic 6 16). Is this a justifiable view to take of the marriage? One answer would be that Ahab made a wise alliance; that Baal-worship was not non-Heb, that Ahab named his children not after Baal but after Jeh (cf Ahaziah, Jehoram, Athaliah), and that he consulted the prophets of Jeh (cf 1 K 22 6); further, that he only did what Solomon had done on a much larger scale; it may be added too that Ahab was in favor of religious toleration, and that Elijah and not the king is the persecutor. What then can be said for the unfavorable verdict of the Heb historians? That verdict is based on the results and effects of the marriage, on the life and character of J., and in that life two main incidents demand attention.

This is not described; it is only referred to in 1 K 18 4, "when J. cut off the prophets of Jeh"; and this shows the history of the time to 1. Persecution of 19 we are further told that "450 Jeh's prophets of Baal ate at her table" Prophets (commentators regard the reference to "400 prophets of the Asherah" as an addition). In 1 K 19 1 Ahab tells J. of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal by Elijah, and then J. (19 2) sends a messenger to Elijah to threaten his life. This leads to the prophet's flight, an object which J. had in view, perhaps, for she would hardly dare to murder Elijah himself. 2 K 9 7 regards the massacre of Ahab's family as a punishment for the persecution of the prophets by J.

Ahab expresses a desire to possess the vineyard neighboring upon his palace in Jezreel, owned by Naboth, who refuses to part with the family inheritance though offered either its money value or a better vineyard in exchange. Ahab

2. Jezebel's Plot Against Naboth

(1 K 21) is depressed at this, and J., upon finding the cause of his melancholy feelings, asks him sarcastically if he is not king, suggesting that as king his wishes should be immediately granted by his subjects. She thereupon plots to secure him Naboth's vineyard. J. sends letters sealed in Ahab's name to the elders of Naboth's township, and bids them arrange a public fast and make Naboth "sit at the head of the people" (RVm), a phrase taken by some to mean that he is to be arraigned, while it is explained by others as meaning that Naboth is to be given the chief place. Two witnesses—a sufficient number for that purpose—are to be brought to accuse Naboth of blasphemy and treason. This is done, and Naboth is found guilty, and stoned to death. The property is confiscated, and sent to the king (vs 1-16). Elijah hears of this, and is sent to threaten Ahab with Divine vengeance; dogs shall lick his dead body (ver 19). But in vs 20-23 this prophecy is made, not concerning Ahab but against Jezebel, and ver 25 attributes the sins of Ahab to her influence over him.

The prophecy is fulfilled in 2 K 9 30-37. Ahaziah and Jehoram had succeeded their father Ahab; the one reigned for 2 years (1 K 22 51), the other 12 years (2 K 3 1). Jehu heads a revolt against the house of Ahab, and one day comes to Jezreel. J. had "painted her eyes, and attired her head," and sees Jehu coming. She greets him sarcastically as his master's murderer. According to MT, Jehu asks, "Who is on my side? who?" but the text is emended by Klostermann, following LXX in the main, "Who art thou that thou shouldst find fault with me?" i.e. thou art but a murderess thyself. She is then thrown down and the horses tread upon her (reading "they trod" for "he trod" in ver 33). When search is afterward made for her remains, they are found terribly mutilated. Thus was the prophecy fulfilled. (Some comms. hold that Naboth's vineyard and Ahab's garden were in Samaria, and Naboth a Jezreelite. The words, "which was in Jezreel," of 1 K 21 1 are wanting in LXX, which has "And Naboth had a vineyard by the threshing-floor of Ahab king of Samaria." But cf 1 K 18 45; 21 23; 2 K 8 29; 9 10.15 ff.30 ff.) See AHAH; JEHU.

The character of J. is seen revived in that of her daughter, Athaliah of Judah (2 K 11); there is no doubt that J. was a powerful person.

3. Jezebel's ality. She brought the worship of Character the Phoen Baal and Astarte with her into Heb life, and indirectly introduced it into Judah as well as into the Northern Kingdom. In judging her connection with this propagation, we should bear in mind that she is not a queen of the 20th cent.; she must be judged in company with other queens famous in history. Her religious attitude and zeal might profitably be compared with that of Mary, queen of Scots. It must also be remembered that the introduction of any religious change is often resented when it comes from a foreign queen, and is apt to be misunderstood, e.g. the attitude of Greece to the proposal of Queen Olga to have an authorized edition of the Bible in modern Gr.

On the other hand, although much may be said that would be favorable to J. from the religious standpoint, the balance is heavy against her when we remember her successful plot against Naboth. It is not perhaps blameworthy in her that she upheld the religion of her native land, although the natural thing would have been to follow that of her adopted land (cf Ruth 1 16 f). The superiority of Jeh-worship was not as clear then as it is to us today. It may also be held that Baal-worship was not unknown in Heb life (cf Jgs 6 25 f), that Baal of Canaan had become incorporated with Jeh of Sinai, and that there were pagan elements in the worship of the latter. But against all this it must be clear that the Baal whom J. attempted to introduce was the Phoen Baal, pure and simple; he was another god, or rather in him was presented an idea of God very different from Jeh. And further, "in Phoenicia, where wealth and luxury had been enjoyed on a scale unknown to either Israel or the Canaanites of the interior, there was a refinement, if one may so speak, and at the same time a prodigality of vicious indulgences, connected with the worship of Baal and Astarte to which Israel had hitherto been a stranger. . . . It was like a cancer eating into the vitals or a head and heart sickness resulting in total decay (Isa 1 6). In Israel, moral deterioration meant political as well as spiritual death. The weal of the nation lay in fidelity to Jeh alone, and in His pure worship" (HPM, §213).

The verdict of the Heb historian is thus substantiated. J. is an example—an extreme one no doubt—of the bad influence of a highly developed civilization forcing itself with all its sins upon a community less highly civilized, but possessed of nobler moral and religious conceptions. She has parallels both in family and in national life. For a parallel to Elijah's attitude toward J. of the words of Carlyle about Knox in On Heroes and Hero-Worship, IV, esp. the section, "We blame Knox for his intolerance," etc.

In Rev 2 20, we read of Iezabel, "the woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess"; not "thy wife" (i.e. the wife of the bishop) RVm, but as Moffat (Expos Gr Test.) aptly renders, "that Jezebel of a woman alleging herself a prophetess." Some members of the church at Thyatira "under the sway of an influential woman refused to separate from the local guilds where moral interests, though not ostensibly defied, were often seriously compromised. . . . Her lax principles or tendencies made for a connection with foreign and compromising associations which evidently exerted a dangerous influence upon some weaker Christians in the city." Her followers "prided themselves upon their enlightened liberalism (ver 24)." Moffat rejects both the view of Schürer (Theol. Abhandlungen, 39 f), that she is to be identified with the Chaldaean Sibyl at Thyatira, and also that of Selwyn making her the wife of the local asiarch. "It was not the cults but the trade guilds that formed the problem at Thyatira." See also Zahn, Intro to the NT, § 73, n. 7; AHAH; BAAL; ELIJAH.

JEZREEL, jez'rē-el, jez'rēl (יֶזְרְעֵל, yizrē'el, "God soweth"):

(1) A city on the border of the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 18). It is named with Chesuloth and Shunem (modern Iksāl and 1. Territory Sōlam). It remained loyal to the house of Saul, and is mentioned as part of the kingdom over which Abner set Ishbosheth (2 S 2 9). From Jezreel came the tidings of Saul and Jonathan's death on Gilboa, which brought disaster to Mephibosheth (2 S 4 4). The city plays no important part in the history till the time of Ahab. Attracted, doubtless, by the fine position and natural charms of the place, he made it one of his royal residences, building here a palace (1 K 21 1). This was evidently on the eastern wall; and the gate by which Jehu entered was overlooked by the quarters of Queen Jezebel (2 K 9 30 f). The royal favor naturally enhanced the dignity of the city, and "elders" and "nobles" of Jezreel are mentioned (1 K 21 8, etc.). Under the influence of Jezebel, an institution for the worship of Baal was founded here, from which, probably, the men were drawn who figured in the memorable contest with Elijah on Carmel (2 K 10 11). "The tower in Jezreel" was part of the defences of the city. It commanded a view of the approach up the valley from Beth-shean—the way followed by the hordes of the E., who, from time immemorial, came westward for the rich pasture of the plain (2 K 9 17). It was necessary also to keep constant watch, as the district E. of the Jordan was always more unsettled than that on the W.; and danger thence might appear at any moment. The garden of Naboth seems to have lain to the E. of the city (2 K 9 21), near the royal domain, to which Ahab desired to add it as a garden of herbs (1 K 21 1 ff). See NABOTH. This was the scene of the tragic meetings between Elijah and Ahab (1 K 21 17 ff), and between Jehu and Joram and Ahaziah (2 K 9 21). Joram had returned to Jezreel from Ramoth-gilead to be healed of his wounds (9 15). By the gateway the dogs devoured Jezebel's body (vs 31 ff). Naboth had been stoned to death outside the city (1 K 21 13). Jos lays the scene by the fountain of Jezreel, and here, he says, the dogs licked the blood washed from the chariot of Ahab (Ant. VIII, xv, 6). This accords with 1 K 21 19; but 22 38 points to the pool at Samaria.

The site of Jezreel must be sought in a position where a tower would command a view of the road coming up the valley from Beth-shean. It has long been the custom to identify it with the modern village, Zer'in, on the northwestern spur of Gilboa. This meets the above condition; and it also agrees with the indications in Onom as lying between Legio (Leyān) and Scythopolis (Bēsan). Recently, however, Professor A. R. S. Macalister made a series of excavations here, and failed to find any evidence of ancient Israelite occupation. This casts doubt upon the identification, and further excavation is necessary before any certain conclusion can be reached. For the "fountain which is in Jezreel," see HAROD, WELL or.

JOAB, jō'ab (יֹאָב, yō'ābh, "Jeh is father"; יֹאָב, Iōāb):

(1) Son of Zeruah, David's sister. He was "captain of the host" (cf 2 S 19 13) under David.

(a) Joab is first introduced in the narrative of the war with Abner, who supported the claims of Ishbosheth to the throne against those

1. Joab of David (2 S 2 8—3 1). The two and Abner armies met, and on Abner's suggestion a tournament took place between 12 men from each side; a general engagement follows, and in this J.'s army is victorious. Asahel, J.'s brother, is killed in his pursuit of Abner, but the latter's army is sorely pressed, and he appeals to J. for a cessation of hostilities. J. calls a halt, but declares that he would not cease had Abner not made his plea.

(b) 2 S 3 12—29. Abner visits David at Hebron, and makes an alliance with David. He then leaves the town, apparently under royal protection. J. is absent at the time, but returns immediately after Abner's departure, and expostulates with David for not avenging Asahel's death, and at the same time attributes a bad motive to Abner's visit. He sends a message, no doubt in the form of a royal command, for Abner to return; the chief does so, is taken aside "into the midst of the gate" (or as LXX and commentators read, "into the side of the gate," 3 27), and slain there by J. David proclaims his own innocence in the matter, commands J. as well as the people to mourn publicly for the dead hero (3 31), composes a lament for Abner, and pronounces a curse upon J. and his descendants (ver 30 is regarded as an editorial note, and commentators change ver 39).

(a) 2 S 10 1—14; 1 Ch 19 1—15. David sends ambassadors with his good wishes to Hanun on his ascending the throne of the Ammon-

2. The Ammonites; these are ill-treated, and war follows, David's troops being commanded by J. On finding himself placed between the Ammonites on the one hand, and their Syrian allies on the other, he divides his army, and himself leads one division against the Syrians, leaving Abishai, his brother, to fight the Ammonites; the defeat of the Syrians is followed by the rout of the Ammonites.

(b) 2 S 10 15-19; 1 Ch 19 16-19 describes a second war between Hadarezer and David. J. is not mentioned here.

(c) 2 S 11 1 narrates the resumption of the war against the Ammonites; J. is in command, and the town of Rabbah is besieged. Here occurs the account of David's sin with Bathsheba, omitted by Ch. David gets J. to send Uriah, her husband, to Jerus, and when he refuses to break the soldier's vow (11 6-13), J. is used to procure Uriah's death in the siege, and the general then sends news of it to David (11 14-27). After capturing the 'water-city' of Rabbah, J. sends for David to complete the capture and lead the triumph himself (12 26-29).

(a) The next scene depicts J. attempting and succeeding in his attempt to get Absalom restored to royal favor. He has noticed that

3. Joab and Absalom "the king's heart is toward Absalom" (14 1), and so arranges for "a wise woman" of Tekoa to bring a supposed complaint of her own before the king, and then rebuke him for his treatment of Absalom. The plan succeeds. David sees J.'s hand in it, and gives him permission to bring Absalom to Jerus. But the rebel has to remain in his own house, and is not allowed to see his father (14 1-24).

(b) Absalom attempts to secure J.'s intercession for a complete restoration to his father's confidence. J. turns a deaf ear to the request until his field is put on fire by Absalom's command. He then sees Absalom, and gets David to receive his prodigal son back into the royal home (14 28-33).

(c) Absalom revolts, and makes Amasa, another nephew of David, general instead of J. (17 24f). David flees to Mahanaim, followed by Absalom. J. is given a third of the army, the other divisions being led by Abishai and Ittai. He is informed that Absalom has been caught in a tree (or thicket), and expostulates with the informer for not having killed him. Although he is reminded of David's tender plea that Absalom be kindly dealt with, he dispatches the rebel himself, and afterward calls for a general halt of the army. When David gives vent to his feelings of grief, he is sternly rebuked by J., and the rebuke has its effect (17-19 8a).

2 S 19 8b-15. On David's return to Jerus, Amasa is made "captain of the host" instead of J. (19 13). Then Sheba revolts, Amasa

4. Joab and Amasa loses time in making preparation for quelling it, and Abishai is bidden by David to take the field (20 6). The Syr VS reads "J." for "Abishai" in this verse, and some commentators follow it, but LXX supports MT. J. seems to have accompanied Abishai; and when Amasa meets them at Gibeon, J., on pretense of kissing his rival, kills him. He then assumes command, is followed by Amasa's men, and arranges with a woman of Abel beth-maacah to deliver to him Sheba's head. The revolt is then at an end.

J. subsequently opposed David's suggestion of a census, but eventually carried it out (2 S 24 1-9; 1 Ch 21 1-6), yet 1 Ch 21 6 and 27

5. Joab's Death 24 relate that he did not carry it out fully. He was one of Adonijah's supporters in his claim to the throne

(1 K 1 7.19.41). For this he had to pay the penalty with his life, being slain at the altar in the "Tent of Jeh" (1 K 2 28-34) by Benaiah, who acted upon Solomon's orders. His murderer became his successor as head of the army. 1 K 2 5 makes David advise Solomon not to forget that J. slew Abner and Amasa, and 1 K 11 14-22 contains a reference to the dread of his name in Edom. 1 Ch 11 6 makes him win his spurs first at the capture of Jerus, but

2 S 2, 3 are previous in time to this event (cf 2 S 5 6-10), and 1 Ch 11 8 makes him repair the city, while 1 Ch 26 28 refers to a dedication of armor by him.

In summing up J.'s character, we must remember the stirring times in which he lived. That he was a most able general, there is no doubt.

6. Joab's Character He was, however, very jealous of his position, and this accounts for Amasa's murder, if not partially for that of Abner too: if he was afraid that Abner would supplant him, that fear may be held to be justified, for Amasa, who had not been too loyal to David did take J.'s place for a time. But blood revenge for Asahel's death was perhaps the chief cause. Yet even when judged in the light of those rough times, and in the light of eastern life, the murder of Abner was a foul, treacherous deed (see Trumbull, Studies in Oriental Social Life, 129-31).

J. opposed the census probably because it was an innovation. His rebuke of David's great grief over Absalom's death can only be characterized as just; he is the stern warrior who, after being once merciful and forgiving, will not again spare a deceitful rebel; and yet David shows how a father's conduct toward a prodigal, rebellious son is not regulated by stern justice. J.'s unswerving loyalty to David leads one to believe that no disloyalty was meant by his support of Adonijah, who was really the rightful heir to the throne. But their plans were defeated by those of the harem, and J. had to pay the price with his life.

Taken as a whole, his life, as depicted in the very reliable narrative of 2 S and 1 K, may be said to be as characteristic of the times as that of David himself, with a truly Homeric ring about it. He was a great man, great in military prowess and also in personal revenge, in his loyalty to the king as well as in his stern rebuke of his royal master. He was the greatest of David's generals, and the latter's success and glory owed much to this noblest of that noble trio whom Zeruah bore.

JOACHAZ, jō'a-kaz (Ἰωαχά, Iōcház, Ἰεχονίας, Iechonías): Son of Josiah (1 Esd 1 34). In Mt 1 11 "Jechoniah" is the reading.

JOACIM, jō'a-sim. See JOAKIM.

JOADANUS, jō-a-dā'nus (Ἰωαννᾶνος, Iōadānos): In 1 Esd 9 19, apparently, through some corruption; the same as Gedaliah, a son of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, in Ezr 10 18.

JOAH, jō'a (יְהוֹאֵה, yō'āh, "Jeh is brother"):

(1) Son of Asaph and recorder under King Hezekiah (2 K 18 18.26; Isa 36 3.11.22); he was one of the 3 officers sent by the king to speak to the Assyrian envoys at the siege of Jerus (c 701 BC).

(2) In 1 Ch 6 21 (Heb 6); 2 Ch 29 12, a Levite (son of Zimma) = "Ethan" of 1 Ch 6 42 (Heb 27).

(3) A son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4).

(4) Son of Joahaz and recorder under King Josiah (2 Ch 34 8).

JOAHAZ, jō'a-haz (יְהוֹאָחָז, yō'āhāz, "Jeh has grasped" = "Jehoahaz"):

(1) Father of JOAH (4) (2 Ch 34 8).

(2) RV and Heb in 2 K 14 1 for Jehoahaz, king of Israel. See JEHOAHAZ.

(3) RV and Heb in 2 Ch 36 2.4 for JEHOAHAZ, king of Judah (q.v.).

JOAKIM, jō'a-kim (Ἰωακίμ, Iōakeim; AV Joacim):

(1) Jehoiakim, king of Judah and Jerus (1 Esd 1 37-39; Bar 1 3).

(2) Jehoiachin, son of (1) (1 Esd 1 43).

(3) Son of Jeshua (1 Esd 5 5), called by mistake son of Zerubbabel; in Neh 12 10.26 his name occurs as in 1 Esd, among the priests and Levites who returned to Jerus with Zerubbabel.

(4) High priest of Jerus in the time of Baruch (Bar 1 7).

(5) High priest in Jerus in the days of Judith who, along with "the ancients of the children of Israel," welcomed the heroine back to the city after the death of Holofernes (Jth 4). He cannot be identified with any of the high priests in the lists given in 1 Ch or in Jos, Ant, X, viii, 6. The word means "the Lord hath set up." It is probably symbolical, and tends with other names occurring in the narrative to establish the supposition that the book was a work of imagination composed to support the faith of the Jews in times of stress and difficulty.

(6) The husband of Susanna (Sus vs 1 ff), perhaps here also a symbolical name. J. HUTCHISON

JOANAN, jō-ā-nan (Ἰωάναν WH, Iōanán; Ἰωάννα TR, Iōanná; AV Joanna):

(1) A grandson of Zerubbabel in the genealogy of Jesus according to St. Luke (3 27).

(2) The son of Eliasib (1 Esd 9 1 AV, RV "Jonas").

JOANNA, jō-an'a (Ἰωάννα, Iōána, or Ἰωάννα, Iōánna): The wife of Chuzas, Herod's steward. She was one of the "women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities" which "ministered unto him [AV, i.e. Jesus, or "them"] RV, i.e. Jesus and His disciples" of their substance," on the occasion of Jesus' tour through Galilee (Lk 8 2.3). Along with other women she accompanied Jesus on His last journey from Galilee to Jerus, and was present when His body was laid in the sepulcher (Lk 23 55). She was thus among those who prepared spices and ointments, who found the grave empty, and who "told these things unto the apostles" (Lk 23 56-24 10). C. M. KERR

JOANNES, jō-an'es, jō-an'ez (Ἰωάννης, Iōánnēs; AV Johannes):

(1) Son of Acatan (1 Esd 8 38), called also "Johanan" in Ezr 8 12.

(2) Son of Bebai (1 Esd 9 29), called "Jehohan-an" in Ezr 10 28.

JOARIB, jō'a-rib (Ἰωαρίβ, Iōarib; AV Jarib): Ancestor of Mattathias (1 Macc 14 29), given as "Joarib" in AV of 1 Macc 2 1; he was chief of the first of the 24 courses of priests in the reign of David. Varieties of the name are Jarib, Joarib, and Jehoarib (1 Ch 24 7).

JOASH, jō'ash (יֹאשָׁה, yō'āsh, "Jeh is strong" or "Jeh has bestowed"; Ἰωάς, Iōás):

(1) Father of Gideon, of the clan of Abiezer and the tribe Manasseh (Jgs 6 11.29.30.31; 7 14; 8 13.29.32). Gideon declares (6 15) that the family is the poorest in Manasseh, words similar to those of Saul (1 S 9 21), and not to be taken too literally. J. would be a man of standing and wealth, for Gideon was able to command 10 servants to destroy the altar and the Asherah (Jgs 6 27.34), and also to summon the whole clan to follow him. Further, the altar that J. had was that used by the community (6 28), so that he would be the priest, not only of his own family quod paterfamilias, but also of the community in virtue of his position as chief. When Gideon destroyed the altar and the Asherah or sacred pillar by it, J. refused to deliver his son to death, declaring that Baal, if he was a god, should avenge himself (cf Elijah in 1 K 18).

(2) Called "the king's son" (1 K 22 26; 2 Ch 18 25; cf Jer 36 26; 38 6), or, less probably, "the son of Hammelech," RVm; perhaps a son of Ahab. Micaiah the prophet was handed over to his custody and that of Amon by Ahab.

(3) A Judahite, descendant of Shelah (1 Ch 4 22).

(4) A Benjamite recruit of David at Ziklag. Commentators read here, "J. the son of Shemaiah [or Jehoshama], the Gibeathite" (1 Ch 12 3).

(5) In 2 K 11 2, etc.=Jehoash, king of Judah.

(6) In 2 K 13 9, etc.=Jehoash, king of Northern Israel. DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JOASH (יֹאשָׁה, yō'āsh, "Jeh has aided"):

(1) A Benjamite, or, more probably, a Zebulunite (1 Ch 7 8).

(2) One of David's officers; J. was "over the cellars of oil" (1 Ch 27 28).

JOATHAM, jō'a-tham (Ἰωάθαμ, Iōátham): AV for RV "Jotham" (Mt 1 9). See JOTHAM (the king).

JOB, jōb (יֹב, yōb, meaning of name doubtful; some conjecturing "object of enmity," others "he who turns," etc., to God; both uncertain guesses; Ἰάβ, Iób): The titular hero of the Book of Job, represented as a wealthy and pious landholder who lived in patriarchal times, or at least conditions, in the land of Uz, on the borders of Idumaea. Outside of the Book of Job he is mentioned by Ezekiel (Ezk 14 14.20) as one of 3 great personages whose representative righteousness would presumably avail, if that of any individuals could, to redeem the nation; the other two being Noah, an ancient patriarch, and Daniel, a contemporary of the prophet. It is difficult to determine whether J. was an actual personage or not. If known through legend, it must have been on account of some such experience as is narrated in the book, an experience unique enough to have become a potent household word; still, the power and influence of it is due to the masterly vigor and exposition of the story. It was the J. of literature, rather than the J. of legend, who lived in the hearts of men; a character so commanding that, albeit fictitious, it could be referred to as real, just as we refer to Hamlet or Othello. It is not the way of Heb writers, however, to evolve literary heroes from pure imagination; they crave an authentic basis of fact. It is probable that such a basis, in its essential outlines, existed under the story of Job. It is not necessary to suppose, however, that the legend or the name was known to Israel from ancient times. Job is introduced (Job 1 1) as if he had not been known before. The writer, who throughout the book shows a wide acquaintance with the world, doubtless found the legend somewhere, and drew its meanings together for an undying message to his and all times. ## LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—The greatest production of the Heb Wisdom literature, and one of the supreme literary creations of the world. Its

1. Place in the Canon corresponds to the high estimation in which it was held; it stands in the 3d section, the "writings" (ktubhim) or Hagiographa, next after the two great anthologies Pss and Prov; apparently put thus near the head of the list for weighty reading and meditation. In the Gr Canon (which ours follows), it is put with the poetical books, standing at their head. It is one of 3 Scripture books, the others being Pss and Prov, for which the later Heb scholars (the Massoretes) employed a special system of punctuation to mark its poetic character.

The Book of Job was not one of the books designated for public reading in the synagogues, as were the Pent and the Prophets, or for

2. Rank and Readers occasional reading at feast seasons, as were the 5 megilloth or rolls. It was rather a book for private reading, and one whose subject-matter would appeal esp. to the more cultivated and thoughtful classes. Doubtless it was all the more intimately valued for this detachment from sanctuary associations; it was, like Prov, a people's book; and esp. among the cultivators of Wisdom it must have been from its first publication a cherished classic. At any rate, the patriarch Job (though whether from the legend or from the finished book is not clear; see Job) is mentioned as a well-known national type by Ezk (14 14.20); and James, writing to Jewish Christians (5 11), refers to the character of the patriarch as familiar to his readers. It was as one of the great classic stories of their lit., rather than as embodying a ritual or prophetic standard, that it was so universally known and cherished.

II. The Literary Framework.—In view of the numerous critical questions by which the interpretation of the book has been beclouded—questions of later alterations, additions, corruptions, dislocations—it may be well to say at the outset that what is here proposed is to consider the Book of Job as we have it before us today, in its latest and presumably definitive edition. It will be time enough to remove excrescences when a fair view of the book as it is, with its literary values and relations, makes us sure that there are such; see III, below. Meanwhile, as a book that has reached a stage so fixed and finished that at any rate modern tinkering cannot materially change it, we may consider what its literary framework does to justify itself. And first of all, we may note that preëminently among Scripture books it bears the matured literary stamp; both in style and structure it is a work, not only of spiritual edification, but of finished literary art. This may best be realized, perhaps, by taking it, as from the beginning it purports to be, as a continuously maintained story, with the consistent elements of plot, character scheme, and narrative movement which we naturally associate with a work of the narrator's art.

The story of the Book of Job is laid in the far-off patriarchal age, such a time as we find elsewhere

1. Setting of Time, Place and Scene represented only in the Book of Gen; a time long before the Israelitish state, with its religious, social and political organization, existed. Its place is "the land of Uz," a little-known region S.E. of Pal, on the borders of Edom; a place remote from the ways of thinking peculiar to Israelitish lawgivers, priests and prophets. Its scene is in the free open country, among mountains, wadies, pasture-lands, and rural towns, where the relations of man and man are more elemental and primitive, and where the things of God are more intimately apprehended than in the complex affairs of city and state. It is easy to see what the writer gains by such a choice of setting. The patriarchal conditions, wherein the family is the social and communal unit, enable him to portray worship and conduct in their primal elements: religious rites of the simplest nature, with the family head the unchallenged priest and intercessor (cf 1 4.5; 42 8), and without the austere exactions of sanctuary or temple; to represent God, as in the old folk-stories, as communicating with men in audible voice and in tempest; and to give to the patriarch or sheikh a function of counsel and succor in the community analogous to that of the later wise man or sage (cf ch 29). The place outside the bounds of Pal enables him to give an international or rather intercommunal tissue to his thought, as befits the character of the wisdom with which he is dealing, a strain of truth which Israel could and did share with neighbor nations. This is made further evident by the fact that in the discourses of the book, the designation of God is not Jeh (with one exception, 12 9), but Elohim or Eloah or Shaddai, appellatives rather than names, common to the Sem peoples. The whole archaic scene serves to detach the story from complex conditions of civilization, and enables the writer to deal with the inherent and intrinsic elements of manhood.

All the characters of the story, J. included, are from non-Palestinian regions. The chief spokesman of the friends, Eliphaz, who is

2. Characters and Personality from Teman, is perhaps intended to represent a type of the standard and orthodox wisdom of the day; Teman, and Edom in general being famed for wisdom (Jer 49 7; Ob vs 8.9). The characters of the friends, while representing in general a remarkable uniformity of tenet, are quite aptly individualized: Eliphaz as a venerable and devout sage who, with his eminent penetrativeness of insight, combines a yearning compassion; Bildad more as a scholar versed in the derived lore of tradition; and Zophar more impetuous and dogmatic, with the dogmatist's vein of intolerance. In Elihu, the young Aramaean who speaks after the others, the writer seems endeavoring to portray a young man's positiveness and absoluteness of conviction, and with it a self-conceit that quite outruns his ability. The Satan of the Prologue, who makes the wager with Jeh, is masterfully individualized, not as the malignant tempter and enemy of mankind, but as a spirit compact of impudent skepticism, who can appreciate no motive beyond self-advantage. Even the wife of J., with her peremptory disposition to make his affliction a personal issue with God, is not without an authentic touch of the elemental feminine. But high above them all is the character of J. himself, which, with all its stormy alternations of mood, range of assertion and remonstrance and growth of new conviction, remains absolutely consistent with itself. Nor can we leave unmentioned what is perhaps the hardest achievement of all, the sublime venture of giving the very words of God, in such a way that He speaks no word out of character nor measures His thought according to the standards of men.

The Prologue, chs 1 and 2, a few verses at the beginning of ch 32 (vs 1-6a), and the Epilogue (42 7-17) are written in narrative prose. The rest of the book (except the short sentences introducing the speakers) is in poetry; a poetic tissue conforming to the type of the later māshal (see under PROVERBS), which, in continuous series of couplets, is admirably adapted alike to imaginative sublimity and impassioned address. Beginning with J.'s curse of his day (ch 3), J. and his three friends answer each other back and forth in three rounds of speeches, complete except that, for reasons which the subject makes apparent, Zophar, the third friend, fails to speak the third time. After the friends are thus put to silence, J. speaks three times in succession (chs 26-31), and then "the words of J. are ended." At this point (ch 32) a fourth speaker, Elihu, hitherto unmentioned, is introduced and speaks four times, when he abruptly ceases in terror at an approaching whirlwind (37 24). Jeh speaks from the whirlwind, two speeches, each of which J. answers briefly (40 3-5; 42 1-6), or rather declines to answer. Such, which we may summarize in Prologue (chs 1, 2), Body of Discussion (3-42 6), and Epilogue (42 7-17), is the literary framework of the book. The substance of the book is in a way dramatic; it cannot, however, be called so truly a drama as a kind of forum of debate; its movement is too rigid for dramatic action, and it lacks besides the give-and-take of dialogue. In a book of mine published some years ago I ventured to call it "The Epic of the Inner Life," epic not so much in the technical sense, as in recognition of an underlying epos which for fundamental significance may be compared to the story underlying the Prometheus Bound of Aeschylus. It will not do, however, to make too much of either of these forms as designating the Book of Job; either term has to be accommodated almost out of recognition, because the Heb literary forms were not conceived according to the Gr categories from which our terms "epic" and "dramatic" are derived. A greater limitation on our appreciation of its form, I think, is imposed by those who regard it as a mixture of forms. It is too generally divided between narrative and didactic debate. To the Heb mind it was all a continuous narrative, in which the poetic discussion, though overweighting the current of visualized action, had nevertheless the movement and value of real events. It is in this light, rather than in the didactic, that we may most profitably regard it.

III. The Course of the Story.—To divide the story of J. into 42 parts, according to the 42 numbered chapters, is in the last degree arbitrary. Nothing comes of it except convenience in reading for those who wish to take their Job in little detached bits. The chapter division was no part of the original, and a very insignificant step in the later apprehension of the original. To divide according to the speeches of the interlocutors is better; it helps us realize how the conflict of views brought the various phases of the thought to expression; but this too, with its tempting three-times-three, turns out to be merely a framework; it corresponds only imperfectly with the true inwardness of the story's movement; it is rather a scheme than a continuity. We are to bear in mind that this Book of Job is fundamentally the inner experience of one man, as he rises from the depths of spiritual gloom and doubt to a majestic table-land of new insight and faith; the other characters are but ancillary, helps and foils, whose function is subordinate and relative. Hence, mindful of this inwardness of Job's experience, I have ventured to trace the story in 5 main stages, naming them according to the landing-stage attained in each.

The story begins (1 1-5) with a brief description of J. as he was before his trial began; the elements of his life, outer and inner, on which is to be raised the question of motive. A prosperous land holder of the land of Uz, distinguished far and wide as the greatest (i.e. richest) of the sons

A) To Job's of the East, his inner character corresponding to all appearance nothing lacking, a man "perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and turned away from evil." The typical Heb blessings of life were his to the full: wealth, honor, health, family. He is evidently set before us as the perfect example of the validity of the established Wisdom-tenet, that righteousness and Wisdom are identical (see under PROVERBS, THE BOOK OF), and that this is manifest in its visible rewards. This period of his life J. describes afterward by retrospect as his "autumn days," when the friendship or intimacy (רֵדָה, šōdh) of God was over his tent (see 29 4, and the whole ch). Nor are we left without a glimpse into his heart: his constant attitude of worship, and his tender solicitude lest, in their enjoyment of the pleasures of life, his sons may have been disloyal to God (1 4, 5). It is easy to see that not J. alone, but Wisdom as embodied in J., is postulated here for its supreme test.

1. His "Autumn Days"

Nor is the test delayed, or its ground ambiguous when it comes. Satan proposes it. Two scenes are given (1 6-12; 2 1-6) from the court of God, wherever that is; for they are overheard by the reader, not seen, and of course neither J. nor any inhabitant of earth is aware of them.

2. The Wager in Heaven

In these scenes the sons of God, the spirits who rejoiced over creation (38 7), are come together to render report, and Satan, uninvited, enters among them. He is a wandering spirit, unanchored to any allegiance, who roams through the earth, prying and criticizing. There is nothing, it would seem, in which he cannot find some flaw or discount. To Jeh's question if he has considered J., the man perfect and upright, he makes no denial of the fact, but raises the issue of motive: "Doth J. fear God for nought?" and urges that J.'s integrity is after all only a transparent bargain, a paying investment with only reward in view. It is virtually an arraignment both of God's order and of the essential human character: of God's order in connecting righteousness so intimately with gain; and of the essential human character, virtually denying that there is such a thing as disinterested, intrinsic human virtue. The sneer strikes deep, and J., the perfect embodiment of human virtue, is its designated victim. Satan proposes a wager, to the issue of which Jeh commits Himself. The trial of J. is carried out in two stages: first against his property and family, with the stipulation that it is not to touch him; and then, this failing to detach him from his allegiance, against his person in sore disease, with the stipulation that his life is to be spared. Jeh acknowledges that for once He is consenting to an injustice (2 3), and Satan, liar that he is, uses instrumentalities that men have ascribed to God alone: the first time, tempest and lightning (as well as murderous foray), the second time, the black leprosy, a fell disease, loathsome and deadly, which in men's minds meant the immediate punitive stroke of God. The evil is as absolute as was the reward; a complete reversal of the order in which men's wisdom had come to trust. But in the immediate result, Jeh's faith in His noblest creature is vindicated. Urged by his wife in his extremity to "curse God and die," J. remains true to his allegiance; and in his staunch utterance, "Jeh gave, and Jeh hath taken away; blessed be the name of Jeh," J., as the writer puts it, 'sinned not, nor attributed aught unbecoming [תִּפְלָה, tiphlah, lit. "tasteless"] to God.' Such is the first onset of J.'s affliction and its result. It remains to be seen what the long issue, days and months of wretchedness, will bring forth.

We are now to imagine the lapse of some time, perhaps several months (cf 7 3), during which J.

suffers alone, an outcast from house and society, on a leper's ash-heap.

3. The Silent Friends Meanwhile three friends of his who have heard of his affliction make an appointment together and come from distant regions to give him sympathy and comfort

(2 11-13). On arriving, however, they find things different from what they had expected; perhaps the ominous nature of his disease has developed since they started. What they find is a man wretched and outcast, with a disease (elephantiasis) which to them can mean nothing but the immediate vengeance of God. The awful sight gives them pause. Instead of condoling with him, they sit silent and dismayed, and for seven days and nights no word is spoken (cf Isa 53 3). What they were debating with themselves during that time is betrayed by the after-course of the story. How can they bless one whom God has stamped with His curse? To do so would be taking sides with the wicked. Is it not rather their duty to side with God, and be safe, and let sympathy go? By this introduction of the friends and their averted attitude, the writer with consummate skill brings a new element into the story, the element of the Wisdom-philosophy; and time will show whether as a theoretical thing, cold and intellectual, it will retain or repress the natural outwelling of human friendship. And this silence is ominous.

The man who, in the first onset of trial, blessed

Jeh and set himself to bear in silence now opens his mouth to curse. His curse is directed,

4. Whose Way Is Hid not against Jeh nor against the order of things, but against the day of his birth. It is a day that has ceased to have meaning or worth for him. The day stands for life, for his individual life, a life that in the order of things should carry out the personal promise and fruitage for which it had been bestowed. And his quarrel with it is that he has lost its clue. Satan unknown to him has sneered because Jeh had hedged him round with protection and favor (1 10);

but his complaint is that all this is removed without cause, and God has hedged him round with darkness.

His way is hid (3 23). Why then was life given at all?

In all this, it will be noted, he raises no train of introspection to account for his condition; he assumes no sinfulness, nor even natural human depravity; the opposite rather, for a baffling element of his case is his shrinking sensitiveness against evil and disloyalty

(cf 3 25, 26, in which the tenses should be past, with 1 5; see also 6 30; 16 17). His plight has become sharply, poignantly objective; his inner self has no part in it. Thus in this opening speech he strikes the keynote of the real, against which the friends' theories rage and in the end wreck themselves.

With all the gentle regret of having to urge a disagreeable truth the friends, beginning with Eliphaz, the wisest and most venerable,

B) To Job's Ultimatum of Protest enter upon their theory of the case. Eliphaz covers virtually the whole ground; the others come in mainly to echo or emphasize. He veils his reproof in general and implicatory terms, the seasoned

terms of wisdom in which Job himself is expert

(4 3-5); reminds him that no righteous man perishes, but that men reap what they sow (4 7, 8); adduces a vision that he had had which revealed to him that man, by the very fact of being mortal, is impure and iniquitous (4 17-19);

implies that J.'s turbulence of mind precludes him from similar revelations, and jeopardizes his soul (5 1, 2); advises him to commit his case to God, with the implication, however, that it is a case needing correction rather than justification, and that the result in view is restored comfort and prosperity. As J.

answers with a more passionate and detailed portrayal of his wrong, Bildad, following, abandons the indirect impeachment and attributes the children's death to their sin (8 4), saying also that if J. were pure and upright he might supplicate and regain

God's favor (8 5, 6). He then goes on to draw a lesson from the traditional Wisdom lore, to the effect that sure destruction awaits the wicked and sure felicity the righteous (8 11-22). On J.'s following this with his most positive arraignment of God's order and claim for light, Zophar replies with impetuous heat, averring that J.'s punishment is less than he deserves (11 6), and reproving him for his presumption in trying to find the secret of God (11 7-12). All three of the friends, with increasing emphasis, end their admonitions in much the same way; promising J. reinstatement in God's favor, but always with the veiled implication that he must own to iniquity and entreat as a sinner.

To the general maxims of Wisdom urged against him, with which he is already familiar (cf 13 2),

J.'s objection is not that they are

2. Wisdom Untrue, but that they are insipid

(6 6, 7); they have lost their appli-

Friends cation to the case. Yet it is pain to Doubtful him to think that the words of the Holy One should fail; he longs to die rather than deny them (6 9, 10). One poignant element of his sorrow is that the intuitive sense

(tūshiyāh; see under PROVERBS, THE BOOK OF) is driven away from him; see 6 13. He is irritated by the insinuating way in which the friends beg the question of his guilt; longs for forthright and sincere words (6 25). It is this quality of their speech, in fact, which adds the bitterest drop to his cup; his friends, on whom he had counted for support, are deceitful like a dried-up brook (6 15-20);

he feels, in his sick sensitiveness, that they are not sympathizing with him but using him for their cold, calculating purposes (6 27). Thus is introduced one of the most potent motives of the story, the motive of friendship; much will come of it when

from the fallible friendships of earth he conquers his way by faith to a friendship in the unseen (cf 16 19; 19 27).

With the sense that the old theories have become stale and pointless, though his discernment of the evil of things is undulled by sin (6 30),

3. Crookedness of the Order of Things J. arrives at an extremely poignant realization of the hardness and crookedness of the world-order, the result both of what the friends are saying and of what he has always held in common with them. It is the view that is forced upon him by the sense that he is unjustly dealt with by a God who renders no reasons, who on the score of justice vouchsafes to man neither insight nor recourse, and whose severity is out of all proportion to man's sense of worth (7 17) or right (9 17) or claim as a creature of His hand (10 8-14). Ch 9, which contains J.'s direct address to this arbitrary

Being, is one of the most tremendous, not to say audacious conceptions in literature; in which a mortal on the threshold of death takes upon himself to read God a lesson in godlikeness. In this part of the story J. reaches his ultimatum of protest; a protest amazingly sincere, but not blasphemous when we realize that it is made in the interest of the Godlike.

The great lack which J. feels in his arraignment of God is the lack of mediation between Creator and creature, the Oppressor and His victim. There is no umpire between them, who might lay his hand upon both, so that the wronged one might have a voice in the matter (9 32-35). The

4. No Mediation in Sight two things that an umpire might do to remove God's afflicting hand, and to prevent God's terror from unmaning His victim (see 13 20-22, as compared with the passage just cited), are the great need to restore normal and reciprocal relations with Him whose demand of righteousness is so inexorable. This umpire or advocate idea, thus propounded negatively, will grow to a sublime positive conviction in the next stage of J.'s spiritual progress (16 19; 19 25-27).

As the friends finish their first round of speeches, in which a remote and arbitrary God is urged upon him as everything, and man so corrupt and blind that he cannot but be a worm and culprit (cf 25 4-6), J.'s eyes, which hitherto have seen with theirs, are suddenly opened. His first complaint of their professed friendship was that it was fallible; instead of sticking to him when he needed them most (6 14), and in spite of his bewilderment (6 26), they were making it virtually an article of traffic (6 27), as if it were a thing for their gain. It was not sincere, not intrinsic

C) To Job's Ultimatum of Faith to their nature, but an expedient. And now all at once he penetrates to its motive. They are deserting him in order to curry favor with God. That motive has prevented them from seeing true; they see only their theoretical God, and are respecting His person instead of responding to the inner dictate of truth and integrity. To his honest heart this is monstrous; they ought to be afraid of taking falseness for God (13 3-12). Nor does his inference stop with thus detecting their false note. If they are "forgers of lies" in this respect, what of all their words of wisdom? They have been giving him "proverbs of ashes" (13 12); the note of false implication is in them all. From this point therefore he pays little attention to what they say; lets them go on to grossly exaggerated statement of their tenet, while he opens a new way of faith for himself, developing the germs of insight that have come to him.

1. Detecting the Friends' False Note Having cut loose from all countenancing of the friends' self-interested motives, J. now, with the desperate sense of taking his life in his hand and abandoning hope, resolves that come what will he will maintain his ways to God's face. This, as he believes, is not only the one course for his integrity, but his one plea of salvation, for no false one shall appear before him. How tremendous the meaning of this resolve, we can think when we reflect how he has just taken God in hand to amend His supposed iniquitous order of things; and that he is now, without mediator, pleading the privilege that a mediator would secure (13 20.21; see 8, above) and urging a hearing on his own charges. The whole reach of his sublime faith is involved in this.

2. Staking All on Integrity In two directions his faith is reaching out; in both negatively at first. One, the belief in an Advocate, has already been broached, and is germinating from negative to positive. The other, the question of life after death, rises here in the same tentative way: using first the analogy of the tree which sprouts again after it is cut down (14 7-9), and from it inquiring, 'If a man die—might he live again?' and dwelling in fervid imagination on the ideal solution which a survival of death would bring (14 13-17), but returning to his reluctant negative, from the analogy of drying waters (14 11)

3. "If a Man Die" and the slow wearing down of mountains (14 18.19). As yet he can treat the idea only as a fancy; not yet a hope or a grounded conviction.

The conviction comes by a nobler way than fancy, by the way of his personal sense of the just and Godlike order. The friends in their

4. The Surviving Next of Kin second round of speeches have begun their lurid portrayals of the wicked man's awful fate; but until all have spoken again he is concerned with a far more momentous matter. Dismissing these for the present as an academic exercise composed in cold blood (16 4.5), and evincing a heart hid from understanding (17 4), he goes on to recount in the most bitter terms he has yet used the flagrancy of his wrong as something that calls out for expiation like the blood of Cain (16 18), and breaks out with the conviction that his witness and voucher who will hear his prayer for mediation is on high (16 19-21). Then after Bildad in a spiteful retort has matched his complaint with a description of the calamities of the wicked (an augmented echo of Eliphaz), and he has pathetically bewailed the treachery of earthly friends (19 13.14.21.22), he mounts, as it were, at a bound to the sublime ultimatum of his faith in an utterance which he would fain see engraved on the rock forever (19 23-29). "I know that my Redeemer liveth," he exclaims;

lit. my Go'el (גֹּאֵל, gō'ālī), or next of kin, the person whose business in the old Heb idea was to maintain the rights of an innocent wronged one and avenge his blood. He does not recede from the idea that his wrong is from God (cf 19 6.21); but over his dust stands his next of kin, and as the result of this one's intercession J., in his own integral person, shall see God no more a stranger. So confident is he that he solemnly warns the friends who have falsely impeached him that it is they, not he, who are in peril (19 28.29; cf 13 10.11).

That in this conviction of a living Redeemer J.'s faith has reached firm and final ground is evident from the fact that he does not

D) To Job's Verdict on Things as They Are recur to his old doubts at all. They are settled, and settled right. But now, leaving them, he can attend to what the friends have been saying. Zophar, the third speaker, following, presses to vehement extreme their iterated portrayal of the wicked man's terrific woes; it seems the design of the writer to make them outdo themselves in frantic overstatement of their thesis. As Zophar ceases, and J. has thus, as it were, drawn all their fire, J. refutes them squarely, as we shall presently see.

1. Climax and Subsidence of the Friends' Charge Meanwhile, in the course of his extended refutation, the friends begin a third round of speeches. Eliphaz, who has already taken alarm at the tendency of J.'s words, as those of a depraved skeptic and ruinous to devotion (15 4-6), now in the interests of his orthodoxy brings in his bill of particulars. It is the kind of theoretical cant that has had large prevalence in dogmatic religion, but in J.'s case atrociously false. He accuses J. of the most heartless cruelties and frauds (22 5-11), and of taking occasion to indulge in secret wickedness when God was not looking (22 12-14); to this it is that he attributes the spiritual darkness with which J. is encompassed. Then in a beautiful exhortation—beautiful when we forget its unreal condition (22 23)—he ends by holding open to J. the way of reinstatement and peace. This is the last word of the friends that has any weight. Bildad follows J.'s next speech indeed very briefly (ch 25), giving a last feeble echo of their doctrine of total depravity; a reply which

J. ridicules and carries on in a kind of parody (ch 26). Zophar does not speak a third time at all. He has nothing to say. And this silence of his is the writer's way of making the friends' theory subside ingloriously.

The idea that J. has a defensible cause or sees farther than they is wholly lost on the friends; to them he is simply a wicked man tormented by the consciousness of guilt, and they attribute the tumult of his thoughts to a wrath, or vexation, which blinds and imperils his soul (cf 5 2; 18 4). That is not the cause of his dismay at all, nor is it merely that his personal fate is inscrutable (cf 23 17 m). He is confounded rather, even to horror, because the probable facts of the world-order prove the utter falsity of all that they allege. Leaving his case, the righteous man's, out of the account, he sees the wicked just as prosperous, just as secure, just as honored in life and death, as the righteous (21 5-15.29-33). The friends ought to see so plain a fact as well as he (21 29). To all outward appearance there is absolutely no diversity of fate between righteous and wicked (21 23-26). The friends' cut-and-dried Wisdom-doctrine and their thrifty haste to justify God (cf 13 7.8) have landed them in a lie; the truth is that God has left His times mysterious to men (24 1). They may as well own to the full the baffling fact of the impunity of wickedness; the whole of ch 24 is taken up with details of it. Wisdom, with its rigid law of reward and punishment, has failed to penetrate the secret. A hard régime of justice, work and wage, conduct and desert, does not sound the deep truth of God's dealings, either with righteous or wicked. What then? Shall Wisdom go, or shall it rise to a higher level of outlook and insight?

In some such dim inquiry as this, it would seem, J. goes on from where his friends sit silenced to figure some positive solution of things as they are. He begins with himself as they are. He begins with himself and his steadfastly held integrity, sealing his utterance by the solemn Hebrew oath (27 2-6), and as solemnly disavowing all part or sympathy with the wicked (27 7; cf 21 16). He has already found a meaning in his own searching experience; he is being tried for a sublime assay, in which all that is permanent and precious in him shall come out as gold (23 10). But this thought of manhood in the ore is no monopoly of his; it may hold for all. What then of the wicked? In a passage which some have deemed the lost third speech of Zophar (27 8-23), and which, indeed, recounts what all the friends have seen (27 12), he sets forth the case of the wicked in its true light. The gist of it is that the wicked have not the joy of God (27 10), or the peace of a permanent hope. It is in much the same tone as the friends' diatribes, but with a distinct advance from outward disaster toward tendency and futility. The ore is not being purged for a noble assay; and this will work their woe. Then finally, in the celebrated ch 28, comes up the summary of wisdom itself. That remains, after all this testing of motive, a thing intact and elemental; and man's part in it is just what J.'s life has been, to fear God and shun evil (28 28).

3. Manhood in the Ore

As the crowning pronouncement on things as they are, J. in his final and longest speech, describes in a beautiful retrospect his past life, from his "autumn days" when the friends' friendship of God was over his tent

4. Job Reads His Indictment

and he was a counselor and benefactor among men (ch 29), through this contrasted time of his wretchedness and curse-betraying disease, when the most degraded despise him

(ch 30), until now as he draws consciously near the grave, he recounts in solemn review the principles and virtues that have guided his conduct—a noble summary of the highest Heb ideals of character (ch 31). This he calls, in sublime irony, the indictment which his Adversary has written; and like a prince, bearing it upon his shoulder and binding it to him like a crown, he is ready to take it with him beyond the bourn to the presence of his Judge. With this tremendous proposal, sanctioned Hebrew-fashion by a final curse if it prove false, the words of J. are ended.

The friends are silenced, not enlightened. They have clung to their hard thesis to the stubborn end; postulating enough overt crime on J.'s part to kill him (22 5-9), and clinching their hypothesis with their theory of innate depravity (4 18.19; 15 14.15; 25 4-6) and spiritual hebetude (5 2; 15 26.27; 22 10.11); but toward J.'s higher level of honest integrity and exploring faith they have not advanced one inch; and here they lie, fossilized dogmatists, fixed and inveterate in their odium theologicum—a far cry from the friendship that came from afar to condole and console. J., on the other hand, staking all on the issue of his integrity, has held on his way in sturdy consistency (cf 17 9), and stood his ground before the enigma of things as they are. Both parties have said their say; the story is evidently ready for its dénouement. J., too, is ready for the determining word, though it would seem he expects it to be spoken only in some unseen tribunal; the friends rather savagely wish that God would speak and reprove Job for his presumption (cf 11 5.11). But how shall the solution be brought about in this land of Uz where all may see? And above all, how shall it affect the parties concerned? A skilfully told story should not leave this out.

For this determining pronouncement the writer has chosen to have both parties definitely represented, apparently at their best. So, instead of proceeding at once to the summons from the whirlwind, he introduces here a new character, Elihu, a young man, who has listened with growing impatience to the fruitless discussion, and now must set both parties right or burst (32 19). It is like the infusion of young blood into a theodicy too arrogant in its antiquity (cf 8 8-10; 15 10.18; 12 12 m, or better as question). This character of Elihu is conceived in a spirit of satire, not without a dash of grim humor. His self-confidence, not to say conceit, is strongly accentuated (32 11-22); he assumes the umpire function for which J. has pleaded (33 6.7; cf 9 33-35; 13 20-22); and is sure he represents the perfect in knowledge (36 2-4; 37 16). He speaks four times, addressing himself alternately to J. and the friends. His words, though designedly diffuse, are not without wisdom and beauty; he makes less of J.'s deep-seated iniquity than do the friends, but blames him for speaking in the wicked man's idiom (34 7-9.36.37), and warns him against inclining more to iniquity than submission (36 21); but his positive contribution to the discussion is the view he holds of the chastening influence of dreams and visions (33 14-18; cf 7 13-15), and of the pains of disease (33 19-28), esp. if the sufferer has an "angel [messenger] interpreter" to reveal its meaning, such a one perhaps as Elihu feels himself to be. As he proceeds in his speech, his words indicate that a storm is rising; and so long as it is distant he employs it to descant on the wonders of God in Nature, wonders which to him mean little more than arbitrary marvels of power; but as it approaches nearer and shows exceptional phenomena

1. The Self-constituted Interpreter

For this determining pronouncement the writer has chosen to have both parties definitely represented, apparently at their best. So, instead of proceeding at once to the summons from the whirlwind, he introduces here a new character, Elihu, a young man, who has listened with growing impatience to the fruitless discussion, and now must set both parties right or burst (32 19). It is like the infusion of young blood into a theodicy too arrogant in its antiquity (cf 8 8-10; 15 10.18; 12 12 m, or better as question). This character of Elihu is conceived in a spirit of satire, not without a dash of grim humor. His self-confidence, not to say conceit, is strongly accentuated (32 11-22); he assumes the umpire function for which J. has pleaded (33 6.7; cf 9 33-35; 13 20-22); and is sure he represents the perfect in knowledge (36 2-4; 37 16). He speaks four times, addressing himself alternately to J. and the friends. His words, though designedly diffuse, are not without wisdom and beauty; he makes less of J.'s deep-seated iniquity than do the friends, but blames him for speaking in the wicked man's idiom (34 7-9.36.37), and warns him against inclining more to iniquity than submission (36 21); but his positive contribution to the discussion is the view he holds of the chastening influence of dreams and visions (33 14-18; cf 7 13-15), and of the pains of disease (33 19-28), esp. if the sufferer has an "angel [messenger] interpreter" to reveal its meaning, such a one perhaps as Elihu feels himself to be. As he proceeds in his speech, his words indicate that a storm is rising; and so long as it is distant he employs it to descant on the wonders of God in Nature, wonders which to him mean little more than arbitrary marvels of power; but as it approaches nearer and shows exceptional phenomena as of a theophany, his words become incoherent, and he breaks off with an abject attempt to disclaim his pretensions. Such is the effect, with him, of the near presence of God. It overwhelms, paralyzes, stops the presumptuous currents of life.

The writer of the book has not committed the literary fatuity of describing the whirlwind, except as Elihu has seen its oncoming, first with conceit of knowledge, then with wild access of terror—a description in which his essentially vapid personality is reflected. For the readers the significance of the whirlwind is in the Voice it incloses, the thing it says. And here the writer has undertaken the most tremendous task ever attempted by the human imagination: to make the Almighty speak, and speak in character. And one fatuity at least he has escaped; he has not made God bandy arguments with men, or piece together the shifting premises of logic. The whole of the two discourses from the whirlwind is descriptive; a recounting of observable phenomena of created nature, from the great elemental things, earth and sea and light and star and storm, to the varied wonders of animal nature—all things in which the questing mind of man may share, laying hold in his degree on its meaning or mystery. Thus, as a sheer literary personation, it fails at no point of the Godlike. It begins with a peremptory dismissal of Elihu: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" (38 2). Then J. is bidden gird up his loins like a strong man, and listen and answer. The fact that J. alone, of all the company, can stand, as it were, on common terms with God is premonitory of the outcome. Of the two Divine discourses, the first (chs 38, 39) emphasizes more especially the unsearchable wisdom of creation; and the lesson it brings home to J. is that a being who is great enough—or presumptuous enough—to criticize and censure is great enough to resolve his own criticism (40 2). To this, of course, J. has no answer; he has presented his plea, which he neither adds to nor takes back (40 3-5). Resuming, then, the Voice in the second discourse (40 6-41 34) goes on to describe two great beasts, as it were, elemental monsters of Nature: Behemoth—probably the hippopotamus—vast in resisting and overcoming power, yet unaware of it, and easily subduable by man; and Leviathan—probably the crocodile—a wonder of beautiful adaptedness to its function in Nature, yet utterly malignant, unsubduable, untamable. And the lesson brought home to J. by this strange distribution of creative power is that he, who has called in question God's right to work as He does, had better undertake to lower human pride and "tread down the wicked where they stand" (40 12), thus demonstrating his ability to save himself and manage mankind (40 14). By this illuminating thought J.'s trenchancy of demand is utterly melted away into contrition and penitence (42 1-6); but one inspiring effect is his, the thing indeed which he has persistently sought (cf 23 3): God is no more a hearsay, such as the friends have defended and his Wisdom has speculated about; his eye sees Him here on earth, and in his still unremoved affliction, no stranger, but a wise and communicable Friend, just as his confident faith had pictured he would, in some embodied sphere beyond suffering (19 27).

2. The Whirlwind and the Voice

Two of the parties in the story have met the august theophany, and it has wrought its effect on them according to the spirit of the man. The self-constituted interpreter, Elihu, has collapsed as suddenly as he swelled up and exhibited himself. The man of integrity, J., has reached the beatific goal of his quest. What now of the friends who came from far to confirm their Wisdom, and who were so sure they were defending the mind of God? They are not left without a sufficing word, addressed straight to their spokesman Eliphaz (42 7); but their way to light is through the man whose honesty they outraged. Eliphaz' closing words had promised mediatorial power to Job if he would return from iniquity and acquaint himself with God (22 30); Job is now the mediator, though he has held consistently to the terms they reprobated. And the Divine verdict on them is: "Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant J. hath" (42 7). These are the words of the Being who acknowledged that in permitting this whole trial He was 'swallowing Job up causelessly' (2 3). J.'s honest and immensely revelatory words, anger, remonstrance, bold arraignment of God's way and all, were "the thing that is right." There is no more tremendous Divine pronouncement in all Scripture than this.

3. The Thing That Is Right

Here certain myopic students of the Book of Job think the story should end. It offends them, apparently, to see Satan's work undone;

4. The Restored Situation

if they had had the making of the story they would have left J. still suffering, as if disinterested virtue could not be its own reward without it. The author, at least the final author, evidently did not think so; in the ideals and sanctions that prevailed in his age he knew better what he was about. It is not my business to cut the book to a modern pattern, but to note what is there. J. is restored to health, to double his former wealth, to family and honor and a ripe old age. These were what the friends predicted for him on condition of his owing to guilt and calling injustice desert; but in no word of his has he intimated that worldly reinstatement was his wish or his object, the contrary rather. And what he sought he obtained, in richer measure than he sought; obtained it still in suffering, and on earth, "in the place where all may see" (cf 34 26 m). It is no discount to the value of this, nor on the other hand is it an essential addition, to express it not only in spiritual terms, but in terms current among men. And one fundamental thing this restored situation shows, or at least takes for granted, namely, that the quarrel has not been with Wisdom itself, its essence or its sanctions, but only with its encroaching false motive. Deepened, not invaded, its Newtonian law that it is well with the righteous, ill with the wicked, remains intact, an external sanction to live by, in spite of temporal exceptions. A spiritual principle of great significance, too, seems to be indicated, as it were, furtively, in the words, "And Jeh turned the captivity of J., when he prayed for his friends." He had stood on his integrity demanding his right, and became a self-loathing penitent; out of dust and ashes he prayed for his friends, and became again such a power in health and wealth as he had been in his "autumn days."

IV. The Problem and the Purpose.—If the foregoing section has rightly shown that the main thrust and interest of the Book of Job

1. Beyond the Didactic Tether lies not in its debate but in its narrative, we have therein the best clue to its problem and its purpose. The sublime self-portrayal of a man who held fast his integrity against God and man and death and darkness tells its own story and teaches its own lesson, beyond the power of didactic propositions or deductions to compass. The book is not a sermon but a vital, throbbing uprise of the human spirit. It is warm with the life of sound manhood, the inner life with its hopes, its doubts, its convictions, its supreme affiance; to impose on this any tether of didacticism is to chill its spirit and make it dogmatic and academic. The reading of its problem which mainly holds the field today is expressed in the question, "Why does God afflict the righteous?" and so the book is resolved into a theodicy, a justification of God's ways with man. Well, the friends of J. do their best to make their interpretation a theodicy, even outraging palpable fact to do it; they monopolize the didactic element of the poem; but their chief contention is that God does not afflict the righteous but the wicked, and that J. is a flagrant case in point who adds rebellion to his sin (cf 34 37). J. does not know why God afflicts the righteous; he only knows that it is a grievous fact, which to him seems utterly un-Godlike. God knows, undoubtedly, but He does not tell. Yet all the while an answer to the question is shaping itself in personality, in intrinsic manhood, in the sturdy truth and loyalty of J.'s spirit. So, going beyond the didactic tether, we may say that in a deeper sense God is justified after all; if such a result of desperate trial is possible in man, it is worth all the rigor of the experiment. But it is as truly an anthropodicy (excuse the word!) as a theodicy; it puts the essential man on a plane above all that Satan can prove by his lying sneers of self-interest, or the friends' poisoning of the wells by their theory of natural depravity. It comes back after all to the story of J.; he lives the answer to the problem, his personality is the teaching.

It is from this point of view that we can best judge of the critical attacks that have been made on the structure and coherence of the Book of Job. The book has suffered its full share of negative disintegration at the hands of the critics; mostly subjective it seems to me, coming from a too restricted view of its problem and purpose, or from lack of that long patient induction which will not be content until it sees all the elements of its creative idea in fitting order and proportion. To limit the purpose to the issue of a debated theodicy, is to put some parts in precarious tenure; accordingly, there are those to whom the Epilogue seems a superfluity, the Prologue an afterthought, ch 28 a fugitive poem put in to fill up—not to go on to still more radical excisions. On the score of regularity of structure, too, this limitation of design has had equally grave results. Elihu has perhaps fared the worst. He must go, the critics almost universally say, because forsooth he was not formally introduced in the Prologue; and naturally enough, as soon as he has received notice to quit, the language which in one view fits him so dramatically to his part begins to bristle with Aramaisms ('of the kindred of Ram,' 32 2) and strange locutions, the alleged marks of a later bungling hand. Then, further, Zophar must needs round out the mechanical three-times-three of structure by coming up the third time; accordingly, J. is levied upon to contribute some of his words (27 13-23) to help him out. I need not go into further detail. The foregoing section has done something, I hope, to justify my conviction that the book has a homogeneous design and structure just as it is. Whatever its vicissitudes since the first draft was made, it may turn out after all that the last edition is the best.

We are not left in the dark as to the large purpose of the Book of Job, if we will follow its own indications consistently. Satan's question at the beginning, "Doth Job fear God for naught?" sets us on the track

3. The Book's Own Purpose of it. To give that question a Godlike and not a Satanic answer, to prove in the person of J. that man has it in him to make his life an unbought loyalty to the Divine, is a purpose large enough to include many subsidiary purposes. But behind this appears, on the part of the author, a purpose which relates his story intimately to the intellectual tendencies of his day. The book embodies, esp. in the theories of the friends, a searching epitome of the status to which the wisdom philosophy of his time had arrived. That philosophy was a nobly founded theory of life; J. himself had been and continued (cf 28 28) thoroughly at one with it. Soundly identified with righteousness and piety, Wisdom had in religious idiom defined the elements of right and wrong living, and had in no uncertain terms fixed its sanctions of reward and penalty. But from a warm, pulsating life it had become an orthodoxy. Its rigid world had room for only two classes of men: the righteous, bound for the sure rewards of life; the wicked, bound for sure failure and destruction. It brooked no real exception to this austere law of being. But two grave evils were invading its system. One was its hard blindness to facts, or, what is as bad, its determination at all hazards to explain them away. From the psalms of the period (cf e.g. Pss 37, 49, 73) we can see how the evident happiness and prosperity of the wicked was troubling devout minds. The other was that under this prevailing philosophy life was becoming too cold-blooded and calculable a thing, a virtual feeder of self-interest. The doubt lay very near whether conduct so sanctioned was a thing intrinsic and sincere or a thing bought and sold. This equivocal state of things could not long endure. Sooner or later Satan's question of motive must stab it to the heart; and we may be sure that to the author of the book the impulse to ask the question was not all Satanic. The interests of true wisdom, no less than of skepticism, demanded that the question of inner motive be raised and solved. Nay, Jeh Himself, whom Satan mocked as abettor of the situation, was on trial. Have we not material here, then, for a sublime purpose, a mighty epic of test and trial and victory? Out of it, not J. alone, but Wisdom must emerge purified, enlightened, spiritualized.

So much for the purpose of the book. The problem corresponds to it. If we take it as the baffling problem of suffering, or more specifically why God afflicts the righteous, the sufficing answer is, Job is why. To give such essential integrity as his its ultimate proof and occasion is worth the injustice and the unmerited pain.

In other words, the problem is more deeply concerned with man's intrinsic nature than with God's mysterious dealings. When God created man in His own image, did He endow him most fundamentally with the spirit of commercialism, or with the spirit of unbought loyalty to the Godlike? And when created man was made fallible and mortal, did that mean an unescapable inherent depravity, or was the potency of noblest manhood still left at the center of his being? Here again J. is the embodied answer. The friends, veritable Calvinists before Calvin, urge depravity; they would exalt God by making man His utter contrast. But J.'s steadfast integrity proves that man, one man at least, is at heart sound and true. And if one man, then the potency of soundness exists in manhood. The book is indeed a theodicy; but still more truly it is a boldly maintained anthropodicy, a vindication of the intrinsic worth of man.

V. Considerations of Age and Setting.—The questions who was the personal author of the Book of Job, and what was its age, are at

1. Shadowy Contacts with History best only a matter of conjecture; and my revised conjecture, arrived at since I wrote my Epic of the Inner Life, must go for what it is worth. It seems to me much better to regard a story so homogeneous and interrelated as in the main the composition of one mind than to distribute it, as some critics do, among various authors, supplementers, and editors. As to its age, there is so little identifiable contact with political or ecclesiastical history that its composition has been ascribed to many periods, from the time of Abraham to late in post-exilic times. The fact that its scene is laid in the patriarchal past and in a land outside of Pal indicates the author's design to dissociate it from contemporary events and conditions; such contact with these as exist, therefore, must be read between the lines. The book does not hold with full consistency to patriarchal conditions. Job's friends appeal with the complacency of wisdom-prospered men to the ancient tenure of the land (15 19); and yet, as Job complains, the heartless greed of the landholding class in removing landmarks and oppressing the poor (24 2-12) connotes the prevalence of such outrages as were denounced by Isaiah and Micah before the Assyrian crisis. Such evils would not decrease under Manasseh and Jehoiakim, and might well be portrayed in reminiscence by an exilic writer. On the top of this consideration may be cited the most definite reference to a historical event that the book contains: the passage 12 17-25, which vividly describes, by an eyewitness ("Lo, mine eye hath seen all this," 13 1), a wholesale deportation and humiliation of eminent persons, just like that told of Jehoiachin and his court in 2 K 24 13-15. To my mind this is illuminative for the age of the book. It seems to have been written by one who saw the Chaldean deportation of 587 BC. May I be suffered to carry the suggestion a step farther? It will be remembered that the chief personage of that deportation was for 37 years a state prisoner in Babylon, at the end of which time he was "taken from durance and judgment" (cf Isa 53 8 AV) and lived thenceforth honored with kings (2 K 25 27-30 = Jer 52 31-34). I take him to have been the original of the individualized Servant of Jeh described and describing himself in Second Isa. In one of his self-descriptions he says that Jeh has given him "the tongue of them that are taught" (Isa 50 4); in another that Jeh has made his "mouth like a sharp sword" and himself "a polished shaft" (Isa 49 2). What he said or wrote is of course unidentifiable; but it is certain that in some cultural way he was a hidden power for good to his people. What if this Book of Job were a prison-made book, like Pilgrim's Progress and Don Quixote, but as much greater as the experience that underlay it was more momentous? I do not see but this suggestion is as probable as any that have been made; and some expressions of the book become thereby very striking, as for instance, the reference to prisoners (3 18, 19), to the servant longing for release (7 2), the general sense of being despised, the several references to Job as "my servant Job" (1 8; 2 3; 42 7, 8), the description of his restoration as a turned captivity, and his successful intercession for the friends (42 10; cf Isa 53 12). I would merely suggest the idea, however, not press it.

If the Book of Job is a product of the time of Jehoiachin's imprisonment, it is in worthy and congenial literary company. Isaiah, fostering the faith of a new-born spiritual "remnant," had gathered the elements of that sublime vision (Isa 1 1) of Israel's mission among the nations which a later hand was even now, four generations after, working to supplement and finish, in a prophecy (Isa 40-66) which, as all recognize, constitutes the closest parallel in spirited idea to our book. Seers, priests and singers had long busied themselves with the literary treasures of the past; drawing out of dusty archives and putting into popular idiom the ancient laws and counsels of Moses (Dt; see under JOSHUA); collecting and adapting the old Davidic psalms and composing new ones, as Hezekiah's reorganization of the worship required. Ezekiel was at Tel Abib planning for the reconstruction of the temple, and perhaps by his use of the name "Job" veiling a cryptic reference (Ezk 14 14, 20). The affiliations of the Book of Job, however, were more specifically with the wisdom literature; and long before this the "men of Hezekiah" (Prov 25 1) had gathered their aftermath of the Solomonic proverbs, to supplement the maxims which had been the educative pabulum of the people (see under PROVERBS, BOOK OF). It was with the care and principle of this diffused instruction, now the most popular vein of literature, that the Book of Job concerned itself. That had become apparent as soon as the maxims were coordinated in an anthology, and an introduction to the collection had been composed, extolling Wisdom as the guide and savior of life. To a spiritually-minded thinker with the Heb genius for religion the motivation of Wisdom must sooner or later come. With its values should be apprehended also its unguarded points and tendencies. It was exposed to the one-sided drift of all popular things. In an age when revision and deeper insight were the literary order of the day, Wisdom would come in with the other strains of literature for purification and maturing; and there was not wanting an experience, the basis of an almost unbelievable report (cf Isa 53 1) to give depth and poignancy to Job's personal story of suffering and integrity.

In the amazing sureness and vigor of its message the Book of Job stands out unique and alone; but it is by no means without its lesser

3. Parallels parallels in faith and doubt, above and Echoes which it rises like a mountain above its retinue of foothills. Mention has been made above of a number of Pss (e.g. 37, 49, 73) which with different degrees of assurance witness to the struggle of faith with the problem of the rampant and successful wicked. Ps 49, one of the pss of the sons of Korah, is esp. noteworthy, because it expressly employs the popular māshāl, that is, the Wisdom vehicle, to convey a corrective lesson about unblest riches, drawing a conclusion not unlike that of Job 27 8-23, though in milder tone. Not less noteworthy also is the note of suffering and its mysteriousness which pervades many of the pss, esp. of Asaph and Heman; Pss 88 and 102 might both have been composed with special reference to Hezekiah's sickness and set beside his ps in Isa 38, but also they are so fully in the tone of J's complaint, esp. 88, that Professor Godet, not unreasonably, conjectures that the Book of Job was written by its author Heman. Hezekiah's deadly sickness itself (Isa 38), which was of a leprous nature, banishing him from the house of God, and which was miraculously healed—an experience regarding which Hezekiah's own writing (Isa 38 10-20) is strikingly in the key of Job's complaint—furnishes the nearest parallel to, or adumbration of, Job's affliction; but also in the accounts of the Servant of Jeh there are hints of a similar stroke of God's judgment (cf Isa 52 14; 53 3). The passage Job 7 17, 18 has been called "a bitter parody" of Ps 8 4; it may be so, but the conditions are in utter contrast, and nothing can be concluded as to which is original and which echo. As to expression, the most remarkable parallel to Job, perhaps, is the passage Jer 20 14-18, in which, like Job, the prophet Jeremiah curses the day of his birth. This curse in Job would naturally be remembered by all readers as one of the most characteristic features of the book; and in like manner the curse in Jer may have stood out in the memory of his disciples, of whom the writer of Job may have been one, and figure in a similar literary situation. Ezekiel's naming of Job along with Noah and Daniel (Ezk 14 14, 20), as a type of atoning righteousness, is doubly remarkable if the writer of Job was a contemporary; he may have taken the name from a well-known legend, and there may have underlain it a double meaning, known to an inner circle, referring cryptically to one whose real name it might be impolitic to pronounce. Whenever written, the outline and meaning of J's momentous experience must have won speedily to a permanent place in the universal Heb memory; so that centuries afterward St. James could write to the twelve tribes scattered abroad (5 11), "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord."

LITERATURE

I. The Prophet.—The Book of Joel stands second in the collection of the Twelve Prophets in the Heb Canon. The name (יֹאֵל, yō'ēl), meaning "Jeh is God," seems to have been common, as we find a dozen other persons bearing it at various periods of the Bib. history. Beyond the fact that he was the son of Pethuel, there is no intimation in the book as to his native place, date, or personal history; nor is he mentioned in any other part of the OT; so that any information on these points must be matter of inference, and the consideration of them must follow some examination of the book itself.

II. The Book.—This takes largely the form of addresses, the occasion and scope of which have to be gathered from the contents. There

1. Literary Form is no narrative, properly so called, except at one place (2 18), "Then was Jeh jealous for his land," etc, and even there the narrative form is not continued. Yet, though the earlier portions at least may be the transcript of actual addresses in which the speaker had his audience before him, this would not apply to the later portions, in which also the direct address is still maintained (e.g. 3 11, "Haste ye, and come, all ye nations round about"). This form of direct address is, indeed, characteristic of the style throughout (e.g. 2 21; 3 4,9,13). There is this also to be said of its literary character, that "the style of Joel is bright and flowing," his "imagery and language are fine" (Driver, LOT); "his book is a description, clear, well arranged, and carried out with taste and vivacity, of the present distress and of the ideal future. J. may be reckoned among the classics of Heb lit. The need of a commentary for details, as is the case with Amos and Hosea, is here hardly felt" (Reuss, Das AT).

The book in the original consists of 4 chapters, which, however, are in our VS reduced to 3, by making the portion which constitutes

2. Outline of Contents ch 3 in the Heb the concluding portion (vs 28-32) of ch 2. The book begins in gloom, and its close is bright. Up to 2 18 there is some great trouble or a succession of troubles culminating at 2 28-32 (ch 3 in Heb). And the concluding portion, ch 3 (ch 4 in Heb), in which the prophet projects his view into futurity, begins with judgment but ends with final blessedness. There is a progression in the thought, rising from the solid, sorely smitten earth to a region ethereal, and the stages of advance are marked by sudden, sharp calls (1 2,14; 3 9), or by the blasts of the trumpet which prelude the shifting scenes (2 1,15).

Ch 1 begins with an address, sharp and peremptory, in which the oldest inhabitant is appealed to whether such a calamity as the present has ever been experienced, and all are called to take note so that the record of it may be handed down to remotest posterity. The land has suffered from a succession of disasters, the greatest that could befall an agricultural country, drought and locusts. The two are in fact inextricably connected, and the features of both are mixed up in the description of their effects. The extent of the disaster is vividly depicted by the singling out of the classes on whom the calamity has fallen, the drinkers of wine, the priests, the vine-dressers, the husbandmen; and, toward the close of the chapter, the lower animals are pathetically introduced as making their mute appeal to heaven for succor (vs 18-20). Specially to be noted is the manner in which the priests are introduced (ver 9), and how with them is associated the climax of the affliction. The prophet had just said "my land" (ver 6), "my vine" and "my fig-tree" (ver 7); and, though many modern expositors take the pronoun as referring to the nation or people, it would appear more appropriate, since the people is objectively addressed, to regard the prophet as identifying himself with the God in whose name he is speaking. And then the transition to ver 8 becomes intelligible, in which certainly the land is personified as a female: "Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth." The underlying idea seems to be the conception of the land as Jeh's and of Jeh as the ba'al "lord," or husband of people and land. This is the idea so much in evidence in the Book of Hos, and so much perverted by the people whom he addressed, who ascribed their corn and wine and oil to the Can. ba'als. The idea in its purer form is found in the "land Beulah," "married land" (Isa 62 4.5). If it was this that was in J.'s mind, the mention of the priests comes naturally. The products of the land were Jeh's gifts, and the acknowledgment of His lordship was made by offerings of the produce laid on His altar. But if nothing was given, nothing could be offered; the "cutting off" of the meal and drink offerings was the mark of the widowhood and destitution of the land. Hence the pathetic longing (2 14) that at least so much may be left as to assure the famished land that the supreme calamity, the loss of God, has not fallen. Thus the visitation is set in a religious light: the graphic description is more than a poetic picture. It is the Lord's land that is wasted; hence the summons (1 14) to "cry unto Jeh," and in the vs that follow the supplication by man and beast for deliverance.

Ch 2 up to ver 17 seems to go over the same ground as ch 1, and it has also two parts || respectively to two parts of that chapter: 2 1-11 is || to 1 2-12, and 2 12-17 to 1 13-20. The former part in both cases is chiefly descriptive of the calamity, while the latter part is more hortatory. Yet there is an advance; for, whereas in 1 2-12 the attention is fixed on the devastation, in 2 1-11 it is the devastator, the locust, that is particularly described; also, in 2 12-17 the tone is more intensely religious: "Render your heart, and not your garments" (ver 13). Finally it is to be noted that it is at the close of this portion that we get the first reference to external nations: "Give not thy heritage to reproach, that the nations should use a byword against them: wherefore should they say among the peoples, Where is their God?" (ver 17m). If the view given above of 1 6-8 be correct, this is merely an expansion of the germinal idea there involved. And so it becomes a pivot on which the succeeding portion turns: "Then was Jeh jealous for his land, and had pity on his people" (2 18).

There is a sharp turn at 2 18, marked by the sudden variation of the verbal forms. Just as in Am 7 10, in the midst of the prophet's discourse, we come upon the narration, "Then Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam," etc, so here we have obviously to take the narrative to be the sequence of the foregoing address, or, more properly speaking, we have to infer that what J. had counseled had been done. The fast had been sanctified, the solemn assembly had been called, all classes or their representatives had been gathered to the house of the Lord; the supplication had been made, and "then was Jeh jealous for his land, and had pity on his people." In point of fact, as the Heb student will perceive, all the vbs. from ver 15 may be read, with a change of the points, as simple perfects, with the exception of the vbs. for "weep" and "say" in ver 17, which might be descriptive imperfects. But no doubt the imperative forms are to be read, expressing as they do more graphically the doing of the thing prescribed. And, this sharp turn having been made, it will be noticed how the discourse proceeds on a higher gradient, forming a counterpart to the preceding context. Step by step, in inverse order, we pass the former points, beginning opposite what was last the "reproach among the nations" (ver 19; cf ver 7), passing the destruction of the great army (ver 20; cf vs 1-11), then touching upon the various kinds of vegetation affected (vs 21-24; cf 1 12.10, etc), and ending with the reversal of the fourfold devastation with which the prophet began (ver 25; cf 1 4). So that what at the outset was announced as a calamity unprecedented and unparalleled, now becomes a deliverance as enduring as God's presence with His people is forever assured.

Up to this point there has been an observable sequence and connection, so that, while the prophet has steadily progressed upward, we can look down from the point reached and see the whole course that has been traversed. But now in 2 28-32 (ch 3 in Heb) he passes abruptly to what "shall come to pass afterward." And yet no doubt there was a connection of thought in his mind, of which we obtain suggestions in the new features of the description. There is "the sound of abundance of rain" (1 K 18 41) in this pouring out of the Spirit upon all flesh; in the sons and daughters, old men and young, servants and handmaidens, we seem to recognize the representative gathering of 2 15f, those engaged in the priestly function of supplication here endowed with prophetic gifts, "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19 6), all the Lord's people become prophets (Nu 11 29). Again we see the sky overcast and sun and moon darkened before the great and terrible day of the Lord, as if the prophet had said: There shall be greater things than these; a new era is coming in which God's hand will be laid more heavily upon the world, and His people will be quickened to a clearer vision of His working. The "day of Jeh" has yet to come in a fuller sense than the locust plague suggested, and there will be a more effective deliverance than from drought and dearth; but then as now there will be found safety in Mt. Zion and Jerus. This, however, implies some danger with which Jerus has been threatened; a "remnant," an "escaped" portion involves a disaster or crisis out of which new life comes. And so the prophet goes on in ch 3 (ch 4 in Heb), still speaking of "those days" and "that time," to tell us of the greater deliverance from the greater trouble to which he has been alluding. There is nothing in the antecedent chapters to indicate what "that time" and "those days" are, or what the prophet means by bringing again the captivity of Judah and Jerus. These are questions of interpretation. In the meantime, we may note the general features of the scene now set before us. A great assize is to be held in the valley of Jehoshaphat, in which "all nations" there assembled by Divine summons will be judged for offences against God's people and heritage (vs 1-8). And again, just as in chs 1, 2 the prophet exhibited the plague of locusts in two pictures, so here in vs 9-21 the picture of the great assize is transformed into a bloody picture in the same valley, not so much of battle as of slaughter, a treading of the wine-press. There is a confused multitude in "the valley of decision"; sun and moon are darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining; the "day of Jeh" has finally come; and, when the din is silenced and clear light again falls upon the scene, all is peace and prosperity, the last of the enemies destroyed, and the Lord dwelleth in Zion.

(1) Literal.—Thus the book forms a fairly intelligible and connected whole when we read in the lit. sense of the language. That is to say: a time of continued drought combined with an unprecedented visitation of locusts gives occasion to the prophet to call his people to the recognition of the Divine hand and to earnest supplication that the threatened ruin of people and land may be averted. The removal of the calamity is interpreted as a mark of restored Divine favor and an assurance of prosperity based on God's unchangeable purpose of good to His people. But these great doings of Nature's God suggest yet greater deeds of Israel's God of a more spiritual kind, the outpouring, like copious showers, of Divine blessing, so that the whole community would be set on a higher level of spiritual apprehension. And thus the prophet is led on to speak of the "last things." Judah and Jerus, highly distinguished and signally protected, are bound up with a world-wide purpose; Israel, in a word, cannot be conceived apart from non-Israel. And as non-Israel had in the past been an opposing power, in the great "day of Jeh," wrong should be at last righted, the nations judged, and Israel and Israel's God be glorified. No doubt the interpretation is not without difficulties. We may not be able to detect the motives of the sudden transitions, or to say how much of the purport of the latter part was in the prophet's mind when he was engaged on the former part. And the description of the locust is so highly poetical that there is a temptation to see in it a reference to a great invading army.

(2) Allegorical.—These considerations, combined with the undoubted eschatological strain of the closing part of the book, led early commentators (and they have had followers in modern times) to an allegorical interpretation of the locust, and to regard the whole book as pointing forward to future history. Thus, in Jerome's time, the 4 names of the locust in 1 4 were supposed to designate (1) the Assyrians and Babylonians, (2) the Medes and Persians, (3) the Macedonians and Antiochus Epiphanes, and (4) the Romans. But, apart from the consideration that the analogy of prophecy would lead us to look for some actual situation or occurrence of his time as the starting-point of J.'s discourse, a close observation and acquaintance with the habits of the locust confirm the prophet's description, albeit highly figurative and poetical, as minutely accurate in all its details. It is to be observed that, though spoken of as an army (and at the present day the Oriental calls the locust the "army of God"), there is no mention of bloodshed. The designation "the northern one," which has been considered inappropriate because the locust comes from the parched plain of the eastern interior, need not cause perplexity; for the Heb. while it has names for the 4 cardinal points of the compass, has none for the intermediate points: Judaea might be visited by locusts coming from the N.E., or, coming from the E., they might strike the country at a point to the N. of Pal and travel southward. So the wind which destroys the locust (2 20) would be a northwesterly wind, driving the forepart into the Dead Sea and the hinder part into the Mediterranean.

The Book of Joel has been assigned by different authorities to very various dates, ranging over 4 or 5 cents.; but, as will appear in the

whether the book is very early or very late, in fact, whether J. is perhaps the very earliest or the very last or among the last of the writing prophets. This diversity of opinion is due to the fact that there are no direct indications of date in the book itself, and that such indirect indications as it affords are held to be capable of explanation on the one view or the other. It will be noticed also that, to add to the uncertainty, many of the arguments adduced are of a negative kind, i.e. consideration of what the prophet does not mention or refer to, and the argument from silence is notoriously precarious. It will, therefore, be convenient to specify the indications available, and to note the arguments drawn from them in support of the respective dates.

(1) Place in the Canon.—An argument for a very early date is based upon the place of the book in the collection of the "twelve" minor prophets.

It stands, in the Heb Bible, between Hos and Am, who are usually spoken of as the earliest "writing prophets." It is true that, in the LXX collection, the order is different, viz. Hos, Am, Mic, Joel, Ob, Jon; which may indicate that as early as the time of the formation of the Canon of the Prophets there was uncertainty as to the place of Joel, Ob, and Jon, which contain no direct indication of their dates. But, seeing that there has evidently been a regard to some chronological order, the books being arranged according to the Assy, Bab and Pers periods, it cannot be without significance that Joel has found a place so high up in the collection. The 3 indisputably post-exilic books stand together at the end. If Joel is late, it must be as late as the latest of these, possibly a great deal later. But if that is so, there was the greater likelihood of its date being known to the collectors. It would be a very hazardous assumption that prophetic books were not read or copied from the time of their first composition till the time they were gathered into a Canon. And, if they were so read and copied, surely the people who handled them took some interest in preserving the knowledge of their origin and authorship.

In this connection, attention is directed to the resemblances to the Book of Am before which Joel stands. These are regarded by Reuss as favoring the early date. That large and beautiful passage with which the Book of Am opens dwells upon the thought that the threatenings, which had formerly been uttered against the nations, are about to receive their fulfilment, and that Jeh could not take back His word. Now it is just such a threatening that fills the last part of the Book of Joel. Indeed Amos begins his book with the very phrase in which J. opens his closing address, "Jeh will roar from Zion, and utter his voice from Jerus" (Am 1 2; Joel 4 16). At the end of Am also the happy fertility of Canaan is described in similar terms to those in Joel (Am 9 13; Joel 3 18). Reuss, moreover, draws attention to the remarkable expression found in Joel, and also, though in modified terms, in two Prophets of the Assy period: "Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears," says J. (3 10), whereas we have the oracle in Isa 2 4 and Mic 4 3, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks"; and it is suggested that, if these were current phrases, they were more likely to have been coined in the form employed by J. in earlier and less settled times, when sudden alarms of war called the peaceful husbandman to the defence of his fields and flocks. Further, it is pointed out that Amos reproaches the people of his day for impotence, although Jeh had given them "cleanness of teeth" and "want of bread" and had "withholden the rain . . . when there were yet three months to the harvest," and smitten them with blasting and mildew and the palmer worm (Am 4 6-9); and all this is the more striking because J. represents the distress of his day as unprecedented in magnitude.

To all this, advocates of the late date reply that we cannot determine the date of a book by its place in the Canon; for that the collectors were guided by other considerations. As to the resemblances to Am, it may have been on the strength of these very resemblances that the Book of Joel, bearing no date in itself, was placed beside that of Am. Moreover, it is maintained, as we shall see presently, that J. has resemblances to other prophets, some of them confessedly of late date, proving that he was acquainted with writings of a very late time.

(2) Language and style.—Another argument for an early date is based upon the purity of the language and character of the style. The book is written in what may be described as classical Heb, and shows no trace of decadence of language. It is no doubt true that "the style is the man," as is strikingly illustrated in the very different styles of Amos and Hosea, who were practically contemporaneous; so that arguments of this kind are precarious. Still, it is to be noted, that though there is nothing archaic in the style of Joel, neither is there anything archaic in the style of Amos, who would, by the exclusion of Joel, be our earliest example of written prophecy.

The advocates of the very late date reply that the style of J. is too good to be archaic; and that his admittedly classic style is to be explained by the supposition that, living at a late time, he was a diligent student of earlier prophetic lit., and molded his style upon the classical.

(3) Quotations.—Here, therefore, must be mentioned an argument much relied on by the advocates of a very late date. It is said that there are so many resemblances in thought and expression to other OT books that it is incredible that so many writers posterior to the early date claimed for Joel should have quoted from this little book or expanded thoughts contained in it. A very elaborate comparison of J. with late writers has been made by Holzinger in ZATW, 1889, 89–131; his line of argument being that, while resemblances to undoubtedly early writers may be explained as the work of a writer in the Renaissance imitating older models, the resemblances to others known to be late, such as Jer, Ezk, II Isa, Pss, Neh, Ch, etc, cannot be so explained if Joel is taken to be early. The principal passages in question are given in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges, "Book of Joel," by Professor Driver, who also takes the view that Joel is late.

The list is not, perhaps, so formidable as its length would imply. Both writers confess that from several of the passages no conclusion of any value can be drawn, and that there is always a difficulty in determining priority when similarities in diction are found. Many of the expressions quoted look as if they might have been commonplaces of the prophetic lit.; and, if it was possible for a very late writer to quote from so many antecedent writings, it was as possible and much easier for a number of late writers to go back to the very earliest prophets, esp. if their words were memorable and germinal. We have heard of the man who objected to Shakespeare because he was full of quotations; and there is perhaps not a line of Gray's "Elegy" that has not been quoted somewhere, while some of his lines have become household words. But the strongest objection to this argument is this: if Joel had the minute acquaintance with antecedent writers and followed them so closely as is implied, he not only varies from them in essential particulars, but falls below them, as we shall see, in his anticipations of the future.

(4) Situation.—We have now to look at features of a more concrete and tangible character, which promise to give more positive results. It is maintained by the advocates of the late date that the situation and immediate outlook of the prophet are not only consistent with the late date but preclude any preëxilic date altogether. The elements of the situation are these: Whereas all the prophets before the downfall of Samaria (722 BC), and even Jeremiah and Ezekiel, mention the Northern Kingdom, it is not once named or referred to in Joel; for the occurrence of the name "Israel" in 2 27; 3 2.16 cannot support this sense. Judah and Jerus fill our prophet's actual horizon (2 1.32; 3 6.16 f. 20); no king is mentioned or implied, but the elders with the priests seem to be the prominent and ruling class. Further, the temple and its worship are central (1 14; 2 15 f) and so important that the cutting off of the meal offering and drink offering is tantamount to national ruin (1 9.13.16; 2 14). Again, there is no mention of the prevailing sins of preëxilic times, the high places with their corrupt worship, or indeed of any specific sin for which the people were to humble themselves, while fasting and putting on sackcloth seem to have a special virtue. All the circumstances, it is held, conform exactly to the time of the post-exilic temple and to no other time. The Northern Kingdom was no more, there was no king in Jerus, the temple was the center and rallying-point of national life, its ritual the pledge and guarantee of God's presence and favor; the period of legalism had set in. It is confidently averred that at no period prior to the régime inaugurated by Ezra and Nehemiah was there such a conjunction of circumstances.

(a) Political: In reply, it is urged in favor of the early date that there was a period in preëxilic time when such a situation existed, viz. the early years of the reign of Joash, when that prince was still an infant; for Jehoiada the priest acted practically as regent after the death of Athaliah, 836 BC (2 K 11 1–17). This would sufficiently account for the absence of mention of a king in the book. At such a time the priesthood must have held a prominent position, and the temple would overshadow the palace in importance. The omission of the Northern Kingdom may be accounted for by the fact that at that time the two kingdoms were on friendly terms; for the two royal houses were connected by marriage, and the kingdoms were in alliance (2 K 3 6 ff; 8 28 ff). Or the omission may have no more significance than the fact that J. was concerned with an immediate and near present distress and had no occasion to mention the Northern Kingdom. To show how unsafe it is to draw conclusions from such silence, it may be observed that throughout the first 5 chapters of Isa, larger in bulk than the whole Book of Joel, only Judah and Jerus are mentioned; and, even if it should be maintained that a part or the whole of these chapters dates from after the deportation of the ten tribes, still it is noteworthy that, when the prophet could have made as good use of a reference to the event as Jeremiah and Ezekiel, he does not do so.

(b) Religious: The fact that there is no mention of specific national sins, and particularly of the worship of the high places, of which preëxilic prophets have so much to say, is made much of by advocates of the late date, Dr. A. B. Davidson, e.g., declaring it to be "doubtful whether such a state of things existed at any time prior to the restoration from exile" (Expos, March, 1888); but perhaps this argument proves too much. If we are to deduce the state of religion in J.'s day from what he does not say on the subject, it may be doubted whether at any time, either before or after the exile, such a condition prevailed. The post-exilic prophets certainly knew of sins in their time, sins, too, which restrained the rain and blasted the wine and oil and corn (Hag 1 11). For all that J. says on the subject, the condition of things implied is as consistent with the time of Jehoiada as with that of Nehemiah. And what shall we say of Isaiah's positive description of the condition of Jerus before his time: "the faithful city . . . she that was full of justice! righteousness lodged in her" (Isa 1 21)? When was that? So also his promise: "I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called The city of righteousness, a faithful town" (Isa 1 26). Higher praise could scarcely be bestowed, and there is nothing in the Book of Joel to imply that he assumed so much.

(c) Ritualistic: Too much has been made of the references to ritual, as if they necessarily implied a post-exilic date. It is not legitimate here to assume that the idea of centralization of worship originated in Josiah's days, and that the priestly legislation is post-exilic. The mention of "old men" or "elders" is no such indication. Wellhausen himself maintains that the expression everywhere in Joel means nothing more than "old men"; and, even if it had an official connotation, the official elders are an old tribal institution in Israel. It may be noted here again that in the first 5 chapters of Isa elders also are mentioned, and more indubitably in an official sense, although the time was that of the monarchy (Isa 3 2.14). And as to the sanctity of the temple, it will hardly be denied that in the time of Jehoiada the Jerus temple was a place of far more importance than any supposed local shrine, and esp. when there was a call to a united national supplication (see 2 K 11). In point of fact the alleged references to ritual are very few and in most general terms. The "fast" is not denoted by the phrases in the legal codes, and was evidently on the footing of such observances as are common and instinctive at all times and among all persons (Jgs 20 26; 1 S 7 6; 2 S 1 12; Jon 3 5 ff). And where in any law-code are priests enjoined to lie all night in sackcloth (1 13)? Or what prescription in any code requires young and old, bridegroom and bride, to press together into the temple (2 16)? And why should not any or all of these things have been done in face of a sudden emergency threatening the ruin of an agricultural people? Moreover, J., so far from ascribing virtue to these outward marks of humiliation in a legalistic spirit, immediately after mentioning them says: "Render your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto Jeh your God" (2 13).

The only ritual references are to the meal offering and the drink offering (1 9.13; 2 14), and these were not characteristically post-exilian. Indeed, they may be regarded as primitive forms of offering, the produce of the ground without which, among an agricultural people, we can hardly imagine a system of offerings to exist. They are both ancient. Amos regards the meal offering as well known (5 22.25), and Isaiah uses the word "vain oblations" in speaking of its abuse (Isa 1 13). And though the noun for drink offering is not mentioned in the older prophets, Hosea knows the related vb. and the act of pouring out wine to the Lord (Hos 9 4), and it may be asked whether it is likely that the people performed the act and had no name for the offering itself. Moreover, in an undisputed passage (2 K 16 13.15), both offerings are mentioned in the time of Ahaz. As for the contention that our prophet regards these offerings of so much importance that the cessation of them would be fatal, if our interpretation of 1 8 f above be correct, the earlier date would be much more appropriate. It was not because the offering threatened to cease, but because the thing offered threatened to be cut off, that J. was so perturbed. The popular view as to the relation of Jeh to His land was ancient, and had a foundation of truth; and in fact Hosea's teaching would fitly follow and complete that of Joel. Finally it is to be said that J.'s fine forecast of the outpouring of the Spirit, and of the universal extension of prophetic activity is as far removed as possible from the "legalistic" tendency that set in after the exile. And if the argument from silence is of any force at all, it is surely a very remarkable thing that in a book of post-exilian times, there should be no mention of prince or governor, or even of high priest.

(5) Foreign nations mentioned or omitted.—Allusions to foreign nations, or the absence of allusion, would obviously promise to afford indications of the time of the prophet; and yet here also the allusions have been adduced in support of either of the divergent dates. The facts here are as follows: In the first two chapters, where the prophet, as is generally understood, is speaking of his own time and its pressing distress, there is no mention of any foreign nation, not even the kingdom of the ten tribes. The only expression which has been taken to be significant in this connection is the word trd "the northern" army (2 20), which some refer to the Assyrians, while others explain it of a northern army in late or apocalyptic time. In ch 3, however, when the prophet is speaking of "those days" and "that time" in the future, when the Lord "shall bring back the captivity of Judah and Jerus," there is to be a gathering of "all nations" in the valley of Jehoshaphat (3 1 f); and later on "all the nations" are summoned to appear in the same valley for judgment (3 11 f). "Tyre, and Sidon, and all the regions of Philistia" are specially reproached (ver 4) because they have carried into their temples the sacred treasures, and have sold the children of Judah and Jerus unto the "sons of the Grecians" (ver 6); in recompense for which their sons and daughters are to be sold into the hand of the children of Judah, to be sold by them to "the men of Sheba, to a nation far off" (ver 8). Finally, at the close (vs 19 f), "Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom shall be a desolate wilderness, for the violence done to the children of Judah, because they have shed innocent blood in their land."

It is acknowledged that, on either hypothesis, there are difficulties in accounting for the presence or absence of names of foreign nations in this presentation. Those who advocate the late date point with confidence to the silence as to the kingdom of the ten tribes, or to the kingdom of Damascus, which, on their hypothesis, had passed away, and the equally significant silence as to Assyria, which had long ago been superseded by the Bab and Pers empires of the East. As to the mention of Tyre and Sidon and the coasts of Philistia (3 4-6), Driver says: "The particular occasion referred to by J. must remain uncertain: but the Phoenicians continued to act as slave-dealers long after the age of Amos: and the notice of Javan (Greece) suits better a later time, when Syrian slaves were in request in Greece" (Cambridge Bible, "Joel," 17). The same writer says on 3 19: "There is so little that is specific in what is said in this verse with reference to either Egypt or Edom, that both countries are probably named (at a time when the Assyrians and Chaldeans had alike ceased to be formidable to Judah) as typical examples of countries hostile to the Jews." It is pointed out, moreover, that the enmity of Edom was particularly manifest at a late period when Jerus was destroyed by the Chaldeans, and that this was remembered and resented long afterward (Ob vs 10-16; Ezk 25 12 ff; 35; Ps 137 7).

On the hypothesis of the early date, it is urged that there was no occasion to refer to the Northern Kingdom. If it was friendly, the inclusive name of Israel for the whole people was sufficient to denote this, and that it was not hostile in the early days of Joash has already been pointed out. As to Damascus, it was not till the last years of the reign of Joash that Hazael showed hostility to Jerus (2 K 12 17 f); and danger from Assyria had not yet emerged, and appears only faintly in Am (3 11; 6 14). Then it is pointed out that history records how, in the reign of Jehoram, the grandfather of Joash, "Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and made a king over themselves" (2 K 8 20; 2 Ch 21 8), and the historian adds that the revolt continued "unto this day." It may well have been that in such a revolt the resident Judaeans in the land of Edom suffered the violence referred to in 3 19. Moreover, the Chronicler mentions that, in the same reign, "Jeh stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philis, and of the Arabians that are beside the Ethiopians: and they came up against Judah, and brake into it, and carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and his sons also, and his wives," etc (2 Ch 21 16 f). This might be what is referred to in 3 4-6. If the royal family were carried away there would most probably be a deportation of other prisoners, who, taken by the seaborard Philis, would, through the great maritime power of the day, be sold to the distant Greeks. And here it is pointed out that Amos singles out the very nations mentioned by J.: Philis, Tyre and Sidon and Edom, and reproaches them with offences such as J. specifies (Am 1 6-12). And then, it is added, if the book is as late as Nehemiah, why is nothing said of Samaritans, Moabites, and Ammonites, who showed such marked hostility in his days (Neh

2 19; 4 7; 6 1)? For Ezekiel also, from whom it is supposed J. derived his reference to the Edomites, mentions also Moabites and Ammonites as hostile to Israel (Ezk 25 1-11). And so far were Tyre and Sidon from being hostile in the days of Nehemiah that we read of similar arrangements being made with them, as in the time of Solomon, for the supply of materials for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 3 7). And why is not a word said of the Babylonians, at whose hands Israel had suffered so much? So strongly, indeed, are these objections felt by Reuss, that he declares that, should the view of the late origin come to be finally accepted as the more probable, he would decide for a date after the Pers domination, i.e. subsequent to 332 BC. For, he says, the names of peoples introduced at the end of the book, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Philis, Edomites, must surely in some way have had an actual significance for the author, who cannot out of caprice have passed over Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldaeans, and Persians. Accordingly, if we are to have nothing to do with the pre-Assyr period, we must come down to the late Seleucid and Ptolemaean dynasties, by whose hostile collisions Judaea was certainly involved in severe trouble. But then, how are we to account for the position of Joel so high up in the collection of prophetic writers? For, on this supposition, we should expect his book to stand in the third division of the Canon.

(6) Some notable expressions.—There remain to be noticed some significant expressions which have a bearing on the question of date and, at first sight, seem to indicate a late origin. And yet there is a difficulty. For there is no doubt that our familiarity with the details of the great downfall of the Jewish state leads us to think of the destruction of Jerus when we read of the captivity or scattering of the people. There is, however, a saying in the Talm that a greater distress makes a lesser one forgotten; and the question is whether there may not have been national experiences at an earlier time to which such expressions might be applicable: or, in other words, how early such phrases were coined and became current.

(a) "Bring back the captivity": There is, first of all, uncertainty as to the origin of the phrase "bring back the captivity." Some connect the word "captivity" (שְׁבוּיָהוּ, shēbhūh, שְׁבוּיָהוּ, shēbhūh) with the vb. "to take captive" (שָׁבַח, shābhāh), while others make it the cognate noun of the vb. "to return" (שָׁבַח, shūbh), with which it stands connected in the phrase "bring back the captivity of Judah and Jerus" (3 1). In the former case the reference would be to the return of captives taken in war, or the return of exiles from captivity; and that view has led to the tr in our VS. On the latter view, the expression would mean the restoration of prosperity, of which use we have an undoubted example in the words: "Jeh turned the captivity of Job" (Job 42 10). We can conceive either of the views to have been the original, and either to be quite early. A main feature of early warfare was the carrying away of prisoners, and the return of such captives was equivalent to a restoration of prosperity. Or again, the relief from any illness or trouble might be expressed by saying that there was a restoration, as e.g. in Scotland a sick person is said to have "got the turn." As to the significance of the phrase in Joel, it is pointed out by the advocates of the early date that, in Nehemiah's time, the exile was at an end, and the captivity "brought back" (Ps 126). On the other side it is said that, though the new order was set up at Jerus, there still remained many Israelites in foreign lands, and J., not satisfied with the meager community in Pal, looked forward to a fuller restoration; or otherwise, that the words are used in the wider and more general sense of restored prosperity. That the phrase was in early use, and in the sense of bringing back captives, is seen in Am 9 14 and Hos 6 11. And it may be observed that the phraseology used by Am to denote going into captivity (Am 1 5.15; 5 5.27; 7 17) is employed by the Jews to denote the Bab captivity, and is even used by modern Jews to express the present dispersion. And yet Amos speaks of an "entire captivity" of people in his day (Am 1 6.9 m).

(b) "Parted my land": Then again, the expression "parted my land" (3 2) does not seem very applicable to the breaking up of the state, for the land was not parted but absorbed in the great eastern empires; nor does J. single out Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, by whom, if by any, a post-exilian parting of the land was effected. The expression would more fitly apply to such movements as the revolt of Edom and Libnah (2 K 8 22), and the successive losses of territory by which the great dominion of David and Solomon was reduced. This process, described as "cutting Israel short" (lit. "cutting off the ends," 2 K 10 32 AV) is recorded as having begun in the time of Jehu, before the reign of Joash, when outlying parts of territory were smitten by Hazael of Damascus; and J., speaking in God's name, may have used the expression "my land" as referring to the whole country.

(c) "Scattered among the nations": Whether the expression "scattered among the nations" (3 2) would be applicable to the Israelite inhabitants of such conquered territories or to those sold into slavery (3 6) may be disputed. The expression certainly suggests rather the dispersion following the downfall of the state. And yet it is noteworthy that, if so, J. is the only prophet who uses in that sense the vb. here employed, a very strange thing if he followed and borrowed from them all; for, both in Jer and Ezk, as well as in Dt, other vbs. are used. Jer indeed uses the vb. in comparing Israel to a scattered (or isolated) sheep which the lions have driven away (50 17); but the only other passage in which the word is plainly used of Israel being dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of Persia is Est 3 8.

(d) "Reproach of the nations": Then there is the passage: "Give not thy heritage to reproach, that the nations should rule over them" (or "use a byword against them"): "wherefore should they say among the peoples, Where is their God?" (2 17.19; cf m). Here it is to be noted that the idea involved is certainly much older than the time of the exile. In the time of Hezekiah, the ambassadors of Sennacherib delivered their taunting message, which is described as reproaching the living God (2 K 19 4). It was the method of ancient warfare, as is seen in the boasting of Goliath; for it is the same word that is used in that narrative, though rendered in our VS "defy" (1 S 17 10.25f. 36). And, if we read between the lines of the historical books, we shall see how common was this habit of "defying" or "reproaching," and how sensitive the people were to it (e.g. 1 K 20 2 f. 5 f. 13. 28). All this is anterior to the earliest possible date of J., and proves that, at an early time, there was a consciousness in Israel that the fortunes of the people were bound up with the honor of the national God. It is not to be overlooked that it is in the early part of the book, when he is concerned with the drought and locust, that J. uses this expression.

(e) "Strangers passing through": Toward the close of the book it is predicted that, in the time of final glory, strangers shall no longer pass through Jerus (3 17). This again would certainly be applicable to a late time, after the land had suffered many hostile invasions. Yet it can well be understood how a prophet at a very early period, thinking of the glorification of Zion, should imagine a state in which no "stranger" or foreigner should have a footing on the sacred soil, and Israel should dwell in solitary and preëminent exclusiveness. If so, the idea again is of a more primitive kind than the late date would suggest, esp. if we postulate a prophet who had deeply studied earlier prophets, to whom Jerus of the future was the religious metropolis of the world, and Zion the place to which all nations would flow (Isa 2 3; 56 7).

(f) "Day of Jeh": A word must be said, in conclusion, in regard to the "day of Jeh" which figures so prominently in the Book of Joel. In whatever sense it may originally have been employed, whether betokening weal or woe, the expression was an ancient one; for Amos refers to it as current in his day (5 18); and almost all the prophets refer to it in one way or another (Am 5 18-20; Isa 2 12; 13 6,9; 34 8; Jer 46 10; Lam 2 22; Ezk 30 3; Ob ver 15; Zeph 1 8,18; 2 2,3; Zec 14 1; Mal 4 5). So far as it bears upon the date of Joel the question is: How does his usage compare with those of the other prophets? We find that he uses the expression twice in connection with the visitation of the locust (1 15; 2 1), once after speaking of the outpouring of the Spirit (2 31), and once again near the close of the book (3 14). Now, in regard to the earliest occurrences, it will be perceived that J. is on a lower plane than succeeding prophets. He associates the approach of the day of the Lord with a heavy visitation upon material nature, precisely as the simple Oriental of the present day, on the occurrence of an eclipse, or at a visitation of locust or pestilence, begins to talk of the end of the world. And, though the point of view is shifted, and the horizon wider, at the close, it is to be remarked that the highest point attained is the conception of the day of the Lord as the deliverance and glorification of Israel: there is not a hint of that day being a time of testing and sifting of Israel itself, as in Amos and elsewhere (Am 5 18-20; Isa 2 12). In fact, so far is he from going beyond the other prophets in his conception, that we may say J. leaves the matter at the point where Amos takes it up.

In view of all these perplexing questions, Professor Ad. Merx had some reason for describing the Book of Joel as the "sorrow's child" (Schmerzkind) of OT exegesis; and he published in 1879 a work, Die Prophetie des Joel und ihre Auslegung von den ältesten Zeiten bis zu den Reformatoren, in which, besides giving a history of the interpretation, he combated the method hitherto employed, and put forth a novel view of his own. Concluding, on the grounds usually maintained by the advocates of the late date, that Joel is post-exilic, he makes a comparison of the book with preceding prophetic lit., in order to show that J. derived his ideas from a study of it, and esp. that he followed step by step the prophecies of Ezekiel. Now in Ezekiel's outlook, the overflowing of Judaea by the northern people, Gog, plays an important part (Ezk 38 2,3,16,18; 39 11), and this explains J.'s reference in 2 20.

As to the precise date: not only is the second temple standing, but the city is surrounded by a wall (2 9); and this brings us down to the government of Nehemiah, after 445 BC; and the book of Neh shows that other prophets besides Malachi lived and found acceptance in those days (Neh 6 7,14). The circumstances were these. Not only the exile, but the restoration, is a thing of the past. We are to think of Jerus and Judah in the narrowest sense: the elders and all the inhabitants of the land are addressed, a sort of senatus populusque Romanus, and with them are the priests presiding over an orderly ritual service at the temple. Judah is unaffected by political movements; the conflict with the Samaritans has died down; Judah is leading a quiet life, of which nothing is recorded because there is nothing to record; and the people of the ten tribes have practically disappeared, being swallowed up among the heathen. This undisturbed period is employed in literary regard, as may be inferred from the well-known notice regarding Nehemiah's collection of books (2 Macc 2 13 f), and from the production of such works as Est, Jon, Koheleth, Mal, Ch, Ezr-Neh, etc. The making of books (Ecc 12 12) had not come to an end.

But now, if the older prophets were seriously studied (cf Dnl 9 2), what impression would they make on the mind of a man like J.? Was the daily life that followed the time of Nehemiah in any degree a fulfilment of the hopes of a Deutero-Isaiah, a Jeremiah, an Ezekiel, a Zechariah? Could a member of the restored community contemplate without painful feelings the lamentable condition of existence under the Pers government, the limitation of the people to a narrow territory, the separation from those still in the Dispersion, the irritation of the worship of the half-heathen Samaritans, the mixed marriages and general low condition, as contrasted with the glowing pictures of the prophets who had spoken of the last days? Such a contradiction between prophecy and event must have disturbed the minds of the more thoughtful; and so, while some said, "It is vain to serve God" (Mal 3 14), "They that feared Jeh spake one with another" (Mal 3 16), waiting in hope, believing that the present restoration could not be the true and final bringing back of the captivity.

To relieve his mind, J. will write a book, the result of his study; and it must depict the full and final consummation. Living-as he did, however, in quiet times, he had not, like earlier prophets, a historical situation to start from. Here, according to Merx, the genius of J. comes into play. Seeking for a type of the end of the world, which was to be the antitype, he found one in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt in the distant past. Just as at that great crisis the people were rescued from bondage and brought into a wide and fertile land, so in the end Jeh would subdue all Israel's enemies and place them in a noble land, uncontaminated by strangers, while He Himself would be enthroned in majesty on Zion. But just as that deliverance was ushered in by plagues, so also will be the "great day of Jeh"; and as a signal type of the wholesale destruction of Israel's enemies, he seizes upon the plague of locusts and models his introduction upon Ex 10 4 ff. J. had, no doubt, seen many a visitation of locusts; but what we have before us in chs 1 and 2 is not actual description but idealized picture, the groundwork of his eschatology.

Accordingly, in the view of Merx, the whole Book of Joel is one piece. There is no historical transition at 2 10; in fact, there is no historical element in it at all. The end of the book being apocalyptic, the beginning, which forms with it a unity, must also relate to no event in J.'s days, but moves likewise in the period at the close of time. The people addressed are not the men of J.'s day, but those who shall be alive when "that day" is imminent: in a word, the reader is at 1 2 lifted into the air and placed at the beginning of the final judgment, at the moment when the apocalyptic locusts appear as heralds of the day.

Merx's view may be taken as an extreme and somewhat fanciful statement of the case for a late post-exilic date; and it does not seem to have found acceptance by the critics who start from a historical basis. Merx himself is fully aware that it is a revival of the allegorical and typical interpretation which had its vogue in earlier stages of exposition. But he defends himself on the ground that it was not the ancients who imposed the allegorical interpretation upon Scripture, but the original writers who were the first typologists and allegorists, as is notably seen in later books like Ezk and Dnl. Whatever opinion may be held on that subject, we must at least recognize the strongly marked eschatology of the book. But this does not of necessity imply a late date. It is no doubt true that the fully developed eschatology, as we see it in the apocalyptic literature of the extra-canonical books, came in after the cessation of prophecy proper. Yet prophecy, in its earliest phases, contemplated the distant future, and had its support in such an outlook. Professor A. B. Davidson has said: "Isaiah is the creator of the eschatology of the OT and of Christianity, and it comes from his hand in a form so perfect that his successors can hardly add a single touch to it" (Expos T, V, 297). The ancient oracle, found both in Isa and Mic (Isa 2 2-4; Mic 4 1-5), testifies to the triumphant and far-reaching hope of the older seers; and, before Isaiah's time, both Amos (9 11-15) and Hosea (14 4-8) have their outlook to the final future. The remarkable thing about J., which makes the determination of his date so difficult, is that he seems now to go beyond and now to fall short of other prophets. If he is later than Ezekiel and Jeremiah, he has nothing to say of the inclusion of Gentiles in the inheritance of Israel, but contemplates the final destruction of all Israel's enemies. If he is a contemporary of Malachi or later, he is less legalistic than that prophet; and whereas in Mal we see the beginning of the fading away of prophecy, J. looks for the time when the Spirit shall be poured out on all flesh, and the sons and daughters shall prophesy (2 28).

It is this last element in the prophecy of J. that links his book particularly with the NT, for St.

6. Connec- as fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, tion with when the Spirit was poured forth on the NT the assembled multitude (Acts 2 16 ff).

Yet, even as the OT prophets one after another caught up the idea, unfolding and expanding it, so the NT writers see the approach of the day of the Lord in their own time (1 Thess 5 2; 2 Pet 3 10); for that day is always coming, always near, though still in the future. St. Paul saw the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain, as J. did, and the pouring out of the Spirit at Pentecost was part of, and also more than, the effusion seen by J. What J. said he said truly, though he could not say all. For "that day" has grown in significance as the ages have rolled on; men have seen its approach in the various commotions and upheavals of the world, depicting its features in the colors of the changing times, now praying for it, now dreading its approach; and how far from precision are our thoughts in regard to it still! Yet, early or late, unerring is the sure word of prophecy in its essential burden. The concrete historical situations crumble away and leave the eternal truth as fresh as ever: "Jeh reigneth; let the earth rejoice" (Ps 97 1); it is the hopeful burden of OT prophecy, for "righteousness and justice are the foundation of thy throne" (Ps 89 14).

The name attaches to 3 groups of ruins which date from Rom times. The position is about 7 miles N.W. of 'Ammān, and about midway between that city and the town of es-Sall. He warned Gedaliah of the plot of Ishmael ben Nethaniah, who was instigated by the Ammonite king Baalis, to murder the governor; but the latter refused to believe him nor would he grant J. permission to slay Ishmael (40 8—16). After Ishmael had murdered Gedaliah and also 70 northern pilgrims, J. went in pursuit. He was joined by the unwilling followers of Ishmael, but the murderer escaped. Thereupon J. settled at Geruth-Chimham near Bethlehem (ch 41). As Ishmael's plan was to take the remnant to the land of Ammon, so that of J. and his fellow-chiefs was to go to Egypt. They consulted the Divine oracle through Jeremiah, and received the answer that they should remain in Judah (ch 42). But the prophet was accused of giving false counsel and of being influenced by Baruch. The chiefs then resolved to go to Egypt, and forced Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany them (ch 43).

(5) A Benjamite recruit of David at Ziklag, but perhaps a Judacan (1 Ch 12 4 [Heb 5]).

(6) A Gadite recruit of David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 12 [Heb 13]).

LITERATURE

The materials for the following sketch of the Johannine theology are necessarily drawn from the Fourth Gospel and the Epp., chiefly the First Ep., of St. John. The question of authorship is not here considered (see articles on the GOSPEL and on the EPP. of ST. JOHN). These writings, whether by the same or by different authors, are equally saturated with that spiritual and theological atmosphere, equally characterized by that type of thought which we call Johannine, and which presents an interpretation of Christianity scarcely less distinctive and original than Paulinism. Where there are differences in the point of view, these will be indicated.

1. The Antecedents of the Theology.—To attempt a full account of the historical sources and antecedents of the Johannine theology is beyond the scope of the present article; but they may be briefly indicated.

1. Personality of the Writer. Much must be attributed to the personality of the great anonymous writer to whom we directly owe this latest development of NT thought. Only a thinker of first rank among the idealists and mystics, a mind of the Platonic order, moving instinctively in the world of supersensuous realities, absorbed in the passion for the infinite, possessing in a superlative degree the gift of spiritual intuition, could under any conditions have evolved a system of thought having the special characteristics of this theology.

Yet with all his originality the builder has raised his structure upon the foundation already laid in the teaching represented by the earlier NT writings. The synoptic tradition, though freshly interpreted, is presupposed. At certain points there is a strong affinity with the Ep. to the He. In the main, however, the Johannine doctrine may be said to be a natural and inevitable development of Paulinism—the conclusion to which the earlier writer's mind is visibly moving in e.g. the Ep. to the Col.

Among the influences which have stimulated and guided this development, the first place belongs to the natural growth of Christian experience.

3. Christian Experience and Teaching of History. In the closing decades of the 1st cent., Christianity was compelled by the force of events to liberate itself more completely from the husk of Jewish Messianism in which its Divine seed had first been deposited. The faith of the first Christian generation in the Messiahship of Jesus and the triumph of His cause had expressed itself (necessarily so, under the historical conditions) in vivid expectation of His Second Coming. He was only waiting behind the clouds, and would speedily return to the earth for the restitution of all things (Acts 3 21). But after the fall of Jerus this primitive apocalypticism became, with the passing years, more and more discredited; and the Christian faith had either to interpret itself afresh, both to its own consciousness and to the world, or confess itself "such stuff as dreams are made of." It would be difficult to overestimate the service which the Johannine theology must have rendered in this hazardous transition by transferring the emphasis of Christian faith from the apocalyptic to the spiritual, and leading the church to a profounder realization of its essential and inalienable resources in the new spiritual life it possessed through the ever-living Christ. Eternal life was not merely a future felicity, but a present possession; the most real coming of Christ, His coming in the Spirit. The Kingdom of God is here: the eternal is now. Such was the great message of St. John to his age, and to all ages.

In another direction, the widening contact of Christianity with the gentile world had stimulated the development of doctrine. A dis-

4. Widening Contact with the Gentile World. entanglement from Jewish nationalism, more complete than even St. Paul had accomplished, had become a necessity. If Christianity was to find a home and a sphere of conquest in the Gr-Rom world—to recreate European thought and civilization—the person of Christ must be interpreted as having a vastly larger significance than that of the Jewish Messiah. That this necessity hastened the process of thought which reached its goal in the Logos-doctrine of St. John cannot well be doubted. The way had so far been prepared by Philo and the Jewish-Alexandrian school. And while it is probably mere coincidence that Ephesus, with which the activity of St. John's later years is associated by universal tradition, was also the city of Heraclitus, who, 500 years earlier, had used the term Logos to express the idea of an eternal and universal Reason, immanent in the world, there is as little room as there can be motive for questioning that in the Johannine theology Christian thought has been influenced and fertilized at certain points by contact with Hellenism.

On the other hand it is possible that this influence has been overrated. Fresh material for the investigation of the sources and connections of the Johannine theology is furnished by the

5. The Odes of Solomon. recent discovery of the Odes of Solomon (J. Rendel Harris, M.A., Odes and Psalms of Solomon, Cambridge, 1909; Adolf Harnack, Ein jüdisch-christliches Psalmbuch aus dem ersten Jahrhundert, Leipzig, 1910). This collection of religious poems is regarded by its discoverer, Rendel Harris, as the work of a writer who, while not a Jew, was a member of a community of Christians who were for the most part of Jewish extraction and beliefs. But though the Odes in their present form contain distinctly Christian elements (references, e.g. to the Son, the Incarnation, the Virgin Birth, the Passion, the Descensus ad inferos), Harnack's closer analysis tends to the conclusion that in their original form they were purely Jewish, and that they have been adapted to Christian use by a process of interpolation. For the original work Harnack gives as a possible date the beginning of the Christian era, the Christian redaction falling within the 1st cent. Harnack recognizes a possibility that the redactor may have been acquainted with the Fourth Gospel. The religious feeling of the writer is throughout individual and mystical, rather than nationalistic and Messianic. The characteristic atmosphere is strongly Johannine (we may quote in illustration only the noble sentence from the 12th ode: "The dwelling-place of the Word is man; and its truth is Love"). The Odes have, in common with the Johannine writings, such leading conceptions as "grace," "believing," "knowledge," "truth," "light," "living water," "life" (for a full exhibition of the parallelisms, see article by R. H. Strachan, Expos T, October, 1910). Harnack asserts deliberately (p. 99) that in the Odes we possess "the presuppositions of the Johannine theology, apart from the historical Jesus Christ, and without any Messianic doctrine." More recent criticism of the Odes, however, has resulted in great diversity of view regarding their origin. They have been assigned to Gnosticism, and on the contrary to Montanism; and again are described (Bernard) as Christian baptismal hymns. In view of this division of critical opinion, all that can be said in the meantime is that the Odos testify to a collateral mystical development, the recognition of which necessitates a revision of the estimates which have been made regarding the extent to which the Johannine theology is indebted to Hellenistic philosophy.

One other factor in this theological development remains to be mentioned—antagonism to gnostic speculation. In the Gospel this has

6. Antagonism to Gnostic Speculation left not a few traces, in the way both of statement and omission; in the 1st Ep. scarcely any other danger to the faith and life of the church is apprehended than the spreading influence of gnostic tenets (see JOHN, EPISTLES OF). St. John himself has been charged with gnostic tendencies; but the truth rather is that to him Gnosticism must have been the more hateful and have seemed the more dangerous because its conceptions were at some points the caricature of his own. In it he saw the real Antichrist, the "spirit of error," giving fatally misleading solutions of those problems which the human mind can never leave alone, but regarding which the one true light is the historic Christ. Gnosticism had lost all historical sense, all touch with reality. It moved in a world of sheer mythology and speculation; history became allegory; the incarnate Christ a phantasm. St. John took his stand only the more firmly upon historical fact, insisted the more strenuously upon the verified physical reality of the Incarnation. In many of its adherents Gnosticism had lost almost completely the moral sense; St. John the more vehemently asserts the inviolable moral purity of the Divine nature and of the regenerate life which is derived from it. Gnostic dualism had set God infinitely far from men as transcendent Being; St. John brings God infinitely near to men as Love; and sweeps away the whole complicated mythology of gnostic emanations, aeons and archons, by his doctrine of the Logos, coeternal and coequal with the Father, incarnate in Jesus, through whom humanity is made to participate in the very life of God—the life of all love, purity and truth.

II. The Divine Nature.—One of the glories of the Johannine theology is its doctrine of God, its delineation of the Divine nature. This

1. God Is Spirit is given in a series of intuitional affirmations which, though the manner of statement indicates no attempt at correlation, unite to form a complete organic conception. The first of these affirmations defines what is the Divine order of being: God is Spirit (Jn 4 24). The central significance of this inexhaustible saying is defined by the context. The old local worship, whether at Jerus or Samaria, had implied some special local mode of Divine presence; and this naturally suggested, if it did not necessitate, the idea of some kind of materiality in the Divine nature. But God is spirit; and true worship must be an intercourse of spirit with spirit, having relation to no local or material, but only to moral conditions. Thus the concept of the Divine spirituality is both moral and metaphysical. The religious relation to God, as it exists for Christian faith, rests upon the fact that the Supreme Being is essentially moral, but also omnipresent and omniscient—the Divine Spirit whose will and percipency act immediately and simultaneously at every point of existence. Such a Being we utterly lack the power to comprehend. But only such a Being can be God, can satisfy our religious need—a Being of whom we are assured that nothing that is in us, good or evil, true or false, and nothing that concerns us, past, present or future, is hid from His immediate vision or barred against the all-pervading operation of His will. To realize that God is such a Being is to be assured that He can be worshipped with no mechanical ritual or formal observance: they that worship Him must worship Him "in spirit and in truth."

God, who is spirit, is further conceived as Life, Light, Righteousness and Love. Righteousness

2. God Is Life and Love are the primary ethical qualities of the Divine nature; Life the energy by which they act; Light the self-revelation in which they are manifested throughout the spiritual universe. God is Life. He is the ultimate eternal Reality. He was "in the beginning" (Jn 1 1), or "from the beginning" (1 Jn 1 1; 2 13). These statements are made of the Logos, therefore a fortiori of God. But the Divine nature is not mere abstract being, infinite and eternal; it is being filled with that inscrutable elemental energy which we call Life. In God this energy of life is self-originating and self-sustaining ("The Father hath life in himself," Jn 5 26), and is the source of all life (Jn 1 3 4, RV m). For every finite being life is union with God according to its capacity.

But the lower potencies of the creative Life do not come within the scope of the Johannine theology. The term is restricted in usage to its highest ethical significance, as denoting that life of perfect, holy love which is "the eternal life," the possession of which in fellowship with God is the chief end for which every spiritual nature exists. The elements present in the conception of the Divine life are these: (1) The ethical: the life God lives is one of absolute righteousness (1 Jn 2 29), and perfect love (1 Jn 4 9). (2) The metaphysical: the Divine life is nothing else than the Divine nature itself regarded dynamically, as the ground and source of all its own activities, the animating principle or energy which makes Divine righteousness and love to be not mere abstractions but active realities. (3) In Johannine thought the Divine life is esp. an energy of self-reproduction. It is this by inherent moral necessity. Love cannot but seek to beget love, and righteousness to beget righteousness, in all beings capable of them. With St. John this generative activity of the Divine nature holds a place of unique prominence. It is this that constitutes the Fatherhood of God. Eternally the Father imparts Himself to the Son (Jn 5 26), the Word whose life from the beginning consisted in His relation to the Father (1 Jn 1 2). To men eternal life is communicated as the result of a Divine begetting (Jn 1 13; 3 5; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9; 4 7, etc) by which they become "children of God" (Jn 1 12; 1 Jn 3 1, etc). (4) But God is not only the transcendent final source, He is also the immanent source of life. This is clearly implied in all those passages, too numerous to be quoted, which speak of God's abiding in us and our abiding in Him. Life is maintained only through a continuous vitalizing union with Him, as of the branches with the vine (Jn 15 1-6). It must be observed, however, that St. John nowhere merges the idea of God in that of life. God is personal; life is impersonal. The eternal life is the element common to the personality of God, of the Logos, and of those who are the "children of God." Any pantheistic manner of thinking is as foreign to St. John as to every other Bib. writer.

God is not life only; He is light also (1 Jn 1 5). That God is life means that He is and is self-imparting; that He is light means that the

3. God Is Light Divine nature is by inward necessity self-revealing. (1) As the essential property of light is to shine, so God by His very nature of righteousness and love is necessitated to reveal Himself as being what He is, so as to become the Truth (ἡ ἀλήθεια, hē alētheia), the object of spiritual perception (γινώσκειν, ginōskein), and the source of spiritual illumination to every being capable of receiving the revelation. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." In God there is nothing that hides, nothing that is hidden. The Divine character is utterly transparent—goodness without a shadow of evil. (2) This self-revelation of God is given in its perfect form in Jesus, the incarnate Word, who is the light of men (Jn 1 4), the light of the world (Jn 8 12; 9 5), the true light (Jn 1 9; 1 Jn 2 8). (3) It is in their illumination by this Divine light that there exists, even for the sinful, a medium of moral fellowship with God. We can "come to the light" (Jn 3 19-21) and "walk in the light" (1 Jn 1 7). In the translucent atmosphere of the truelight, we, even while morally imperfect and impure, may come to have a common view of spiritual facts with God (1 Jn 1 8-10; 2 9.10). This is the basis of a spiritual religion, and distinguishes Christianity from all irrational superstitions and unethical ritualisms.

In gnostic speculation the Divine nature was conceived as the ultimate spiritual essence, in eternal separation from all that is material

4. Ethical Attributes also, and mutable. But while St. John also, as we have seen, conceives it in this way, with him the conception is primarily and intensely ethical. The Divine nature, the communication of which is life and the revelation of which is light, has, as its two great attributes, Righteousness and Love; and with his whole soul St. John labors to stamp on the minds of men that only in righteousness and love can they walk in the light and have fellowship in the life of God. It is characteristic of St. John's intuitional fashion of thought that there is no effort to correlate these two aspects of the ethical perfection of God; but, broadly, it may be said that they are respectively the negative and the positive. Love is the sum of all that is positively right; righteousness the antithesis of all that is wrong, in character and conduct.

God is righteous.—(1) That such righteousness—antagonism to all sin—belongs to, or rather is, the moral nature of God, and that this lies at the basis of Christian ethics is categorically affirmed. "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (1 Jn 2 29). (2) This righteousness which belongs to the inward character of God extends necessarily to all His actions: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins" (1 Jn 1 9). When on the ground of Christ's propitiation God forgives those who by confessing their sins make forgiveness possible, He acts righteously; and because He acts righteously, He acts also faithfully, that is, self-consistently. He does not "deny himself" (2 Tim 2 13), but does what is in accordance with His own unchangeable character. (3) God's righteousness is related imperatively to the whole moral activity of His creatures, rendering sin inadmissible in them—inadmissible de jure in all, de facto in all who are "begotten of him." This St. John maintains with unexampled vigor (cf 1 Jn 2 29; 3 6.8-10; 5 18). It is true, however, that in its doctrine of Divine righteousness the Johannine theology makes no notable contribution to the sum of NT thought, but simply restates in peculiarly forceful fashion the conception of it which pervades the whole Bib. revelation.

(1) The love of God.—It is far otherwise with the next of the great affirmations which constitute its doctrine of God: God is Love. Here Gospel and Epistle rise to the summit of all revelation, and for the first time clearly and fully enunciate that truth which is the innermost secret of existence.

(a) Primarily a disposition: Love is primarily a disposition, a moral quality of the will. What this quality is is indicated by the fact that the typical object of love in human relation is invariably our "brother." It is the disposition to act toward others as it is natural for those to do who have all interests in common and who realize that the full self-existence of each can be attained only in a larger corporate existence. It is the mysterious power by which egoism and altruism meet and coalesce, the power to live not only for another but in another, to realize one's own fullest life in the fulfilment of other lives. It is self-communication which is also self-assertion.

(b) Embodied in Christ's self-sacrifice: In history love has its one perfect embodiment in the self-sacrifice of Christ. "Hereby know we love [i.e. perceive what love is], because he laid down his life for us" (1 Jn 3 16). The world had never been without love; but till Jesus Christ came and laid down His life for the men that hated and mocked and slew him, it had not known what love in its greatness and purity could be.

(c) Love in redemption: But here history is the invisible translated into the visible. The self-sacrifice of Christ in laying down His life for us is the manifestation (1 Jn 4 9), under the conditions of time and sense, of the love of God, eternal and invisible. In the closely related passages (Jn 3 16; 1 Jn 4 9.10) this is declared with matchless simplicity of statement. The Divine love is manifested in the magnitude of its gift—"his Son, his only begotten" (elsewhere the title is only "the Son" or "his Son" or "the Son of God"). Other gifts are only tokens of God's love; in Christ its all is bestowed (cf Rom 8 32; Gen 22 12). The love of God is manifested further in the purpose of its gift—"that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." It is the self-determination of God, not only to rescue men from what is the sum and finality of all evils, but to impart the supreme and eternal good. But again, the love of God is manifested in the means by which this purpose is achieved. His son is sent as "the propitiation for our sins." God shrinks not from the uttermost cost of redemption; but in the person of His Son humbles Himself and suffers unto blood that He may take upon Himself the load of human guilt and shame. And the last element in the full conception of Divine love is its objects: "God so loved the world"; "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us." Its ineffable mystery reveals itself in its absolute spontaneity, its self-origination. Its fires are self-kindled; it shines forth in its purest splendors upon the unattractive and unworthy. Such is the conception St. John sets before us. In this entirely spontaneous, self-determined devotion of God to sinful men; this Divine passion to rescue them from sin, the supreme evil, and to impart to them eternal life, the supreme good; in this, which is evoked not by their worthiness but by their need, and goes to the uttermost length of sacrifice in bearing the uttermost burden of their sin and its inevitable consequences; in this, which is forever revealed in the mission of Jesus Christ, God's only begotten Son, is love.

(2) Love is God's nature.—And God is love (1 Jn 4 8.16). (a) God is love essentially. Love is not one of God's moral attributes, but that from which they all proceed, and in which they all unite. The spring of all His actions is love. (b) Therefore also His love is universal. In a special sense He loves those who are spiritually His children (Jn 14 23); but His undivided and essential love is given also to the whole world (Jn 3 16; 1 Jn 2 2). That is St. John's great truth. He does not attempt to reconcile with it other apparently conflicting truths in his theological scheme; possibly he was not conscious of any need to do so. But of this he is sure—God is love. That fact must, in ways we cannot yet discern, include all other facts. (c) The love of God is eternal and unchangeable; for it does not depend on any merit or reciprocation in its object, but overflows from its own infinite fullness. We may refuse to it the inlet into our life which it seeks (Jn 3 19; 5 40); we may so identify ourselves with evil as to turn it into an antagonistic force. But as our goodness did not call it forth, neither can our evil cause it to cease. (d) If love is an essential, the essential attribute of God, it follows that we cannot ultimately conceive of God as a single simple personality. It is at this point that the fuller Johannine conception of multiple personality in the Godhead becomes most helpful, enabling us to think of the Divine life in itself not as an eternal solitude of self-contemplation and self-love, but as a life of fellowship (Jn 1 1; 1 Jn 1 2). The Godhead is filled with love. "The Father loveth the Son" (Jn 3 35); and the prayer of the Son for His followers is "that the love wherewith thou lovedst me may be in them" (Jn 17 26). The eternal giving and receiving of Divine love between the Father and the Son is, in the Johannine theology, an essential element of the Divine nature.

III. The Incarnation.—The 2d great contribution of the Johannine writings to the development of Christian theology is their doctrine of Christ—the latest and most deliberate effort within NT times to relate intellectually the church's faith in Jesus to its faith in God. In these writings the superhuman personality of Jesus is expressed by three titles which are used as practically synonymous—"the Christ," "the Son" ("Son of God," "only begotten Son of God"), the "Word" (Logos). The last alone is distinctively Johannine.

Historically, the Logos-doctrine of St. John has undoubted links of connection with certain speculative developments both of Gr and Heb thought. The Heraclitean use of the term "Logos" (see above, I) to express the idea of an eternal and all-embracing Reason immanent in the world was continued, while the conception was further elaborated, by the Stoics. On the other hand, the later developments of Heb thought show an increasing tendency to personify the self-revealing activity of God under such conceptions as the Angel, Glory, or Name of Jeh, to attach a peculiar significance to the "Word" (mē'mrā) by which He created the heaven and the earth, and to describe "Wisdom" (Job, Prov) in something more than a figurative sense as His agent and coworker. These approximations of Gr pantheism and Heb monotheism were more verbal than real; and, naturally, Philo's attempt in his doctrine of the Logos to combine philosophies so radically divergent was less successful than it was courageous. How far, and whether directly or indirectly, St. John is indebted to Philo and his school, are questions to which widely different answers have been given; but some obligation, probably indirect, cannot reasonably be denied. It is evident, indeed, that both the idea and the term "Logos" were current in the Christian circles for which his Gospel and First Ep. were immediately written; in both its familiarity is assumed. Yet the Johannine doctrine has little in common with Philo's except the name; and it is just in its most essential features that it is most original and distinct.

As the OT begins with the affirmation, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," so the Fourth Gospel begins with the similar affirmation, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (Jn 1 1). The Word was the medium of Divine action in creation (Jn 1 3). In the Word was

2. The life, not merely self-existing but self-
Logos-imparting, so that it became the light Doctrine in of men (Jn 1 4)—the true light, which,
St. John coming into the world, lighteth every man (Jn 1 9). And finally it is declared that this Divine Word became flesh and tabernacled among us, so that "we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn 1 14). Here faith in Jesus as Divine has been traced back to, and grounded in, a duality within the Godhead itself. In the twofold mode of the Divine existence, it is seen that there is God who is just God (so to say), God in Himself; and there is God-with-God, God who is God's other self, God going forth from Himself in thought and action. The first without the second would be essence without manifestation, mind without utterance, light without effulgence, life without life-giving, fatherhood without sonship. It is seen that within the Divine Being there is one through whom, as there is also one from whom, all Divine energy goes forth. Above all it is seen that there is a Divine mode of existence in which it is inherently possible and natural for God to be immediately related to created being and even to become incarnate in humanity, as there is also a mode of Divine existence which cannot be immediately communicated or revealed to created life. Thus the Johannine doctrine is: first, that the Logos is personal and Divine, having a ground of personal being within the Divine nature (pros tōn theōn, "in relation to God"); and, second, that the Logos became flesh, was and is incarnate in the historical Jesus.

In the Gospel the term "Logos" does not recur after the opening verses; yet the thesis of the Prologue, so far from being irrelevant, dominates the entire biographical presentation.

3. The In- The creative and cosmic significance of the Logos-Christ is naturally in the background; but it may be said of the Gospel that "the Word became flesh" is its text, and all the rest—miracle, incident, discourse—is comment. On the one hand, the reality of the "becoming flesh" is emphasized (e.g. Jn 4 6; 11 35; 19 1.2.3.17.28.34.38-40; 20 20.27). On the other hand, the human vesture only reveals the Divine glory within. On earth, Jesus is still "the Son of man, who is in heaven" (3 13); the perfect revelation of the Father (14 9); the light of the world (8 12); the way, the truth and the life (14 6); the resurrection (11 26); the final judge (5 22) and Saviour (4 42; 6 40) of men; the supreme moral authority (13 34; 14 15.21); the hearer of prayer (14 13.14); the giver of the Spirit (7 38.39; 16 7; 20 22); endowed with all the prerogatives of God (5 23; 10 30.36-38).

In the First Ep. the central thesis is the complete, personal, and permanent identity of the historical Jesus with the Divine Being who is

4. The the Word of Life (1 1), the Christ
Incarnation (4 2), the Son of God (5 5). This in the First is maintained in a vigorous polemic
Epistle against certain heretical teachers whom the writer calls "antichrists," who in docetic fashion denied that Jesus is the Christ (2 22), or, more definitely, the "Christ come in the flesh" (4 3), and who asserted that He "came" by water only and not by blood also (5 6; see JOHN, EPISTLES OF). Against this doctrine of a merely apparent or temporary association of Jesus with the Christ St. John bears vehement testimony. "Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?" (2 22). "Every spirit that confesseth Jesus as Christ come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God" (4 2.3). "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not with the water only, but with the water and with the blood" (5 5.6). These passages all promulgate the same truth in substantially the same way. Without ceasing to be what He is, the Christ, the Son of God, has become Jesus; and Jesus, without ceasing to be truly human, is the Son of God. As to the manner of the incarnation—by what process of self-emptying or by what conjunction of Divine-human attributes the eternal Son became Jesus—the Johannine writings, like the NT everywhere, are silent. They proclaim Jesus Christ as human and Divine; but the distinguishing of what in Him was human and what Divine, or whether the one is distinct from the other, this they do not even consider. Gnosticism drew such a distinction; St. John does not. His one truth is that Jesus is the Son of God and the Son of God is Jesus, and that in Him the life of God was manifested (1 2) and is given (5 11) to men.

In this truth, viewed in its practical consequences, St. John sees the core of the church's faith and the root and safeguard of its life. (a)

5. Practical This alone secures and guarantees the Implications Christian revelation of God; with its denial that revelation is canceled. of the Incarnation "Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father" (2 23). (b)

Above all, it is only in the life and death of Jesus, the incarnate Son, that we possess a valid revelation of God's self-sacrificing love. "Herein was the love of God manifested in us, that God hath sent his . . . Son into the world that we might live through him" (4 9). With the denial of this the Christian ethic is drained of its very life-blood. There was no merely external and accidental connection between Docetism and the moral indifference of the Gnostic. The natural result of making man's salvation easy, so to say, for God, was to make it easy for man also—salvation by creed without conduct (2 4.6; 3 7), knowledge without love (4 8), or love that paid its debts with goodly phrases and empty words (3 17.18). A docetic Christ meant docetic Christianity. (c) Finally, St. John sees in the incarnation the only possibility of a Divine redemption. It was not for a word or a formula he was concerned, but for the raising of humanity to Divine life through the God-man. The ultimate significance of the incarnation of the Son is that in Him the eternal life of God has flowed into our humanity and become a fountain of regenerative power to as many as receive Him (Jn 1 12). "He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life" (1 Jn 5 12). This is the center of the Johannine Gospel—a Divine-human Christ, who stands in a unique, vital relation to men, reproducing in them His own character and experiences as the vine reproduces itself in the branches, doing that, the mysterious reality of which is only expressed, not explained, when it is said that He is our "life" (Jn 14 19.20; 15 5).

IV. The Holy Spirit.—In one direction the doctrine of the Holy Spirit is uniquely developed in the Johannine writings. The conception of the Spirit as the agent of presence in which all and more than all the effects of His bodily presence would be perpetuated (Jn 14 18; 16 22). In truth, it was expedient for them that He should go away, in order that this other Paraclete should come (16 7). In the body His presence with His followers had been local and intermittent; in the Spirit He would come to take up His abode with them forever (14 16). Formerly He had been still external to them, but now was not only to dwell with them, but to be in them (14 17). Instead of the external voice of their Teacher addressing to them the words of eternal life, they should possess the very Spirit of truth (14 17), a well-spring of illumination from within, giving them an "understanding" to know Him that is true (1 Jn 5 20); and instead of His visible example before their eyes, an inward community of life with Him like that of the vine and the branches. The complete, vital, permanent union of Christ and His people, which had been prevented by the necessary limitations of a local, corporeal state of existence, would be attained, when for this there was substituted the direct action of spirit upon spirit.

Perpetuates, but also intensifies the consciousness of Christ.—Thus the function of the Spirit which is chiefly emphasized in the Johannine writings is that by which He perpetuates but also intensifies, enlightens, and educates the consciousness of Christ in the church and in the Christian life. In this respect His nature is the opposite of that of the Logos, the self-revealing God. The Holy Spirit never reveals Himself to human consciousness; He reveals the Son and the Father through the Son. His operations are wholly secret and inscrutable, known only by their result (Jn 3 8). He is the silent inward monitor and remembrancer of the disciples (Jn 14 20); the illuminator, the revealer of Christ (16 14); a spirit of witness who both Himself bears witness concerning Christ to His people and makes of them ready and joyful witness-bearers (15 26.27); a guide by whom a steady growth in knowledge is secured, leading gradually on to the full truth of Christ (16 12.13); a spirit of conviction working in men an immediate certainty of the truth regarding sin and righteousness, and the Divine judgment which marks their eternal antagonism (16 8-11).

In the Ep. we find the promise of the Gospel accomplished in actual experience. There is no reference to the manifold charismata of the first age, the prophetic afflatus excepted (1 Jn 4 1). But whether through the prophetic "medium" or the normal Christian consciousness, the function of the Spirit is always to "teach" or to "witness" concerning Christ. This is finely brought out in the parallelism of 1 Jn 5 6: "This [Jesus Christ] is he that came" (once for all fulfilling the Messiah's mission); "It is the Spirit that beareth witness" (ever authenticating its Divine origin, interpreting its purpose and applying its results). The specific testimony the Spirit bears to Christ is defined (1 Jn 4 2.3). "Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God."

(1) A Divine Teacher.—The gift of the Spirit is an "anointing from the Holy One" (1 Jn 2 20); and the result of this "anointing" is that "ye know all things" (or that "ye all have knowledge"; the reading is doubtful), and "need not that any one teach you" (2 27). The apostle's comfort concerning his readers, encompassed as they are by the snares of Antichrist, is that they have a Divine Teacher, who continually enlightens their understanding, strengthens their convictions and ministers to them an invincible assurance of the truth of the Gospel. "The anointing abideth in you . . . and teacheth you concerning all things." The spirit is not a source of independent revelation, but makes the revelation of Christ effectual. The truth is placed beyond all reach of controversy and passes into absolute knowledge: "Ye know all things." It may be added that the history of Christianity furnishes an always growing verification of this Johannine doctrine of a living power of witness and enlightenment present in the church, by which, notwithstanding the constant hindrance of human imperfection, the development of the Christian faith has been steadily advanced, its forgotten or neglected factors brought to remembrance. Old truths have been presented in new aspects and filled with fresh life, and all has been brought to pass with marvelous adaptation to the church's needs and in proportion to its receptivity.

(2) Other aspects.—In other directions the doctrine of the Spirit is less developed. The agency of the Spirit in regeneration is repeatedly and emphatically declared in a single passage (Jn 3 5-8), but is nowhere else referred to either in the Gospel or the First Ep. More remarkable still, neither in Gospel nor Ep. is the Holy Spirit once spoken of as the Divine agent in sanctification. There is no passage resembling that in which St. Paul speaks of the ethical "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5 22-23). The Spirit is the Spirit of truth, the revealer, the inspirer of faith, but is never spoken of as the Spirit of love or holiness. If those who are begotten of God cannot sin, it is not because God's Spirit, but because "his seed" abideth in them (1 Jn 3 9). The explanation of this peculiarity (which has been little observed) in the Johannine theology may be that the Spirit's work of revealing Christ is regarded as all-inclusive. Thus enabling Christ's disciples to abide in Him as the branch in the vine, He secures also their bringing forth "much fruit" in all Christlikeness of character and conduct.

Passing now from the work to the Person, we observe that in the Fourth Gospel the attribution of personality to the Spirit reaches the acme of distinctness. He is 3. The Person of "another Paraclete" (Jn 14 16m), personal as Christ Himself is personal; and all the functions ascribed to Him—to remind, to teach, to testify, to guide, to convict—are such as are possible only to a personal agent. Nor is it otherwise in the First Ep. The expressions in it which have been alleged (Pfeiderer and others) as inconsistent with personality (the "anointing," 2 20; "He hath given us of his Spirit," 4 13) require no such interpretation. The "anointing" denotes the Spirit, not in His essence or agency, but as the gift of the Holy One with which He anoints believers (cf Jn 7 38,39); and the expression "He hath given us of his Spirit" (as if the Spirit were a divisible entity) is no more incompatible with personality than is the saying "to Him whom he hath sent . . . , God giveth not the Spirit by measure" (Jn 3 34), or than our speaking of Christians as having more or less of the Spirit.

His Deity implied.—The essential Deity of the Spirit is nowhere explicitly asserted, but is necessarily implied in His relation both to Christ and to the church as the "other Paraclete." There is not, however, the same theological development as is achieved regarding the Logos. The Divinity of Christ is grounded in an essential duality of being within the Godhead itself; but there is no similar effort to trace back the threefoldness in the revelation of God, as Father, Son and Spirit, to an essential threefoldness in the Divine nature. The fact is that both historically and logically the doctrine of the Spirit as the third person in the Godhead depends upon that of the Divine Son as the second. It was through its living experience of the Divine in Christ that the church first developed its thought of God beyond the simple monotheism of the OT; but having advanced to the conception of a twofold Godhead, in which there is Fatherhood and Sonship, it was bound to enlarge it still further to that of a threefold Godhead—Father, Son and Spirit. The Son and the Spirit were equally manifestations of God in redemption, and must equally stand in essential relation to the Divine existence.

V. Doctrine of Sin and Propitiation.—This theme is not elaborated. It is characteristic of the Johannine writings that salvation is looked at from the terminus ad quem rather than from the terminus a quo. The infinite good, eternal life, is more in view than the infinite evil, sin. It seems safe to say that the author of these writings at no time had that intense experience of bondage to the law of sin and of death which so colors St. Paul's presentation of the gospel. It was, moreover, no part of his plan to expound the doctrine of propitiation; nor had he any original contribution to make on this head to the sum of NT thought. But it is a quite unwarrantable criticism which denies that the saving work of Christ, in the Johannine conception, consists in deliverance from sin.

It is true that Christ not only takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1 29), but also draws it forth in its utmost intensity and guilt. All sin

1. Sin culminates in the rejection of Christ (15 22); the Spirit convicts men of sin because they "believe not" on Him (16 9). "Every one that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin" (8 34); but what reveals the true character of this bondage is that in the presence of the light, men "loved the darkness" (3 19). That the malign quality and power of evil are fully revealed only in the presence of perfect goodness, that the brighter is the light, the darker is the shade of guilt created by its rejection—all this St. John teaches; but such teaching is by no means peculiar to him, and to infer from it that "to his mind sin in itself involves no moral culpability" is nothing more than a wayward paradox.

In the Ep. the guilt of sin as constituting an objective disability to fellowship with God is strongly emphasized. "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves" (1 Jn 1 8). The phrase "to have sin" is peculiar to St. John, and specifically denotes the culpability of the agent (cf Jn 9 41; 15 22,24; 19 11). Sin is essentially that which needs God's forgiveness (1 Jn 1 9; 2 1,2); and to this end an intercessor and a propitiation have been provided. Such culpability is universal: "If we say that we have not sinned, we"—not only deceive ourselves—"we make him a liar" (1 Jn 1 10).

A second passage (1 Jn 3 4-9) emphasizes the ethical quality of sin—its antagonism to the nature of God and of the children of God. The word which defines the constitutive principle of sin is "lawlessness" (1 Jn 3 4). Sin is fundamentally the denial of the absoluteness of moral obligation, the repudiation of the eternal law upon which all moral life is based. In other words, to sin is to assert one's own will as the rule of action against the absolutely good will of God. But again, the Ep. gives the warning that "all unrighteousness is sin" (5 17). Everything that is not right is wrong. Every morally inferior course of action, however venial it may appear, is sin and contains the elements of positive guilt. The perplexing topic of "sin unto death" demands too special treatment to be dealt with here.

(1) In the Gospel.—The paucity of reference in the Fourth Gospel to the propitiating aspect of Christ's redemptive work has been

2. Propitiation seized upon as proof that, though the writer did not consciously reject the orthodox doctrine, it was really alien to his system. But such a criticism might be directed with almost equal force against the Synoptics. It was no part of St. John's plan, as has been said, to expound a doctrine of propitiation; yet his frontispiece to the ministry of Jesus is "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"; and, as Dr. Inge has pointed out, the same type of the Paschal Lamb underlies the whole narrative of the Passion. In the high-priestly prayer Our Lord expressly represents Himself as the covenant-sacrifice which consecrates His disciples as the people of God (17 19); while the Synoptic "ransom for many" is paralleled by the interpretation of Christ's death as effectual "for the nation; and not for the nation only, but that he might also gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad" (11 51.52; cf 1 Jn 2 2).

(2) In the Epistle.—In the Ep. the doctrinal statement is much more explicit. The fact of propitiation is placed in the forefront. The passage which immediately follows the Prologue (1 6—2 2) introduces a group of ideas—propitiation, blood, forgiveness, cleansing—which are taken directly from the sacrificial system of the OT, and are expressed, indeed, in technical Levitical terms. The mode of action by which Christ accomplished and still accomplishes His mission as the Saviour of the world is: "He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (2 2). Propitiation has its ultimate source in the moral nature of God. It is no device for inducing a reluctant Deity to forgive; it is the way by which the Father brings back His sinning children to Himself. In St. John's conception it is the supreme act of God's supreme attribute, love. "Herein is love" (4 10). Yet it is a real work of propitiation in which this love goes forth for man's salvation—a work, that is, which expiates the guilt of sin, which restores sinful offenders to God by rendering their sin null and inoperative as a barrier to fellowship with Him. This propitiatory virtue is regarded as concentrated in the "blood of Jesus his Son" (1 7), that is to say, in the Divine-human life offered to God in the sacrifice of the cross. This, if we walk in the light as He is in the light, "cleanseth us from all sin"—removes from us the stain of our guilt, and makes us clean in God's sight. In virtue of this, Christ is the penitent sinner's advocate (paraclete-helper) with the Father (2 1). The words "with the Father" are highly significant. Even the Father's love can urge nothing in apology for sin, nothing that avails to absolve from its guilt. But there is one who can urge on our behalf what is at once the strongest condemnation of our sin and plea for its remission—Himself, "Jesus Christ the righteous" (2 1). "And he [Himself] is the propitiation for our sins." St. John does not speak of Christ as "making propitiation"; He, Himself, in virtue of all He is—Jesus Christ, in whom the Divine ideal of humanity is consummated, in whom the Father sees His own essential righteousness revealed, Jesus Christ the Righteous—is both propitiation and intercession. The two acts are not only united in one person, but constitute the one reconciling work by which there is abiding fellowship between God and His sinning people.

(3) One with NT teaching.—In this statement of the doctrine of propitiation, memorable as it is, there is nothing notably original. It tacitly presupposes, as NT teaching everywhere does, that God, in bestowing the sovereign grace of pardon and sonship, must deal truthfully and adequately with sin as a violation of the moral order; and with St. John, as with other NT writers, the necessity and efficacy of sacrifice as the means by which this is accomplished are simply axiomatic. His great contribution to Christian thought is the vision of the cross in the heart of the eternal love. How suggestive are these two statements when placed side by side! "Herein is love . . . that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 Jn 4 10); and "Hereby know we love [recognize what it is], because he laid down his life for us" (3 16). God's sending His Son and Christ's laying down His life are moral equivalents. The sacrifice of Christ is the sacrifice of God. St. John's doctrine of propitiation follows as a moral necessity from his doctrine of God. If God is love, nothing is more inevitably true than that He suffers on account of human sin; and to deny Him the power to help and save men by bearing their burden would be to deny to Him love's highest prerogative.

VI. Eternal Life.—The development of the conception of eternal life must be set along with the doctrine of the moral nature of God and the doctrine of the incarnation as one of the greatest contributions of the Johannine theology to NT thought. With this conception the Gospel begins (1 4) and ends (20 31); and, in like manner, the Ep. (1 2; 5 20). The designation most frequently employed is simply "the life" (hē zōē); 17 t in the Gospel and 6 t in the First Ep. it is described qualitatively as "eternal"; but the adj. brings out only what is implicit in the noun. In harmony with the universal Bib. conception, St. John regards life as the summum bonum, in which the reality of fellowship with God consists, which therefore fulfils the highest idea of being—"perfect truth in perfect action" (Westcott). Christ Himself is "the life" (Jn 14 6), its only bestower and unfailing source (14 19). He came that we might have it abundantly (10 10).

But this conception is uniquely developed in two directions. While the eschatological element is not lost, it is absorbed in the ethical. The

1. Ethical ideas of duration and futurity, which Rather than are properly and originally expressed Eschatological by the adj. "eternal" (aiōnios=belonging to an aeon—specifically to "the coming aeon"), become secondary to that of timeless moral quality. Always life is regarded as a present possession rather than as future felicity (e.g. Jn 3 36; 20 31; 1 Jn 3 14. 15; 5 12). For St. John the question whether it is possible to make the best of both worlds is meaningless. Eternal life is the best, the Divine, kind of life, whether in this world or another. It is the kind of life that has its perfect manifestation in Christ (1 Jn 1 2; 5 11). To possess that nature which produces thoughts and motives and desires, words and deeds like His, is to have eternal life.

Metaphysically the conception undergoes a development which is equally remarkable, though in the judgment of many, of more questionable value.

2. Meta-physical Aspect It has already been seen (see above, II) that life is conceived as the animating principle or essence of the Divine nature, the inward energy of which all its activities are the manifold outgoing. And this conception is carried through with strict consistency; The spiritual life in men, which is "begotten of God," is the vital essence, the mystic principle which is manifested in all the capacities and activities of Christian personality. It does not consist in, and still less is it a result following, repentance, faith, obedience or love; it is that of which they are the fruits and the evidences. Thus instead of "This do, and thou shalt live" (Lk 10 28), St. John says, conversely, "Every one also that doeth righteousness is [=has been] begotten of God" (1 Jn 2 29); instead of "The just shall live by faith" (Rom 1 17 AV), "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is [=has been] begotten of God" (1 Jn 5 1). The human activity is the result and proof of Divine life already imparted, not the condition or means of its attainment. In the Johannine conception life is cause, not effect; not phenomenon, but essence; not the complex whole of the qualities, activities and experiences of the spiritual man, but that which makes them possible—the inscrutable, Divinely communicated principle (Jn 3 8) in which the capacity for them is given and by which also it is realized.

Reply to criticism.—This Johannine conception of life is vigorously criticized as importing into the interpretation of Christian experience principles and modes of thought borrowed from Gr philosophy. But the tendency to infer causes from effects and to reason from phenomena to essence is not peculiar to Gr philosophy; it is native to the human intellect. The Johannine conception of spiritual life is closely analogous to the common conception of physical life. We do not conceive that a man lives because he breathes and feels and acts; we think and we say that he does these things because he lives, because there is in him that mystic principle we call life. Only to the thinker trained in the logic of empiricism is it possible to define life solely by its phenomena, as e.g. the continuous adjustment of internal to external relations" (Spencer). The ordinary mind instinctively passes behind the phenomena to an entity of which they are the manifestation. The Johannine conception, moreover, lies in the natural line of development for NT thought. It is implicit in that whole strain of Our Lord's synoptic teaching which regards doing as only the outcome of being, and which is emphasized in such utterances as "Either make the tree good, and its fruit good; or make the tree corrupt, and its fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by its fruit" (Mt 12 33); as also in the whole Pauline doctrine of the new creation and the mystical indwelling of Christ in the members of His body. And while it is no doubt true that the Johannine conception of life was immediately influenced by contact with Hellenism, it is one which was sure, sooner or later, to emerge in Christian theology.

(1) Source in God.—In the development of the doctrine we note the following points. (a) The sole and absolute source of life is God, the

ment of Father hath life in himself" (Jn 5 26).
Doctrine He is the "living Father" by whom the Son lives (Jn 6 57); the "true God, and eternal life" (1 Jn 5 20). Eternal life is nothing else than the immanence of God in moral beings created after His likeness; the Divine nature reproducing itself in human nature; the energy of the Spirit of God in the spiritual nature of man.
This is its ultimate definition.

(2) Mediated by Christ.—Of this life Christ is the sole mediator (Jn 6 33, 57; 11 25; 14 6). The witness is that "God gave unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son" (1 Jn 5 11). This mediation is grounded in the relation, eternally subsisting within the Godhead, of the Logos to the Father. The life manifested and seen in the historic Christ (1 Jn 1 1) is "the life, the eternal life," which existed in relation to the Father (1 Jn 1 2). By the incarnation of the Son the eternal life in its Divine fulness has become incorporate with humanity, a permanent source of regenerative power to "as many as received him" (Jn 1 12). It is His own relation to the Father that He reproduces in men (Jn 17 23).

(3) Through the Spirit.—In the communication of this life the Spirit is the one direct agent (Jn 3 5-8; see above, under IV).

(4) The Divine "begetting."—The act of Divine self-communication is constantly and exclusively expressed by the word "beget" (gennán—Jn 1 13; 3 3, 5-8; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9, etc.). The word is of far-reaching significance. It implies not only that life has its ultimate origin in God, but that its communication is directly and solely His act. In how literal a sense the Divine begetting is to be understood appears very strikingly in 1 Jn 3 9: "Who-soever is begotten of God doeth no sin; because his seed abideth in him." The unique expression "his seed" signifies the new life-principle which is the formative element of the "children of God." This abides in him who has received it. It stamps its own character upon his life and determines its whole development.

(5) The "children of God."—Those who are "begotten of God" are ipso facto "children of God" (tekna theou, Jn 1 12; 11 52; 1 Jn 3 1, 2, 10; 5 2). The term connotes primarily the direct communication of the Father's own nature; and secondarily the fact that the nature thus communicated has not as yet reached its full stature, but contains the promise of a future glorious development. We are now children of God, but what it fully is to be children of God is not yet made manifest (1 Jn 3 2). Participation in this life creates a family fellowship (koinōnía) at once human and Divine. Those who are begotten of God and walk in the light have "fellowship one with another" (1 Jn 1 7). They are "brethren" and are knit together by the instincts (1 Jn 5 1) and the duties of mutual love (Jn 13 34; 15 12; 1 Jn 3 16; 4 11) and of mutual watchfulness and intercession (1 Jn 5 16).

On the Divine side they have fellowship "with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1 3). In this Divine fellowship the life "begotten" is nourished and sustained; and no term is more characteristic of the Johannine vocabulary, alike in Gospel and Epp., than the word "abide" (mênein), by which this is expressed. There is, however, a noticeable difference in the modes of statement. In the Ep., the formulae almost exclusively employed are these: "God abides in us," "We abide in God," "God abides in us and we in him." In the Gospel the reciprocal indwelling is that of Christ and His disciples (Jn 15 4-10), which has its Divine counterpart in that of the Father and the Son (Jn 14 10; 17 23; 15 10). This diversity is consistent with the different points of view occupied in the two documents. The Gospel is christocentric; the Ep., theocentric. In the one is given the concrete presentment of the incarnate Son; in the other the immediate intuition of the Divine nature revealed in Him. While the theme common to both is the "Word of life," the special theme of the Gospel is the Word who reveals and imparts the life; in the Ep. it is the life revealed and imparted by the Word, and the thought of the indwelling Christ is naturally carried up to the ultimate truth of the indwelling God.

(6) The Divine abiding.—The vitalizing union by which the Divine life is sustained in those who are begotten of God consists in two reciprocal activities, not separable and not identical—God's (or Christ's) abiding in us and our abiding in Him. As in the similitude of the vine and the branches (Jn 15 1-10), the life imparted is dependent for its sustenance and growth upon a continuous influx from the parent source: as it is the sap of the vine that vitalizes the branches, producing leaf and blossom and fruit, so does the life of God support and foster in His children its own energies of love and truth and purity. But to this end the abiding of God in us has as its necessary counterpart our abiding in Him. We can respond to the Divine influence or reject it; open or obstruct the channels through which the Divine life flows into ours (Jn 15 6, 7, 10; 8 31). Hence abiding in God is a subject of instruction and exhortation (Jn 15 4; 1 Jn 2 27 f); and here the idea of persistent and steadfast purpose which belongs to the word mênein comes clearly into view. As the abiding of God in us is the persistent and purposeful action by which the Divine nature influences ours, so our abiding in God is the persistent and purposeful submission of ourselves to that influence. The means of doing this are steadfast loyalty to the truth as it is revealed in Christ and announced in the apostolic Gospel (Jn 8 31; 15 7; 1 Jn 2 27), keeping God's commandments (Jn 14 23; 15 10; 1 Jn 3 24), and loving one another (1 Jn 4 12, 16). Thus only is the channel of communication kept clear between the source and the receptacle of life.

VII. Human Nature and Its Regeneration.—The necessity of regeneration is fundamental to the whole theological scheme (Jn 3 3, 5, 7). Life which consists in union with God does not belong to man as he is naturally constituted: those who know that they have eternal life know that it is theirs because they have "passed out of death into life" (1 Jn 3 14; Jn 5 24).

The unregenerate state of human nature is specially connected with the Johannine conception of the "world" (kósmos). This term has a peculiar elasticity of application; and Westcott's definition—"the order of finite being, regarded as apart from God"—may be taken as expressing the widest idea that underlies St. John's use of the word. When the kosmos is material, it signifies (1) the existing terrestrial creation (Jn 1 10; 13 1; 16 28), esp. as contrasted with the sphere of the heavenly and eternal. When it refers to humanity, it is either (2) the totality of mankind as needing redemption and as the object of God's redeeming love (Jn 3 16; 1 Jn 2 2; 4 14), or (3) the mass of unbelieving men, hostile to Christ and resisting salvation (e.g. Jn 15 18). Of the world in this sense it is said that it has no perception of the true nature of God and the Divine glory of Christ (Jn 1 10; 17 25; 1 Jn 3 1); that it hates the children of God (Jn 15 18, 19; 17 14; 1 Jn 3 13); that the spirit of Antichrist dwells in it (1 Jn 4 3, 4); that to it belong the false prophets and their adherents (1 Jn 4 1, 5); that it is under the dominion of the wicked one (Jn 12 31; 14 30; 16 11; 1 Jn 5 19); that the constituents of its life are "the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the vainglory of life" (1 Jn 2 16); that it passeth away (1 Jn 2 17); that Christ has conquered it (Jn 16 33), and that "whatsoever is begotten of God" conquers it (1 Jn 5 4) by the power of faith in Him (1 Jn 5 5). Thus the "world" (in this darker significance) is composed of those who still love the darkness rather than the light (Jn 3 19), who, when Christ is presented to them, obstinately retain their blindness and enmity. Nevertheless, the "world" is not beyond the possibility of salvation. The Holy Spirit, acting in the Christian community, will convince the world with regard to sin and righteousness and judgment (Jn 16 8); and the evidence of the unity of Divine fellowship among Christ's disciples will lead it to believe in His Divine mission (Jn 17 23).

Thus it is true that St. John teaches "a distinction of two great classes in the human race—those who are from above and those who are from beneath—children of light and children of darkness." But that he teaches this in any gnostic or semi-gnostic fashion is an assertion for which there is no real basis. He distinguishes between those who love the light and those who love the darkness rather than the light, between those who "receive" Christ and those who "will not" come unto Him that they may have life. This distinction, however, he traces to nothing in the natural constitution of the two classes, but solely to the regenerating act of God (Jn 1 13; 6 44). His doctrine of regeneration is, in fact, his solution of the problem created by the actual existence of those two classes among men—a problem which is forced upon every thoughtful Christian mind by the diverse and opposite results of evangelism. It is this that lies behind such utterances as these: "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice" (Jn 18 37); "Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep. My sheep hear my voice . . . and they follow me" (Jn 10 26, 27); "Every one that hath heard from the Father, cometh unto me. No man can come unto me except it be given unto him of the Father" (Jn 6 45, 65). In these and all similar passages, belief or unbelief in Christ, when He is presented, depends upon antecedent spiritual predisposition (St. John's equivalent to the Pauline predestination). There exists in certain persons what is lacking in others, a power of spiritual vision by which Christ is recognized, a capacity and a predisposition to receive Him. But this predisposition is not (any more than St. Paul's predestination) theirs by gift of nature. St. John refuses to find its source in human personality (Jn 1 13; 1 Jn 5 1). The children of God are not a superior species of the genus homo. They are men who have passed from death into life, and who have done so because they are begotten of God. St. John's doctrine is thus the antithesis of Gnosticism. The gnostic distinction of two classes in the human race glorified men; its proper and inevitable fruit was spiritual pride. The effect of St. John's doctrine is to humble man and glorify God, to satisfy the innermost Christian consciousness that not even for their appropriation of God's gift in Christ can believers take credit to themselves; that in nothing can the human spirit do more than respond to the Divine, and that, in the last analysis, this power itself is of God. Regeneration in the Johannine sense is not to be identified with conversion. It is the communication of that vision of truth and that capacity for new moral activity which issue in conversion. The doctrine of regeneration contained in the Johannine writings is the fullest recognition in the NT that all the conscious experiences and activities of the Christian life are the result of God's own inscrutable work of begetting in the depths of human personality, and of renewing and replenishing there, the energies of the Divine.

VIII. The Church and Sacraments.—While the word "church" is not found, the idea lies near the base of the Johannine theology. The Divine life communicated to men creates a Divine brotherhood, a "fellowship" which is with the Father and "with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1 3) and also "one with another" (1 Jn 1 7)—a fellowship which is consecrated by the self-consecration of Jesus (Jn 17 19), in which men are cleansed from all sin by His blood (1 Jn 1 7), and which is maintained by His intercessory action as the Paraclete with the Father (1 Jn 2 1). This fellowship is realized in the actual Christian community and there only; but it is essentially inward and spiritual, not mechanically ecclesiastical. In the visible community spurious elements may intrude themselves, as is proved when schism unmasks those who, though they have belonged to the external organization, have never been partakers of its real life (1 J 2 19). Only among those who walk in the light of God does true fellowship exist (1 Jn 1 7).

From the doctrine of the Divine nature as life and light one might a priori infer the possibilities of a Johannine view of the sacraments. It is evident that there is room in the Johannine system of thought for a genuinely sacramental mode of Divine action—the employment of definite external acts, not as symbols only, but as real media of Divine communication. On the other hand, the truth that God is not life only but light also—self-revealing as well as self-imparting—would necessarily exclude any magical ex opere operato theory by which spiritual efficacy is attributed either to the physical elements in themselves or to the physical act of participation. And (though there is little or no explicit statement) such is the type of doctrine we actually find. With regard to all sacramental rites the universal principle applies: 'It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing' (Jn 6 63).

(1) Baptism.—Yet baptism is the physical counterpart of the Spirit's work in regeneration, and great importance is attached to it as the means of admission to the new life of the kingdom (Jn 3 5).

(2) The Lord's Supper.—The omission of all reference to the institution of the Lord's Supper (the incident of the feet-washing and the proclamation of the new commandment taking its place in the Gospel-narrative) is thought to indicate that St. John was conscious of a tendency to attach a superstitious value to the outward observance, and desired emphatically to subordinate this to what was spiritual and essential. The omission, to whatever motive it may have been due, is counterbalanced by the sacramental discourse (Jn 6). While the language of this discourse is not to be interpreted in a technically eucharistic sense, its purpose, or one of its purposes, undoubtedly, is to set forth the significance of the Lord's Supper in the largest light. Christ gives to men the bread of life, which is His own flesh and of which men must eat that they may live (Jn 6 50–55). "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me and I in him." This eating and drinking is essentially of the Spirit. It signifies a derivation of life analogous to that of the Son Himself from the Father.

"As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father; so he that eateth me, he also shall live because of me" (ver 57). To "eat the flesh" of the Son of Man is to receive spiritual nourishment from Him, to live by His life. Yet there is nothing in St. John's way of thinking to exclude a real sacramental efficiency. "The act which is nothing when it is performed ignorantly and mechanically is of sovereign value to those who have apprehended its true meaning. The material elements represent the flesh and blood of Christ—His Divine Person given for the life of the world. He is present in them, not merely by way of symbol, but actually; but there must be something in the recipient corresponding to the spiritual reality which is conveyed through the gift. The outward act of participation must be accompanied with belief in Christ and a true insight into the nature of His work and a will to know and serve Him. The sacrament becomes operative as the bread of life through this receptive spirit on the part of those who observe it" (Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 127-28).

IX. Eschatology.—The type of mind revealed in the Johannine writings is one that instinctively leans to the ideal and the spiritual in its contemplation of life, grasping what is of universal significance and dwelling upon events only as they are the embodiment of eternal principles. Where this fashion of thought is so strongly developed, the eschatological, like the historical, becomes secondary.

In St. John there is but one life—the eternal; and there is but one world—the world of the ideal, which is also the only real. Yet he is not an idealist, pure and simple. For him events are not merely symbols; history is not allegory. The incarnation is a historical fact, the Parousia a future event. His thought does not move in a world of mere abstractions, a world in which nothing ever happens. His true distinction as a thinker lies in the success with which he unites the two strains of thought, the historical and the ideal. The word which may be said to express his conception of history is "manifestation" (cf Jn 2 11; 9 3; but esp. 1 Jn 1 2; 2 19.28; 3 2.5.8; 4 9). The incarnation is only the manifestation of 'what was from the beginning' (1 Jn 1 1.2); the mission of Christ, the manifestation of the love eternally latent in the depths of the Divine nature (1 Jn 4 9). The successive events of history are the emergence into visibility of what already exists. In them the potential becomes actual.

Thus St. John has an eschatology, as well as a history. He profoundly spiritualizes. He reaches down through the pictorial representations of the traditional apocalyptic, and inquires what essential principle each of these embodies. Then he discovers that this principle is already universally and inevitably in operation; and this, the present spiritual reality, becomes for him the primary thought. Judgment means essentially the sifting and separation, the classification of men according to their spiritual affinities. But every day men are thus classifying themselves by their attitude toward Christ; this, the true judgment of the world, is already present fact. So also the coming and presence of Christ must always be essentially a spiritual fact, and as such it is already a present fact. There is, in the deepest significance of the word, a perpetual coming of Christ in Christian experience. This, however, does not prevent St. John from firmly holding the certainty of a fuller manifestation of these facts in the future, when tendencies shall have reached a final culmination, and principles which are now apprehended only by faith will be revealed in all the visible magnitude of their consequences.

We shall now briefly survey the Johannine presentation of the chief eschatological ideas.

(1) Eternal life.—It has already been said that the most distinctive feature in the conception of eternal life is that it is not a future immortal felicity so much as a present spiritual state. The category of duration recedes before that of moral quality. Yet it has its own stupendous importance. In triumphant contrast with the poor ephemerality of the worldly life, he that doeth the will of God "abideth for ever" (1 Jn 2 17); and the complete realization of the life eternal is still in the future (Jn 4 36; 6 27; 12 25).

(2) Antichrist.—The view of Antichrist is strikingly characteristic. Tacitly setting aside the lurid figure of popular traditions, St. John grasps the essential fact that is expressed by the name and idea of Antichrist (=one who in the guise of Christ opposes Christ), and finds its fulfilment in the false teaching which substituted for the Christ of the gospel the fantastic product of gnostic imagination (1 Jn 4 3). But in this he reads the sign that the world's day has reached its last hour (1 Jn 2 18).

(3) Resurrection.—While the Fourth Gospel so carefully records the proofs of Christ's resurrection, noticeably little (in the Ep., nothing) is made of the thought of a future resurrection from the dead. For the Christian, the death of the body is a mere incident. "Whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die" (Jn 11 26; cf 8 51). Regeneration—union with Christ—is the true resurrection (Jn 6 50.51.58). And yet, again, the eschatological idea is not lost. Side by side with the essential truth the supplementary and interpretative truth is given its right place. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (Jn 6 54 AV). If Christ says "I am the life: whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die," He also says "I am the resurrection: he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live" (Jn 11 25).

(4) Judgment.—As has already been said, St. John regards judgment as essentially a present fact of life. Christ does not pass judgment upon men—that is not the purpose of His coming (Jn 3 17; 12 47). Yet Christ is always of necessity judging men—compelling them to pass judgment upon themselves. For judgment He is come into the world (Jn 9 39). By their attitude toward Him men involuntarily but inevitably classify themselves, reveal what spirit they are of, and automatically register themselves as being or as not being "of the truth" (Jn 18 37). Judgment is not the assigning of a character from without, but the revelation of a character from within. And this is not future, but present. "He that believeth not hath been judged . . . because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God" (Jn 3 18). Yet the apostle indubitably looks forward to a future Day of Judgment (Jn 12 48; 1 Jn 4 17). Nor is this simply an "unconscious concession to orthodoxy." The judgment to come will be the full manifestation of the judgment that now is, that is to say, of the principles according to which men are in reality approved or condemned already. What this present judgment, the classification of men by their relation to Christ, ultimately signifies, is not at all realized by the "world," is not fully realized even in Christian faith. There must be a day when all self-deception shall cease and all reality shall be manifested.

(5) The Parousia.—In like manner the conception of the Parousia is primarily spiritual. The substitution in the Fourth Gospel of the Supper Discourse (Jn 14-16) for the apocalyptic chapters in the Synoptics is of the utmost significance. It is not a Christ coming on the clouds of heaven that is presented, but a Christ who has come and is ever coming to dwell in closest fellowship with His people (see above under IV). Yet St. John by no means discards belief in the Parousia as a historical event of the future. If Christ's abiding-place is in those that love Him and keep His word, there is also a Father's House in which there are many abiding-places, whither He goes to prepare a place for them and whence He will come again to receive them unto Himself (Jn 14 2.3). Still more is this emphasized in the Ep. The command "Love not the world" is sharpened by the assurance that the world is on the verge, aye, in the process of dissolution (1 Jn 2 17). The exhortation to "abide in him" is enforced by the dread of being put to shame at His impending advent (2 28). The hope of being made partakers in His manifested glory is the consummation of all that is implied in our being now children of God (1 Jn 3 2.3).

(a) A "manifestation": But this future crisis will be only the manifestation of the existing reality (3 2). The Parousia will, no more than the incarnation, be the advent of a strange Presence in the world. It will be, as on the Mount of Transfiguration, the outshining of a latent glory; not the arrival of one who is absent, but the self-revealing of one who is present. As to the manner of Christ's appearing, the Ep. is silent. As to its significance, we are left in no doubt. It is a historical event; occurring once for all; the consummation of all Divine purpose that has governed human existence; the final crisis in the history of the church, of the world, and of every man.

(b) Relation to believers: Especially for the children of God, it will be a coming unto salvation. "Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is" (1 Jn 3 2). Here the Johannine idea of "manifestation" is strikingly employed. "What we shall be" will be essentially what we are—children of God. No new element will be added to the regenerate nature. All is there that ever will be there. But the epoch of full development is not yet. Only when Christ—the Christ who is already in the world—shall be manifested, then also the children of God who are in the world will be manifested as being what they are. They also will have come to their Mount of Transfiguration. As eternal life here is mediated through this first manifestation (1 Jn 1 2), so eternal life hereafter will be mediated through this second and final manifestation. "We know that we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is." It is true that here according to our capacity we behold Him as He is (Jn 1 14); but perception, now dim and wavering, will then be intense and vivid. The vision of the future is in some sense corporeal as well as spiritual. Sense and faith will coincide. It will then have ceased to be expedient that Christ should go away in order that the Spirit of truth may come. We shall possess in the same experience the privilege of the original eyewitnesses of the incarnate life and the inward ministry of the Spirit. And seeing Him as He is, we shall be like Him. Vision will beget likeness, and likeness again give clearness to vision. And as the vision is in some unconjecturable fashion corporeal as well as spiritual, so also is the assimilation (cf Phil 3 21). The very idea of the spiritual body is that it perfectly corresponds to the character to which it belongs. The outward man will take the mold of the inward man, and will share with it its perfected likeness to the glorified manhood of Jesus Christ. Such is the farthest view opened to our hope by the Johannine eschatology; and it is that which, of all others, has been most entrancing to the imagination and stimulating to the aspiration of the children of God.

JOHN, THE APOSTLE: The sources for the life of the apostle John are of various kinds, and of different degrees of trustworthiness.

Sources of the Life of St. John There are the references in the Synoptic Gospels, which may be used simply and easily without any preliminary critical inquiry into their worth as sources; for these Gospels contain the common tradition of the early church, and for the present purpose may be accepted as trustworthy. Further, there are the statements in Acts and in Gal, which we may use without discussion as a source for the life of St. John. There is next the universal tradition of the 2d cent., which we may use, if we can show that the John of Ephesus, who bulks so largely in the Christian literature of the 2d and 3d cents., is identical with the son of Zebedee. Further, on the supposition that the son of Zebedee is the author of the Johannine writings of the NT, there is another source of unequalled value for the estimate of the life and character of the son of Zebedee in these writings. Finally, there is the considerable volume of tradition which gathered around the name of John of Ephesus, of which, picturesque and interesting though the traditions be, only sparing use can be made.

I. Witness of the NT.—Addressing ourselves first to the Synoptic Gospels, to Acts and to Gal, we ask, What, from these sources, can we know of the apostle John? A glance only need be taken at the Johannine writings, more fully discussed elsewhere in relation to their author.

That John was one of the two sons of Zebedee, that he became one of the disciples of Jesus, that

1. The Synoptic Gospels at his call he forsook all and followed Jesus, and was thereafter continuously with Jesus to the end, are facts familiar to every reader of the Synoptic Gospels.

The call was given to John and to his brother James at the Sea of Galilee, while in a boat with their father Zebedee, "mending their nets" (Mt 4 21.22, and || passages). "Come ye after me," said Jesus, "and I will make you to become fishers of men" (Mk 1 17; on the earlier call in Judaea, Jn 1 35 ff, see below). That Zebedee was a man of considerable wealth may be inferred from the fact that he had "hired servants" with him (Mk 1 20), and that his wife was one of those women who ministered of their substance to Jesus and His disciples (Mt 27 55.56). Comparison of the latter passage with Mk 15 40.41 identifies the wife of Zebedee, John's mother, with Salome, and it seems a fair inference from Jn 19 25, though all do not accept it, that Mary, the mother of Jesus, and Salome, the wife of Zebedee, were sisters. On this view, James and John were cousins of Jesus, and were also related to the family of John the Baptist. The name of John appears in all the lists of the apostles given in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 10 2 and ||s). While his name appears rarely in a position by itself, he is still one of the most prominent of the disciples. With Peter and James he is present at the raising of the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5 37; Lk 8 51 ff). These three were also present at the transfiguration (Mt 17; Mk 9; Lk 9). They were nearest to the Lord at the agony of Gethsemane. In all these cases nothing characteristic of John is to be noted. He is simply present as one of the three, and therefore one of the most intimate of the disciples. But there is something characteristic in an incident recorded by Luke (9 54), in which James and John are represented as wishing to call down fire on a Sam village, which had refused them hospitality. From this can be inferred something of the earnestness, zeal, and enthusiasm of the brothers, and of their high sense of what was due to their Master. Peter, James, John, and Andrew are the four who asked Jesus about the prophecies He had uttered: "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when these things are all about to be accomplished?" (Mk 13 4). Then there is the request of their mother as to the place she desired for her sons in the coming kingdom (Mk 10 35 ff). To Peter and John was entrusted the task of preparation for the keeping of the Passover (Lk 22 8). Once John stands alone, and asks what we may consider a characteristic question: "Teacher, we saw one casting out demons in thy name; and we forbade him, because he followed not us" (Mk 9 38; Lk 9 49). From these notices we see that John was in the front rank of the disciples, and we see also that he was so far conscious of the position he held, and of the intimate connection he had with the Master. We note further that John was a young man of fiery zeal, and of a tendency toward intolerance and exclusiveness. The zeal and the intolerance are in evidence in the desire to call down fire upon the Sam village, and the tendency toward exclusiveness is manifested in the request of his mother as to the place her sons were to occupy in the kingdom. These tendencies were not encouraged by Jesus. They were rebuked by Him once and again, but the tendencies reveal the men. In harmony with these notices of character and temperament is the name given to the brothers by Jesus, "Boanerges," "Sons of thunder" (Mk 3 17), which, whatever else may be meant by it, means strength, unexpectedness, and zeal approaching to methods of violence.

John is found in company with Peter in the opening scenes in Acts. He is with Peter while the man at the gate was healed (3 1 ff). He is

2. Acts and Gal with Peter on the mission to Samaria (8 14 ff). He is with Peter and James, the Lord's brother, at the interview with St. Paul recorded in Gal 2, and the three are described by St. Paul as the pillar apostles (2 9). This interview is of importance because it proves that John had survived his brother James, whose death is recorded in Acts 12; at all events that John and James were not killed by the Jews at the same time, as some now contend that they were. This contention is considered below.

Much is to be learned of the apostle John from the Fourth Gospel, assuming the Gospel to have been written by him. We learn from it that he was a disciple of John the Baptist (1 35), that he was one of the first six disciples called by Jesus in His early ministry in Judaea (vs 37-51), and that he was present at all the scenes which he describes in the Gospel.

We find later that he had a home in Jerus, and was acquainted with many there. To that home he took Mary, the mother of Jesus, whom the dying Saviour entrusted to his care (19 26.27). Much more also we learn of him and of his history, for the Gospel is a spiritual biography, a record of the growth of faith on the part of the writer, and of the way in which his eyes were opened to see the glory of the Lord, until faith seems to have become vision. He was in the inner circle of the disciples, indeed, nearest of all to Jesus, "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (13 23; 19 26; 20 2; 21 7.20), and, because of that love, became the apostle of love (see, further, JOHN, GOSPEL OF; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; JOHANNINE THEOLOGY).

The Book of Rev, likewise traditionally ascribed to John, bears important witness to the apostle's banishment in later life to the isle of Patmos in the Aegean (1 9). There he received the visions recorded in the book. The banishment probably took place in the reign of Domitian (see REVELATION), with whose practice it was entirely in consonance (on the severity of such exile, cf Sir W. M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, ch viii). The testimony is of high importance in its bearing on the disputed question of John's residence in Asia, a point now to be discussed.

II. Alleged Early Martyrdom of John: Criticism of Evidence.—The consentient testimony of the church of the 2d cent. is that the later years of St. John were spent at Ephesus, where he wrote his Gospel, and gathered round him many disciples (see the evidence drawn out in detail in Godet, Comm. on Gospel of St. John, 43 ff; cf also Lightfoot, "The School of Ephesus," in Essays on the Work Entitled "Supernatural Religion"). Before, however, we can use the traditions connected with this residence at Ephesus, it is needful to inquire into the statement alleged to be made by Papias that John, the son of Zebedee, was killed by the Jews at an early date. It is plain, that, if this statement is correct, the apostle could not be the author of the Johannine writings in the NT, universally dated near the end of the 1st cent.

The evidence for the statement that St. John was early killed by the Jews is thus summed up by Dr. Moffatt: "The evidence for the early martyrdom of John the son of Zebedee is, in fact, threefold: (a) a prophecy of Jesus preserved in Mk 10 39=Mt 20 23, (b) the witness of Papias, and (c) the calendars of the church" (Intro to Lit. of NT, 602). Our lim-

2. Grounds its do not admit of an exhaustive of Denial examination of this so-called evidence, but, happily, an exhaustive examination is not needed.

(a) The first head proceeds on an assumption which is not warranted, viz. that a prophecy of Jesus would not be allowed to stand, if it were not evidently fulfilled. In the present instance, a literal fulfilment of the prophecy ("The cup that I drink ye shall drink," etc) is out of the question, for there is no hint that either James or John was crucified. We must therefore fall back on the primary meaning of martyrdom, and recognize a fulfilment of the prophecy in the sufferings John endured and the testimony he bore for the Master's sake (thus Origen, etc.).

(b) Dr. Moffatt lays great stress on what he calls the testimony of Papias. But the alleged testimony of Papias is not found in any early authority, and then occurs in writers not of any great value from the point of view of critical investigation. It is found in a passage of Georgius Hamartolus (9th cent.), and is held to be corroborated by a fragment of an epitome (7th or 8th cent.) of the Chronicle of Philip Sidetes (5th cent.), a thoroughly untrustworthy writer. The passage from Georgius may be seen in convenient form in Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers, 513-19. It tells that John survived to the time of Nerva, quotes a saying of Papias that he was killed by the Jews, states that this was in fulfilment of the prophecy of Jesus above referred to, and goes on to say: "So the learned Origen affirms in his interpretation of St. Matthew's Gospel, that John was martyred, declaring that he had learnt the last from the successors of the apostles" (Lightfoot, op. cit., 531). Fortunately, the statement of Origen can be tested, and it by no means, as Moffatt admits (op. cit., 604), bears out the meaning attached to it. Origen is of opinion that the prophecy of Jesus was sufficiently fulfilled by the fact of John's banishment to Patmos and his sufferings there. This, according to him, is what tradition taught and what the prophecy meant. From the whole statement of Georgius, which expressly declares that John survived till the time of Nerva, nothing can be inferred in support of the so-called quotation from Papias. It is to be remembered that the writings of Papias were known to Irenaeus and to Eusebius, and it is inconceivable that, if such a statement was to be found in these, they would have ignored it, and have given currency to a statement contradictory to it. No stress, therefore, can be laid on the alleged quotation. We do not know its context, nor is there anything in the lit. of the first 3 centuries confirmatory of it. In the citation in the epitome of Philip, Papias is made to speak of "John the divine" (ho theolōgos). This title is not applied to John till the close of the 4th cent.

(c) As regards the 3d line of evidence instanced by Dr. Moffatt—church calendars, in which James and John are commemorated together as martyrs—it is even more worthless than the other two. On the nature and origin of these martyrologies, Dr. J. Drummond may be quoted: "They were constructed in process of time out of local calendars. At some period in the 2d half of the 5th cent., a martyrology was formed by welding together a number of provincial calendars, Rom, Italian, Spanish, and Gallic, into what was in effect a general martyrology of Western Europe. At Nicomedia, about the year 360, a similar eastern martyrology was formed out of the local calendars, and this was tr'd with curtailments into Syr at Edessa about the year 400. It is a copy of this, made in 411, which is now in the British Museum" (Inquiry into Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 232). If this is a true account of the rise and origin of martyrologies we need not be surprised that Sir W. M. Ramsay speaks as follows: "That James and John, who were not slain at the same time, should be commemorated together, is the flimsiest conceivable evidence that John was killed early in Jerus. The bracketing together of the memory of apostles who had some historical connection in life, but none in death, must be regarded as the worst side, historically speaking, of the martyrologies" (The First Christian Century, 49, note).

III. The Ephesian Traditions.—Thus the early traditions of the churches are available for the life of John the son of Zebedee. But there still remain many blank spaces in that life. After the reference to the pillar apostles in Gal, silence falls on the life of John, and we know nothing of his life and activity until we read of his banishment to Patmos, and meet with those references to the old man at Ephesus, which occur in the Christian lit. of the 2d cent. One point of interest relates to the (genuine) quotation from Papias, preserved by Eus. (H.E., III, 39), regarding a "Presbyter John," a disciple of the Lord, who was one of his living authorities. Were there two Johns at Ephesus? Or was there only one?

Or, if there was only one, was he John the Evangelist, or only John the Presbyter? Here there is every possible variety of opinion. Many hold that there were two, and many that there was only one. Many who hold that there was only one, hold that the one was John the son of Zebedee; others hold, with equal assurance, that he was a distinct person. Obviously, it is impossible to discuss the question adequately here. After due consideration, we lean to the conclusion that there was only one John at Ephesus, and he the son of Zebedee. For the proof of this, impossible within our limits, we refer to the learned argument of John Chapman, O.S.B., in his work John the Presbyter and the Fourth Gospel (1911).

Into the traditions which cluster round John in Ephesus it is not necessary to enter in detail (cf Godet, op. cit., 57 ff.). According to the tradition uni-

2. Characteristic Traditions—versally accepted in the church, John survived till the time of Trajan (98 AD). Striking and characteristic things are told of him in harmony with the touches we find in the Synoptic Gospels. The story of his rushing forth from the bath when Cerinthus, the heretic, entered it (Iren., Adv. Haer., III, 3, 4) recalls the characteristics of him whom Jesus called "son of thunder." The same tone of exclusiveness, modified by larger experience, is found in the 1st Ep., which so frequently and so decisively discriminates between those who believe in Jesus and those who do not.

IV. The Character of St. John.—The general character of this great apostle is already sufficiently apparent. While we recall the illustrative facts found in the Synoptics, that James and John were the two who wished to call down fire from heaven on the inhospitable village, that John was one of those who desired one of the chief places in the kingdom, that he it was who forbade the man to cast out demons in the name of Jesus because he followed not with them, we do not forget that on each of these occasions he was corrected and rebuked by the Master, and he was not the kind of man who could not profit by the rebuke of Jesus. So that vehemence of disposition was held in check, and, while still in existence, was under control, and allowed to have vent only on occasions when it was permissible, and even necessary. So in his writings, and in the reflections in the Gospel, we note the vehemence displayed, but now directed only against those who refused to believe in, and to acknowledge, Jesus.

"A quiet and thoughtful temperament is by no means inconsistent with a certain vehemence, when, on occasions, the pent-up fire flashes forth; indeed, the very violence of feeling may help to foster an habitual quietude, lest word or deed should betray too deep an emotion. Then it is not without significance that, in the three narratives which are cited from the Gospels to prove the overbearing temper of John, we are expressly told that Jesus corrected him. Are we to suppose that these rebukes made no impression? Is it not more likely that they sank deep into his heart, and that the agony of beholding his Master's crucifixion made them ineffaceable? Then, if not before, began that long development which changed the youthful son of thunder into the aged apostle of love" (Drummond, op. cit., 410, 411).

But love itself has its side of vehemence, and the intensity of love toward a person or a cause may be measured by the intensity of aversion and of hatred toward their contradictories. There are many reflections in the Gospel and in the Epp. which display this energy of hatred toward the work of the devil, and toward those dispositions which are under the influence of the father of lies. We simply notice these, for they prove that the fervent youth who was devoted to his Master carried with him to the end the same disposition which was characteristic of him from the beginning.

I. Sources.—The sources of first-hand information concerning the life and work of John the Baptist are limited to the NT and Jos. Lk and Mt give the fuller notices, and these are in substantial agreement. The Fourth Gospel deals chiefly with the witness after the baptism. In his single notice (Ant, XVIII, v, 2), Jos makes an interesting reference to the cause of John's imprisonment. See VI, 2, below.

II. Parentage.—John was of priestly descent. His mother, Elisabeth, was of the daughters of Aaron, while his father, Zacharias, was a priest of the course of Abija, and did service in the temple at Jerus. It is said of them that "they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless" (Lk 1 6). This priestly ancestry is in interesting contrast with his prophetic mission.

III. Early Life.—We infer from Luke's account that John was born about six months before the birth of Jesus. Of the place we know only that it was a city of the hill country of Judah. Our definite information concerning his youth is summed up in the angelic prophecy, "Many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and he shall drink no wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb" (Lk 1 14-16), and in Luke's brief statement, "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (1 80). The character and spiritual insight of the parents shown in the incidents recorded are ample evidence that his training was a fitting preparation for his great mission.

IV. Ministry.—The scene of the Baptist's ministry was partly in the wilderness of Southern Judaea and partly in the Jordan valley. Two

1. The locations are mentioned, Bethany or Scene Bethabara (Jn 1 28), and Aenon near Salim (Jn 3 23). Neither of these places can be positively identified. We may infer from Jn 3 2 that he also spent some time in Peraea beyond the Jordan.

The unusual array of dates with which Luke marks the beginning of John's ministry (Lk 3 1.2) reveals his sense of the importance of the event

2. His First Appearance as at once the beginning of his prophetic work and of the new dispensation. His first public appearance is assigned to the 15th year of Tiberius, probably 26 or 27 AD, for the first Passover attended by Jesus can hardly have been later than 27 AD (Jn 2 20).

John's dress and habits were strikingly suggestive of Elijah, the old prophet of national judgment.

His desert habits have led some to connect him with that strange community of Jews known as the Essenes.

There is, however, little foundation for such a connection other than his ascetic habits and the fact that the chief settlement of this sect was near the home of his youth. It was natural that he should continue the manner of his youthful life in the desert, and it is not improbable that he intentionally copied his great prophetic model. It was fitting that the one who called men to repentance and the beginning of a self-denying life should show renunciation and self-denial in his own life. But there is no evidence in his teaching that he required such asceticism of those who accepted his baptism.

The fundamental note in the message of John was the announcement of the near approach of the

4. His Message Messianic age. But while he announced himself as the herald voice preparing the way of the Lord, and because of this the expectant multitudes crowded to hear his word, his view of the nature of the kingdom was probably quite at variance with that of his hearers. Instead of the expected day of deliverance from the foreign oppressor, it was to be a day of judgment for Israel. It meant good for the penitent, but destruction for the ungodly. "He will gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff he will burn up with . . . fire" (Mt 3 12). "The axe also lieth at the root of the trees: every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire" (Lk 3 9). Yet this idea was perhaps not entirely unfamiliar. That the delay in the Messiah's coming was due to the sinfulness of the people and their lack of repentance, was a commonplace in the message of their teachers (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, I, 169).

The call to repentance was then a natural message of preparation for such a time of judgment. But to John repentance was a very real and radical thing. It meant a complete change of heart and life. "Bring forth . . . fruits worthy of repentance" (Lk 3 8). What these fruits were he made clear in his answers to the inquiring multitudes and the publicans and soldiers (3 10-14). It is noticeable that there is no reference to the usual ceremonies of the law or to a change of occupation. Do good; be honest; refrain from extortion; be content with wages.

John used such violence in addressing the Pharisees and Sadducees doubtless to startle them from their self-complacency. How hope-

5. His Severity lessly they were blinded by their sense of security as the children of Abraham, and by their confidence in the merits of the law, is attested by the fact that these parties resisted the teachings of both John and Jesus to the very end.

With what vigor and fearlessness the Baptist pressed his demand for righteousness is shown by his stern reproof of the sin of Herod and Herodias, which led to his imprisonment and finally to his death.

V. Baptism.—The symbolic rite of baptism was such an essential part of the work of John that it

1. Significance not only gave him his distinctive title of "the Baptist" (ὁ βαπτιστής, ho baptistēs), but also caused his message to be styled "preaching the baptism of repentance." That a special virtue was ascribed to this rite, and that it was regarded as a necessary part of the preparation for the coming of the Messiah, are shown by its important place in John's preaching, and by the eagerness with which it was sought by the multitudes. Its significance may best be understood by giving attention to its historical antecedents, for while John gave the rite new significance, it certainly appealed to ideas already familiar to the Jews.

(1) Lustrations required by the Levitical law.—The divers washings required by the law (Lev 11-15) have, without doubt, a religious import. This is shown by the requirement of sacrifices in connection with the cleansing, esp. the sin offering (Lev 14 8.9.19.20; cf Mk 1 44; Lk 2 22). The designation of John's baptism by the word βαπτίζειν, baptizein, which by NT times was used of ceremonial purification, also indicates some historical connection (cf Sir 34 25).

(2) Anticipation of Messianic lustrations foretold by prophets.—John understood that his baptism was a preparation for the Messianic baptism anticipated by the prophets, who saw that for a true cleansing the nation must wait until God should open in Israel a fountain for cleansing (Zec 13 1), and should sprinkle His people with clean water and give them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezk 36 25.26; Jer 33 8). His baptism was at once a preparation and a promise of the spiritual cleansing which the Messiah would bestow. "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me . . . shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (Mt 3 11 m).

(3) Proselyte baptism.—According to the teaching of later Judaism, a stranger who desired to be adopted into the family of Israel was required, along with circumcision, to receive the rite of baptism as a means of cleansing from the ceremonial uncleanness attributed to him as a Gentile. While it is not possible to prove the priority of this practice of proselyte baptism to the baptism of John, there can be no doubt of the fact, for it is inconceivable, in view of Jewish prejudice, that it would be borrowed from John or after this time.

While it seems clear that in the use of the rite of baptism John was influenced by the Jewish customs of ceremonial washings and proselyte baptism, his baptism differed very essentially from these. The Levitical washings restored an unclean person to his former condition, but baptism was a preparation for a new condition. On the other hand, proselyte baptism was administered only to Gentiles, while John required baptism of all Jews. At the same time his baptism was very different from Christian baptism, as he himself declared (Lk 3 16). His was a baptism of water only; a preparation for the baptism "in the Spirit" which was to follow. It is also to be observed that it was a rite complete in itself, and that it was offered to the nation as a preparation for a specific event, the advent of the Messiah.

We may say, then, that as a "baptism of repentance" it meant a renunciation of the past life; as a cleansing it symbolized the forgiveness of sins (Mk 1 4), and as preparation it implied a promise of loyalty to the kingdom of the Messiah. We have no reason to believe that Jesus experienced any sense of sin or felt any need of repentance or forgiveness; but as a Divinely appointed preparation for the Messianic kingdom His submission to it was appropriate.

While the multitudes flocked to the Jordan, Jesus came also to be baptized with the rest. "John

2. Baptism of Jesus would have hindered him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? But Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it now:

for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness" (Mt 3 13-15). Wherein was this act a fulfilment of righteousness? We cannot believe that Jesus felt any need of repentance or change of life. May we not regard it rather as an identification of Himself with His people in the formal consecration of His life to the work of the kingdom?

VI. Imprisonment and Death.—Neither the exact time of John's imprisonment nor the period of time between his imprisonment and his

1. The Time death can be determined. On the occasion of the unnamed feast of Jn 5 1, Jesus refers to John's witness as already past. At least, then, his arrest, if not his death, must have taken place prior to that incident, i.e. before the second 'Passover of Jesus' ministry.

According to the Gospel accounts, John was imprisoned because of his reproof of Herod's marriage

2. The Philip with Herodias, the wife of his brother (Lk 3 19.20; cf Mt 14 3.4; Mk 6 17.18). Jos says (Ant, XVIII, Occasion v, 2) that Herod was influenced to put John to death by the "fear lest his great influence over the people might put it in his power or inclination to raise a rebellion. Accordingly, he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Machaerus, and was there put to death." This account of Jos does not necessarily conflict with the tragic story of the Gospels. If Herod desired to punish or destroy him for the reasons assigned by the evangelists, he would doubtless wish to offer as the public reason some political charge, and the one named by Jos would be near at hand.

VII. John and His Disciples.—Frequent reference is made in the Gospel narrative to the disciples of John. As the multitudes crowded to his baptism, it was natural that he and should aid him in the work of baptism, which must have soon increased beyond his power to perform alone. It was in the formation of this inner circle of immediate followers that he prepared a sure foundation for the work of the Messiah; for it was from this inner group that the disciples of Jesus were mainly drawn, and that with his consent and through his witness to the superior worth of the latter, and the temporary character of his own mission (Jn 1 29-44).

Concerning the substance of their training, we know from the disciples of Jesus (Lk 11 1) that it included forms of prayer, and from his own disciples (Mt 9 14) we learn that frequent fastings were observed. We may be sure also that he taught them much concerning the Messiah and His work.

There is abundant evidence of the great fidelity of these disciples to their master. This may be observed in their concern at the overshadowing popularity of Jesus (Jn 3 26); in their loyalty to him in his imprisonment and in their reverent treatment of his body after his death (Mk 6 29). That John's work was extensive and his influence lasting is shown by the fact that 20 years afterward Paul found in far-off Ephesus certain disciples, including Apollos, the learned Alexandrian Jew, who knew no other baptism than that of John (Acts 19 1-7).

VIII. John and Jesus.—John assumed from the first the rôle of a herald preparing the way for the approaching Messianic age. He clearly

1. John's Relation to Jesus regarded his work as Divinely appointed (Jn 1 33), but was well aware of his subordinate relation to the Messiah (Mk 1 7) and of the temporary character of his mission (Jn 3 30). The Baptist's work was twofold. In his preaching he warned the nation of the true character of the new kingdom as a reign of righteousness, and by his call to repentance and baptism he prepared at least a few hearts for a sympathetic response to the call and teaching of Jesus. He also formally announced and bore frequent personal testimony to Jesus as the Messiah.

There is no necessary discrepancy between the synoptic account and that of the Fourth Gospel in reference to the progress of John's knowledge of the Messianic character of Jesus. According to Mt 3 14, John is represented as declining at first to baptize Jesus because he was conscious of His superiority, while in Jn 1 29-34 he is represented as claiming not to have known Jesus until He was manifested by the heavenly sign. The latter may mean only that He was not known to him definitely as the Messiah until the promised sign was given.

The message which John sent to Jesus from prison seems strange to some in view of the signal testimonies which he had previously borne to His character. This need not indicate that he had lost faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, but rather a perplexity at the course of events. The inquiry may have been in the interest of the faith of his disciples or his own relief from misgivings due to Jesus' delay in assuming the expected Messianic authority. John evidently held the prophetic view of a temporal Messianic kingdom, and some readjustment of view was necessary.

Jesus was no less frank in His appreciation of John. If praise may be measured by the worth of the one by whose lips it is spoken, 2. Jesus' Estimate of John then no man ever received such praise as he who was called by Jesus a shining light (Jn 5 35), more than a prophet (Mt 11 9), and of whom He said,

"Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist" (Mt 11 11). If, on the other hand, He rated him as less than the least in the kingdom of heaven, this was a limitation of circumstances, not of worth.

Jesus paid high tribute to the Divine character and worth of John's baptism; first, by submitting to it Himself as a step in the fulfilment of all righteousness; later, by repeated utterance, esp. in associating it with the birth of the Spirit as a necessary condition of inheriting eternal life (Jn 3 5); and, finally, in adopting baptism as a symbol of Christian discipleship.

LITERATURE

Among the 7 NT epp. which from ancient times have been called "catholic," there is a smaller group of three in which the style alike of thought and language points to a common authorship, and which are traditionally associated with the name of the apostle John. Of these, again, the first differs widely from the other two in respect not only of intrinsic importance, but of its early reception in the church and unquestioned canonicity.

THE FIRST EPISTLE

1. General Character.—Not only is the Ep. an anonymous writing; one of its unique features among the books of the NT is that it

1. A True Letter does not contain a single proper name (except Our Lord's), or a single definite allusion, personal, historical, or geographical. It is a composition, however, which a person calling himself "I" sends to certain other persons whom he calls "you," and is, in form at least, a letter. The criticism which has denied that it is more than formally so is unwarranted. It does not fall under either of Deissmann's categories—the true letter, intended only for the perusal of the person or persons to whom it is addressed, and the ep., written with literary art and with an eye to the public. But it does possess that character of the NT epp. in general which is well described by Sir William Ramsay (Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 24): "They spring from the heart of the writer and speak direct to the heart of the readers. They were often called forth by some special crisis in the history of the persons addressed, so that they rise out of the actual situation in which the writer conceives the readers to be placed; they express the writer's keen and living sympathy with and participation in the fortunes of the whole class addressed, and are not affected by any thought of a wider public. . . . On the other hand, the letters of this class express general principles of life and conduct, religion and ethics, applicable to a wider range of circumstances than those which called them forth; and they appeal as emphatically and intimately to all Christians in all time as they did to those addressed in the first instance." The 1st Ep. of St. John could not be more exactly characterized than by these words. Though its main features are didactic and controversial, the personal note is frequently struck, and with much tenderness and depth of feeling. Under special stress of emotion, the writer's paternal love, sympathy and solicitude break out in the affectionate appellation, "little children," or, yet more endearingly, "my little children." Elsewhere the prefatory "beloved" shows how deeply he is stirred by the sublimity of his theme and the sense of its supreme importance to his readers. He shows himself intimately acquainted with their religious environment (2 19; 4 1), dangers (2 26; 3 7; 5 21), attainments (2 12-14, 21), achievements (4 4) and needs (3 19; 5 13). Further, the Ep. is addressed primarily to the circle of those among whom the author has habitually exercised his ministry as evangelist and teacher. He has been wont to announce to them the things concerning the Word of Life (1 1, 2), that they might have fellowship with him (1 3), and now, that his (or their) joy may be full, he writes these things unto them (1 4). He writes as light shines. Love makes the task a necessity, but also a delight.

There is no NT writing which is throughout more vigorously controversial: for the satisfactory interpretation of the Ep. as a whole, 2. Subject-Matter recognition of the polemical aim that pervades it is indispensable. But it is true also that there is no such writing in which the presentation of the truth more widely overflows the limits of the immediate occasion. The writer so constantly lifts up against the error he combats, the simple, sublime and satisfying facts and principles of the Christian revelation, so lifts up every question at issue into the light of eternal truth, that the Ep. pursues its course through the ages, bringing to the church of God the vision and the inspiration of the Divine. The influence of the immediate polemical purpose, however, is manifest, not only in the contents of the Ep., but in its limitations as well. In a sense it may be said that the field of thought is a narrow one. God is seen exclusively as the Father of Spirits, the Light and Life of the universe of souls. His creatorship and government of the world, the providential aspects and agencies of salvation, the joys and sorrows, hopes and fears that spring from the terrestrial conditions and changes of human life, their disciplinary purpose and effect—to all this the Ep. contains no reference. The themes are exclusively theological and ethical. The writer's immediate interest is confined to that region in which the Divine and human vitally and directly meet—to that in God which is communicable to man, to that in man by which he is capax Dei. The Divine nature as life and light, and love and righteousness; the Incarnation of this Divine nature in Jesus, with its presuppositions and consequences, metaphysical and ethical; the imparting of this Divine nature to men by regeneration; the antithesis to it—sin—and its removal by propitiation; the work of the Holy Spirit; the Christian life, the mutual indwelling of God and man, as tested by its beliefs, its antagonism to sin, its inevitable debt of love—such are the fundamental themes to which every idea in the Ep. is directly related. The topics, if few, are supremely great; and the limitations of the field of vision are more than compensated by the profundity and intensity of spiritual perception.

The Ep. is in a sense impersonal to the last degree, offering a strange contrast to that frankness of self-revelation which gives such charm to St. Paul's letters; yet few writings so clearly reveal the deepest characteristics of the writer. We feel in it the high serenity of a mind that lives in constant fellowship with the greatest thoughts and is nourished at the eternal fountain-head; but also the fervent indignation and vehement recoil of such a mind in contact with what is false and evil. It has been truly called "the most passionate" book in the NT. Popular instinct has not erred in giving to its author the title, "Apostle of Love." Of the various themes which are so wonderfully intertwined in it, that to which it most of all owes its unfading charm and imperishable value is love. It rises to its sublimest height, to the apex of all revelation, in those passages in which its author is so divinely inspired to write of the eternal life, in God and man, as love.

But it is an inveterate misconception which regards him solely as the exponent of love. Equally he reveals himself as one whose mind is dominated by the sense of truth. There are no words more characteristic of him than "true" (alēthinós, denoting that which both ideally and really corresponds to the name it bears) and "the truth"

(alētheia, the reality of things sub specie aeternitatis). To him Christianity is not only a principle of ethics, or even a way of salvation; it is both of them, because it is primarily the truth, the one true disclosure of the realities of the spiritual and eternal world. Thus it is that his thought so constantly develops itself by antithesis. Each conception has its fundamental opposite: light, darkness; life, death; love, hate; truth, falsehood; the Father, the world; God, the devil. There is no shading, no gradation in the picture. No sentence is more characteristic of the writer than this: "Ye know that no lie is of the truth" (2 21 m). But again, his sense of these radical antagonisms is essentially moral, rather than intellectual. It seems impossible that any writing could display a more impassioned sense, than this Ep. does, of the tremendous imperative of righteousness, a more rigorous intolerance of all sin (2 4; 3 4 8.9.10). The absolute antagonism and incompatibility between the Christian life and sin of whatsoever kind or degree is maintained with a vehemence of utterance that verges at times upon the paradoxical (3 9; 5 18). So long as the church lays up this Ep. in its heart, it can never lack a moral tonic of wholesome severity.

The style is closely, though perhaps unconsciously, molded upon the Heb model, and esp. upon the parallelistic forms of the Wisdom lit.

4. Style and Diction One has only to read the Ep. with an attentive ear to perceive that, though using another language, the writer had in his own ear, all the time, the swing and cadences of Heb verse. The diction is inartificial and unadorned. Not a simile, not a metaphor (except the most fundamental, like "walking in the light") occurs. The limitations in the range of ideas are matched by those of vocabulary and by the unvarying simplicity of syntactical form. Yet limited and austere as the literary medium is, the writer handles its resources often with consummate skill. The crystalline simplicity of the style perfectly expresses the simple profundity of the thought. Great spiritual intuitions shine like stars in sentences of clear-cut gnomic terseness. Historical (1 1) and theological (1 2; 4 2) statements are made with exquisite precision. The frequent reiteration of nearly the same thoughts in nearly the same language, though always with variation and enrichment, gives a cumulative effect which is singularly impressive. Such passages as 2 14-17, with its calm challenge to the arrogant materialism of the world—"And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever"—or the closing vs of the Ep., with their thrice-repeated triumphant "we know" and their last word of tender, urgent admonition, have a solemn magnificence of effect which nothing but such simplicity of language, carrying such weight of thought, could produce. If it has been true of any writer that "le style est l'homme," it is true of the author of this Ep.

II. Polemical Aim.—The polemical intention of the Ep. has been universally recognized; but there has been diversity of opinion as to its actual object. By the older commentators, generally, this was found in the perilous state of the church or churches addressed, which had left their first love and lapsed into Laodicean lukewarmness. But the Ep. gives no sign of this, and it contains many passages that are inconsistent with it (2 13.14.20.21.27; 4 4; 5 18-20). The danger which immediately threatens the church is from without, not from within. There is a "spirit of error" (4 6) abroad in the world. From the church itself (2 18), many "false prophets" have gone forth (4 1), corruptors of the gospel, veritable antichrists (2 18). And it may be asserted as beyond question that the peril against which the Ep. was intended to arm the church was the spreading influence of some form of Gnosticism.

The pretensions of Gnosticism to a higher esoteric knowledge of Divine things seems to be clearly referred to in several passages. In

1. Gnosticism 2 4.6.9, e.g. one might suppose that they are almost verbally quoted ("He that saith"; "I know Him"; "I abide in Him"; "I am in the light"). When we observe, moreover, the prominence given throughout to the idea of knowledge and the special significance of some of these passages, the conviction grows that the writer's purpose is not only to refute the false, but to exhibit apostolic Christianity, believed and lived, as the true Gnosis—the Divine reality of which Gnosticism was but a fantastic caricature. The confidence he has concerning his readers is that they "know him who is from the beginning," that they "know the Father" (2 13). "Every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God" (4 7); and the final note upon which the Ep. closes is: "We know him that is true, and we are in him that is true" (5 20). The knowledge of the ultimate Reality, the Being who is the eternal life, is for Christian and Gnostic alike the goal of aspiration.

But it is against two closely related developments of gnostic tendency, a docetic view of the incarnation, and an antinomian view of morals, that the Ep. is specifically directed. Both of these sprang naturally from the dualism which was the fundamental and formative principle of Gnosticism in all its many forms. According to the dualistic conception of existence, the moral schism of which we are conscious in experience is original, eternal, inherent in the nature of beings. There are two independent and antagonistic principles of being from which severally come all the good and all the evil that exist. The source and the seat of evil were found in the material element, in the body with its senses and appetites, and in its sensuous earthly environment; and it was held inconceivable that the Divine nature should have immediate contact with the material side of existence, or influence upon it.

To such a view of the universe Christianity could be adjusted only by a docetic interpretation of the Person of Christ. A real incarnation

2. Docetism was unthinkable. The Divine could enter into no actual union with a corporeal organism. The human nature of Christ and the incidents of His earthly career were more or less an illusion. And it is with this docetic subversion of the truth of the incarnation that the "antichrists" are specially identified (2 22.23; 4 2.3), and against it that St. John directs with whole-hearted fervor his central thesis—the complete, permanent, personal identification of the historical Jesus with the Divine Being who is the Word of Life (1 1), the Christ (4 2) and the Son of God (5 5): "Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh." In Jn 5 6 there is a still more definite reference to the special form which gnostic Christology assumed in the teaching of Cerinthus and his school. According to Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., i.26, 1) this Cerinthus, who was St. John's prime antagonist in Ephesus, taught that Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary, and was distinguished from other men only by superiority in justice, prudence and wisdom; that at His baptism the heavenly Christ descended upon Him in the form of a dove; that on the eve of His Passion, the Christ again left Jesus, so that Jesus died and rose again, but the Christ, being spiritual, did not suffer. That is to say, that, in the language of the Ep., the Christ "came by water," but not, as St. John strenuously affirms, "by water and blood . . . not with the water only, but with the water and with the blood" (5 6). He who was baptized of John in Jordan, and He whose life-blood was shed on Calvary, is the same Jesus and the same Christ, the same Son of God eternally.

A further consequence of the dualistic interpretation of existence is that sin, in the Christian meaning of sin, disappears. It is no longer

3. Antinomianism a moral opposition (anomia), in the human personality, to good; it is a physical principle inherent in all non-spiritual being. Not the soul, but the flesh is its organ; and redemption consists, not in the renewal of the moral nature, but in its emancipation from the flesh. Thus it is no mere general contingency, but a definite tendency that is contemplated in the repeated warning: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. . . . If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us" (1 8.10).

With the nobler and more earnest spirits the practical corollary of this irreconcilable dualism in human nature was the ascetic life; but to others the same principle readily suggested an opposite method of achieving the soul's deliverance from the yoke of the material—an attitude of moral indifference toward the deeds of the body. Let the duality of nature be boldly reduced to practice. Let body and spirit be regarded as separate entities, each obeying its own laws and acting according to its own nature, without mutual interference; the spiritual nature could not be involved in, nor affected by, the deeds of the flesh. Vehement opposition to this deadly doctrine is prominent in the Ep.—in such utterances as "Sin is lawlessness" (3 4) and its converse "All unrighteousness is sin" (5 17), but esp. in the stringent emphasis laid upon actual conduct, "doing" righteousness or "doing" sin. The false spiritualism which regards the contemplation of heavenly things as of far superior importance to the requirements of commonplace morality is sternly reprobated: "Little children, let no man lead you astray: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous" (3 7); and the converse application of the same doctrine, that the mere "doing" of sin is of little or no moment to the "spiritual" man, is met with the trenchant declaration, "He that doeth sin is of the devil" (3 8). The whole passage (2 29—3 10) presupposes, as familiar to its readers, a doctrine of moral indifferentism according to which the status of the spiritual man is not to be tested by the commonplace facts of moral conduct. It is only as a passionate contradiction of this hateful tenet that the paradoxical language of 3 6.9 and 5 18 can be understood.

To the same polemical necessity is due the uniquely reiterated emphasis which the Ep. lays upon brotherly love, and the almost fierce tone in which the new commandment is promulgated. To the Gnostic, knowledge was the sum of attainment. "They give no heed to love," says Ignatius, "caring not for the widow, the orphan or the afflicted, neither for those who are in bonds nor for those who are released from bonds, neither for the hungry nor the thirsty." That a religion which banished or neglected love should call itself Christian or claim affinity with Christianity excites St. John's hottest indignation; against it he lifts up his supreme truth, God is love, with its immediate consequence that to be without love is to be without capacity for knowing God (4 7.8). The assumption of a lofty mystical piety apart from dutiful conduct in the ordinary relations of life is ruthlessly underlined as the vaunt of a self-deceiver (4 20); and the crucial test by which we may assure our self-accusing hearts that we are "of the truth" is love "not in word, neither with the tongue; but in deed and truth" (3 18).

The question is raised whether the polemic of the Ep. is directed against the same persons throughout or whether in its two branches, the Christological and the ethical, it has different objects of attack. The latter view is maintained on the ground that no charge of libertine teaching or conduct is brought against the "antichrists," and there is no proof that docetism in Asia Minor lay open to such a charge. But the other view has greater probability. The Ep. suggests nothing else than that the same spirit of error which is assailing the faith of the church (4 6) is also a peril to the moral integrity of its life (3 7). And if there is no proof that docetism in Asia Minor was also antinomian, there is no proof that it was not. The probability is that it was. Docetism and the emancipation of the flesh were both natural fruits of the dualistic theory of life.

The name which unvarying tradition associates with the Ep., as St. John's chief antagonist in Ephesus, is that of Cerinthus. Un-

4. Cerinthus fortunately the accounts which have come down to us of Cerinthus and his teaching are fragmentary and confused, and those of his character, though unambiguous, come only from his opponents. But it is certain that he held a docetic view of the incarnation, and, according to the only accounts we possess, his character was that of a voluptuary. So far as they go, the historical data harmonize with the internal evidence of the Ep. itself in giving the impression that the different tendencies it combats are such as would be naturally evolved in the thought and practice of those who held, as Cerinthus did, that the material creation, and even the moral law, had its origin, not in the Supreme God, but in an inferior power.

III. Structure and Summary.—In the judgment of many critics, the Ep. possesses nothing that can be called an articulate structure of thought, its aphoristic method admitting of no logical development; and this estimate has a large measure of support in the fact that there is no NT writing regarding the plan of which there has been greater variety of opinion. The present writer believes, nevertheless, that it is erroneous, and that, in its own unique way, the Ep. is a finely articulated composition. The word that best describes the author's mode of thinking is "spiral." The course of thought does not move from point to point in a straight line. It is like a winding staircase—always revolving around the same center, always recurring to the same topics, but at a higher level.

Carefully following the topical order, one finds, e.g., a paragraph (2 3-6) insisting upon practical righteousness as a guaranty of the Christian life; then one finds this treated a second time in 2 29-3 10a; and yet again in 5 3 and 5 18. Similarly, we find a paragraph on the necessity of love in 2 7-11, and again in 3 10b-20, and yet again in 4 7-13, and also in 4 17-5 2. So also, a paragraph concerning the necessity of holding the true belief in the incarnate Son of God in 2 18-28, in 4 1-6, and the same subject recurring in 4 13-16 and 5 4-12. And we shall observe that everywhere these indispensable characteristics of the Christian life are applied as tests; that in effect the Ep. is an apparatus of tests, its definite object being to furnish its readers with the necessary criteria by which they may sift the false from the true, and satisfy themselves of their being "begotten of God." "These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life" (5 13). These fundamental tests of the Christian life—doing righteousness, loving one another, believing that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh—are the connecting themes that bind together the whole structure of the Ep. Thus if we divide the Ep. into 3 main sections, the first ending at 2 28, the second at 4 6, the result is that in the first and second of these sections we find precisely the same topics coming in precisely the same order; while in the third section (4 7-5 21), though the sequence is somewhat different, the thought-material is exactly the same. The leading themes, the tests of righteousness, love, and belief, are all present; and they alone are present. There is, therefore, a natural division of the Ep. into these three main sections, or, as they might be descriptively called, "cycles," in each of which the same fundamental themes appear. On this basis we shall now give a brief analysis of its structure and summary of its contents.

The writer announces the source of the Christian revelation—the historical manifestation of the eternal Divine life in Jesus Christ—and declares himself a personal witness of the facts in which this manifestation has been given. Here, at the outset, he hoists the flag under which he fights. The incarnation is not seeming or temporary, but real. That which was from the beginning—the eternal life, which was with the Father—is identical with "that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled."

1. The Prologue, 1:1-4

The Christian life, as fellowship with God (walking in the Light) tested by righteousness, love and belief.—The basis of the whole section is the announcement:

2. First Cycle,

1:5-2:28 "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (ver 5). What God is at once determines the condition of fellowship with Him; and this, therefore, is set forth: first, negatively (1 6): "if we say that we have fellowship with him and walk in the darkness"; then, positively (1 7): "if we walk in the light, as he is in the light." What, then, is it to walk in the light, and what to walk in darkness? The answer is given in what follows.

(a) Paragraph A, 1 8-2 6 (walking in the Light tested by righteousness): First, in confession of sin (1 8-2 2), then in actual obedience (2 3-6). The first fact upon which the light of God impinges in human life is sin; and the first test of walking in the light is the recognition and confession of this fact. Such confession is the first step into fellowship with God, because it brings us under the cleansing power of the blood of Jesus, His Son (1 7), and makes His intercession available for us (2 1). But the light not only reveals sin; its greater function is to reveal duty; and to walk in the light is to keep God's commandments (2 3). His word (2 5), and to walk even as Christ walked (2 6).

(b) Paragraph B, 2 7-17 (walking in the Light tested by love): (i) Positively: The old-new commandment (2 7-11). Love is the commandment which is "old," because familiar to the readers of the Ep. from their first acquaintance with the rudiments of Christianity (2 7); but also "new," because ever fresh and living to those who have fellowship with Christ in the true light which is now shining for them (2 8). On the contrary, "He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother, is in the darkness" (2 9). The antithesis is then repeated with variation and enrichment of thought (vs 10, 11). (Then follows a parenthetical address to the readers [vs 12-14]. This being treated as a parenthesis, the unity of the paragraph at once becomes apparent.)

(ii) Negatively: If walking in the light has its guaranty in loving one's "brother," it is tested no less by not loving "the world." One cannot at the same time participate in the life of God and in a moral life which is governed by the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the vain-glory of the world.

(c) Paragraph C, 2 18-28 (walking in the Light tested by belief): The light of God not only reveals sin and duty, the children of God (our "brother") and "the world" in their true character; it also reveals Jesus in His true character, as the Christ, the incarnate Son of God. And all that calls itself Christianity is to be tested by its reception or rejection of that truth. In this paragraph light and darkness are not expressly referred to; but the continuity of thought with the preceding paragraphs is unmistakable. Throughout this first division of the Ep. the point of view is that of fellowship with God, through receiving and acting according to the light which His self-revelation sheds upon all things in the spiritual realm. Unreal Christianity in every form is comprehensively a "lie." It may be the antinomian "lie" of him who says he has no sin (1 8) yet is indifferent to keeping God's commandments (2 4), the lie of lovelessness (2 9), or the lie of Antichrist, who, claiming spiritual enlightenment, yet denies that Jesus is the Christ (2 22).

Divine sonship tested by righteousness, love and belief.—The first main division of the Ep. began with the assertion of what God is as self-revealing—light. He becomes to us the light in which we behold our sin, our duty, our brother, the world, Jesus the Christ; and only in acknowledging and loyally acting out the truth thus revealed can we have fellowship with God. This second division, on the other hand, begins with the assertion of what the Divine nature is in itself, and thence deduces the essential characteristics of those who are "begotten of God."

3. Second Cycle, 2:29-4:6

(a) Paragraph A, 2:29-3:10a (Divine sonship tested by righteousness): This test is inevitable. "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (2:29). But this new idea, "begotten of God," arrests for a time its orderly development. The writer is carried away by wonder and thanksgiving at the thought that sinful man should be brought into such a relation as this to God. "Behold what manner of love!" he exclaims. This leads him to contemplate, further, the present concealment of the glory of God's children, and the splendor of its future manifestation (3:1,2). Then the thought that the fulfilment of this hope is necessarily conditioned by present endeavor after moral likeness to Christ (ver 3) leads back to the main theme, that the life of Divine sonship is by necessity of nature one of absolute antagonism to all sin. This necessity is exhibited (1) in the light of the moral authority of God—sin is lawlessness (ver 4); (2) in the light of Christ's character, in which there is no sin, and of the purpose of His mission, which is to take away sin (vs 5-7); (3) in the light of the diabolic origin of sin (ver 8); (4) in the light of the God-begotten quality of the Christian life (ver 9). Finally, in this is declared to be the manifest distinction between the children of God and the children of the devil (ver 10).

(b) Paragraph B, 3:10b-24a (Divine sonship tested by love): This test is inevitable (vs 10b 11). The thought is then developed pictorially instead of dialectically. Cain is the prototype of hate (ver 12). Cain's spirit is reproduced in the world (ver 13). Love is the sign of having passed from death into life (ver 14a); the absence of it, the sign of abiding in death (vs 14b,15). In glorious contrast to the sinister figure of Cain, who sacrifices his brother's life to his morbid self-love, is the figure of Christ, who sacrificed His own life in love to us His brethren (ver 16a); whence the inevitable inference that our life, if one with His, must obey the same law (ver 16b). Genuine love consists not in words, but in deeds (vs 17 18); and from the evidence of such love alone can we rightly possess confidence toward God (vs 19,20) in prayer (ver 22). Then follows recapitulation (vs 23,24b), combining, under the category of "commandment," love and also belief on His Son Jesus Christ. Thus a transition is made to Paragraph C.

(c) Paragraph C, 3:24b-4:6 (Divine sonship tested by belief): This test is inevitable (3:24b). "We know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he gave us"; and the Spirit "which he gave us" is the Spirit that "confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (4:2). On the contrary, the Spirit that confesseth not Jesus is the spirit of Antichrist (ver 3). Then follows a characterization of those who receive the true and of those who receive the false teaching (vs 4-6).

Closer correlation of righteousness, love and belief.—In this closing part, the Ep. rises to its loftiest heights; but the logical analysis of it is more difficult. It may be divided into two main sections dealing respectively with love and belief.

4. Third Cycle, 4:7-5:21

(a) SECTION I, 4:7-5:3a, on love.—(i) Paragraph A, 4:7-12: This paragraph grounds more deeply than before the test of love. Love is indispensable, because God is love (vs 7,8). The proof that God is love is the mission of Christ (ver 9); which is also the absolute revelation of what love, truly so called, is (ver 10). But this love of God imposes upon us an unescapable obligation to love one another (ver 11); and only from the fulfilment of this can we obtain the assurance that "God abideth in us" (ver 12).

(ii) Paragraph B, 4:13-16: This paragraph strives to show the inner relation between Christian belief and Christian love. The true belief is indispensable as a guaranty of Christian life, because the Spirit of God is its author (ver 13). The true belief is that "Jesus is the Son of God" (vs 14,15). In this is found the vital ground of Christian love (ver 16).

(iii) Paragraph C, 4:17-5:3a: Here the subject is the effect, motives and manifestations of brotherly love. The effect is confidence toward God (vs 17,18); the motives: (1) God's love to us (ver 19); (2) that the only possible response to this is to love our brother (ver 20); (3) that this is Christ's commandment (ver 21); (4) that it is the natural instinct of spiritual kinship (5:1). But true love is inseparable from righteousness. We truly love the children of God only when we love God, and we love God only when we keep His commandments (vs 2,3a).

(b) SECTION II, 5:3b-21, on belief.—(i) Paragraph A, 5:3b-12: Righteousness is possible only through belief. It is our faith that makes the commandments "not grievous" because it overcomes the world (vs 3b,4). Then follows a restatement of the contents of the true belief, specially directed against the Cerinthian heresy (vs 5,6); then an exposition of the "witness" upon which this belief rests (vs 7-10); then a reiterated declaration of its being the test and guaranty of possessing eternal life (vs 11,12).

(ii) Paragraph B, 5:13-21: This closing paragraph sets forth the great triumphant certainties of Christian belief: its certainty of eternal life (ver 13), and of prevailing in prayer (vs 14,15). Then the writer guards himself by citing an instance in which such certainty is unattainable—prayer for those that sin unto death—and reminds his readers that all unrighteousness, though not sin unto death, is sin (vs 16,17). He then resumes the great certainties of Christian belief: the certainty that the Christian life stands always and everywhere for righteousness, absolute antagonism to all sin (ver 18); the certainty of the moral gulf between it and the life of the world (ver 19); its certainty of itself, of the facts on which it rests, and the supernatural power which has given perception of these facts (ver 20). With an abrupt, affectionate call to those who know the true God to beware of yielding their trust and dependence to "idols," the Ep. ends.

IV. Canonicity and Authorship.—As to the reception of the Ep. in the church, it is needless to cite any later witness than Eusebius (c 325), who classes it among the books (homologoumena) whose canonical rank was undisputed. It is quoted by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria (247-65), by the Muratorian Canon, Cyprian, Origen, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenaeus. Papias (who is described by Irenaeus as a "hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp") is stated by Eusebius to have "used some testimonies from John's former ep."; and Polycarp's Ep. to the Philippians (c 115) contains an almost verbal reproduction of 1 Jn 4:3. Reminiscences of it are traced in Athenagoras (c 180), the Ep. to Diognetus, the Ep. of Barnabas, more distinctly in Justin (Dial. 123) and in the Didache; but it is possible that the earliest of these indicate the currency of Johannine expressions in certain Christian circles rather than acquaintance with the Ep. itself. The evidence, however, is indisputable that this Ep., one of the latest of the NT books, took immediately and permanently an unchallenged position as a writing of inspired authority. It is no material qualification of this statement to add that, in common with the other Johannine writings, it was rejected, for dogmatic reasons, by Marcion and the so-called Alogi; and that, like all the catholic epp., it was unknown to the Canon of the ancient Syrian church, and is stated to have been "abrogated" by Theodore (bishop of Mopsuestia, 393-428 AD).

The verdict of tradition is equally unanimous that the Fourth Gospel and the First Ep. are both the legacy of the apostle John in his old age to the church. All the Fathers already mentioned as quoting the Ep. (excepting Polycarp, but including Irenaeus) quote it as the work of St. John; and, until the end of the 16th cent., this opinion was held as unquestionable. The first of modern scholars to challenge it was Joseph Scaliger (1540-1609), who rejected the entire trio of Johannine Epp. as unapostolic; and in later times a dual authorship of the Gospel and the First Ep. has been maintained by Baur, H. J. Holtzmann, Pfleiderer, von Soden, and others; although on this particular point other adherents of the critical school, like Jülicher, Wrede and Wernle, accept the traditional view.

Thus two questions are raised: first, what light does the Ep. shed upon the personality of its own author? And second, whether or not

3. Internal Evidence the Gospel and the Ep. are from the same hand. Now, while the Ep. furnishes no clue by which we can identify the writer, it enables us very distinctly to class him. His relation to his readers, as we have seen, is intimate. The absence of explicit reference to either writer or readers only shows how intimate it was. For the writer to declare his identity was superfluous. Thought, language, tone—all were too familiar to be mistaken. The Ep. bore its author's signature in every line. His position toward his readers was, moreover, authoritative. As has already been said, the natural interpretation of 1 2.3 is that the relation between them was that of teacher and taught. (By this fact we may account for the enigmatic brevity of such a passage as that on the "three witnesses." The writer intended only to recall fuller oral expositions formerly given of the same topics.) The writer is at any rate a person of so distinctive eminence and recognized authority that it is not necessary to remind the readers either who he is or by what circumstances he is compelled now to address them through the medium of writing; their knowledge of both facts is taken for granted. And all this agrees with the traditional account of St. John's relation to the churches of Asia Minor in the last decades of the 1st cent.

Further, the writer claims to be one of the original witnesses of the facts of the incarnate life: "That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life (and the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and declare unto you the life, the eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us); that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us" (1 1-3). To understand the "Word of life" here as the gospel (Westcott, Rothe, Haupt) seems to the present writer frankly impossible; and not less so the theories by which the words "what we have heard, what we have seen with our eyes," etc., are regarded as utterances of the "faith-mysticism" or the "collective testimony" of the early church. It is difficult to imagine words more studiously adapted to convey the impression that the writer is one of the original, first-hand witnesses of Christ's life and resurrection ("that what we beheld, and our hands handled"; cf Lk 24 39). At furthest, the use of such language is otherwise compatible with veracity only on the supposition that the writer was recognized by the church as so closely identified with the original witnesses that he could speak of their testimony as virtually his own. But, apart from the presumption that he cannot have been one of the actual disciples of Jesus, there is really nothing to besaid for this supposition. So far as the internal evidence is concerned, the ancient and unbroken tradition which assigns it to the apostle John must be regarded as holding the field, unless, indeed, the traditional authorship is disproved by arguments of the most convincing kind. Whether the arguments brought against the apostolic authorship of the Johannine writings as a whole possess this character is too large a question to be investigated here. Yet the kernel of it lies in small compass. It is whether room can be found within the 1st cent. for so advanced a stage of theological development as is reached in the Johannine writings, and whether this development can be conceivably attributed to one of Our Lord's original disciples. To neither of these questions, as it appears to the present writer, is a dogmatically negative answer warranted. If within a period comparatively so brief, Christian thought had already passed through the earlier and later Pauline developments, and through such a development as we find in the Ep. to the He, there is no obvious reason why it may not have attained to the Johannine, within the lifetime of the last survivor of the apostles. Nor, when we consider the nature of the intellectual influences, within and without the church, by which the apostle John was surrounded, if, as tradition says, he lived on to a green old age in Ephesus, is there any obvious reason why he may not have been the chief instrument of that development.

V. Relationship to the Fourth Gospel.—The further question remains as to the internal evidence the Ep. supplies regarding its relation to the Fourth Gospel. 1. Common Character-istics—the case for identity of authorship is overwhelmingly strong. The two writings are equally saturated with that spiritual and theological atmosphere; they are equally characterized by that type of thought which we call Johannine and which presents an interpretation of Christianity not less original and distinctive than Paulinism. Both exhibit the same mental and moral habit of viewing every subject with an eye that stedfastly beholds radical antagonisms and is blind to approximations. There is in both the same strongly Heb style of composition; the same development of ideas by parallelism or antithesis; the same repetition of keywords like "begotten of God," "abiding," "keeping his commandments"; the same monotonous simplicity in the construction of sentences, with avoidance of relative clauses and singular parsimony in the use of connecting particles; the same apparently tautological habit of resuming consideration of a subject from a slightly different point of view; the same restricted range of vocabulary, which, moreover, is identical to an extent unparalleled in two independent writings.

The evidence for these statements cannot be presented here in full; but the following are some of the words and phrases characteristic of both and not found elsewhere in the NT—the Word, joy fulfilled, to see (or behold) and bear witness, to do the truth, to have sin, Paraclete, to keep the word (of God or Christ), to abide (in God or in Christ), the true light, new commandment, little children (teknia), children (paidia), to abide for ever, begotten of God, to purify one's self, to do sin, to take away sins, works of the devil, to pass from death into life, murderer, to lay down one's life, to be of the truth, to give commandment, to hear (=to hear approvingly), no man hath beheld God at any time, knowing and believing, Saviour of the world, water and blood, to overcome the world, to receive witness, to give eternal life, to have eternal life (in present sense), to believe in the name. The following are some of the terms common to both, which are found very rarely elsewhere in the NT: Beginning (=past eternity), to be manifested (9 t in each), to bear witness (6 t in the Ep., 33 t in the Gospel, once only in Mt, once in Lk, not at all in Mk), light (metaphorical), walk (metaphorical), to lead astray, to know (God, Christ, or Spirit, 8 t in the Ep., 10 t in the Gospel), true (alēthinos), to confess Jesus (elsewhere only in Rom 10 9), children of God, to destroy (luēin, elsewhere only in 2 Pet), the spirit of truth, to send (apostēllein, of mission of Christ), only begotten son, to have the witness (elsewhere only in Apoc), to hear (=to answer prayer).

On the other hand, the divergences of vocabulary are not more numerous than might be expected in two writings by the same author but of different literary form. The rather notable difference in the choice and use of particles is accounted for by the fact that dialogue and narrative, of which the Gospel is largely composed, are foreign to the Ep. The discrepancy, when closely examined, sometimes turns out to be a point of real similarity. Thus the particle oūn occurs nearly 200 t in the Gospel, not at all in the Ep. But in the Gospel it is used only in narrative, no occurrence of it being found, e.g. in chs 14-16.

Of the words and phrases contained in the Ep., but not in the Gospel, the great majority are accounted for by the fact that they are used in connection with topics which are not dealt with in the Gospel. Apart from these, the following may be noted, the most important being italicized: Word of life, fellowship, to confess sins (nowhere else in the NT), to cleansse from sin, propitiation (hilasmós, nowhere else in the NT), perfected or perfect love, last hour, Antichrist, anointing, to give of the spirit, to have (Father, Son) boldness (Godward), Parousia, lawlessness, seed (of God), come in the flesh, God is love, Day of Judgment, belief (pistis), to make God a liar, understanding. As regards style and diction, therefore, it seems impossible to conceive of two independent literary productions having a more intimate affinity. The relation between them in this respect is far closer than that between the Acts of the Apostles and the Third Gospel, or even any two of St. Paul's Epp., except those to the Eph and the Col.

Arguments for a dual authorship are based chiefly on certain theological emphasis and developments in the Ep., which are absent

4. Arguments against the Unity of Authorship from the Gospel; and invariably these arguments have been pressed with complete disregard of the fact that the one writing purports, at least, to be a Gospel, the other, an utterance of the writer in propria persona. If, for example, it is urged that the words "He is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins" have a more Pauline ring than any utterance of the Fourth Gospel, or that the conceptions in the Ep. of propitiation, intercession, and cleansing, are presented in a more explicit and technical form than in the Gospel, it is a fair reply to ask, Why not? Is it to be accepted as a canon of criticism that the writer of that Gospel must necessarily have put all his own theological expressions into the mouth of Him whose teaching he proposed to report? Much is made of the assertion that in the matter of the last things the Ep. recedes from the idealism of the Gospel, placing itself more nearly in line with the traditional apocalyptic eschatology. Whereas the Gospel speaks of Christ's bodily departure as the necessary condition of His coming again in the Spirit to make His permanent abode with His disciples (Jn 16 7), the writer of the Ep. thinks of a visible Parousia as nigh at hand (2 28); and whereas the Gospel conceives of judgment as a present spiritual fact (Jn 3 18, 19), the Ep. clings to the "popular" idea of a Judgment Day. But it ought to be noted that in the Ep., as compared with the Gospel, the eschatological perspective is foreshortened. The author writes under the conviction that "the world is passing away" and that the "last hour" of its day has come (2 17, 18). And it is an unwarrantable assumption that he must, if he wrote the Gospel, have been guilty of the manifest anachronism of importing this conviction into it also. Apart from this the fundamental similarities between the eschatology of the Ep. and that of the Gospel are far more striking than the differences. In both, eternal life is conceived of as a present and not merely a future possession. In both, Christ's presence is an abiding reality—"Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 3). If the Gospel speaks of the revelation of Christ as bringing present and inevitable "judgment" into the world, the Ep. is saturated with the same thought. If, on the other hand, the Ep. speaks of a visible future Parousia, this is plainly implied in Jn 5 28, 29. If the Ep. makes a single reference to the Day of Judgment (4 17), the Gospel has 6 passages which speak of the "last day," and in these the "last day" is explicitly the day of resurrection (11 24) and of judgment (12 48). In the two writings different features of the eschatological picture may be made more or less conspicuous; but there is no such diversity as to warrant the hypothesis of a separate authorship. Again, it is urged that in the Ep. the conception of the Logos is modified in the direction of conformity to traditional doctrine. The conception of the personal, preëxistent Logos, who "in the beginning was," and "was with God," and "was God" (1 1) was new, it is said, and, because of its gnostic tinge, suspect; and was therefore avoided and becomes in the Ep. the depersonalized "Word of life" (1 1). But why should the "Word of life" necessarily signify anything less personal than the phraseology of the Gospel? The phraseology in both cases is exactly adapted to its purpose. In the Gospel, "in the beginning was the Word . . . and the Word became flesh" is right, because it sums up the contents of the Gospel, announces its subject, the history of the Incarnate Logos. In the Ep., the "Word of life" is right, because the theme is to be the life, not as to its historical manifestation in Jesus, but as to its essential characteristics, whether in God or in man.

Other arguments of a similar kind which have been put forward need not be considered. On the whole, it seems clear that, while there are differences of emphasis, perspective and point of view, these cannot be held as at all counterbalancing, on the question of authorship, the unique similarity of the two writings in style and vocabulary and in the whole matter and manner of thought, together with the testimony of a tradition which is ancient, unanimous and unbroken.

Regarding the question of priority as between the two writings, the only certainty is that the Ep. presupposes its readers' acquaintance with the substance of the Gospel (otherwise such expressions as "Word of life," "new commandment" would have been unintelligible); but that does not imply its posteriority to the composition of the Gospel in literary form. By Lightfoot and others it is supposed to have been written simultaneously with the Gospel, and dispatched along with it as a covering letter to its original readers. In view, however, of the independence and first-rate importance of the Ep., it is difficult to think of it as having originated in this way; and by the majority of scholars it is regarded as later than the Gospel and separated from it by an appreciable interval. That it was written with a "mediating" purpose (Pfleiderer), to "popularize" the ideas of the Gospel (Weizsäcker), or to correct and tone down what in it was obnoxious to the feeling of the church, and at the same time to add certain links of connection (such as propitiation, Paraclete, Parousia) with the traditional type of doctrine, or to emphasize these where they existed (Holtzmann), is a theory which rests on an extremely slender basis; the theory that it was written as a protest against gnostic appropriation of the Fourth Gospel itself (Jülicher) has no tangible basis at all.

That there was an appreciable interval between the two writings is probable enough. Gnostic tendencies have meanwhile hardened into more definite form. Many false prophets have gone out into the world. The "antichrists" have declared themselves. The time has come for the evangelist to focus the rays of his Gospel upon the malignant growth which is acutely endangering the life of the church.

LITERATURE.—Commentaries are numerous and excellent. The most important are those by Calvin, Lücke, Ebrard, Haupt (of fine insight but grievous verbosity), Huther (specially valuable for its conspectus of all earlier exegesis), Westcott (a magazine of materials for the student of the Ep.), Alexander (in the Speaker's Comm.), Rothe (original, beautiful, profound), B. Weiss, H. J. Holtzmann, Plummer (in Cambridge G. NT, scholarly and very serviceable); Brooke (ICC, excellent). Among the numerous expositions of the Ep. are those by Neander, Candlish, Maurice, Alexander (Expositor's Bible), Watson, J. M. Gibbon (Eternal Life), Findlay (Fellowship in the Life Eternal), Law (The Tests of Life—combined exposition and commentary); among books on Introduction, those by Weiss, Bleek, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Zahn, Salmon, Gloag, Peake; and, among books of other kinds, the relevant sections in Borschlag, NT Theology; Pfleiderer, Urchristentum; Har-nack, Geschichte der altchristl. Literatur; Farrar, Early Days of Christianity; McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age; Stevens, Johannine Theology and Theology of the NT; articles by Salmond in HDB; by Schmiedel in EB, and by Häring in Theologische Abhandlungen, Carl von Weizsäcker . . . gewidmet. In German, the fullest investigation of the relationship of the Ep. to the Fourth Gospel will be found in a series of arts. by H. J. Holtzmann in the Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie (1882-83); in English, in Brooke's comm., in Law, Tests of Life, 339-63. See also Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, ch. iii.

THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES

It is not surprising that these brief and fugitive Epp. are among the NT writings which have had the hardest struggle for canonical recognition. One is probably, the other certainly, a private letter; and neither the same reason nor the same opportunity for their circulation existed, as in the case of church letters. The 2d Ep. contains little that is distinctive; the 3d Ep. is occupied with a vexatious episode in the internal history of a single congregation. Both are written by a person who designates himself simply as "the Presbyter"; and the names of the person (or church) to which the one is addressed and of the church with whose affairs the other is concerned are alike unknown. The fact, therefore, that, in spite of such obstacles, these letters did become widely known and eventually attained to canonical rank is proof of a general conviction of the soundness of the tradition which assigned them to the apostle John.

Like all the catholic epp., they were unknown to the early Syrian church; when 1 Jn, 1 Pet and Jas were received into its Canon, they were still excluded, nor are they found even in printed editions of the Syr NT till 1630. They were not acknowledged by the school of Antioch. Jerome distinguishes their authorship from that of the 1st Ep. They are classed among the disputed books by Eusebius, who indicates that it was questioned whether they belonged to the evangelist or "possibly to another of the same name as he." Origen remarks that "not all affirm them to be genuine"; and, as late as the middle of the 4th cent., the effort to introduce them in the Latin church met with opposition in Africa (Zahn).

On the other hand, we find recognition of their Johannine authorship at an early date, in Gaul (Irenaeus); Rome (Muratorian Canon, where, however, the reading is corrupt, and it is doubtful whether their authorship is ascribed or denied to the apostle John); Alexandria (Clement, who is reputed by Eusebius to have commented upon them, and who in his extant works speaks of John's "larger epistle," implying the existence of one or more minor epp.); Africa (Cyprian reports that 2 Jn was appealed to at the Synod of Carthage, 256 AD). Dionysius, Origen's disciple and successor, speaks of John's calling himself in them "the Presbyter." Eusebius, though conscientiously placing them among the antilegomena, elsewhere writes in a way which indicates that he himself did not share the doubt of their authenticity.

The internal evidence confirms the ultimate decision of the early church regarding these letters. Quite evidently the 2d Ep. must have been written by the author of the 1st, or was an arrant and apparently purposeless piece of plagiarism. The 3d Ep. is inevitably associated with the 2d by the superscription, "the Presbyter," and by other links of thought and phraseology.

The mention of this title opens up a wide question. The famous extract from Papias (Euseb., HE, III, 39) vouches for the existence, among those who were or had been his contemporaries, of a certain "Presbyter" John (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, II, 5). Jerome, moreover, speaks of the two smaller Epp. as, in contrast with the 1st, ascribed to the Presbyter (De Vir. Illustr., ix); Eusebius inclines to ascribe to him the Book of Rev; and modern critics, like Weizsäcker and Harnack, have improved upon the hint by finding in this shadowy personage the author of the Fourth Gospel. Into this far-reaching controversy, we cannot here enter. It may be noted, however, that whether, in the confusedly written passage referred to, Papias really intends to distinguish between John the Apostle and John the Presbyter is a point still in debate; and that Eusebius (Evangelica Demonstratio, III, 5) does not regard the title "Presbyter" as inapplicable to St. John, but observes that in his Epp. he "either makes no mention of himself or calls himself presbyter, nowhere apostle or evangelist." Dionysius, too, remarks that "in the 2d and 3d Epp. ascribed to him, he writes anonymously, as the Presbyter." These Fathers, both exceptionally learned men and presumably well acquainted with primitive usage, saw nothing anomalous, although they did see something characteristic, in the fact, or supposed fact, that an apostle should designate himself by the lowlier and vaguer title. In the very sentence from Papias already referred to, the apostles are called "presbyters"; not to say that in the NT itself we have an instance of an apostle's so styling himself (1 Pet 5 1).

To sum up, it is evident that no one desiring falsely to secure apostolic prestige for his productions would have written under so indistinctive a title; also, that these brief and very occasional letters could never have won their way to general recognition and canonical rank unless through general conviction of their Johannine authorship—the very history of these Epp. proving that the early church did not arrive at a decision upon such matters without satisfying itself of the trustworthiness of the tradition upon which a claim to canonicity was founded; finally, the internal evidence testifies to an authorship identical with that of the 1st Ep., so that the evidence cited regarding this is available also for those. These letters, along with St. Paul's to Philemon, are the only extant remains of a private apostolic correspondence which must have included many such, and for this reason, apart from their intrinsic worth, possess an interest, material and biographical, peculiar to themselves. We proceed to consider the two Epp. separately, and since an interesting question arises as to whether the 2d is that referred to in ver 9 of the 3d, it will be convenient to reverse the canonical order in dealing with them.

The Third Epistle.—This brief note gives a uniquely authentic and intimate glimpse of some aspects of church life as it existed in Asia Minor (this may be taken as certain) somewhere about the end of the 1st cent. It concerns a certain episode in the history of one of the churches under the writer's supervision, and incidentally furnishes character-sketches of two of its members, the large-hearted and hospitable Gaius, to whom it is written (and whom it is merely fanciful to identify with any other Gaius mentioned in the NT), and the loquacious, overbearing Diotrophes; also of the faithful Demetrius, by whose hand probably the letter is sent. The story which may be gathered from the Ep. seems to be as follows. A band of itinerant teachers had been sent out, by the Presbyter's authority, no doubt, and furnished by him with letters of commendation to the various churches, and among others to that of which Gaius and Diotrophes were members. Diotrophes, however, whether through jealousy for the rights of the local community or for some personal reason, not only declined to receive the itinerant teachers, but exerted his authority to impose the same course of action upon the church as a whole, even to the length of threatening with excommunication (ver 10) those who took a different view of their duty. Gaius alone had not been intimidated, but had welcomed to his home the repulsed and disheartened teachers, who when they returned (to Ephesus, probably) had testified to the church of his courageous and large-hearted behavior (ver 6). A 2d time, apparently, the teachers are now sent forth (ver 6), with Demetrius as their leader, who brings this letter to Gaius, commending his past conduct (ver 5) and encouraging him to persevere in it (ver 6). The Presbyter adds that he has dispatched a letter to the church also (ver 9); but evidently he has little hope that it will be effectual in overcoming the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes; for he promises that he will speedily pay a personal visit to the church, when he will depose Diotrephes from his pride of place and bring him to account for his scornful "prating" and overbearing conduct (ver 10). So far as appears, the cause of friction was purely personal or administrative. There is no hint of heretical tendency in Diotrephes and his party. Pride of place is his sin, an inflated sense of his own importance and a violent jealousy for what he regarded as his own prerogative, which no doubt he identified with the autonomy of the local church.

The Second Epistle.—The letter is addressed to "the elect lady" (better, to "the lady Electa"). Its tone throughout is peculiarly affectionate; there is a warmer rush of emotion, esp. in the opening verses, than is characteristic of St. John's usual reserve. But in these verses the keynote of the Ep. is struck—truth. The writer testifies his love for his correspondent and her children "in truth"; this love is shared by all who "know the truth" (ver 1), and it is "for the truth's sake which abideth in us, and it shall be with us for ever" (ver 2). What follows (vs 4-9) is in effect an epitome of the 1st Ep. After declaring his joy at finding certain of her children "walking in truth," he proceeds to expound, quite in the style of the 1st Ep., what "walking in truth" is. It is to love one another (ver 5; cf 1 Jn 2 7-11); but this love is manifested in keeping God's commandments (ver 6a; cf 1 Jn 5 2-3); and no less in steadfast adherence to the genuine doctrine of the Gospel (cf 1 Jn 3 23). "For many deceivers are gone forth into the world, even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh" (ver 7; cf 1 Jn 4 1-3). Then follows an exhortation to steadfastness (ver 8), and a warning that whoever in the name of progress departs from this teaching "hath not God," while he who abides in it "hath both the Father and the Son" (ver 9; cf 1 Jn 2 23, 24). This leads up to the immediately practical point, a warning to extend no hospitality and show no friendliness to the false teachers (vs 10, 11); and the Ep. closes with the hope of a speedy and joyful meeting "face to face" of the writer and his correspondent, to whom he conveys greetings from the children of her "elect sister."

Whether the "elect lady," or "lady Electa" of his letter is a real person or the personification of a church is a point which has been debated from ancient times and is still unsolved. The solution has been found, it is true, if we can accept the hypothesis (put forward by Zahn and Schmiedel and adopted by Findlay) that this is the letter referred to in 3 Jn ver 9. It is urged on behalf of this supposition that the two Epp. are curiously identical in phraseology. In both the writer begins by describing his correspondent as one whom "I love in truth"; in both he uses a distinctive phrase (echrōnē than), 2 Jn ver 4, "I rejoice greatly," not found elsewhere in the NT to declare his joy at finding "thy [my] children walking in the truth"; and in both he concludes by saying that he has "many things to write," but that, looking forward to an early interview "face to face," he will not commit these further thoughts to "paper and ink." It is argued that "none but a chancery clerk could have clung so closely to his epistolary formulae" in two private letters written at different periods. But the force of this argument largely vanishes when we look at the formulae in question. If a modern writer may conclude hundreds of friendly letters by subscribing himself "yours sincerely," or something equivalent, why may not the Presbyter have commenced these two and many similar letters by assuring his correspondents that he sincerely loved them? And again, one in his official position must often have had occasion to say that he hoped soon to pay a personal visit, in view of which, writing at greater length was unnecessary. Even if the likeness in phraseology makes it probable that the two letters were written simultaneously, this by no means proves that the one was written to Gaius, the other to the church of which Gaius and Diotrephes were members. Zahn calculates that 2 Jn would occupy 32 lines, and 3 Jn not quite 31 lines of ancient writing, and infers that the author used two pages of papyrus of the same size for both letters; but why we are to identify 2 Jn with the letter mentioned in 3 Jn because both happen to fill the same size of note paper is not quite clear.

On the other hand, the difficulties in the way of this attractive hypothesis are too substantial to be set aside. The two Epp. belong to entirely different situations. Both deal with the subject of hospitality; but the one forbids hospitality to the wrong kind of guests, and says nothing about the right kind, the other enjoins hospitality to the right kind and says nothing about the wrong kind. In the one the writer shows himself alarmed about the spread of heresy, in the other, about the insubordination of a self-important official. Is it conceivable that the Presbyter should send at the same time a letter to Gaius in which he promises that he will speedily come with a rod for Diotrephes (who had carried the church along with him), and another to the church in which that recalcitrant person was the leading spirit, in which he expresses the hope that when he comes and speaks face to face their "joy may be made full"—a letter, moreover, in which the real point at issue is not once touched upon? Such a procedure is scarcely imaginable.

We are still left, then, with the question What kind of entity, church or individual, is entitled "the lady Electa"? (See ELECT LADY, where reasons are given for preferring this tr.) The address of the letter is certainly much more suggestive of an individual than of a church. After all that has been so persuasively argued, notably by Dr. Findlay (Fellowship in the Life Eternal, ch iii), from the symbolizing of the church as the Bride of Christ, it remains very hard for the present writer to suppose that, in the superscription of a letter and without any hint of symbolism, anyone could address a particular Christian community as "the elect lady" or the "lady elect." On the other hand, the difficulties urged against the personal interpretation are not so grave as sometimes represented. The statement, "I have found certain of thy children walking in truth," does not imply that others of them were not doing so, but emphasizes what had come under the writer's personal observation. Nor can we pronounce the elevated and didactic love of the letter more suitable to a church than to an individual without taking into account the character, position and mutual relations of the correspondents. The person (if it was a person) addressed was evidently a Christian matron of high social standing—one able in a special degree to dispense hospitality, and of wide influence, one beloved of "all them that know the truth," whose words would be listened to and whose example would be imitated. And, in view of the ominous spreading of the leaven of Antichrist, it is not difficult to suppose that the Presbyter should write to such a person in such a strain. Nor does there seem to be anything esp. odd in the fact of the children of a private family sending their respects to their aunt through the apostle John (Findlay). If he was intimate with that family, and in their immediate vicinity at the time of writing, it appears a natural thing for them to have done. Possibly Dr. Harris' "exploded" "prehistoric countess of Huntington" is not so far astray as a modern equivalent of the lady Electa.

LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—The Fourth Gospel has a form peculiar to itself, as well as a characteristic style and attitude, which mark it as a unique

1. Scope of Gospel (1) There is a prologue, consisting of 1 1-18, of which something will be said later on. (2) There is a series of scenes and discourses from the life of Jesus, descriptive of Himself and His work, and marking the gradual development of faith and unbelief in His hearers and in the nation (1 19-12 50). (3) There is a more detailed account of the closing events of the Passion Week—of His farewell intercourse with His disciples (chs 13-17), of His arrest, trials, crucifixion, death, and burial (chs 18-19). (4) There are the resurrection, and the manifestations of the risen Lord to His disciples on the resurrection day, and on another occasion eight days after (20 1-29). This is followed by a paragraph which describes the purpose of the Gospel, and the reason why it was written (vs 30.31). (5) Finally, there is a supplementary ch (21), which has all the characteristic marks of the Gospel as a whole, and which probably, therefore, proceeds from the same pen (thus Lightfoot, Meyer, Alford, etc; some, as Zahn, prefer to take the ch as the work of a disciple of St. John). The concluding vs (24.25) of this ch read: "This is the disciple that beareth witness of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his witness is true. And there are also many other things which Jesus did," etc. "We know that his witness is true" seems to be a testimony on the part of those who knew as to the identity of the disciple, and the trustworthiness of his witness. Nor has this earliest testimony been discredited by the attacks made on it, and the natural meaning has been vindicated by many competent writers. The present tense, "beareth witness," indicates that the "disciple" who wrote the Gospel was still alive when the testimony was given.

As to the time of the appearance of the Johannine literature, apart from the question as to the authorship of these writings, there is now a

2. State of growing consensus of opinion that it Opinion as arose at the end of the 1st cent., or at to Date of the beginning of the 2d. This is held Appearance by those who assign the authorship, not to any individual writer, but to a school at Ephesus, who partly worked up traditional material, and elaborated it into the form which the Johannine writings now have; by those also, as Spitta, who disintegrate the Gospel into a Grund-schrift and a Bearbeitung (cf his Das Johannes-Evangelium als Quelle der Geschichte Jesu, 1910). Whether the Gospel is looked on as a compilation of a school of theologians, or as the outcome of an editor who utilizes traditional material, or as the final outcome of theological evolution of certain Pauline conceptions, with few exceptions the appearance of the Johannine writings is dated early in the 2d cent. One of the most distinguished of these exceptions is Schmiedel; another is the late Professor Pfeiderer. One may respect Pfeiderer in the region of philosophical inquiry, but in criticism he is a negligible quantity. And the writings of Schmiedel on the Johannine question are rapidly passing into the same category.

Thus the appearance of the Johannine writings at the end of the 1st cent. may safely be accepted as a sound historical conclusion. Slowly the critics who assigned their appearance to the middle of the 2d cent., or later, have retraced their steps, and assign the emergence of the Johannine writings to the time mentioned. This does not, of course, settle the questions of the authorship, composition and trustworthiness of the Gospel, which must be determined on their merits, on the grounds of external, and still more of internal, evidence, but it does clear the way for a proper discussion of them, and gives us a terminus which must set a limit to all further speculation on matters of this kind.

II. External Evidence for the Fourth Gospel.—Only an outline of the external evidence for the Fourth Gospel, which concerns both date and authorship, can be given in this article. Fuller information may be sought in the Intros to the Commentaries on the Gospel, by Godet, Westcott, Luthardt, Meyer; in Ezra Abbot's The Fourth Gospel and Its Authorship; in Zahn's Intro to the NT, III; in Sanday's The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel; in Drummond's The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel. All these and many others defend the Johannine authorship. On the other side, reference may be made to the author of Supernatural Religion, of which many editions have appeared. Among recent works, Moffatt's Intro to the NT, and B. W. Bacon's Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate, may be mentioned as denying the Johannine authorship.

The external evidence is as follows. At the end of the 2d cent., the Christian church was in possession of four Gospels, which were 1. At End used as sacred books, read in churches of 2d Cent. in public worship, held in honor as authoritative, and treated as part of a Canon of Scripture (see GOSPELS). One of these was the Fourth Gospel, universally ascribed to the apostle John as its author. We have the evidence on this point of Irenaeus, of Tertullian, of Clement of Alexandria, a little later of Origen. Clement is witness for the belief and practice of the church in Egypt and its neighborhood; Tertullian for the church in Africa; and Irenaeus, who was brought up in Asia Minor, was a teacher at Rome, and was bishop of Lyons in Gaul, for the churches in these lands. The belief was so unquestioned, that Irenaeus could give reasons for it which would of themselves have convinced no one who had not already had the conviction which the reasons were meant to sustain. To discount the evidence of Irenaeus, Tertullian and Clement on the ground of the desire to find apostolic authorship for their sacred books, is not argument but mere assertion. There may have been such a tendency, but in the case of the four Gospels there is no proof that there was necessity for this at the end of the 2d cent. For there is evidence of the belief in the apostolic authorship of two Gospels by apostles, and of two by companions of the apostles, as an existing fact in the churches long before the end of the 2d cent.

The importance of the testimony of Irenaeus is measured by the efforts which have been made to invalidate his witness. But these attempts fail in the presence of his historical position, and of the means at his command to ascertain the belief of the churches. There are many links of connection between Irenaeus and the apostolic age. There is specially his connection with Polycarp. He himself describes that relationship in his letter to Florinus, a fellow-disciple of Polycarp, who had lapsed into Gnosticism, in which he says, "I remember the events of that time more clearly than those of recent years. For what boys learn, growing with their mind, becomes joined with it; so that I am able to describe the very place in which the blessed Polycarp sat as he discoursed, and his goings out and comings in, and the manner of his life, and his physical appearance and his discourses to the people, and the accounts which he gave of his intercourse with John and the others who had seen the Lord" (Euseb., HE, V, 20: McGiffert's tr.). We cannot say what was the age of Irenaeus at that time, but he was of sufficient age to receive the impressions which, after many years, he recorded. Polycarp was martyred in 155 AD, and he had been a Christian for 86 years when he was martyred. Thus there was only one link between Irenaeus and the apostolic age. Another link was constituted by his association with Pothinus, his predecessor in Lyons. Pothinus was a very old man when he was martyred, and had in his possession the traditions of the church of Gaul. Thus, Irenaeus, through these and others, had the opportunity of knowing the belief of the churches, and what he records is not only his own personal testimony, but the universal tradition of the church.

With Irenaeus should be adduced the apologist Theophilus (c 170), the earliest writer to mention St. John by name as the author of the Gospel. In prefacing a quotation from the commencement of the prologue, he says, "This is what we learn from the sacred writings, and from all men animated by the Spirit, amongst whom John says" (Ad Autol., ii.22). Theophilus is further stated by Jerome to have composed a Harmony of the four Gospels (De Viris Illustr., 25).

From Irenaeus and Theophilus we ascend nearer to the middle of the 2d cent., and here we encounter the Diatessaron of Tatian, on which much need not be said. The Diatessaron is likewise a Harmony of the four Gospels, and this Harmony dates not later than 170. It begins with the 1st ver of the Fourth Gospel, and ends with the last ver of the appendix to the Gospel. Tatian was a pupil of Justin Martyr, and that fact alone renders it probable that the "Memoirs of 2d Cent. of the Apostles," which Justin quotes so often, were those which his pupil afterward combined in the Diatessaron. That Justin knew the Fourth Gospel seems clear, though we cannot argue the question here. If he did, it follows that it was in existence about the year 130.

But there is evidence that helps us to trace the influence of the Fourth Gospel back to the year 110.

"The first clear traces of the Fourth Gospel upon the thought and language of the church are found in the Epp. of Ignatius (c 110 AD). How unmistakable these traces are is shown by the fact that not infrequently this dependence of Ignatius upon John has been used as an argument against the genuineness of the Ignatian letters" (Zahn, Intro, III, 176). This argument may now be safely used since the Epp. have been vindicated as historical documents by Lightfoot and by Zahn. If the Ignatian Epp. are saturated with the tone and spirit of the Johannine writings, that goes to show that this mode of thought and expression was prevalent in the church of the time of Ignatius. Thus at the beginning of the 2d cent., that distinctive mode of thought and speech which we call Johannine had an existence.

A further line of evidence in favor of the Gospel, which need only be referred to, lies in the use made of it by the Gnostics. That the Gospel was used by the Valentinians and Basilides has been shown by Dr. Drummond (op. cit., 265-343).

To estimate aright the force of the above evidence, it is to be remembered that, as already observed, there were many disciples of the John of Ephesus, to whom the Johannine writings were ascribed, living far on in the 2d cent.—bishops like Papias and Polycarp, the "presbyters" so often mentioned by Irenaeus—forming a chain connecting the time of the origin of the Gospel with the latter half of the century. Here arises the question, recently so largely canvassed, as to the identity of "the presbyter John" in the well-known fragment of Papias preserved by Euseb. (HE, III, 39). Were there, as most, with Euseb., understand, two Johns—apostle and presbyter (cf e.g. Godet)—or was there only one? If only one, was he the son of Zebedee? On these points wide difference of opinion prevails. Harnack holds that the presbyter was not the son of Zebedee; Sanday is doubtful; Moffatt believes that the presbyter was the only John at Ephesus. Zahn and Dom J. Chapman (John the Presbyter and the Fourth Gospel, 1911) think also that there was only one John at Ephesus, but he was the son of Zebedee. It is hardly necessary to discuss the question here, for the tradition is explicit which connected the Gospel with the apostle John during the latter part of his residence in Ephesus—a residence which there is no sufficient ground for disputing (see JOHN, THE APOSTLE).

On a fair consideration of the external evidence, therefore, we find that it is unusually strong. It is very seldom the case that conclusive proof of the existence and influence of a writing can be brought so near to the time of its publication as in the case of the Fourth Gospel. The date of its publication is at the end of the 1st cent., or at the latest in the beginning of the 2d. Traces of its influence are found in the Epp. of Ignatius. The 1st Ep. of Jn is quoted in the Ep. of Polycarp (ch 7). The thought and style of the Gospel had influenced Justin Martyr. It is one of the four interwoven in the Diatessaron of Tatian. It was quoted, commented on, and interpreted by the Gnostics. In truth the external evidence for the early date and Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel is as great both in extent and variety as it is for any book of the NT, and far greater than any that we possess for any work of classical antiquity.

The history of the controversy on the Johannine authorship is not here entered into. Apart from the obscure sect of the Alogi (who attributed the Gospel to Cerinthus!) in the 2d cent., no voice was heard in challenge of the authorship of St. John till the close of the 17th cent., and serious assault did not begin till the 19th cent. (Bretschneider, 1820, Strauss, 1835, Weiss, 1838, Baur and his school, 1844 and after, Keim, 1865, etc.). The attacks were vigorously repelled by other scholars (Olshausen, Tholuck, Neander, Ebrard, Bleek, etc.). Some adopted, in various forms and degrees, the hypothesis of an apostolic basis for the Gospel, regarded as the work of a later hand (Weizsäcker, Renan, etc.). From this point the controversy has proceeded with an increasing dogmatism on the side of the opponents of the genuineness and trustworthiness of the Gospel, but not less firmness on the part of its defenders. The present state of opinion is indicated in the text.

III. Characteristics of the Gospel: Internal Evidence.—

The external evidence for the Fourth Gospel is criticized, but it is chiefly on internal grounds that the opposition to the Johannine authorship and historical trustworthiness of the Gospel is based. Stress is laid on the broad contrast which admittedly exists in style, character and plan, between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics; on its supposed philosophical dress (the Logos-doctrine); on alleged errors and contradictions; on the absence of progress in the narrative, etc. The defence of the Gospel is usually conducted by pointing out the different aims of the Gospel, rebutting exaggerations in the above objections, and showing that in a multitude of ways the author of the Gospel reveals his identity with the apostle John. He was, e.g., a Jew, a Palestinian Jew, one familiar with the topography of Jerus., etc., an apostle, an eyewitness, the disciple whom Jesus loved (13 23; 20 2; 21 7.20). The attestation in 21 24 of those who knew the author in his lifetime is of the greatest weight in this connection. Instead of following these familiar lines of argument (for which see Godet, Luthardt, Westcott, Ez. Abbot, Drummond, etc., in works cited), a confirmation is here sought on the lines of a fresh comprehensive study.

2. Unwarrantable Critical Presuppositions

The study of the Johannine writings in general, and of the Fourth Gospel in particular, has been approached in many ways and from various points of view. One of the most common of these ways, in recent works, is that which assumes that here we have the product of Christian reflection on the facts disclosed in the other Gospels, and that these facts have been modified by the experience of the church, and reflect the consciousness of the church at the end of the 1st cent. or the beginning of the 2d. By this time, it is assumed that the church, now mainly a gentile church, has been greatly influenced by Gr-Rom culture, that she has been reflecting on the wonder of her own history, and has so modified the original tradition as to assimilate it to the new environment. In the Fourth Gospel, it is said, we have the highest and most elaborate presentation of the outcome of the process. Starting with St. Paul and his influence, Professor B. W. Bacon traces for us the whole process until a school of theologians at Ephesus produced the Johannine writings, and the consciousness of the church was satisfied with the completeness of the new presentation of Christianity (cf his Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate). Hellenistic ideas in Heb form, the facts of the Gospel so transformed as to be acceptable to the Hellenistic mind—this is what scholars of this class find in the Fourth Gospel.

Others again come to the Gospel with the presupposition that it is intended to present to the reader a complete view of the life of Jesus, that it is intended to supplement and to correct the statements of the Synoptics and to present Christ in such a form as to meet the new needs of the church at the beginning of the 2d cent. Others find a polemical aim in the Gospel. Weizsäcker e.g. finds a strong polemic aim against the Jews. He says, "There are the objections raised by the Jews against the church after its secession has been consummated, and after the development of the person of its Christ has passed through its most essential stages. It is not a controversy of the lifetime, but that of the school carried back into the history of the life" (Apostolic Age, II, 222). One would have expected that a statement so forcibly put would have been supported by some evidence; that we might have some historical evidence regarding a controversy between Jew and church beyond what we have in the Fourth Gospel itself. But nothing is offered by Weizsäcker except the dictum that these are controversial topics carried on in the school, and that they are anachronisms as they stand. As it happens, we know from the Dial. between Justin Martyr and Trypho what were the topics discussed between Jew and Christian in the middle of the 2d cent., and it is sufficient to say that these topics, as reported by Justin, mainly regarded the interpretation of the OT, and are not those which are discussed in the Fourth Gospel.

Perhaps the most surprising of all the presuppositions with regard to the Fourth Gospel is that which lays great stress on the supposition that the book was largely intended to vindicate a Christian doctrine of the sacraments which flourished at the beginning of the 2d cent. According to this presupposition, the Fourth Gospel set forth a doctrine of the sacraments which placed them in a unique position as a means of salvation. While scarcely contending that the doctrine of the sacraments held by the church of the 2d cent. had reached that stage of development which meets us in the mediaeval church, it is, according to this view, far on the way toward that goal afterward reached. We do not dwell on this view, for the exegesis that finds sacramentarianism in the Fourth Gospel is hopeless. That Gospel does not put the sacraments in the place of Christ. Finally, we do not find the contention of those who affirm that the Fourth Gospel was written with a view of making the gospel of Jesus more acceptable to the Gentiles any more satisfactory. As a matter of fact, the Gospel which was most acceptable to the Gentiles was the Gospel according to Mt. It is more frequently quoted than any other. In the writings of the early church, it is quoted as often as all the other Gospels put together. The Fourth Gospel did not come into prominence in the Christian church until the rise of the Christological controversies in the 3d cent.

When, after dwelling on these ways of approaching the Fourth Gospel, and reading the demands made on the Gospel by those who approach it with these presuppositions and demands, we turn to the Gospel itself, and ask regarding its aim and purpose, we find a simple answer. The writer of it expressly says: "Many other signs therefore did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name" (20 30.31). Pursuing this clue, and putting away all the presuppositions which bulk so largely in introductions, exegeses, histories of the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages, one meets with many surprises.

(1) Relation to Synoptics.—In relation to the Synoptics, the differences are great, but more surprising is the fact that the points of contact between these Gospels and the Fourth Gospel are so few. The critics to whom reference has been made are unanimous that the writer or the school who compiled the Johannine writings was indebted to the Synoptics for almost all the facts embodied in the Fourth Gospel. Apart, however, from the Passion Week, only two points of contact are found so obvious that they cannot be doubted, viz. the feeding of the 5,000, and the walking on the sea (6 4-21). The healing of the child of the royal officer (4 46-53) can scarcely be identified with the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt, Lk); but even if the identification were allowed, this is all we have in the Fourth Gospel of the events of the ministry in Galilee. There is a ministry in Galilee, but the earlier ministry in Judaea and in Galilee began before John was cast into prison (3 24), and it has no parallel in the Synoptics. In fact, the Fourth Gospel assumes the existence of the other three, and does not anew convey the knowledge which can be gathered from them. It takes its own way, makes its own selections, and sets these forth from its own point of view. It has its own principle of selection: that plainly indicated in the passage already quoted. The scenes depicted, the words done, the words spoken, and the reflections made by the writer, are all directed toward the aim of enabling the readers to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. In the writer's view this would issue in their obtaining life in His name.

(2) Time occupied in the Gospel.—Accepting this principle for our guidance, we turn to the Gospel, and the first thing that strikes the reader is the small amount of the real time filled up, or occupied, by the scenes described in the Gospel. We take the night of the betrayal, and the day of the crucifixion. The things done and the words spoken on that day, from one sunset to another, occupy no fewer than 7 chs of the Gospel (chs 13–19). Apart from the supplementary ch (21), there are 20 chs in the Gospel, containing 697 vs, and these 7 chs have 257 vs. More than one-third of the whole given to the ministry is thus occupied with the events of one day.

Again, according to Acts 1 3, there was a ministry of the risen Lord which lasted for 40 days, and of all that happened during those days John records only what happened on the day of the resurrection, and on another day 8 days after (ch 20). The incidents recorded in the other Gospels fall into the background, are taken for granted, and only the signs done on these two days are recorded here. They are recorded because they are of significance for the purpose he has in hand, of inducing belief in the truth that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. If we continue to follow the clue thus afforded, we shall be surprised at the fewness of the days on which anything was transacted. As we read the story of the Fourth Gospel, there are many indications of the passing of time, and many precise statements of date. We learn from the Gospel that the ministry of Jesus probably lasted for 3 years. We gather this from the number of the feasts which He attended at Jerus. We have notes of time spent in journeys, but no account of anything that happened during them. The days on which anything was done or anything said are very few. We are told precisely that "six days before the passover Jesus came to Bethany, where Lazarus was" (12 1 ff), and with regard to these 6 days we are told only of the supper and the anointing of the feet of Jesus by Mary, of the entry into Jerus, the visit of the Greeks, and of the impression which that visit made on Jesus. We have also the reflections of the evangelist on the unbelief of the Jews, but nothing further. We know that many other things did happen on these days, but they are not recorded in this Gospel. Apart from the two days during which Jesus dwelt in the place where he was, of which days nothing is recorded, the time occupied with the raising of Lazarus is the story of one day (ch 11). So it is also with the healing of the blind man. The healing is done one day, and the controversy regarding the significance of that healing is all that is recorded of another day (ch 9). What is recorded in ch 10 is the story of two days. The story of the 7th and 8th chs, interrupted by the episode of the woman taken in adultery, which does not belong to the Gospel, is the story of not more than two days. The story of the feeding of the 5,000 and of the subsequent discourse (ch 6) is the story of two days. It is not necessary to enter into fuller detail. Yet the writer, as remarked, is very exact in his notes of time. He notes the days, the number of days on which anything was done, or when anything was said. We make these remarks, which will be obvious to every reader who attends to them, mainly for the purpose of showing that the Gospel on the face of it does not intend to, at least does not, set forth a complete account of the life and work of Jesus. It gives at the utmost an account of 20 days out of the 1,000 days of Our Lord's ministry. This is of itself sufficient to set aside the idea of those who deal with the Fourth Gospel as if it were meant to set aside, to supplement, or to correct, the accounts in the Synoptics. Plainly it was not written with that purpose.

(3) A personal record.—Obviously the book professes to be reminiscences of one who had personal experience of the ministry which he describes. The personal note is in evidence all through the book. It is present even in the prologue, for in that ver in which he describes the great fact of the incarnation he uses the personal note, "We beheld his glory" (1 14). This might be taken as the keynote of the Gospel. In all the scenes set forth in the Gospel the writer believes that in them Jesus manifested forth His glory and deepened the faith of His disciples. If we were to ask him, when did he behold the glory of the incarnate Word, the answer would be, in all these scenes which are described in the Gospel. If we read the Gospel from this point of view, we find that the writer had a different conception of the glory of the incarnate Word from that which his critics ascribe to him. He sees a glory of the Word in the fact that He was wearied with His journey (4 6), that He made clay of the spittle and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay (9 6), that He wept at the grave of Lazarus (11 35), that He groaned in the spirit and was troubled (ver 38), and that He could sorrow with a sorrow unspeakable, as He did after the interview with the Greeks (12 27). For he records all these things, and evidently thinks them quite consistent with the glory of the incarnate Word. A fair exegesis does not explain these things away, but must take them as of the essence of the manifested glory of the Word.

The Gospel then is professedly reminiscences of an eyewitness, of one who was personally present at all the scenes which he describes. No doubt the reminiscences often pass into reflections on the meaning and significance of what he describes. He often pauses to remark that the disciples, and he himself among them, did not understand at the time the meaning of some saying, or the significance of some deed, of Jesus (2 22; 12 16, etc.). At other times we can hardly distinguish between the words of the Master and the reflections of the disciple. But in other writings we often meet with the same phenomenon. In the Ep. to the Gal, e.g., Paul writes what he had said to Peter at Antioch: "If thou, being a Jew, livest as do the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, how compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (Gal 2 14). Shortly after, he passes into reflections on the situation, and it is impossible to ascertain where the direct speech ends and the reflections begin. So it is in the Fourth Gospel. It is impossible in many instances to say where the words of Jesus end and the reflections of the writer begin. So it is, e.g., with his record of the witness of the Baptist in ch 3. The record of the Baptist's words may end with the sentence, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (ver 30), and the rest may be the reflections of the writer on the situation.

(4) Reminiscences of an eyewitness.—The phenomena of the Gospel are thus, apparently at least, reminiscences of an eyewitness, with his reflections on the meaning of what he has experienced. He was present at the scenes which he describes. He was present on the night on which the Master was betrayed; he was present in the hall of the high priest; he was present at the cross, and bears testimony to the reality of the death of Jesus (18 15; 19 35). As we read the Gospel we note the stress he lays on "witness." The term frequently occurs (1 7.8.19; 3 11.26.33; 5 31; 12 17; 21 24, etc), and is used to set forth the verified facts of experience. In these testimonies we have an unusual combination of elevated thought and minute observation. At one time the evangelist soars aloft into a spiritual world, and moves with ease among the richest and highest elements of spiritual experience. Using common words, he yet reads into them the deepest meanings regarding man, the world, and God which have ever entered into the mind of man. Sublime mysticism and open-eyed practical sense meet in his wonderful writings. Above all, we are impressed with his sense of the supreme value of the historical. All his spiritual meanings have a historical basis. This is as apparent in the 1st Ep. as it is in the Gospel, and in the Gospel it is conspicuous. While his main interest is to focus the minds of his readers on Jesus, His work and His word, yet unconsciously he has written his own spiritual biography. We gradually become aware, as we read ourselves sympathetically into the spirit of the Gospel, that we are following the line of a great spiritual awakening, and are tracing the growth of faith and love in the life of the writer, until they become the overmastering tone of his whole life. On the one hand, the book is a grand objective revelation of a unique life, the story of the self-revelation of the Son of God, of the revelation of the Father in Jesus Christ, moving onward to its consummation through the contrasted developments of faith and unbelief on the part of them who received Him, and on the part of them who received Him not. On the other hand, it has a subjective unity in the heart of the writer, as it tells of how faith began, of how faith made progress, until he came to the knowledge of the Son of God. We can enter into the various crises through which he passed, through which, as they successively passed, he won the assurance which he so calmly expresses; and these supply him with the key by means of which he is able to unlock the mystery of the relations of Jesus to the world. The victory of faith which he sets forth was first won in his own soul. This also is included in the significant phrase, "We beheld his glory" (1 14).

(5) Reminiscence illustrated.—The Gospel receives powerful confirmation from reflection on the nature of reminiscence generally. A law of reminiscence is that, when we recall anything, or any occurrence, we recall it in its wholeness, with all the accessories of its accompaniments. As we tell it to others, we have to make a selection of that only which is needful to convey our meaning. Inartistic natures do not make a selection; they pour out everything that arises in the memory (cf Dame Quickly in Shakespeare). The finer qualities of reminiscence are abundantly illustrated in the Fourth Gospel, and furnish an independent proof that it is from the pen of an eyewitness. It is possible within reasonable limits to give only a few examples. Observe first the exact notes of time in ch 1 and the special notes of character in each of the 6 disciples whom Jesus met on the first 4 days of His ministry. Mark the peculiar graphic note that Nathanael was under the fig tree (ver 50). Pass on to notice the 6 water-pots of stone set at Cana after the manner of the Jews' purifying (2 6). We might refer in this connection to the geographical remarks frequently made in the course of the narrative, indicative of an intimate knowledge of Pal, and to the numerous allusions to Jewish laws, customs, beliefs, religious ceremonies, usually admitted now to be accurate, and illustrative of familiar knowledge on the part of the writer. Our main object, however, is to call attention to those incidental things which have no symbolical significance, but are set down because, as the main happening was recalled, these arose with it. He again sees the "lad" with the 5 barley loaves and 2 fishes (6 9); remembers that Mary sat still in the house, when the active Martha went forth to meet the Lord as He approached Bethany (11 20); recalls the appearance of Lazarus as he came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes (ver 44). He has a vivid picture before him as he recalls the washing of the disciples' feet (13 1-15), and the various attitudes and remarks of the disciples during the whole of that eventful night. He still sees the attitude of the soldiers who came to arrest Jesus (18 3-8), the flashing of Peter's sword (ver 10), the share of Nicodemus in the burying of Jesus, and the kinds and weights of the spices brought by him for the embalming of the body (19 38-40). He tells of the careful folding of the linen cloths, and where they were placed in the empty tomb (20 4-8). These are only some of those vivid touches due to reminiscence which none but an eyewitness could safely make. Looking back on the past, the evangelist recalls the various scenes and words of the Lord in their wholeness as they happened, and he chooses those living touches which bear the mark of reality to all readers.

(6) Conclusions.—These touches of vivid reality warrant the conclusion that the writer in this Gospel is depicting scenes in a real life, and is not drawing on his imagination. Looking back on his own spiritual history, he remembered with special vividness those words and works of Christ which determined his own life, and led him on to the full assurance of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God. The Gospel can be understood from this point of view: it does not seem to us that it can be understood from any other, without ignoring all the phenomena of the kind now indicated. When the Gospel is approached from this point of view, set forth by itself, one can afford to neglect many of the elaborate discussions which have arisen regarding the possible displacement of certain chs (Spitta, etc). Much, e.g., has been made of the sudden transference of the scene from Galilee to Judaea as we pass from ch 4 to ch 5, and the equally sudden transference back to Galilee (6 1). Many suggestions have been made, but they all proceed on the supposition that the reminiscences were meant to be continuous, which it has been seen is not the case. While it is very likely that there is a sequence in the writer's thought, yet this need not compel us to think of displacements. Taken as they are in the Gospel, the selected proofs, whether they occur in Judaea or in Galilee, in all instances indicate progress. They illustrate the manifested glory of Jesus, on the one hand, and the growth of faith and the development of unbelief on the other. This, however, opens up a separate line of objection and inquiry to which attention must now be given.

IV. Progress and Development in the Gospel.—It is an objection often urged against the view of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel that in it there is no progress, no development, no crisis, nothing, e.g., to correspond with the significance of the confession of St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16 13-17 ||). This is held to be true alike of the character of Jesus, which, under the influence of the Logos-doctrine of the prologue, exhibits no development from first to last, and of the attitude of the disciples, whose faith in Jesus as the Christ is likewise represented as complete from the beginning. In reality the opposite is the case. In the course of the Gospel, as already said, the glory of the Lord is ever more completely manifested, and the disciples attain to a deeper faith, while the unbelief of those who reject Him becomes more fixed, until it is absolute. This will appear clearly on nearer examination.

The objection from the presentation of Jesus in the Gospel takes different forms, which it is desirable to consider separately.

1. The Presentation of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel.—(1) Alleged absence of development in the character of Jesus.—It is affirmed, Jesus in the first, that there is no development in the character of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, none of those indications such as we have in the Synoptics of widening horizons, no recognition of the fact that the meaning, purpose and issue of His calling became clearer to Him as the days passed by. To this assertion there are two answers. The first is, that in a series of scenes from the activity of Jesus, selected for the definite purpose set forth in the Gospel, there is no need to demand a continuous history of His ministry. Selection is made precisely of those scenes which set forth His insight into human character and motive, His power of sympathetic healing, His command over Nature, and His supreme authority over man and the world. The other remark is, that even in the Fourth Gospel there are hints of a crisis in the ministry of Our Lord, during which He came to a clearer recognition of the fuller meaning of His mission (e.g. the visit of the Greeks, ch 12). It will be seen further, below, that it is not true in this Gospel, any more than in the Synoptics, that Jesus is represented as publicly proclaiming Himself as the Messiah from the first.

(2) Alleged "autonomy" of Jesus.—Akin to the above is the objection to the historicity of the Gospel that in it Jesus is represented as always directing His own course, maintaining an attitude of aloofness to men, refusing to be influenced by them. This, it is held, results from the dominance of the Logos-idea in the prologue. The reply is that there is really no essential difference between the attitude of Jesus in these respects in the Synoptics and in Jn. In all alike He maintains an attitude of authority. In the Synoptics He can say, "I say unto you" (Mt 5 22, 28, 32, etc). In them also He claims to be the teacher of absolute truth, the Saviour, the Ruler, the Judge, of men. In this regard there is no new claim made in the Fourth Gospel: "No one cometh unto the Father, but by me" (14 6). But He had said, "Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest" (Mt 11 28). A claim to authority over men is thus common to all the Gospels. In all of them, too, in the Fourth no less than in the others, there is on the part of Jesus loyalty, submission, subordination to the Father. In fact this is more conspicuous in the Fourth Gospel than in the Synoptics: "The Father is greater than I" (14 28). The words He speaks are the Father's words; the works He does are the Father's (5 19, 20; 7 16, 18, etc): "This commandment received I from my Father" (10 18). In all the Gospels it is one consistent, gracious Figure who appears.

(3) "Inconceivability" of Logos-presentation.—A further objection, which aims at showing that this Gospel could not be the work of "a primitive apostle," may be noticed, partly from the eminence of him who makes it, and partly from the interest of the objection itself. In his work on The Apostolic Age, Weizsäcker says, "It is a puzzle that the beloved disciple of the Gospel, he who reclined at table next to Jesus, should have come to regard and represent his whole former experience as a life with the incarnate Logos of God. It is impossible to imagine any power of faith and philosophy so great as thus to obliterate the recollection of a real life and to substitute for it this marvelous picture of a Divine being. We can understand that Paul, who had not known Jesus, who had not come into contact with the man, should have been opposed to the tradition of the eyewitnesses, the idea of the heavenly man, and that he should have substituted the Christ who was spirit for His earthly manifestation, pronouncing the latter to be positively a stage above which faith must rise. For a primitive apostle it is inconceivable. The question is decided here and finally here" (II, 211). It is easy to say, "For a primitive apostle it is inconceivable," yet we know that a primitive apostle believed that Jesus rose from the dead, that He was exalted a Prince and Saviour, that He was seated at the right hand of God, that He was Lord of all (Acts 2 22-36). If we grant that the primitive church believed these things, it cannot be fairly said that the further step taken in the Fourth Gospel is inconceivable. In truth, the objection of Weizsäcker is not taken against the Fourth Gospel; it is equally effective against Christianity in general. If Jesus be what He is said to be in the Synoptic Gospels, and if He be what the primitive church held Him to be, the leading conception of the Fourth Gospel is credible and conceivable. If Christianity is credible, the Fourth Gospel adds nothing to the difficulty of faith; rather it gives an additional ground for a rational faith.

It is proper at this point that a little more should be said on the Logos-doctrine itself, in its bearing

2. The Logos-Doctrine of the Prologue.—(The Logos-doctrine of the prologue of the Fourth Gospel (for the philosophical and historical aspects of the doctrine, see Logos). Obviously the great interest of the author of the reminiscences and reflections in the Fourth Gospel is in the personal life of the Master whom he had known so intimately. To him this real historical life was everything. On it he brooded, on it he meditated, and he strove to make the significance of it ever more real to himself first, and to others afterward. How shall he make the reality of that life apparent to all? What were the relationships of that person to God, to man, and to the world? What Jesus really was, and what were His relations to God, to man, and to the world, John endeavors to make known in the prologue. This real person whom he had known, revered, loved, was something more than was apparent to the eyes of an ordinary observer; more even than had been apparent to His disciples. How shall this be set forth? From the Gospel it is evident that the historical person is first, and the attempt to set forth the meaning of the person is second. The prologue is an attempt to find language to set forth fitly the glory of the person. The Logos-doctrine does not descend on the historic person as a garment from without; it is an endeavor to describe what John had grown to recognize as the essential meaning of the person of Jesus. It is not a speculative theory we have here, not an endeavor to think out a theory of the world or of God; it is an attempt to find suitable language for what the writer recognizes to be a great fact. We need not, therefore, seek an explanation of St. John's Logos-doctrine in the speculation of Heraclitus, in the theories of the Stoics, even in the eclecticism of Philo. The interests of these men are far removed from the atmosphere of the Fourth Gospel. They desired a theory of the universe; John sought to set forth the significance of a personal historical life. In the prologue he set forth that life, and he chose a word which he filled up with concrete meaning, a meaning which included the deepest teaching of the OT, and the highest thought of his contemporaries. The teaching of St. Paul, esp. in the epp. of the captivity, approaches very closely to that of the Fourth Gospel. Thus it is not a right method to bring the Logos-doctrine to the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, and to look at all the phenomena of the Gospel as mere illustrations of that doctrine. The right method is the reverse. The Logos-doctrine has no concreteness, no living reality, taken apart from the personal life which was manifested to the apostle. The prologue represents what John had come to see as to the meaning of the personality he had historically known. He sets it forth once for all in the prologue, and never once in the Gospel does he refer to it again. We can understand that Logos-doctrine when we look at it in the light of those manifestations recorded in the Gospel, manifestations which enabled St. John to behold His glory; we cannot understand the manifestations if we look at them merely as illustrations of an abstract philosophical theorem. In brief, the Fourth Gospel is concrete, not abstract; it is not the evolution or the demonstration of a theory, but the attempt to set forth a concrete personality, and to find fitting words to express the significance of that personality as St. John had grown to see it.

As it is with the character of Jesus, so it is with the alleged absence of development in the faith of the disciples. Careful inquiry shows of Faith and (1) Early confessions.—Here again, Develop- it is said, we see the end from the bement of ginning. In ch 1 Jesus is twice greeted Unbelief as the Messiah (vs 41.45), and twice described as the Son of God (vs 34.

3. Growth this objection also to be unfounded.

49). The Baptist at this early stage points to Him as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (ver 29). Reference is made to the case of Nicodemus (3 1 ff), to the Samaritans (4 41 f), and other incidents of the same kind, with the view of proving that at this early stage of the ministry of Our Lord such confessions are unlikely, and even impossible. It is to be noticed, however, that the confessions in these cases are represented as the outcome of special manifestations on the part of Jesus to the persons who make them. And the manifestations are such as to justify the psychological possibility of the confession. It is so in the case of Nathanael. Nor is the objection to the testimony of John the Baptist of a kind which admits of no answer. For the Baptist, according to the Synoptics, had found his own credentials in Isa 40. There he found himself and his mission, and described himself, as we find it in the Fourth Gospel, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said Isaiah the prophet" (1 23; cf Mt 3 3; Mk 1 2.3). We find also that when John "heard in the prison the works of the Christ," and "sent by his disciples and said unto him, Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" (Mt 11 2), the answer of Jesus was a reference to a passage in Isa 61. According to Jesus these were the true signs of the Messianic kingdom. Is there any reason why we should not say that, as John found his own credentials in Isa 40, he would also have found the character and signs of the Coming One in the description of the suffering servant in ch 53? If he did so, what more simple than that he should describe the Coming One as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world? In His answer to John, Jesus simply asks him to read farther on in that prophesy which had already meant so much for him.

(2) Growth of faith in the disciples.—Apart from what may be made of these early confessions, it may fairly be said that there are many signs of a growth of faith on the part of the disciples. Carrying with us the fact that each of these confessions had its ground in a particular manifestation of the glory of Christ, we go on to passages which prove how imperfect was the faith of the disciples. It is to be remembered also that John has only one word to describe all the phases of faith, from the slightest impression up to whole-hearted conviction and thorough surrender. We may refer to the careful and exhaustive treatment of the meanings of the word "believing" by E. A. Abbott in his work, Johannine Vocabulary. In the Fourth Gospel the vb. is always used, and never the noun. As the word is used, it denotes the impression made, whether that impression is slight and transient, or deep and abiding. Successive steps of acceptance are seen as the disciples advance to complete and absolute faith.

As we read the Gospel, we perceive that Jesus did test and try the faith of His disciples, and made His deeds and His words both tests of faith, and a means for its growth. As the result of the words on the bread of life, we find that many of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" (6 60), and on account of the difficulty of His words, "Many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him" (ver 66). On His appeal to those who did not go away it is found that the difficulty became really an opportunity to them for a larger faith (vs 68.69). The incidents and events of the night of the betrayal, and the conversations on that night, prove how incomplete were the faith and confidence of the disciples; how far they were from a full understanding of the Master's purpose. Nor is it until after the resurrection, and the gladness of seeing their risen Lord in the upper room, that faith obtained a complete victory, and attained to full possession of itself.

(3) Gradual disclosure of Messiahship: Growth of unbelief.—On the other side, there is as manifestly an evolution of unbelief from the passing doubt of the moment on to the complete disbelief in Jesus, and utter rejection of Him.

It is only fair here to the Gospel to observe that the confessions to which we have already referred are on the part of individuals who came into special relationship with Jesus. Such is the case with regard to Nathanael, Nicodemus, the woman of Samaria and the Samaritan people, and the writer places the reader in that close relationship so that he who reads may believe. But such close relationship to Jesus is only the lot of a few in this Gospel. It is not true, as already remarked, that in this Gospel Jesus is represented as definitely proclaiming Himself as the Messiah. There is something of the same reserve here as there is in the Synoptics. He did not assert His claim; He left it to be inferred. His brethren hint that He ought to put His claims really to the test (7 3 f). An account of the doubts and speculations regarding Him is given in ch 7. The people hesitate, and inquire, and speculate, Is He a good man, or a deceiver? (ver 12) Had He really a mission from God? (vs 14 ff)—all of which goes to prove that only certain individuals had such intimate knowledge of Him as to lead to acceptance. In ch 10 we read, "And it was the feast of the dedication at Jerus: it was winter; and Jesus was walking in the temple in Solomon's porch. The Jews therefore came round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou hold us in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly" (10 22-24). "It is very clear," as Dr. Sanday says, "that no sharply defined issue was set before the people. They are left to draw their own conclusions; and they draw them as well as they can by the help of such criteria as they have. But there is no entweder . . . oder . . .—either Messiah or not Messiah—peremptorily propounded by Jesus Himself" (The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 164). The sum of the matter as regards the development of unbelief is given by the evangelist in the words: "Though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on him" (12 37). On the other hand, the culmination of faith is seen in the word of the Lord to Thomas: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (20 29).

JOIADA, joi'a-da (יְהוֹיָדָה, yōyādhā, "Jeh knows"; cf JEHOIADA):

(1) A repairer of the Jerus walls (Neh 3 6); AV "Jehoiada."

(2) Son of Eliashib the high priest (Neh 12 10, 11 22; 13 28).

JOIAKIM, joi'a-kim (יְהוֹיָכִים, yōyākīm, "Jeh raises up"; cf JEHOIAKIM; JOKIM): Son of Jeshua and father of Eliashib, the high priest (Neh 12 10, 12 26).

JOIARIB, joi'a-rib (יְהוֹיָרִיב, yōyārīb, "Jeh pleads" or "contends"; cf JEHOIARIB):

(1) A "teacher" of Ezra's time (Ezr 8 16).

(2) A Judahite (Neh 11 5).

(3) In Neh 11 10; 12 6.19 = JEHOIARIB (q.v.).

JOIN, join: Of the NT words, kollāō, lit. "glue," "weld together," and its compounds, designate the closest form of personal union, as in Lk 15 15; 1 Cor 6 16; Eph 5 31. In the words of institution of marriage, szuzūgnūmī is used (Mt 19 6; Mk 10 9, lit. "yoke together"; cf Gen 2 24).

JOKDEAM, jok'dē-am (יְדֵאִם, yok'dh'am): An unidentified city of Judah, named with Maon, Carmel and Ziph (Josh 15 56). It probably lay to the S. of Hebron.

JOKIM, jō'kim (יְכִים, yōkīm, "Jeh raises up"; cf JEHOIAKIM; JOIAKIM): A Judahite, descendant of Shelah (1 Ch 4 22).

JOKMEAM, jok'mē-am (יְכֵמֵאִם, yokm'am): A town in Mt. Ephraim assigned to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch 6 68), named along with Gezer and Beth-horon. Its place is taken by Kibzaim in Josh 21 22 (in LXX here the name is omitted). It is mentioned again in 1 K 4 12 (AV wrongly "Jokneam"), where it seems to indicate some position to the E. of Ephraim. So far no identification is possible.

JOKNEAM, jok'nē-am (יְכֵנֵאִם, yokn'am): A royal city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua and described as "in Carmel" (Josh 12 22), in the territory of Zebulun, and allotted to the Merarite Levites (21 34). The border of Zebulun "reached to the brook that is before Jokneam" (19 11). In 1 K 4 12 the name appears in AV where, with RV, we should read "Jokmeam." Onom places it 6 Rom miles from Lejio (Lejjūn) on the way to Ptolemais (Acre). This points to Tell Kaimūn, a striking mound on the eastern slope of Mt. Carmel. To the E. of it runs the "torrent bed" of the Kishon. It stands about 300 ft. above the valley to the N. of it, and the sides are steep. It is crowned by the ruins of an 18th-cent. fortress. A little lower down are the remains of a small chapel. There are fine springs at the foot (PEFM, II, 69 f). In Jth 7 3 it appears as "Cyamon" (Κυαμών, Kuamōn). It is the "Mons Cain" of the Middle Ages. "In the Sam Book of Jgs it is noticed as the scene of a conflict between the Hebrews and the Giants; and Joshua is said to have been shut up here in magic walls of brass, till on sending a dove to the Heb king of Gilead, he was rescued" (Conder, HDB, s.v.).

JOKSHAN, jok'shan (יְכֶשָׁן, yokshān, meaning unknown): Son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25 2.3 1 Ch 1 32). Tuch suggested that yokshān = yoktān (Gen 10 25-29); see HDB, s.v.; Skinner, Gen, 350.

JOKTHEEL, jok'thē-el, jok'thēl (יְכֶתֶל, yok'th'ēl):

(1) A city in the Shephelah of Judah named between Mizpeh and Lachish (Josh 15 38); unidentified.

(2) A city in Edom formerly called Sela, taken by Amaziah after the battle in the Valley of Salt, and by him called Joktheel (2 K 14 7). See SELA.

JONAH, jō'na (יְהוֹנָה, yōnāh, "dove"; יְהוֹנָדָס, Iōnās):

(1) According to 2 K 14 25, Jonah, the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher, a prophet and servant of Jeh, predicted the restoration of the land of Israel to its ancient boundaries through the efforts of Jeroboam II. The prophet lived and labored either in the early part of the reign of Jeroboam (790-750 BC), or during the preceding generation. He may with great probability be placed at 800-780 BC. His early ministry must have made him popular in Israel; for he prophesied of victory and expansion of territory. His native village of Gath-hepher was located in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 19 13).

(2) According to the book bearing his name, Jonah the son of Amittai received a command to preach to Nineveh; but he fled in the opposite direction to escape from the task of proclaiming Jeh's message to the great heathen city; was arrested by a storm, and at his own request was hurled into the sea, where he was swallowed by a great fish, remaining alive in the belly of the fish for three days. When on his release from the body of the fish the command to go to Nineveh was renewed, J. obeyed and announced the overthrow of the wicked city. When the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of the prophet, God repented of the evil He had threatened to bring upon them. J. was grieved that the oppressing city should be spared, and waited in the vicinity to see what would be the final outcome. An intense patriot, J. wished for the destruction of the people that threatened to swallow up Israel. He thought that Jeh was too merciful to the heathen oppressors. By the lesson of the gourd he was taught the value of the heathen in the sight of Jeh.

It is the fashion now in scholarly circles to treat the Book of Jonah as fiction. The story is said to be an allegory or a parable or a symbolic narrative. Why then did the author fasten upon a true and worthy prophet of Jeh the stigma of rebellion and narrowness? On the theory that the narrative is an allegory, J. Kennedy well says that "the man who wrote it was guilty of a gratuitous insult to the memory of a prophet, and could not have been inspired by the prophet's Master thus to dishonor a faithful servant."

(3) Our Lord referred on two different occasions to the sign of Jonah the prophet (Mt 12 38-41; Lk 11 29-32; Mt 16 4). He speaks of J.'s experience in the belly of the fish as parallel with His own approaching entombment for three days, and cites the repentance of the Ninevites as a rebuke to the unbelieving men of his own generation. Our Lord thus speaks both of the physical miracle of the preservation of Jonah in the body of the fish and of the moral miracle of the repentance of the Ninevites, and without the slightest hint that He regarded the story as an allegory.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

JONAH, THE BOOK OF: This little roll of four short chapters has given rise to almost as much discussion and difference of opinion as the first four chapters of Gen. It would be presumptuous to think that one could, in a brief article, speak the final word on the questions in debate.

I. Contents of the Book.—The story is too well known to need retelling. Moreover, it would be difficult to give the events in fewer words than the author employs in his classic narrative. One event grows out of another, so that the interest of the reader never flags.

When the call came to Jonah to preach in Nineveh, he fled in the opposite direction, hoping thus to escape from his unpleasant task. He was

1. Jonah Disobedient, 1: 1-3 afraid that the merciful God would forgive the oppressing heathen city, if it should repent at his preaching. Jonah was a narrow-minded patriot, who feared that Assyria would one day swallow up his own little nation; and so he wished to do nothing that might lead to the preservation of wicked Nineveh. Jonah was willing to prophesy to Israel; he at first flatly refused to become a foreign missionary.

The vessel in which the prophet had taken passage was arrested by a great storm. The heathen sailors inferred that some god must be angry with some person on board, and cast lots to discover the culprit. When the lot fell upon Jonah, he made a complete confession, and bravely suggested that they cast him overboard. The heathen mariners rowed desperately to get back to land, but made no progress against the storm. They then prayed Jeh not to bring innocent blood upon them, and cast Jonah into the sea. As the storm promptly subsided, the heathen sailors offered a sacrifice to Jeh and made vows. In this part of the story the mariners give an example of the capacity of the Gentiles to perform noble deeds and to offer acceptable worship to Jeh.

Jeh prepared a great fish to swallow Jonah and to bear him in his body for three days and nights.

2. Jonah Punished, 1: 4-16 Surprised to find himself alive and conscious in the body of the fish, the prophet prayed to his God. Already by faith he speaks of his danger as a past experience. The God who had saved him from drowning in the depths of the sea will yet permit him once more to worship with loud thanksgiving. At the command of Jeh the fish vomits out Jonah upon the dry land. The almost inevitable grotesqueness of this part of the story is one of the strongest arguments against the view that the Book of Jon is literal history and not a work of the imagination.

Upon the renewal of the command to go to Nineveh, Jonah obeyed, and marching through the streets of the great city, he cried, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown!" His message was so brief that he may well have spoken it in good Assyrian. If the story of his deliverance from the sea preceded him, or was made known through the prophet himself, the effect of the prophetic message was thereby greatly heightened.

The men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, the entire city uniting in fasting and prayer. So great was the anxiety of the people that even the lower animals were clothed in sackcloth. The men of Nineveh turned from deeds of violence ("their evil way") to seek the forgiveness of an angry God. Jeh decided to spare the city.

Jonah breaks out into loud and bitter complaint when he learns that Nineveh is to be spared. He decides to encamp near the city to see what will become of it. He hopes it may yet be overthrown. Through a

6. A Narrow Prophet versus the Merciful God, 4: 1-11 gourd vine Jeh teaches the prophet a great lesson. If such a mean and perishable plant could come to have real value in the eyes of the sullen prophet, what estimate ought to be put on the lives of the thousands of innocent children and helpless cattle in the great city of Nineveh? These were dearer to the God of heaven than Jonah's protecting vine could possibly be to him.

II. The Aim of the Book.—The main purpose of the writer was to enlarge the sympathies of Israel and lead the chosen people to undertake the great missionary task of proclaiming the truth to the heathen world. Other lessons may be learned from the subordinate parts of the narrative, but this is the central truth of the Book of Jon. Kent well expresses the author's main message: "In his wonderful picture of God's love for all mankind, and of the Divine readiness to pardon and to save even the ignorant heathen, if they but repent according to their light, he has anticipated the teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son, and laid the foundation for some of the broadest faith and the noblest missionary activity of the present generation" (Sermons, Epistles, etc, 420).

III. Is the Book History?—Most of the early interpreters so understood it, and some excellent scholars still hold this view. If Jesus thought of the story as history and so taught, that fact alone would settle the question for the devout believer.

On two, possibly three, different occasions He referred to Jonah (Mt 12 38-41; 16 4; Lk 11 29-32). It is significant that Jesus brought the two great miracles of the Book of Jon into relation with Himself and His preaching. As Jonah was three days and three nights in the body of the fish, so should the Son of Man be three days in the heart of the earth. The men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, while the contemporaries of Jesus for the most part rejected His message. It is the fashion now among advanced critics to treat Mt 12 40 as an addition to the words of Jesus, though there is no manuscript evidence in favor of regarding the verse as an interpolation. G. A. Smith, among recent scholars, holds the view that Jesus did not mean to teach the historicity of Jonah's experience in the fish.

"Christ is using an illustration: It matters not whether that illustration be drawn from the realms of fact or of poetry" (BTP, II, 508). In a footnote Dr. Smith says: "Suppose we tell slothful people that theirs will be the fate of the man who buried his talent, is this to commit us to the belief that the personages of Christ's parables actually existed? Or take the homiletic use of Shakespeare's dramas—as Macbeth did, or as Hamlet said. Does it commit us to the historical actuality of Macbeth or Hamlet? Any preacher among us would resent being bound by such an inference. And if we resent this for ourselves, how chary we should be about seeking to bind Our Lord by it."

Notwithstanding Principal Smith's skilful presentation of his case, we still think that Our Lord regarded the miracles of the fish and the repentance of the Ninevites as actual events. Orelli puts the matter judiciously: "It is not, indeed, proved with conclusive necessity that, if the resurrection of Jesus was a physical fact, Jonah's abode in the fish's belly must also be just as historical. On this point also the saying, 'A greater than Jonah is here,' holds good. But, on the other hand, how arbitrary it is to assert, with Reuss, that Jesus regarded Jonah's history as a parable! On the contrary, Jesus saw in it a sign, a powerful evidence of the same Divine power which showed itself also in His dying in order to live again and triumph in the world. Whoever, therefore, feels the religious greatness of the book, and accepts as authoritative the attitude taken to its historical import by the Son of God Himself, will be led to accept a great act of the God who brings down to Hades and brings up again, as an actual experience of Jonah in his flight from his Lord" (The Twelve Minor Prophets, 172, 3).

Most modern critical scholars since Kleinert (1868) and Bloch (1875) have regarded the Book of Jon as a work of the imagination.

2. Modern Critical Views Some prefer to call it an allegory, others a parable, others a prose poem, others a didactic story, others a midrash, others a symbolical book. Keil, Pusey, Delitzsch, Orelli, J. Kennedy and others have contended for the historical character of the narrative. A few treat it as a legend containing a kernel of fact. Cheyne and a few other scholars assert that in the symbolic narrative are imbedded mythical elements. The trend of critical opinion, even in evangelical circles, has of late been toward the symbolical interpretation. Radical critics boldly set aside the teaching of Jesus as erroneous, while the more evangelical take refuge either in the doctrine of the Kenosis (Phil 2 5-8), or in the principle of accommodation. The last explanation might commend itself to the devout student, viz. that Jesus did not think it worth while to correct the views of his contemporaries, had Our Lord not spoken more than once of the sign of Jonah, and in such detail as to indicate His acceptance of the entire narrative with its two great miracles.

IV. Authorship and Date.—The old view that Jonah was the author is still held by some scholars, though most moderns place the book in the late exilic or post-exilic times. A few Aram. words occur in the Heb text. The question in debate is whether the language of Israel in the days of Jeroboam II had taken over words from the Aramaic. There had certainly been a century of close political and commercial contact between Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus, so that it would not be surprising to meet with Aram. words in a prophet of Samaria. Hosca, in the generation following Jonah, betrays little evidence of Aram. influence in his style and vocabulary. Of course, the personal equation is a factor that ought not to be overlooked. If the author was a Judaeon, we should probably have to think of the post-exilic period, when Aram. began to displace Heb as the vernacular of the Jews. The Book of Jon is anonymous, and we really do not know who the author was or when he lived. The view that Jonah wrote the story of his own disobedience and his debate with the merciful God has not been made wholly untenable.

V. The Unity of the Book.—Nachtigal (1799) contended that there were three different authors of widely different periods. Kleinert (1868) held that two parallel narratives had been woven together in chs 3 and 4. Kaufmann Kohler (1879) contended that there were a considerable number of glosses and interpolations besides some transpositions of material. W. Böhme, in 1887, advanced the most radical theory of the composition of the roll. He partitioned the story among two authors, and two redactors or supplementers. A few additional glosses were charged to later hands. Even radical critics treat Böhme's theory as one of the curiosities of criticism. Winckler (AOF, II, 260 ff) tried to improve the story by a few transpositions. Hans Schmidt (1905) subjects the roll of Jonah to a searching criticism, and concludes that a good many changes have been made from religious motives. Budde follows Winckler and Schmidt both in transposing and in omitting some material. Sievers (1905) and Erbt (1907) tried to make of the Book of Jon a poem; but they do not agree as to the meter. Sievers regards the roll as a unit, while Erbt contends for two main sources besides the prayer in ch 2. Beyer, in ICC (1912), is far more conservative in both textual and literary criticism, recognizing but few glosses in our present text and arguing for the unity of the story apart from the insertion of the ps in ch 2. Nearly all recent critics assign Jonah's prayer to a writer other than the author of the narrative about Jonah, but opinions vary widely as to the manner in which the psalm found its way into the Book of Jon. Beyer holds that it was probably put on the margin by a reader and afterward crept into the text, the copyist inserting it after ver 2, though it would more naturally follow ver 11. Beyer remarks: "The literary connections with various post-exilic pss argue for a post-exilic date of the ps. But how early or how late in the post-exilic period it belongs we cannot tell. The Heb is pure and no Aram. influence is apparent." It is evident, then, that the presence or absence of Aram. influence does not alone settle the question of the date of the document. Geography and the personal equation may be more important than the question of date. Beyer recognizes the fact that the ps in Jon is not a mere cento of quotations from the Pss. "The phrases it has in common with other pss," writes Professor Beyer, "were the common property of the religious language of the author's day" (p. 24). Those who still believe that David wrote many of the pss find no difficulty in believing that a prophet of 780 BC could have drawn upon his knowledge of the Psalter in a prayer of thanksgiving to Jeh.

JONAS, jō'nas (יוֹנָתָן, yōnāh, or יוֹנָתָן, yōhānān; יוֹנָה, Iōnā):

(1) The name given in Mt 12 39-41; 16 4; Lk 11 29-32 AV to the OT prophet Jonah (RV renders "Jonah"). See JONAH.

(2) (Ἰωάνης, Iōnēs): The name given in Jn 21 15.16 AV to the father of the apostle Simon Peter. Nothing further is known of him, except the different forms of his name. In Jn 1 42 AV he is called Jona (cf also Mt 16 17 AV). In Jn 1 42; 21 15.16 RV he is called John, with the marginal note "Gr Joanes." In Mt 16 17 RV Simon Peter is called Simon Bar-Jonah.

Jonas may be a contraction for Joanes (Keim). It has also been suggested that the father of Simon may have had a double name, Jona-Johannes (cf F. H. Chase in HDB, art. "John, father of Simon Peter"). C. M. KERR

JONATH ELEM REHOKIM, jō'nath ē'lem rē-hō'kim (יוֹנָתָן אֵלֶם רְהוֹקִים, yōnath 'elem rēhōkīm) (Ps 56, title): "The silent dove of the far ones" (i.e. either of far-off lands, or among aliens), or "The dove of the distant terebinths," in either case indicating the tune to the melody of which the ps was to be sung. See PSALMS; SONG.

JONATHAN, jon'a-than (יְהוֹנָתָן, y'hōnāthān, יוֹנָתָן, yōnāthān, "Jeh has given"; יוֹנָתָן, Iōnāthān; cf JEONATHAN):

(1) (Heb y'hōnāthān): The young "Levite" of Jgs 17, 18 referred to by name in 18 30, where he is called "the son of Gershom, the son of Moses," and where AV has "Manasseh" for Moses, following the MT in which the letter nūn of Manasseh is "suspended."

Rashi states the reason thus: "Because of the honor of Moses was the nūn written so as to alter the name." The original word was Moses, but it was thought undesirable that a descendant of his should have anything to do with images; and so J. was made to have affinity (metaphorically) with Manasseh. See GB, Intro, 335-38.

J. was a Levitical Judahite of Beth-lehem-judah, who came to the house of Micah, in the hill country of Ephraim, and hired himself as a priest in Micah's sanctuary (17 1-13). The Danites sent 5 men north to spy for new territory, and on their way the spies came to the house of Micah, where they found J. and consulted the oracle through him (18 1-5). Having received a favorable answer, they set out and came to Laish, and on their return south they advised that an expedition be sent thither (18 6-10). Their clansmen accordingly sent out a band of warriors who on their way passed by Micah's house. The spies informed their comrades of the ephod and teraphim and images there, and they seized them, inducing J. at the same time to accompany them as their priest (vs 11-20). At Laish he founded a priesthood which was thus descended from Moses (ver 30).

It has been held that there are two sources in the narrative in Jgs 17, 18 (see Moore, Jgs, 365-72). The section is important because of the light it throws on life and religion in early Israel. The "Levites" were not all of one tribe (see Moore, op. cit., 383-84); there were priests who claimed descent from Moses as well as Aaronite priests; and images were common in early Heb worship (cf Gen 31 30 ff; Jgs 8 27; 1 S 19 13).

(3) (Heb y'hōnāthān, yōnāthān, 2 S 15 27.36; 17 17.20; 1 K 1 42.43): Son of Abiathar the priest. He acted with Ahimaaz as courier to inform David of events at Jerus during Absalom's revolt. It was he who also brought to Adonijah the news of Solomon's accession.

(4) (Heb y'hōnāthān, 2 S 21 21 || 1 Ch 20 7): Son of Shimei or Shimea, David's brother; he is said to be the slayer of Goliath. See JEONADAB (1).

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן, y'hōnāthān; also יוֹנָתָן, yōnāthān, "Jeh has given"; יוֹנָתָן, Iōnāthān):

The eldest son of Saul, the first king of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin. The life of J., as far as we are told about him, falls naturally into 3 periods.

(1) First period.—He comes on the scene as the right hand and lieutenant of his father in his early struggles to beat off the hostile tribes, esp. the Ammonites (1 S 11), who beset the territory of Israel on all sides. As soon as Saul had gained his first decisive victory, the people rallied to him in great numbers, so that he was able to count upon 3,000 men whenever they took the field. These were divided into two small armies, Saul retaining 2,000 and making Michmash his headquarters, the rest being stationed at Gibeah under J., some 5 miles distant as the crow flies. J. thus commanded the base, while his father led the fighting force. This position of comparative inactivity does not appear to have been much to the taste of J. Midway between the two camps was a Phili outpost at Geba, facing Michmash across the pass of that name, a valley with steep sides, now the Wādī Suweinī. Saul does not seem to have felt himself strong enough to commence hostilities against the Philis, and took means to increase the forces at his disposal. The Philis no sooner heard that the Israelites had cast off their yoke (1 S 13 3b: for "Let the Hebrews hear," read "The Hebrews have revolted," after LXX), than they came out in great numbers (13 5). They seem to have compelled Saul to evacuate Michmash, which they occupied, Saul falling back on Gibeah (13 16) and Gilgal with a greatly reduced following (13 3.4a seems to be a summary anticipation, in Heb style, of the events detailed in ch 14). In spite of this, J., accompanied only by his armor-bearer, surprised the Philistines at Geba (14 5, "Gibeah" should be "Geba"), which was killed to a man. This feat precipitated a general engagement, in which the Israelites, whose only weapons appear to have been their farming implements (13 20), Saul and J. alone being armed with iron swords and spears, routed their enemies. The completeness of the victory was impaired by the superstitious action of Saul in refusing to allow the people to eat until the day was over (14 24). As this order was unwittingly broken by J., Saul wished to have him executed; but this the people refused to allow, as they clearly recognized that the credit of the victory was due to the energetic action of J. in striking before the enemy had time to concentrate. (In the Heb text there is some confusion between Gibeah and Geba; cf 10 5 m and 13 3.)

(2) Second period.—The 2d period of the life of J. is that of his friendship for David. The narrative is too well known to need recapitulating, and the simple tale would only be spoiled by telling it in other words. J.'s devotion to David was such that he not only took his part against his father, Saul (chs 18, 19), but was willing to surrender to him his undoubted claim to become Saul's successor (ch 20). Their last meeting took place in the "desert" of Ziph, to the S. of Hebron, some time after David had been driven into outlawry (23 16-18).

(3) Third period.—The 3d phase of J.'s life is that of the exile of David, when Saul was directing his energies to combat what he no doubt considered the rebellion of the son of Jesse. During this civil war, if that can be called war in which one of the two sides refuses to take the offensive against the other, J. remained entirely passive. He could not take part in proceedings which were directed against his friend whom he believed to be destined to occupy the place which he himself should in the ordinary course of events have filled. We therefore hear no more of J. until the encroachments of the Philistines once more compelled Saul to leave the pursuit of the lesser enemy in order to defend himself against the greater. Saul's last campaign against the Philistines was short and decisive: it ended in the defeat of Gilboa and the death of himself and his sons. The men of Jabesh-gilead, out of gratitude for Saul's rescue of their town at the beginning of his reign, crossed over to Beth-shan, on the walls of which town the Philistines had hung in chains the bodies of Saul and Jonathan, and took them down under cover of darkness and carried them to Jabesh. There they burned the bodies after the manner of the primitive inhabitants of the land, and buried the bones.

If we may judge from the little which has been handed down to us concerning him, J. must have been one of the finest spirits that ever

2. His Character lived. His character is, as far as our knowledge goes, nearly perfect. He was athletic and brave (1 S 14 13; 2 S 1 22.23). He could keep his plans secret when secrecy was necessary in order to carry them to a successful issue (14 1), and could decide on what course of action to follow and act upon it on the instant. His attack upon the Philistines at Geba (or Gibeah, if

3. Military Qualities we adopt the reading of the LXX and Tg of 13 3; cf 10 5) was delivered at the right moment, and was as wise as it was daring. If he had a fault, from a military point of view, it may have been an inability to follow up an advantage. The pursuit of the Philistines on the occasion referred to ended with nightfall. In this respect, however, he perhaps cannot be censured with justice, as he never had an entirely free hand.

J.'s independence and capacity for acting on his own responsibility were combined with devotion to his father. While holding his own opinion and taking his own course, he conformed as far as possible to his father's views and wishes. While convinced of the high deserts of David, he sought by all means to mitigate Saul's hatred toward him, and up to a certain point he succeeded (19 6). Filial duty could not have been more severely tested than was that of J., but his conduct toward both his father and his friend is above criticism. Only on one occasion did his anger get the better of him (20 34) under gross provocation, Saul having impugned the honor of J.'s mother (20 30 LXX). Ahinoam (14 50), and attempted his life. The estrangement was momentary; Saul and Jonathan were undivided in life and in death (2 S 1 23 to be so read).

But it is as the befriender of David that J. will always be remembered. He is the type of the very perfect friend, as well as of the chivalrous knight, for all time. His devotion to David was altogether human; had it been dictated by a superstitious belief in David's destiny as the future ruler of his people (23 17), that belief would have been shared by Saul, which was not the case (20 31). In disinterestedness and willingness to efface his own claims and give up his own titles the conduct of J. is unsurpassed, and presents a pleasing contrast to some of the characters with whom we meet in the Bible. In this respect he resembles 'Alī, the cousin and son-in-law of Muhammad, who was the bravest of the brave, save when fighting in his own cause, and who had no ambition to fill the highest posts. So J. preferred to serve rather than to command (1 S 23 17). J. and David stand for the highest ideal of Heb friendship, as do Damon and Pythias in Gr lit.

We may be sure that J. won the affection of the people. His squire was ready to follow him anywhere (14 7). David's devotion to

6. Inspired Affection him seems to have been sincere, although it unfortunately coincided with his own self-interest. J. appears to have inspired as great an affection as he himself felt (1 S 20 41; 2 S 1 26). His quarrel with his father was largely due to the solicitude of the latter for his son's interests (1 S 18 29; 20 31).

Jonathan's sons were, in common with his brother's, killed in the wars. One alone—Meribbaal (Mephibosheth)—survived. J.'s

7. His Descendants posterity through him lasted several generations. A table of them is given in 1 Ch 8 33 ff || 9 40 ff (cf 2 S 9 12).

They were famous soldiers and were, like their ancestors, distinguished in the use of the bow (1 Ch 8 40).

JONATHAN, jon'a-thas (Swete reads 'Iathán, in B; Nabán, in N): The Lat form of the common name "Jonathan" (Tob 5 13). See JATHAN. It is sometimes represented as Nathan.

JOPPA, jop'a (יֹפְתָא, γῆψο, יֹפְתָא, Ἰόππη, Ἰόππε): In Josh 19 46 AV called "Japho," a city in the territory allotted to Dan; but

1. Ancient Notices there is nothing to show that in pre-exilic times it ever passed into Israelitic hands. "The gate of Joppa" is mentioned in the Am Tab (214, 32 f; cf 178, 20), as guarded by an Egypt officer for Amenhotep IV. It was conquered by Thothmes III, and old Egypt records speak of the excellence of its gardens and fruit trees. Sennacherib claims to have taken J. after a siege (KB, 2, 93). To J., the Chronicler tells us, the cedars of Lebanon were brought in floats for transportation to Jerus by the workmen of the king of Tyre (2 Ch 2 16). The

2. Biblical city does not appear in the history as References Philistine, so we may, perhaps, infer that it was held by the Phoenicians, the great seamen of those days. It was doubtless a Phoen ship that Jonah found here, bound for Tarshish, when he fled from the presence of the Lord (Jon 1 3). In Ezra's time, again, cedars were brought here for the buildings in Jerus (Ezr 3 7). Having been brought by messengers from Lydda to J., Peter here raised the dead Dorcas to life (Acts 9 36 f). On the roof of Simon's house by the sea, the famous vision was vouchsafed to this apostle, from which he learned that the gospel was designed for Jew and Gentile alike (Acts 10 1 ff; 11 5 ff).

The men of J., having treacherously drowned some 200 Jews, Judas Maccabaeus fell upon the

3. History town "and set the haven on fire by night, and burned the boats, and put from Mac- cabean cabs to the sword those that had fled thither" (2 Macc 12 3 ff). Jonathan

Times took the city, in which Apollonius had placed a garrison (1 Macc 11 47 ff). It was not easy to hold, and some years later it was captured again by Simon, who garrisoned the place, completed the harbor and raised the fortifications (1 Macc 12 36 f; 13 11; 14 5-34). It is recorded as part of Simon's glory that he took it "for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea," the Jews thus possessing for the first time a seaport through which commerce might be fully developed. It was taken by Pompey and joined to the province of Syria (Ant, XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 7). Caesar restored it to the Jews under Hyrcanus (Ant, XIV, x, 6). It was among the cities given by Antony to Cleopatra (XV, iv, 1). Caesar added it to the kingdom of Herod (vii, 3; BJ, I, xx, 3), and at his death it passed to Archelaus (Ant, XVII, xi, 4; BJ, II, vi, 3). At his deposition it was attached to the Roman province. The inhabitants were now zealous Jews, and in the Rom wars it suffered heavily. After a massacre by Cestius Gallus, in which 8,400 of the people perished, it was left desolate. Thus it became a resort of the enemies of Rome, who turned pirates, and preyed upon the shipping in the neighboring waters. The place was promptly captured and destroyed by Vespasian. The people took to their boats, but a terrific storm burst upon them, dashing their frail craft to pieces on the rocks, so that vast numbers perished (BJ, III, ix, 2-4). At a later time it was the seat of a bishopric. During the Crusades it had a checkered history, being taken, now by the Christians, now by the Moslems. It was captured by the French under Kleber in 1799. It was fortified by the English, and afterward extended by the Turks (Baedeker, Pal, 130).

The modern Yāfa is built on a rocky mound 116 ft. high, at the edge of the sea. A reef of rocks runs parallel to the shore a short distance out. It may be rounded in calm weather by lighter vessels, and it affords a certain amount of protection. There is a gap in the reef through which the boats pass that meet the steamers calling here. In time of storm the passage is dangerous. On one of these rocks Perseus is said to have rescued the chained Andromeda from the dragon. Yāfa is a prosperous town, profiting much by the annual streams of pilgrims who pass through it on their way to visit the holy places in Pal. A good trade is done with Egypt, Syria and Constantinople. Soap, sesame, wheat and oranges are the chief exports. The famous gardens and orange groves of Jaffa form one of the main sights of interest. The Christians and the Moslems have rival traditions as to the site of the house of Simon the tanner. The remains of the house of Tabitha are also pointed out. From Jaffa to Jerus the first railway in Pal was built.

JORAH, jō'ra (יֹרָה), yōrah, meaning uncertain, perhaps "harvest-horn"): A family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 18) = "[J]ariph" of Neh 7 24 = "Arsiphurith" (AV "Arzephurith") of 1 Esd 5 16.

JORAI, jō'rā-i (יֹרָי), yōray, "whom Jeh teaches"): A Gadite chief, but possibly the name of a clan (1 Ch 5 13).

JORAM, jō'ram (יֹרָם), yōrām, "Jeh is exalted"; cf JEHORAM):

(1) Son of Toi (or Tou, according to LXX, B, and 1 Ch 18 9.10), sent by his father to greet David (2 S 8.10) = "Hadoram" (1 Ch 18 9.10) a form preferred by commentators in 2 S also.

(2) Same as Jehoram, king of Judah (2 K 8 21-24; 11 2; 1 Ch 3 11; Mt 1 8 [Iōpām, Iōrām]).

(3) Same as Jehoram, king of Northern Israel (2 K 8 29; cf 2 K 9 15 RVm).

(4) (In form יֹרָם, yōrām): A Levite (1 Ch 26 25).

(5) (Iōpām, Iōrām, 1 Esd 1 9) = "Jozabad" (2 Ch 35 9); see JOZABAD (4).

JORDAN, jōr'dan (יַרְדֵּן), yārdēn, "flowing downward"; Iōpḏānēs, Iordānēs): The Jordan river proper begins at the junction of four

1. Source streams (the Barēighil, the Hāsbāny, the Leddān, and the Bānias), in the upper part of the plain of Lake Hāleh. The Barēighil receives its supply of water from the hills on the W., which separate the valley from the river Lūtāny, and is the least important of the four. The Hāsbāny is the longest of the four (40 miles), issuing from a great fountain at the western foot of Mt. Hermon near Hasbeiya, 1,700 ft. above the sea, and descends 1,500 ft. in its course to the plain. The Leddan is the largest of the four streams, issuing in several fountains at the foot of the mound Tell el-kâdy (Dan, or Laish) at an elevation of 505 ft. above the sea. The Bânias issues from a celebrated fountain near the town of Bânias, which is identified as the Cacsarea Philippi associated with the transfiguration. The ancient name was Paneas, originating from a grotto consecrated to the god Pan. At this place Herod erected a temple of white marble dedicated to Augustus Caesar. This is probably the Baal-gad of Josh 11 17 and 12 7. Its altitude is 1,100 ft. above tide, and the stream falls about 600 ft. in the 5 miles of its course to the head of the Jordan.

The valley of Lake Hûleh, through which the Jordan wends its way, is about 20 miles long and

2. Lake Hûleh 5 miles wide, bordered on either side by hills and mountains attaining elevations of 3,000 ft. After flowing 4 or 5 miles through a fertile plain, the Jordan enters a morass of marshy land which nearly fills the valley, with the exception of 1 or 2 miles between it and the base of the mountains upon the western side. This morass is almost impenetrable by reason of bushes and papyrus reeds, which in places also render navigation of the channel difficult even with a canoe. Lake Hûleh, into which the river here expands, is but 7 ft. above tide, and is slowly contracting its size by reason of the accumulation of the decaying vegetation of the surrounding morass, and of the sediment brought in by the river and three tributary mountain torrents. Its continued existence is evidence of the limited period through which present conditions have been maintained. It will not be many thousand years before it will be entirely filled and the morass be changed into a fertile plain. When the spies visited the region, the lake must have been much larger than it is now.

At the southern end of Lake Hûleh, the valley narrows up to a width of a few hundred yards, and the river begins its descent into levels below the Mediterranean. The river is here only about 60 ft. broad, and in less than 9 miles descends 689 ft. through a narrow rocky gorge, where it meets the delta which it has deposited at the head of the Sea of Galilee, and slowly winds its way to meet its waters. Throughout this delta the river is easily forlorn during a great part of the year.

The Sea of Galilee occupies an expansion of the Jordan valley 12 miles long and from 3 to 6 miles wide. The hills, reaching, in general,

3. Sea of Galilee 1,200 or 1,500 ft. above the lake, come down close to its margin on every side. On the E. and S. they are mainly of volcanic origin, and to some extent of the same character on the N.W. side above Tiberias. In the time of Christ the mouth of the river may have been a half-mile or more farther up the delta than now.

As all the sediment of the upper Jordan settles in the vicinity of the delta near Capernaum, a stream of pellucid water issues from

4. The Yarmûk the southern end of the lake, at the modern town of Kerak. Before it reaches the Dead Sea, however, it becomes overloaded with sediment. From Kerak the opening of the valley is grand in the extreme. A great plain on the E. stretches to the hills of Decapolis, and to the S., as far as the eye can reach, through the Ghôr which descends to the Dead Sea, bordered by mountain walls on either side. Four or five miles below, it is joined on the E. by the Yarmûk, the ancient Hieromax, the largest of all its tributaries. The débris brought down by this stream has formed a fertile delta terrace 3 or 4 miles in diameter, which now, as in ancient times, is an attractive place for herdsmen and agriculturists. The valley of the Yarmûk now furnishes a natural grade for the Acre and Damascus Railroad, as it did for the caravan routes of early times. The town of Gadara lies upon an elevation just S. of the Yarmûk and 4 or 5 miles E. of the Jordan.

Jordan Leaving the Sea of Galilee.

Ten miles below the lake, the river is joined on the W. by Wâdy el-Bireh, which descends from the vicinity of Nazareth, between Mt. Tabor and Endor, and furnishes a natural entrance from the Jordan to Central Galilee. An aqueduct here still furnishes water for the upper terrace of the Ghôr. Wâdy el-Arab, with a small perennial stream, comes in here also from the E.

Twenty miles below Lake Galilee the river is joined by the important Wâdy el-Jâlâd, which descends through the valley of Jezreel

5. El-Ghôr between Mt. Gilboa and the range of the Little Hermon (the hill Moreh of Jgs 7 1). This valley leads up from the Jordan to the valley of Esdraelon and thence to Nazareth, and furnished the usual route for Jews going from Jerus to Nazareth when they wished to avoid the Samaritans. This route naturally takes one past Beisân (Bethshean), where the bodies of Saul and Jonathan were exposed by the Philis, and past Shunem and Nain. There is a marked expansion of the Ghôr opposite Beisân, constituting an important agricultural district. The town of Pella, to which the Christians fled at the time of the destruction of Jerus, lies upon the E. side of the Ghôr; while Jabesh-gilead, where the bodies of Saul and Jonathan were finally taken by their friends and cremated, is a little farther up the slope of Gilead. Twenty miles farther down, the Ghôr, on the E., is joined by Wâdy Zerka (the brook Jabbok), the second largest tributary, separating Ammon from Gilead, its upper tributaries flowing past Ammon, Mizpeh, and Ramoth-gilead. It was down this valley that Jacob descended to Succoth.

A few miles below, the Wâdy Farah, whose head is at Sychar between Mts. Ebal and Gerizim, descends from the W., furnishing the natural route for Jacob's entrance to the promised land.

At Dameh (probably the Adam of Josh 3 16), the Ghôr is narrowed up by the projection, from the W., of the mountain ridge terminating in Kurn Sûrtûbeh, which rises abruptly to a height of 2,000 ft. above the river.

The section of the Ghôr between Damich and the Dead Sea is of a pretty uniform width of 10 to 12 miles and is of a much more uniform level than the upper portions, but its fertility is interfered with by the lack of water and the difficulty of irrigation. From the vicinity of Jericho, an old Rom road follows up the Wâdy Nâwaimah, which furnished Joshua a natural line of approach to Ai, while through the Wâdy el-Kelt is opened the natural road to Jerus. Both Ai and the Mount of Olives are visible from this point of the Ghôr.

In a direct line it is only 70 miles from Lake Galilee to the Dead Sea, and this is the total length of the lower plain (the Zôr); but so numer-

6. The *Zôr ous are the windings of the river across the flood plain from one bluff to the other that the length of the river is fully 200 miles. Col. Lynch reported the occurrence of 27 rapids, which wholly interrupted navigation, and many others which rendered it difficult. The major part of the descent below Lake Galilee takes place before reaching Damieh, 1,140 ft. below the Mediterranean. While the bluffs of the Ghôr, upon either side of the Zôr, are nearly continuous and uniform below Damieh, above this point they are much dissected

Notwithstanding the great number of fords where it is possible to cross at low water, those which were so related to the lines of travel as to be of much avail were few. Beginning near the mouth of the J. and proceeding northward, there was a ford at el-Henu leading directly from Jericho to the highlands N.E. of the Dead Sea. Two or three miles farther to the N. is the ford of the pilgrims, best known of all, at the mouth of Wâdy Kelt. A few miles farther up the river on the road leading from Jericho to es-Salt, near the mouth of the Wâdy Nimrin, there is now a bridge where the dependence was formerly upon the ford. Just below the mouth of the Wâdy Zerka (Jabbok) is the ford of Damieh, by the erosion of tributary streams. Still, nearly everywhere, an extended view brings to light the original uniform level of the sedimentary deposits formed when the valley was filled with water to a height of 650 ft. (see ARABAH; DEAD SEA).

The river itself averages about 100 ft. in width when confined strictly within its channel, but in the early spring months the flood plain of the Zôr is completely overflowed, bringing into its thickets a great amount of driftwood which increases the difficulty of penetrating it, and temporarily drives out ferocious animals to infest the neighboring country.

According to Conder, there are no less than 60 fording-places between Lake Galilee and the Dead Sea. For the most part it will be seen that these occur at rapids, or over bars where the road from Shechem comes down to the river. A bridge was at one time built over the river at this point; but owing to a change in the course of the stream this is now over a dry water-course. The next important crossing-place is at the opening of the valley of Jezreel coming in from the W., where probably the Bethabara of the NT should be located. Upon this ford a number of caravan routes from E. to W. converge. The next important crossing-place is at el-Mujamia, 2 or 3 miles below the mouth of the Yarmûk. Here, also, there was a Rom bridge. There are also some traces of an ancient bridge remaining just below the exit of the river from Lake Galilee, where there was a ford of special importance to the people residing on the shores of this lake who could not afford to cross in boats. Between Lake Galilee and Lake Hûleh, an easy ford leads across the delta of the stream a little above its junction with the lake; while 2 or 3 miles below Lake Hûleh is found "the bridge of Jacob's daughters" on the line of one of the principal routes between Damascus and Galilee. Above Lake Hûleh the various tributaries are easily crossed at several places, though a bridge is required to cross the Bareighil near its mouth, and another on the Hâbdâny on the main road from Caesarea Philippi to Sidon, at el-Ghagar.

7. The Fords of Jordan deposited by the streams which descend from one side or the other, as, for example, below the mouths of the Yarmûk, Jabbok, Jâlûd and Kelt. These fords are, however, impassable during the high water of the winter and spring months. Until the occupation by the Romans, no bridges were built; but they and their successors erected them at various places, notably below the mouth of the Yarmûk, and the Jabbok, and nearly opposite Jericho.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

JORDAN VALLEY: As more fully detailed elsewhere (see ARABAH; DEAD SEA; GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE), the Jordan valley in its 1. Physical lower portion occupies a remarkable Peculiarities depression in the earth's surface, reaching its greatest depth in the Dead Sea, the surface of which is 1,300 ft., the bottom 2,600 ft. below tide level, the portion of the basin below the level of the sea being about 100 miles in length and from 10 to 15 miles in breadth at base, and from two to three times that distance between the bordering summits of the mountains and plateaus on either side. In the early prehistoric period, corresponding with the Glacial epoch, this depression was filled with water to a height of 1,400 ft. (see references above) which gradually disappeared by evaporation as present climatic conditions came on. At an elevation of approximately 650 ft. above the Dead Sea, very extensive sedimentary deposits were made, which, while appearing only in fragments along the shores of the Dead Sea, are continuous over the bottom of the valley (the so-called Ghôr), farther N. These deposits are from 100 to 200 ft. thick, consisting of material which was brought down into the valley by the tributary mountain streams descending from each side, while the water stood at this higher level. Naturally these deposits slope gradually from the sides of the valley toward the center, the coarser material of the deposits being nearer the sides, and the amount of sediment being much increased opposite the mouths of the larger streams. The deposit was at first continuous over the entire Ghôr, or valley, but has since been much dissected by the J. river and its tributaries. The J. itself has eroded a channel through the soft sediment, 100 ft. more or less deep, from Lake Galilee to the Dead Sea, a distance in a straight line of about 70 miles. At first this channel was narrow, but it has been constantly enlarged by the stream as it has meandered from side to side, undercutting the banks so that they came into the river and are washed down to fill up the Dead Sea, a process which is esp. familiar to residents upon the banks of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. This narrow gorge is called the Zôr, and will hereafter be referred to under this name. The Zôr at present averages about  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile wide, the most of which is occupied by a flood plain extending from the banks of the river to the foot of the sedimentary bluffs on either side. This flood plain is so overgrown with brush and reeds that it is practically impenetrable, except by wild beasts, which, according to Scriptural references, have infested it from earliest times, among which may be mentioned the lion, the tiger, the wild boar. During the spring months, when the snows are melting from Mt. Hermon and cloud-bursts are sending sudden torrents of water down the river courses from the plateau of Gilead and the mountains of Samaria, the J. "overflows all its banks," i.e. covers this flood plain and drives out the beasts to infest the neighborhood for a short time.

The surface of this old lake bed has also been much dissected by the tributary streams which come in from either side, they having cut channels across the Ghôr down to a depth corresponding to that of the Zôr. As a consequence the roads leading up the valley find it necessary to hug the base of the mountains on either side to avoid the abrupt descent into the channels of the tributary streams, which are deepest near their mouths. Another natural consequence of these physical peculiarities is that agriculture cannot be carried on except as water to irrigate the level surfaces of the Ghôr is carried out from the higher levels of the perennial streams. There are many remains of such aqueducts for irrigation constructed in early times. These are now almost all in ruins and unused. Merrill, however, estimates that 200 sq. miles of the J. valley, over which the surface is as level as a prairie, and as free from stones, could be irrigated at the present time and made as fruitful as the valley of the Nile. But from time immemorial settled agriculture in the Ghôr has been rendered precarious by the incursions of the nomadic tribes, who periodically come down from the desert regions on the E.

Two descriptions (the first from my own journal) of the general views obtained of the J. valley from adjoining elevated points will give 2. Two De- viduality to our conceptions of this scriptions remarkable depression.

"It was the middle of December when, after wading all day across the southern flanks of Mt. Hermon, through snow knee-deep for our horses, we descended below the clouds and the snow to the brink of the eastern mountain wall overlooking the upper valley of the J. It was a sight ever to be remembered, with the glistening peak of Mt. Hermon to our right, and the jagged walls of the borders of Naphtali stretching across the horizon on the W., only a few miles away, while between and at our feet were the green fields of the upper J. valley, through which ran the silver thread of the river, broadening out into the expanded waters of Lake Merom. Over the plain could dimly be seen the black tents of the Arabs, and the husbandmen plowing the fields for an early harvest. No wonder the spies were impressed with the attractiveness and fertility of the region." This of the upper J. valley.

Dr. Merrill gives the following description of the view of the lower J. valley from the summit of Kurn Sârtâbeh, March 23: "Jebel esh Sheikh (Mt. Hermon) was covered with snow, and so was the Lebanon range farther to the W. and N. Lake Merom and the volcanic peaks on the plain to the E. of it and S. of Hermon were distinctly seen, likewise the Sea of Galilee, the hills about Safed, the hills W. of Tiberias and the slope from their summit, which inclines toward Mt. Tabor; also Gamala and Gadara, all the range of Jebel Aylûn or hills of Gilead, Kulâ er Rubad, Jebel Meisera and Jebel Osha, the mountains of Moab, and the Dead Sea. But the mere naming of different points that can be seen gives no adequate idea of the extent and magnificence of the prospect which one enjoys from the top of this strange landmark. Hills to the W. obstruct the view in that direction, and to the E. nothing can be seen beyond the highest part of the Moab and Gilead ranges, but it is the north-and-south sweep which makes the prospect a glorious one. No language can picture correctly the J. valley, the winding stream, the jungles on its banks, the strange Ghôr with its white, ragged sides, the vast plain of the valley, through and in the middle of which the lower Ghôr (the Zôr) is sunk, the dense green oases formed here and there by some mountain stream, and the still, lifeless sea, as bright and motionless as molten lead, lying far to the S., ending the great valley and touching the mountains on either side! This is an outline merely, but I cannot summon to my aid words which will describe it more accurately. The J. valley or Ghôr, in front of Sârtâbeh, is about 8 miles wide, and looks like a vast plain. The lower Ghôr [Zôr] is the ragged channel cut down along the middle of the large one. This distinction of the upper and lower Ghôr is by no means so strikingly defined above the mouth of the Zerka as it is below that point, and all the way thence to the Dead Sea."

Considered in detail the valley may be divided, as Conder suggests, into 8 sections. "First the portion between Banias and the Haleh, where it is some 5 miles broad, with steep cliffs some 2,000 ft. high on either side and a broad marsh between. Secondly, from the Haleh to the Sea of Galilee, where the stream runs close to the eastern hills, and about 4 miles from the base of those on the W., which rise toward the high Safed

3. Division into Eight Sections mountains, more than 3,500 ft. above the lake. Thirdly, for 13 miles from the S. end of the Sea of Galilee to the neighborhood of Beisân. Here the valley is only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles broad W. of the river, and about 3 on the E., the steep cliffs of the plateau of Kaukab el Hawa on the W. reaching an altitude of 1,800 ft. above the stream.

"South of Beisân is the 4th district, with a plain W. of J., 12 miles long and 6 miles broad, the line of hills on the E. being straight, and the foot of the mountains on this side about 2 miles from the river. In the neighborhood of Beisân, the cross-section of the plain shows 3 levels: that of the shelf on which Beisân stands, about 300 ft. below sea-level; that of the Ghôr itself, some 400 ft. lower, reached by an almost precipitous descent; and that of the Zôr, or narrow trench, from a half to a quarter of a mile wide, and about 150 ft. lower still. The higher shelf extends westward to the foot of Gilboa; it dies away on the S., but on the N. it gradually rises into the plateau of Kaukab and to the western table-land above the sea of Galilee, 1,800 ft. above J.

"After leaving the Beisân plain, the river passes through a narrow valley 12 miles long and 2 or 3 miles wide, with a raised table-land to the W., having a level averaging about 500 ft. above the sea. The Beisân plain is full of springs of fresh water, some of which are thermal, but a large current of salt warm water flows down Wady Mâleh, at the northern extremity of this 5th district.

"In the 6th district, the Dâmieh region, the valley again opens to a width of about 3 miles on the W., and 5 on the E. of J. The great block of the Kurn Sârtûbeh here stands out like a bastion, on the W., 2,400 ft. above the river. Passing this mountain, the 7th district is entered—a broad valley extending from near Fusâil to Oshel Ghûrâb, N. of Jericho. In this region the Ghôr itself is 5 miles broad, W. of the river, and rather more on the E. The lower trench or Zôr is also wider here and more distinctly separated from the Ghôr. A curious geographical feature of this region was also discovered by the Survey party. The great affluents of the Fâr'ah and 'Aujeh do not flow straight to J., but turn S. about a mile W. of it, and each runs, for about 6 miles, nearly parallel with the river; thus the mouth of the Fâr'ah is actually to be found just where that of the next valley is shown on most maps.

"The 8th and last district is that of the plain of Jericho, which, with the corresponding basin (Ghôr-es-Seisebân) E. of J., measures over 8 miles N. and S., and more than 14 across, with J. about in the middle. The Zôr is here about a mile wide, and some 200 ft. below the broad plain of the Ghôr."

Owing to its depression below sea-level the climate of the lower J. valley is even more than tropical.

In the summer months the thermometer there scarcely falls below 100° F., even in the night; but during the winter months, though the days are hot, the thermometer frequently goes down to 40° in the night time.

The fauna of this part of the J. valley and about the Dead Sea is said by Tristram (SWP, "Fauna and Flora") to be identical with that now existing in Ethiopia. Of the mammalia characteristic of this general region, 34 are Ethiopian and 16 Indian, though there is now no possible connection with either Ethiopia or India. The fish of the J. show close affinity to many species of the Nile and of the lakes and rivers of tropical Africa. Many species of birds, also, now confined to the lower basin and the Dead Sea, are related to Ethiopian and Indian species.

The flora is equally interesting. Out of 162 species of plants found at the S.W. corner of the Dead Sea, 135 species are African in their affinity. In the marshes of Lake Hâleh, many acres are covered with the papyrus plant, which became extinct in Egypt long ago, and is now found in Africa only in the Upper Nile beyond the 7th degree of N. lat. The most common trees and plants of the J. valley are the castor-oil plant and the oleander, flourishing esp. about Jericho, several varieties of the acacia tree, the caper plant, the Dead Sea apple (Solanum Sodomaeum) the osier tree of the Arabs, tamarisks, Agnus casti (a flowering bamboo), Balanites Aegyptiaca (supposed to be the balm of Gilead), Populus Euphratica (a plant found all over Central Asia but not W. of the J.), and many tropical plants, among which may be mentioned Zygophyllum coccineum, Boerhavia, Indigofera, several Astragal, Cassias, Gymnocarpum, and Nitraria.

LITERATURE

The eleventh son of Jacob. The Bib. narrative concerning J. presents two subjects for consideration, the J. story, a literary question, and the story of J., a biography. It is of the first importance to consider these questions in this order.

Cheyne in EB reaches such conclusions concerning the J. story that the story of J. is mutilated almost beyond recognition as a biography at all. Driver in HDB holds that the J. story was "in all probability only committed to writing 700-800 years later than the time to which J. is attributed, points out that J.'s name was also the name of a tribe, and concludes that "the first of these facts at once destroys all guarantee that we possess in the J. narrative a literal record of the facts," and that "the second fact raises the further question whether the figure of J. in part or even as a whole, is a reflection of the history and characteristics of the tribe projected upon the past in the individual form." But he draws back from this view and thinks it "more probable that there was an actual person J., afterward . . . rightly or wrongly regarded as the ancestor of the tribe . . .
who underwent substantially the experience recounted of him in Gen." In the presence of such critical notions concerning the literature in which the narrative of J. is embodied, it is clear that until we have reached some conclusions concerning the J. story, we cannot be sure that there is any real story of J. to relate.

I. The Joseph Story, a Literary Question.—This literary problem will be solved, if satisfactory answers may be found to two questions: Is it an independent original or an adaptation? Suitable material for such an adaptation as would produce a J. story has been sought at either end of the line of history: J. the pro-

1. An Inde- genitor and J. the tribe. The only pendent contestant for the claim of being an Original or early original of which the J. story an Adapta- might be an adaptation is the nasty tion? "Tale of Two Brothers" (RP, series I, vol II, 137-46). This story in its essential elements much resembles the J. story.

But such events as it records are common: why not such stories?

What evidence does this "Tale of Two Brothers" afford that the J. story is not an independent original?
Are we to suppose that because many French romances involve the demi-monde, there was therefore no Madame de Pompadour? Are court scandals so unheard of that ancient Egypt cannot afford two? And why impugn the genuineness of the J. story because the "Tale of Two Brothers" resembles it? Is anyone so ethereal in his passions as not to know by instinct that the essential elements of such scandal are always the same? The difference in the narrative is chiefly in the telling. At this latter point the J. story and the "Tale of Two Brothers" bear no resemblance whatever.

If the chaste beauty of the Bib. story be observed, and then one turn to the "Tale of Two Brothers" with sufficient knowledge of the Egypt tongue to perceive the coarseness and the stench of it, there can be no question that the J. story is independent of such a literary source. To those who thus sense both stories, the claim of the "Tale of Two Brothers" to be the original of the J. story cannot stand for a moment. If we turn from J. the progenitor to J. the tribe, still less will the claim that the story is an adaptation bear careful examination. The perfect naturalness of the story, the utter absence from its multitudinous details of any hint of figurative language, such as personification always furnishes, and the absolutely accurate reflection in the story of the Egypt of J.'s day, as revealed by the many discoveries of which people of 700-800 years later could not know, mark this theory of the reflection of tribal history and characteristics as pure speculation. And besides, where in all the history of literature has it been proven that a tribe has been thus successfully thrown back upon the screen of antiquity in the "individual form"? Similar mistakes concerning Menes and Minos and the heroes of Troy are a warning to us. Speculation is legiti-mate, so long as it does not cut loose from known facts, but gives no one the right to suppose the existence in unknown history of something never certainly found in known history. So much for the first question.

Is it a monograph or a compilation? The author of a monograph may make large use of literary materials, and the editor of a compilation may

2. A Mono- introduce much editorial comment.
graph or a Thus, superficially, these different kinds Com- of composition may much resemble pilation? each other, yet they are, in essential character, very different the one from the other. A compilation is an artificial body, an automaton; a monograph is a natural body with a living soul in it. This story has oriental peculiarities of repetition and pleonastic expression, and these things have been made much of in order to break up the story; to the reader not seeking grounds of partition, it is one of the most unbroken, simply natural and unaffected pieces of narrative literature in the world. If it stood alone or belonged to some later portion of Scripture, it may well be doubted that it would ever have been touched by the scalpel of the literary dissector. But it belongs to the Pent. There are manifest evidences all over the Pent of the use by the author of material, either documentary or of that paradoxical unwritten lit.

which the ancients handed down almost without the change of a word for centuries. (1) An analytical theory has been applied to the Pent as a whole, to resolve it into a mere compilation. Once the principles of this theory are acknowledged, and allowed sway there, the J. story cannot be left untouched, but becomes a necessary sacrifice to the system. A sight of the lifeless, ghastly fragments of the living, moving J. story which the analysis leaves behind (cf EB, art. "Joseph") proclaims that analysis to have been murder. There was a life in the story which has been ruthlessly taken, and that living soul marked the narrative as a monograph. (2) Where else is to be found such a compilation? Here is one of the most brilliant pieces of literature in the world, a narrative full of gems: (a) the account of the presentation of the brothers in the presence of J. when he was obliged to go out to weep (Gen 43 26-34), and (b) the scene between the terrified brothers of J. and the steward of his house (Gen 44 6-13), (c) Judah's speech (Gen 44 18-34), (d) the touching close of the revelation of J. to his brothers at last (Gen 45 1-15). The soul of the whole story breathes through all of these. Where in all literature, ancient or modern, is to be found a mere compilation that is a great piece of literature? So far removed is this story from the characteristics of a compilation, that we may challenge the world of literature to produce another monograph in narrative literature that surpasses it. (3) Then the dates of Egypt names and events in this narrative strongly favor its origin so early as to be out of the reach of the compilers. That attempts at identification in Egypt of names written in Heb, presenting as they do the peculiar difficulties of two alphabets of imperfectly known phonetic values and uncertain equivalency of one in terms of the other, should give rise to differences of opinion, is to be expected. The Egypt equivalents of Zaphenath-paneah and Asenath have been diligently sought, and several identifications have been suggested (Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, 122; Budge, History of Egypt, V, 126-27). That which is most exact phonetically and yields the most suitable and natural meaning for Zaphenath-paneah is by Lieblein (PSBA, 1898, 204-8). It is formed like four of the names of Hyksos kings before the time of J., and means "the one who furnishes the nourishment of life," i.e. the steward of the realm. The name Asenath is found from the XIth Dynasty on to the XVIIIth. Potiphar is mentioned as an Egyptian. Why not of course an Egyptian? The narrative also points distinctly to conditions obtaining under the Hyksos kings. When the people were like to perish for want of food they promised J. in return for help that they would be "servants of Pharaoh" (Gen 47 18-25). This suggests a previous antagonism to the government, such as the Hyksos kings had long to contend with in Egypt. But the revolution which drove out the Hyksos labored so effectually to eradicate every trace of the hated foreigners that it is with the utmost difficulty that modern Egyptological research has wrested from the past some small items of information concerning them. Is it credible that the editor of scraps, which were themselves not written down until some 700-800 years later, should have been able to produce such a life-story fitting into the peculiar conditions of the times of the Hyksos? Considered as an independent literary problem on its own merits, aside from any entangling necessities of the analytical theory of the Pent, the J. story must certainly stand as a monograph from some time within distinct memory of the events it records. If the J. story be an independent original and a monograph, then there is in reality to be considered the story of J.

II. The Story of Joseph.—It is unnecessary to recount here all the events of the life of J., a story so incomparably told in the Bib. narrative. It will be sufficient to touch only the salient points where controversy has raged, or at which archaeology has furnished special illumination. The story of J. begins the tenth and last natural division of Gen in these words: "The generations of Jacob" (Gen 37 2). Up to this point the unvarying method of Gen is to place at the head of each division the announcement "the generations of" one of the patriarchs, followed immediately by a brief outline of the discarded line of descent, and then to give in detail the account of the chosen line.

There is to be now no longer any discarded line of descent. All the sons of Jacob are of the chosen people, the depositary of the revelation of redemption. So this division of Gen begins at once with the chosen line, and sets in the very foreground that narrative which in that generation is most vital in the story of redemption, this story of J. beginning with the words, "J., being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren" (Gen 37 2). J. had been born in Haran, the firstborn of the beloved Rachel, who died at the birth of her second son Benjamin. A motherless lad among the sons of other mothers felt the jealousies of the situation, and the experience became a temptation. The "evil report" of his brethren was thus naturally carried to his father, and quite as naturally stirred up those family jealousies which set his feet in the path of his great career (37 2-4). In that career he appears as a Bedouin prince in Canaan.

The patriarchs of those times were all sheiks or princes of those semi-nomadic rovers who by the peculiar social and civil customs of that land were tolerated then as they are to this day under the Turkish government in the midst of farms and settled land tenure. Jacob favored Rachel and her children. He put them hindmost at the dangerous meeting with Esau, and now he puts on J. a coat of many colors (Gen 37 3). The appearance of such a coat a little earlier in the decoration of the tombs of Beni-hassan among Palestinian ambassadors to Egypt probably indicates that this garment was in some sense ceremonial, a token of rank. In any case J., the son of Jacob, was a Bedouin prince. Did the father by this coat indicate his intention to give him the precedence and the succession as chieftain of the tribe? It is difficult otherwise to account for the insane jealousy of the older brethren (Gen 37 4). According to the critical partition of the story, J.'s dreams may be explained away as mere reflections or adaptations of the later history of J. (cf PENTATEUCH). In a real biography the striking providential significance of the dreams appears at once. They cannot be real without in some sense being prophetic. On the other hand they cannot be other than real without vitiating the whole story as a truthful narrative, for they led immediately to the great tragedy; a Bedouin prince of Canaan becomes a Bedouin slave in Egypt.

The plot to put J. out of the way, the substitution of slavery for death, and the ghastly device for deceiving Jacob (Gen 37 18-36) are perfectly natural steps in the course of crime when once the brothers had set out upon it. The counterplot of Reuben to deliver J. reflects equally his own goodness and the dangerous character of the other brothers to whom he did not dare make a direct protest.

Critical discussion of "Ishmaelites" and "Midianites" and "Medanites" presents some interesting things and many clever speculations which may well be considered on their own merits by those interested in ethnology and etymologies. Many opinions advanced may prove to be correct. But let it be noted that they are for the most part pure speculation. Almost nothing is known of the interrelation of the trans-Jordanic tribes in that age other than the few hints in the Bible. And who can say what manner of persons might be found in a caravan which had wandered about no one knows where, or how long, to pick up trade before it turned into the northern caravan route? Until archaeology supplies more facts it is folly to attach much importance to such speculations (Kyle, The Deciding Voice of the Monuments in Bib. Criticism, 221).

In the slave market in Egypt, J. was bought by Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, "an Egyptian." The significant mention of this fact fits exactly into a place among the recovered hints of the history of those times, which make the court then to be not Egypt at all, but composed of foreigners, the dynasty of Hyksos kings among whom an "Egyptian" was so unexpected as to have his nationality mentioned.

J.'s native nobility of character, the pious training he had received in his father's house, and the favor of God with him gave him such prosperity that his master intrusted all the affairs of his household to him, and when the greatest of temptations assails him he comes off victorious (ch 39). There is strong ground for the suspicion that Potiphar did not fully believe the accusation of his wife against J. The fact that J. was not immediately put to death is very significant. Potiphar could hardly do less than shut him up for the sake of appearances, and perhaps to take temptation away from his wife without seeming to suspect her. It is noticeable also that J.'s character soon triumphed in prison. Then the same Providence that superintended his dreams is leading so as to bring him before the king (chs 40, 41).

The events of the immediately preceding history prepared J.'s day: the Hyksos kings on the throne, those Bedouin princes, "shepherd kings" (Petrie, Hyksos and Israelite Curies), the enmity of the Egyptians against this foreign dynasty so that they accounted every shepherd an "abomination" (46 34), the friendly relation thus created between Palestinian tribes and Egypt, the princely character of J., for among princes a prince is a prince however small his principality, and last of all the manifest favor of God toward J., and the evident understanding by the Pharaohs of Sem religion, perhaps even sympathy with it (41 39). All these constitute one of the most majestic, Godlike movements of Providence revealed to us in the word of God, or evident anywhere in history. The same Providence that presided over the boy prince in his father's house came again to the slave prince in the Egypt prison. The interpretation of the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh (40—41 1-24) brought him at last through much delay and selfish forgetfulness to the notice of the king, and another dream in which the same cunning hand of Providence is plainly seen (ch 41) is the means of bringing J. to stand in the royal presence. The stuff that dreams are made of interests scarcely less than the Providence that was superintending over them. As the harvest fields of the semi-nomadic Bedouin in Pal, and the household routine of Egypt in the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker, so now the industrial interests and the religious forms of the nation appear in the dreams of Pharaoh. The "seven kine" of the goddess Hathor supplies the number of the cows, and the doubling of the symbolism in the cattle and the grain points to the two great sources of Egypt's welfare. The Providence that had shaped and guided the whole course of J. from the Palestinian home was consummated when, with the words,

"Inasmuch as thou art a man in whom is the spirit of God," Pharaoh lifted up the Bedouin slave to be again the Bedouin prince and made him the prime minister.

The history of "kings' favorites" is too well known for the elevation of J. to be in itself incredible. Such things are esp. likely to take place among the unlimited monarchies of the Orient. The late empress of China had been a Chinese slave girl. The investiture of J. was thoroughly Egypt—the "collar," the signet "ring," the "chariot" and the outrunners who cried before him "Abrech." The exact meaning of this word has never been certainly ascertained, but its general import may be seen illustrated to this day wherever in the East royalty rides out. The policy adopted by the prime minister was far-reaching, wise, even adroit (Gen 41 25-36). It is impossible to say whether or not it was wholly just, for we cannot know whether the corn of the years of plenty which the government laid up was bought or taken as a tax levy. The policy involved some despotic power, but J. proved a magnanimous despot. The deep and subtle statesmanship in J.'s plan does not fully appear until the outcome. It was probably through the policy of J., the prime minister, that the Hyksos finally gained the power over the people and the mastery of the land.

Great famines have not been common in Egypt, but are not unknown. The only one which corresponds well to the Bible account is that one recorded in the inscription of Baba at el Kab, tr'd by Brugsch. Some scarcely justifiable attempts have been made to discredit Brugsch in his account of that inscription. The monument still remains and is easily visited, but the inscription is so mutilated that it presents many difficulties. The severity of the famine, the length of its duration, the preparation by the government, the distribution to the people, the success of the efforts for relief and even the time of the famine, as far as it can be determined, correspond well to the Bible account (Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, ch vi). The way in which such famines in Egypt come about has been explained by a movement of the sudd, a sedge-like growth in the Nile, so as to clog the upper river (Wright, Scientific Confirmations, 70-79).

J.'s brethren came "with those that came," i.e. with the food caravans. The account does not imply that the prime minister presided in person at the selling of grain, but only that he knew of the coming of his brethren and met them at the market place. The watchfulness of the government against "spies," by the careful guarding of the entrances to the land, may well have furnished him with such information. Once possessed with it, all the rest of the story of the interviews follows naturally (cf traditions of J., Jew Enc).

The long testing of the brethren with the attendant delay in the relief of the father Jacob and the family (chs 42-45) has been the subject of much discussion, and most ingenious arguments for the justification of J. All this seems unnecessary. J. was not perfect, and there is no claim of perfection made for him in the Bible. Two things are sufficient to be noted here: one that J. was ruler as well as brother, with the habits of a ruler of almost unrestrained power and authority and burdened with the necessity for protection and the obligation to mete out justice; the other that the deliberateness, the vexatious delays, the subtle diplomacy and playing with great issues are thoroughly oriental. It may be also that the perplexities of great minds make them liable to such vagaries. The career of Lincoln furnishes some curious parallels in the parleying with cases long after the great president's mind was fully made up and action taken.

The time of these events and the identification of J. in Egypt are most vexed questions not conclusively settled. Tofteen quite confidently presents in a most recent identification of J. much evidence to which one would like to give full credence (Toffteen, The Historical Exodus). But aside from the fact that he claims two exodi, two J.s, two Aarons, two lawgivers called Moses, and two givings of the law, a case of critical doublets more astounding than any heretofore claimed in the Pent, the evidence itself which he adduces is very far from conclusive. It is doubtful if the texts will bear the translation he gives them, esp. the proper names. The claims of Rameses II, that he built Pithom, compared with the stele of 400 years, which he says he erected in the 400th year of King Nubti, seems to put J. about the time of the Hyksos king. This is the most that can be said now. The burial of Jacob is in exact accord with Egyp customs. The wealth of the Israelites who retained their possessions and were fed by the crown, in contrast with the poverty of the Egyptians who sold everything, prepares the way for the wonderful growth and influence of Israel, and the fear which the Egyptians at last had of them. "And J. died, being 110 years old," an ideal old age in the Egyp mind. The reputed burial place of J. at Shechem still awaits examination.

Joseph stands out among the patriarchs in some respects with preeminence. His nobility of character, his purity of heart and life,

5. The Patriarch his magnanimity as a ruler and brother make him, more than any other of the OT characters, an illustration of that type of man which Christ was to give to the world in perfection. J. is not in the list of persons distinctly referred to in Scripture as types of Christ—the only perfectly safe criterion—but none more fully illustrates the life and work of the Saviour. He wrought salvation for those who betrayed and rejected him, he went down into humiliation as the way to his exaltation, he forgave those who, at least in spirit, put him to death, and to him as to the Saviour, all must come for relief, or perish.

JOSEPH BARNABAS. See BARNABAS.

JOSEPH BARSABBAS, bār-sab'as (Βαρσαββᾱς, Barsabbās, or Βαρσαβᾱς, Barsabās; AV Barsabas, bār'sa-bas; for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see general art. on JOSEPH): Joseph Barsabbas was surnamed Justus (Acts 1 23). Barsabbas was probably a patronymic, i.e. son of Sabba or Seba. Other interpretations given are "son of an oath," "son of an old man," "son of conversion," "son of quiet." It is likely that the "Judas called Barsabbas" of Acts 15 22 was his brother. Ewald considers that both names refer to the same person, but this is improbable.

J. was one of those who accompanied the apostles "all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto the day that he was received up from us" (Acts 1 21.22). At the meeting of the brethren under the presidency of Peter in Jerus shortly after the crucifixion, he was, therefore, proposed along with Matthias as a suitable candidate for the place in the apostleship left vacant by the treachery and death of Judas Iscariot; but was unsuccessful (Acts 1 15-26).

According to Eusebius (HE, I, 12), J. was one of the 70 (Lk 10 1), and Papias records the oral tradition that he drank a cup of poison without harm (cf Mk 16 18). The Acts of St. Paul, a work belonging to the 2d cent. and first mentioned by

Origen, relates that Barsabbas, Justus the Flatfoot and others were imprisoned by Nero for protesting their faith in Christ, but that upon a vision of the newly martyred Paul appearing to the emperor, he ordered their immediate release. C. M. KERR

JOSEPH, HUSBAND OF MARY (for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see JOSEPH): Joseph, the carpenter (Mt 13 55), was a "just man" (Mt 1 19 AV), who belonged to Nazareth (Lk 2 4). He was of Davidic descent (Mt 1 20; Lk 2 4), the son of Heli (Lk 3 23) or Jacob (Mt 1 16), the husband of Mary (Mt 1 16), and the supposed father of Jesus (Mt 13 55; Lk 3 23; 4 22; Jn 1 45; 6 42).

(1) Before the Nativity.—The Gospels of Mt and Mk alone give any detailed reference to J. and the birth of Jesus, and their accounts vary in part. Lk begins with the Annunciation to Mary at Nazareth (Lk 1 26-38). Overwhelmed with the tidings, Mary departed "with haste" "into the hill country, . . . into a city of Judah," to seek communion with Elisabeth, with whom she had been coupled in the Annunciation by the angel Gabriel (Lk 1 39-55). After abiding with her about three months she returned "unto her own house" (Lk 1 56 AV). The events recorded in Mt 1 18-24 probably took place in the interval between this return and the birth of Jesus. During Mary's visit to Elisabeth, J. had likely remained in Nazareth. The abrupt and probably unexplained departure of his espoused wife for Judah (cf the phrase "with haste"), and her condition on her return, had caused him great mental distress (Mt 1 18-20). Though his indignation was tempered with mercy, he was minded to put her away "privily," but the visitation of the angel in his sleep relieved him from his dilemma, and he was reconciled to his wife (Mt 1 24). The narrative is then continued by St. Luke. While J. and Mary still abode in Nazareth, "there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled" (Lk 2 1). "And all went to enrol themselves, every one to his own city" (Lk 2 3). Being of the house and lineage of David, J. went up with Mary, who was "great with child," from Galilee, "out of the city of Nazareth, into Judaea, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem" (Lk 2 4.5), and there Jesus was born (Lk 2 7; cf Mt 2 1).

(2) After the Nativity.—(a) St. Luke's account: The two accounts now diverge considerably. According to Lk, the Holy Family remained for a time at Bethlehem and were there visited by the shepherds (Lk 2 8-20). After a sojourn of 40 days for the purification (cf Lk 2 21.22; Lev 12), J. departed with his wife for Jerus "to present" the infant Jesus "to the Lord" and to offer up sacrifice according to the ancient law (Lk 2 24). There he was present at the prophesying of Simeon and Anna concerning Jesus, and received the blessing of the former (Lk 2 34). After "they had accomplished all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth" (Lk 2 39). Every year, at the Passover, they made this journey to Jerus (Lk 2 41). The care and solicitude of J. and Mary for the boy Jesus and their grief at His temporary loss are also recorded (Lk 2 45.48.51). There is evidence that, though Mary "kept all these things in her heart," J. at least had no understanding then of the Divine nature of the charge committed to his care (Lk 2 50).

(b) St. Matthew's account: But according to Mt it was from the Wise Men of the East that Jesus received homage at Bethlehem (Mt 2 1-11). There is no further mention of the dedicatory journey to Jerus, or of the return to Nazareth.

Instead, it is stated that on the departure of the Wise Men from Bethlehem, J. was warned in a dream of the impending wrath of Herod, and escaped with his wife and the infant Jesus into Egypt (Mt 2 13-14). Upon the death of Herod, an angel appeared to J., and he returned to the land of Israel (Mt 2 19-21). His original intention was to settle once more in Judaea, but on learning that Archelaus, the son of Herod, was ruler there, "he withdrew into the parts of Galilee, and came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth" (Mt 2 22.23).

(c) The proper sequence of the two narratives: The narrative of Mt would thus imply that the Holy Family had no connection with Nazareth previous to their return from Egypt. It has, however, been suggested by Ramsay that Mt merely reports what was common knowledge, and that Lk, while quite cognizant of this, supplemented it in his own Gospel with details known only to the Holy Family, and in part to the mother alone (cf Sir W. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 78-79). A comparison of the two Gospel narratives makes it clear that the visitation of the Wise Men fell on a later date than that of the shepherds. The latter took place immediately after the Nativity (cf Lk 2 11. 15.16, "is born . . . this day," "let us now go," "and they came with haste"). On the other hand, when the Wise Men came to Jerus, Christ was already born (cf Mt 2 1). Time was required for this journey to Jerus and the consultation of Herod with the chief priests (Mt 2 4); and during this interval the events recorded in Lk 2 8-39 had taken place. That there was sufficient time for this is attested also by the fact that Herod's decree was directed against children up to two years of age (Mt 2 16). Thus it was after the return of the Holy Family to Nazareth, and on a further visit to Bethlehem, implied by Mt but not recorded by Lk, that the infant Jesus received the adoration of the Wise Men. Jesus being born in 6 BC, this took place in 5 BC, and as Herod died in 4 BC, J. may have missed only one of the Passovers (cf Lk 2 41) by his flight into Egypt. (For a full discussion, cf Ramsay, op. cit.) As no mention is made of J. in the later parts of the Gospels where the Holy Family is referred to (cf Mt 12 46; Lk 8 19), it is commonly supposed that he died before the commencement of the public ministry of Christ.

If a type is to be sought in the character of J., it is that of a simple, honest, hard-working, God-fearing man, who was possessed of

2. Character large sympathies and a warm heart.

Strict in the observance of Jewish law and custom, he was yet ready when occasion arose to make these subservient to the greater law of the Spirit. Too practical to possess any deep insight into the Divine mysteries or eternal significance of events which came within his knowledge (cf Lk 2 50), he was quick to make answer to what he perceived to be the direct call of God (cf Mt 1 24). Originally a "just man" (AV), the natural clemency within his heart prevailed over mere justice, and by the promptings of the Holy Spirit that clemency was transferred into a strong and enduring love (cf Mt 1 24). J. is known to us only as a dim figure in the background of the Gospel narratives, yet his whole-hearted reconciliation to Mary, even in the face of possible slanderings by his neighbors, his complete self-sacrifice, when he left all and fled into Egypt to save the infant Jesus, are indicative that he was not unworthy to fulfil the great trust which was imposed upon him by the Eternal Father.

The Gospel of the Infancy according to St. James, a work composed originally in the 2d cent., but with later additions (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 47-63), gives a detailed account of the marriage of the aged J. with Mary, of their journey to Bethlehem, and of the birth of Jesus. A similar gospel, reputed to be by Thomas the philosopher, of later origin and gnostic tendency (cf Hennecke, 63-73), narrates several fantastic, miraculous happenings in the domestic life of the Holy Family, and the dealings of Joseph with the teachers of the youthful Jesus. Other legends, from Syr or Egypt sources, also dealing with the Infancy, in which J. figures, are extant.

The chief is The History of Joseph the Carpenter (cf Hennecke, Handbuch der neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, 95-105). This contains an account of the death and burial of J. at the age of 110, and of the entreaties of Mary to Christ to save him. Its aim was to show forth Christ as the Saviour, even at the last hour, and the rightful manner of Christian death. J. has received a high place in the Calendar of the Roman Catholic Saints, his feast being celebrated on March 19.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHAEA (ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας, apó Arimathaiás; for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see gen. art. on JOSEPH): Joseph of Arimathaea—a place the locality of which is doubtful, but lying probably to the N.W. of Jerus—was a "rich man" (Mt 27 57), "a councillor of honorable estate," or member of the Sanhedrin (Mk 15 43; Lk 23 50), "a good and righteous man . . . who was looking for the kingdom of God" (Lk 23 50; Mk 15 43), and "himself was Jesus' disciple" (Mt 27 57; Jn 19 38). Although he kept his discipleship secret "for fear of the Jews" (Jn 19 38), he was yet faithful to his allegiance in that he absented himself from the meeting which found Jesus guilty of death (cf Lk 23 51; Mk 14 64). But the condemnation of his Lord awakened the courage and revealed the true faith of J. On the evening after the crucifixion he went "boldly" to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. There is a fine touch in that he himself took down the body from the cross. With the assistance of Nicodemus he wound it in fine linen with spices (cf Mt 27 57, J. was a "rich man") and brought it to the new sepulchre in the garden near the place of His crucifixion. There they "laid him in a tomb that was hewn in stone, where never man had yet lain" and "rolled a stone against the door of the tomb" (cf Mt 27 57-60; Mk 15 42-46; Lk 23 50-53; Jn 19 38-42). In this was held to be the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isa 53 9.

The Gospel of St. Peter, written probably in Syria about the middle of the 2d cent., gives a slightly different account. According to this J., "the friend of Pilate and the Lord," was present at the trial of Jesus, and immediately upon its conclusion besought of Pilate that he might have the body for burial. This was granted, and after the crucifixion the Jews handed the body over to J. (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 27-30). Legends of a later origin record that J. was sent by Philip from Gaul to Britain along with 11 other disciples in 63 AD, and built an oratory at Glastonbury (cf PHILIP THE APOSTLE), that he brought the Holy Grail to England, and that he freed Ireland from snakes.

JOSEPH, PRAYER OF: An OT pseudepigraph, no. 3 in the Stichometry of Nicephorus (Westcott, Canon of the NT, 571), with the length given as 1,100 lines, and no. 5 in the List of Sixty Books (Westcott, 568). The work is lost, and the only quotations are in Origen (In Joan., ii.25, Eng. in Ante-Nicene Fathers, IX, 341; In Gen., iii.9,12). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are said to have been created before every work, but Jacob-Israel is the greatest, "the firstborn of every living creature," the "first minister in God's presence," greater than the angel with whom he wrestled. The purport may be anti-Christian, the patriarchs exalted in place of Christ; cf, perhaps, En 71 (but not so in Charles's 1912 text), but Origen's favorable opinion of the book proves that the polemic could not have been very direct.

1. Early Life and Beliefs

His father and mother belonged to families of the priestly aristocracy; consequently he received an excellent education, becoming familiar, not only with Jewish, but with Hellenistic, culture. When 16 years old he resorted to one Banus, an ESSENE (q.v.), in the desert of Engedi, with whom he remained for 3 years, absorbing occult lore, and practising the ascetic life. It might have been expected from his social position that, on his return to Jerus, he would join the SADDUCEES (q.v.); but, his Essene experience having indoctrinated him with ceremonialism, he preferred to become a PHARISEE (q.v.). He evidently believed, too, that the Pharisees were akin to the Stoics, who were then influential in the Hellenistic world. During his absence in the desert, the misgovernment of the Rom procurators at Jerus had grown apace. And the ineptitudes and injustices of Felix, Albanus and Florus were succeeded by anarchy under Annas, the high priest (62). Accordingly, the ZEALOTS (q.v.) plotted against Rom rule. Rebellion simmered, and many of the disaffected were transported to Rome to be dealt with there. Among these were several priests, whom Jos knew. About the year 64, he went to Rome to plead for them, met shipwreck on the voyage, was rescued with a few survivors and was brought to port at Putcoli. Here he met Alityrus, a Jewish actor, who happened to be in the good graces of Poppaea, Nero's consort. The empress, a Jewish proselyte, espoused his cause at Rome, and showed him many favors. At the capital, he also discerned the power of the Romans and, in all probability, grew convinced of the hopelessness of armed revolt. On his return to Jerus, he found his people set upon insurrection, and was forced, possibly against his better judgment, to make common cause with them. The first part of his public career is concerned with the great struggle that now began.

When war broke out, Jos was appointed governor of Galilee, the province where the Rom attack would first fall. He had no military fitness for command, but the influence of his friends and the exigencies of politics thrust the office upon him. The Zealots soon found that he did not carry out the necessary preparations with thoroughness, and they tried to compass his removal. But he was too influential, too good a politician also, to be undermined. Surrounded by enemies among his own folk, who even attempted to assassinate him, he encountered several dangerous experiences, and, at length, flying from the Romans, was beleaguered with his army in Jotopata, near the Lake of Gennesaret, in May, 67. The Jews withstood the siege for 47 days with splendid courage, till Titus, assailing under cover of a mist, stormed the stronghold and massacred the weary defenders. Jos escaped to a cave where, with his usual adroitness, he saved himself from death at the hands of his companions. The Romans soon discovered his hiding-place, and haled him before Vespasian, the commander-in-chief. Jos worked upon the superstitions of the general, and so ingratiated himself that Vespasian took him to Alexandria in his train. Having been liberated by his captor, he adopted the family name of the Flavians, according to Rom custom. Returning to Pal with Titus, he proceeded to mediate between the Romans and the Jews, earning the suspicion of the former, the hatred of the latter. His wonted diplomacy preserved him from anything more serious than a wound, and he was an eyewitness of the terrible events that marked the last days of Jerus. Then he accompanied Titus to Rome for the TRIUMPH (q.v.). Here he lived the remainder of his days, in high favor with the ruling house, and relieved from all anxiety about worldly goods by lavish imperial patronage. He was thus enabled to devote himself to literary pursuits.

2. Public Career

They are as follows: (1) Concerning the Jewish War, written before 79;

3. Works

we have the Gr tr of this history by the author; there are 7 books: I, the period from Antiochus Epiphanes (175 BC) to Herod the Great (4 BC); II, from 4 BC to 66 AD, covering the early events of the War; III, occurrences in Galilee in 67 AD; IV, the course of the War till the siege of Jerus; V and VI, the investment and fall of Jerus; VII, the aftermath of the rebellion. While this work is not written with the objective accuracy of scientific history, it is credible on the whole, except where it concerns the rôle played by the author. (2) The Antiquities of the Jews, written not later than 94 AD. In this Jos purports to relate the entire history of his race, from the beginning till the War of 66 AD. The 20 books fall naturally into 5 divisions, thus: (a) I-X, from prehistoric times till the Captivity, in other words, the period related in the OT substantially; (b) XI, the age of Cyrus; (c) XII-XIV, the beginnings of the Hellenistic period, from Alexander the Great, including the Maccabean revolt, till the accession of Herod the Great; (d) XV-XVII, the reign of Herod; (e) XVIII-XX, from Herod's death till the War of 66. While it cannot be called an apology for the Jews, this work betrays the author's consciousness of the disfavor with which his people were viewed throughout the Rom Empire. Jos does what he can to disabuse the Gr-Rom educated classes, although he shows curious obliquity to the grandeur of Heb religion. All in all, the work is disappointing; but it contains many details and sidelights of first importance to investigators. (3) The treatise called, since Jerome, Against Apion, is Josephus' most inspiring performance. The older title, Concerning the High Antiquity of the Jews, tells us what it contains—a defence of Heb religion against the libels of heathendom. It is in two books. The vituperation with which Jos visits Apion is unimportant in comparison with the defence of Mosaic religion and the criticism of paganism. Here the author's character is seen at its best; the air of Worldly Wiseman has been dropped, and he approaches enthusiasm. (4) His last work is the Vita or Autobiography, a misleading title. It is an echo of old days in Galilee, directed against the traductions of an associate, Justus of Tiberias. We have Jos at his worst here. He so colors the narrative as to convey a totally wrong impression of the part he played during the great crisis. In extenuation, it may be said that his relations with the imperial court rendered it difficult, perhaps impossible, for him to pursue another course.

JOSES, jō'sēz, jō'zez (יוסף, Iōsēs):

(1) One of the brethren of Jesus (Mk 6 3; in Mt 13 55 the Gr is "Joseph," and RV so renders).

(2) A son of Mary, perhaps identical with (1) (Mt 27 56; Mk 15 40.47). See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

(3) A name of Barnabas (Acts 4 36 AV, where again Gr and RV have "Joseph"). See BARNABAS.

JOSHUA, jō'sha (יוֹשֻׁעַ, yōshāh, "Jeh's gift"):

A descendant of Simeon, chief in his family (1 Ch 4 34.38).

JOSHAPHAT, josh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yōshāphāt, "Jeh has judged"; cf JEHOSEPHAT):

(1) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 43), a "Mithnite," but not included in the list of 2 S 23.

(2) A priest and trumpeter of David's time (1 Ch 15 24), AV "Jehoshaphat."

JOSHAVIAH, josh-a-vi'a (יְהוֹשָׁוִיָּה, yōshawyāh, allied form to JOSHUA [q.v.]): Son of Elnaam, one of the band of braves who served David (1 Ch 11 46), omitted from the list of 2 S 23, which is less complete and differs in detail.

JOSHBKASHAH, josh-bē-kā'sha, josh-bē-kash'a (יֹשְׁבִקָּשָׁה, yōshb'kāshāh, "son" of Heman; 1 Ch 25 4.24): The last 8 or 9 names in ver 4 are taken by commentators to be not names but the words of a prayer. See OTJC, 143, n.; Curtis, Chron, 278, 280; SBOT.

JOSHEB-BASSEBETH, jō-sheb-ba-shē'beth (יֹשֶׁב בִּשְׁבֵּת, yōshēbh ba-sheb'beth): This proper name in RV takes the place of the tr "that sat in the seat" in AV (2 S 23 8). The phrase so rendered is meaningless. The text has evidently suffered corruption. There can be no doubt that a proper name is intended. This, according to the || passage in 1 Ch 11 11, should be Jashobeam. Some scholars think that this also is a corruption, and by a process of emendation arrive at "Eshbaal" as the correct name (Driver, Heb Text of S; SBOT, ad loc.).

JOSHIBIAH, josh-i-bi'a (יֹשִׁבִיָּה, yōshibhyāh, "Jeh sets," or "causes to dwell"; AV Josibiah): A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 35).

JOSHUA, josh'ū-a ([a] יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshū', [b] יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshu', "Jeh is deliverance" or "opulence"; cf JESHUA; Ἰησοῦς, Iēsōūs):

(1) Joshua the son of Nun; the name has the Heb form (a) above in Dt 3 21; Jgs 2 7; elsewhere the form (b), except in Neh 8 17, where it is of the form yēshū' (See JESHUA); cf also Nu 13 8.16; Dt 32 44. See following article.

(2) In 1 S 6 14 18 (form [b]), the Bethshemite in whose field stood the kine that brought the ark from the Philistines.

(3) In 2 K 23 8 (form [b]), governor of Jerus in the time of Josiah.

(4) The high priest at Jerus after the return. See separate article. S. F. HUNTER

IV. CHARACTER AND WORK OF JOSHUA

I. Form and Significance of Name.—The name Joshua, a contracted form of Jehoshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshu'), which also appears in the form Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ, Neh 8 17), signifies "Jeh is deliverance" or "salvation," and is formed on the analogy of many Israelite names, as Jehoikim (יְהוֹיָכִים, y'hōyākīm), "Jeh exalteth," Jehoānān (יְהוֹאָנָן, y'hōhānān), "Jeh is gracious," Elishua or Elisha (אֵלִישָׁע, 'ēlishū', אֵלִישָׁע, 'ēlishā'), "God is deliverance," Elizur (אֵלִיזֹר, 'ēlīzūr), "God is a rock," etc. In the narrative of the mission of the spies in Nu 13, the name is given as Hoshea (הוֹשֵׁעַ, hōshē', vs 8.16; cf Dt 32 44), which is changed by Moses to Joshua (ver 16). In the passage in Dt, however, the earlier form of the name is regarded by Dr. Driver (Comm. in loc.) as an erroneous reading.

The Gr form of the name is Jesus (Ἰησοῦς, Iēsōūs, Acts 7 45; He 4 8, RV "Joshua," but AV "Jesus" in both passages), and this form appears even in the passages cited above from Neh and Dt. In Nu 13 8.16, however, LXX has Ἀνθῆ, Hausē. The name occurs in later Jewish history, e.g. as that of the owner of the field in which the ark rested after its return from the land of the Philis (1 S 6 14.18), and appears to have become esp. frequent after the exile (Ezr 2 40; Zec 3 1ab, etc). It is also found (Jeshua) with a local signification as the name of one of the "villages" in Southern Judaea, where the repatriated Jews dwelt after their return from Babylon (Neh 11 26).

II. History of the Life of Joshua.—The narrative of the life of Joshua, the son of Nun, is naturally divided into two parts, in which he held entirely different positions with regard to the people of Israel, and discharged different duties. In the earlier period he is the servant and minister of Moses, loyal to his leader, and one of his most trusted and valiant captains. After the death of Moses he himself succeeds to the leadership of the Israelite host, and conducts them to a settlement in the Promised Land. The service of the earlier years of his life is a preparation and equipment for the office and responsibility that devolved upon him in the later period.

The first appearance of J. in the history is at Rephidim, on the way from the wilderness of Sin to Horcb. Neither the exact site of

1. First Appearance Rephidim nor the meaning of the name can be determined; the Israelites, however, apparently came to Rephidim before they approached the rich oasis of Feirān, for at the former place "there was no water for the people to drink" (Ex 17 1). The fact that the host encamped there seems to assume the existence of wells; either, therefore, these were found to be dry, or they failed before the wants of the great host were satisfied. The Amalekites, wandering desert tribes, claimed the ownership of the wells, and, resenting the Israelite intrusion, swooped down upon them to drive them away and to enrich themselves with the spoil of their possessions. Under the command of J., the Israelites won a complete victory in a battle that seems to have been prolonged until sunset; the fortunes of the battle varying with the uplifting or falling of Moses' hands, which were accordingly supported by Aaron and Hur throughout the day (vs 11 ff). A curse and sentence of extermination pronounced against Amalek were formally written down and communicated to J., apparently that, as the future leader of Israel, he might have it in charge to provide for their fulfilment.

It is evident also that at this period J. was no young and untried warrior. Although no indication of his previous history is given, his name is introduced into the narrative as of a man well known, who is sufficiently in the confidence of Moses to be given the chief command in the first conflict in which the Israelites had been engaged since leaving Egypt. The result justified the choice. And if, during the march, he had held the position of military commander and organizer under Moses, as the narrative seems to imply, to him was due in the first instance the remarkable change, by which within the brief space of a month the undisciplined crowd of serfs who had fled from Egypt became a force sufficiently resolute and compact to repel the onset of the Amalekite hordes.

In all the arrangements for the erection and service of the tabernacle, J. the warrior naturally has no place. He is briefly named (Ex 24 13) as the minister of Moses, accompanying him apparently to the foot of the mount of God, but remaining behind with the elders and Aaron and Hur, when Moses commenced the ascent. A similar brief mention is in 32 17, where he has rejoined Moses on the return of the latter from the mount with the two tables of the testimony, and is unaware of the outbreak of the people and their idolatrous worship of the molten calf in the camp; cf 33 11, where again he is found in the closest attendance upon his leader and chief. No further reference is made to J. during the stay of the Israelites at Sinai, or their subsequent journeyings, until they found themselves at Kadesh-barnea on the southern border of the Promised Land (Nu 13). His name is once mentioned, however, in an earlier ch of the same book (Nu 11 28), when the tidings are brought to Moses that two men in the camp of Israel, Eldad and Medad, had been inspired to prophesy. There he is described in harmony with the previous statements of his position, as Moses' minister from his youth. Jealous of his leader's prerogative and honor, he would have the irregular prophesying stopped, but is himself checked by Moses, who rejoices that the spirit of God should rest thus upon any of the Lord's people.

Of the 12 men, one from each tribe, sent forward by Moses from Kadesh to ascertain the character of the people and land before him, 3. One of the Spies two only, Hoshea the Ephraimite, whose name is significantly changed to Joshua (13 8.16), and Caleb the Judahite, bring back a report encouraging the Israelites to proceed. The account of the mission of the spies is repeated substantially in Dt 1 22-46. There, however, the suggestion that spies should be commissioned to examine and report upon the land comes in the first instance from the people themselves. In the record of Nu they are chosen and sent by Moses under Divine direction (13 1f). The two representations are not incompatible, still less contradictory. The former describes in an altogether natural manner the human initiative, probable enough in the circumstances in which the Israelites found themselves; the latter is the Divine control and direction, behind and above the affairs of men. The instructions given to the spies (vs 17 f) evidently contemplated a hasty survey of the entire region of the Negeb or southern borderland of Pal up to and including the hill country of Judaea; the time allowed, 40 days (vr 25), was too brief to accomplish more, hardly long enough for this purpose alone. They were, moreover, not only to ascertain the character of the towns and their inhabitants, the quality and products of the soil, but to bring back with them specimens of the fruits (vr 20). An indication of the season of the year is given in the added clause that "the time was the time of first-ripe grapes." The usual months of the vintage are September and October (cf Lev 23 39); in the warm and sheltered valleys, however, in the neighborhood of Hebron, grapes may sometimes be gathered in August or even as early as July. The valley from which the fruits, grapes, figs and pomegranates were brought was known as the valley of Eshcol, or the "cluster" (Nu 13 23 f; 32 9; Dt 1 24).

No hesitating or doubtful account is given by all the spies of the fertility and attractiveness of the country; but in view of the strength of its cities and inhabitants only J. and Caleb are confident of the ability of the Israelites to take possession of it. Their reports and exhortations, however, are overborne by the timidity and dissuasion of the others, who so entirely alarm the people that they refuse to essay the conquest of the land, desiring to return into Egypt (Nu 14 3 f), and attempt to stone J. and Caleb (14 10). These two alone, therefore, were exempted from the sentence of exclusion from the Promised Land (vs 24.30.38; 26 65; 32 12; Dt 1 25 f). The remainder of the spies perished at once by a special visitation (Nu 14 36); and the people were condemned to a 40-year exile in the wilderness, a year for each day that the spies had been in Pal, until all the men of that generation "from twenty years old and upward" were dead (14 29; 26 64 f; 32 11 f). An abortive attempt was made to invade the land in defiance of the prohibition of Jeh, and ended in failure and disastrous defeat (vs 40 f; Dt 1 41 f; cf 21 1-3).

Upon the events of the next 38 or 40 years in the life of Israel an almost unbroken silence falls. The wanderers in the wilderness have no history. Some few events, however, that are recorded without note of time, the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, and the breaking out of the plague because of the people's murmuring, and probably others (Nu 15 32-36; 16 f), appear to belong to this period. In none of them does J. take an active part, nor is his name mentioned in connection with the campaigns against Sihon and Og on the E. of the Jordan. When the census of the people is taken in the plains of Moab opposite Jericho, J. and Caleb with Moses himself are found to be the only survivors of the host that 40 years previously came out of Egypt (26 63 f). As the time of the death of the great leader and lawgiver drew near, he was commissioned formally to appoint J. as his successor and to hand over to him and to Eleazar the priest the duty of finally apportioning the conquered territory among the several tribes (27 18 f; 32 28; 34 17; cf Dt 1 38; 3 28; 31 3.7.23; 34 9). Some of these passages anticipate the direct Divine commission and encouragement recorded in Josh (1 1.5 f) and given to him after the death of Moses.

The history of J. in his new capacity as supreme head and leader of the people in several instances recapitulates as it were the history of his greater forerunner. It was not 4. The Head of the People unnatural that it should be so; and the similarity of recorded events affords no real ground for doubt with regard to the reliability of the tradition concerned. The position in which Israel now found itself on the E. of the Jordan was in some respects not unlike that which confronted Moses at Kadesh-barnea or before the crossing of the Red Sea. J., however, was faced with a problem much less difficult, and in the war-tried and disciplined host at his command he possessed an instrument immensely more suitable and powerful for carrying out his purpose.

(1) Sending of the spies.—His first act was to send spies from Shittim to ascertain the character of the country immediately opposite on the W. of the Jordan, and esp. the position and strength of Jericho, the frontier and fortified city which first stands in the way of an invader from the E. who proposes to cross the river by the fords near its mouth (Josh 2 2). In Jericho the spies owed their lives to the quick inventiveness of Rahab (cf He 11 31), who concealed them on the roof of her house from the emissaries of the king; and returning to J., they reported the prospects of an easy victory and conquest (vs 23 f).

There were doubtless special reasons which induced J. to essay the crossing of the Jordan at the lower fords opposite Jericho. Higher up the river a probably easier crossing-place led directly into Central Pal, a district in which apparently his advance would not have been obstructed by fortified cities such as confronted him farther south; which therefore would seem to offer the advantages of an open and ready entrance into the heart of the country. His decision was probably influenced by a desire to possess himself of a fortified base at Jericho and in the neighboring cities. The favorable report of the spies also proved that there would be no great difficulty in carrying out this plan.

(2) Crossing of the Jordan.—The actual crossing of the river is narrated in chs 3, 4. The city of Jericho was built in a plain from 12 to 14 miles wide formed by the recession of the hills that border the valley of the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, and stood at the mouth of the valley of Achor (7 24, 26; 15 7). The modern village of Erîhâ is built at a short distance S.E. of the ancient site, and Gilgal lay half-way to the river. At the latter place the fixed camp was established after the taking of Jericho, and Gilgal formed for some considerable time the base of operations, where the women and children remained in safety while the men were absent on their warlike expeditions. There also the tabernacle was erected, as the symbol and center of national life, and there apparently it remained until the time came for the removal to Shiloh (18 1).

Within the plain the stream has excavated a tortuous bed to a depth of 200 ft. below the surface, varying from an eighth of a mile to a mile in breadth. In ordinary seasons the waters are confined to a small portion of the channel, which is then crossed opposite Jericho by two fords where the depth does not exceed 2 or 3 ft. When the river is low it may be crossed elsewhere. In times of flood, however, the water rises and fills the entire channel from bank to bank, so that the fords become impracticable. It is expressly stated that it was at such a time of flood that the Israelites approached the river, at the "time of harvest," or in the early spring (3 15). The priests were directed to carry the ark to the brink of the river, the waters of which, as soon as their feet touched them, would be cut off, and a dry passage afforded. The narrative therefore is not to be understood as though it indicated that a wall of water stood on the right and left of the people as they crossed; the entire breadth of the river bed was exposed by the failure of the waters from above. See JORDAN.

An interesting parallel to the drying up of the Jordan before J. is recorded by an Arab historian of the Middle Ages, who writes to explain a natural but extraordinary occurrence, without any thought of the miraculous or any apparent knowledge of the passage of the Israelites. During the years 1266-67 A.D., a Mohammedan sultan named Boybars was engaged in building a bridge over the Jordan near Dâmieh, a place which some have identified with the city Adam (Josh 3 16); but the force of the waters repeatedly carried away and destroyed his work. On one night, however, in December of the latter year, the river ceased entirely to flow. The opportunity was seized, and an army of workmen so strengthened the bridge that it resisted the flood which came down upon it the next day, and stood firm. It was found that at some distance up the river, where the valley was narrow, the banks had been undermined by the running water and had fallen in, thus completely damming back the stream. It seems not improbable that it was by agency of this character that a passage was secured for the Israelites; even as 40 years earlier a "strong east wind" had been employed to drive back the waters of the Red Sea before Moses.

At the command of J., under Divine direction, the safe crossing of the Jordan was commemorated by the erection at Gilgal of 12 stones (4 3-9, 20 ff), one for each of the tribes of Israel, taken from the bed of the river. In ver 9 it is stated that 12 stones were set up in the midst of the river. The statement is probably a misunderstanding, and a mere confusion of the tradition. It is not likely that there would be a double commemoration, or an erection of stones in a place where they would never be seen. At Gilgal also the supply of manna ceased, when the natural resources of the country became available (5 12). The date of the passage is given as the 10th day of the 1st month (4 19); and on the 14th day the Passover was kept at Gilgal in the plains of Jericho (5 10). For the 2d time, also, at the crisis of the first entrance into the land, J. was encouraged for his work by a vision and Divine promise of assistance and direction (5 13-15).

(3) Capture of Jericho.—The narrative that follows, of the taking of Jericho, illustrates, as would naturally be expected in the case of a city so situated, the effeminate and unwarlike character of its inhabitants. There was apparently little or no fighting, while for a whole week J. with priests and people paraded before the walls. A brief reference (6 1) seems to indicate that the citizens were quickly driven to take refuge behind their fortifications. Twice seven times the city was compassed, with the ark of the covenant borne in solemn procession, and at the 7th circuit on the 7th day, while the people shouted, the wall of the city fell "in its place" (6 20 m), and Jericho was taken by assault. Only Rahab and her household were spared. All the treasure was devoted to the service of the Lord, but the city itself was burnt, and a solemn curse pronounced upon the site and upon the man who should venture to rebuild its walls (6 26). The curse was braved, whether deliberately or not, by a citizen of Bethel in the time of King Ahab; and the disasters foretold fell upon him in the loss of his children (1 K 16 34). Thenceforward Jericho appears to have been continuously inhabited. There was a settlement of the sons of the prophets there in Elisha's day (2 K 2 5, 15). The natural fertility of the site won for it the name of the city of palm trees (Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13).

From the plains of Jericho two valleys lead up into the central hill country in directions N.W. and S.W. respectively. These form the two entrances or passes, by which the higher land is approached from the E. Along these lines, therefore, the invasion of the land was planned and carried out. The main advance under J. himself took place by the northernmost of the valleys, while the immediate southern invasion was intrusted to Caleb and the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, the supreme control remaining always in the hands of J. (cf Josh 14, 15; Jgs 1). This seems on the whole to be the better way of explaining the narratives in general, which in detail present many difficulties.

(4) Conquest of Ai and Bethel.—At the head of the northern pass stood the city of Luz or Bethel (Gen 28 19; Josh 18 13; Jgs 1 23). Ai lay close at hand, and was encountered by the invaders before reaching Bethel; its exact site, however, is undetermined. The two towns were in close alliance (cf Josh 8 17), and the defeat and destruction of the one was quickly followed by the similar fate that overtook the other. Before Ai, the advance guard of the Israelites, a small party detached on the advice of the spies sent forward by J. from Jericho, suffered defeat and were driven back in confusion (7 2 ff). The disaster was due to the failure to obey the command to "devote" the whole spoil of Jericho, and to the theft by one of the people of treasure which belonged rightfully to Jeh (7 11). When the culprit Achan had been discovered and punished, a renewed attempt upon Ai, made with larger forces and more skilful dispositions, was crowned with success. The city was taken by a stratagem and destroyed by fire, its king being hanged outside the city gate (8 28 f). Unlike Jericho, it seems never to have been restored. Bethel also was captured, through the treachery apparently of one of its own citizens, and its inhabitants were put to the sword (Jgs 1 24 f).

(5) Reading of the law on Mt. Ebal.—Of further campaigns undertaken by J. for the subjugation of Central Pal no account has been preserved. It is possible, therefore, that the conquest of this part of the country was accomplished without further fighting (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF). In the list of the cities (Josh 12 7-24) whose kings were vanquished by J., there are no names of towns that can be certainly identified as situated here; the greater part evidently belong to the north or south. The only record remaining is that of the formal erection of an altar on Mt. Ebal in the presence of all the people and the solemn reading of the law in their hearing (8 30-35). It is expressly noted that all this was done in accordance with the directions of Moses (cf Dt 11 29; 27 2-8.11 ff). It would further appear probable that this ceremony really took place at the close of the conquest, when all the land was subdued, and is narrated here by anticipation.

(6) The Gibeonites.—The immediate effect of the Israelite victories under J. was very great. Especially were the Hivite inhabitants of Gibeon struck with fear (9 3 ff) lest the same fate should overtake them that had come upon the peoples of Jericho and Ai. With Gibeon, 3 other cities were confederate, viz. Chephirah, Becroth and Kiriath-jearim, or the "city of groves" (9 17). Gibeon, however, was the chief, and acted in the name of the others. It is usually identified with the modern village or township of el-Jib, 7 or 8 miles N. by W. of Jerus; and all four lay clustered around the head of the pass or valley of Aijalon, which led down from the plateau westward to the foothills of the Shephelah, toward the plain and the sea. Gibeon held therefore a position of natural strength and importance, the key to one of the few practicable routes from the west into the highlands of Judaea, equally essential to be occupied as a defensive position against the incursions of the dwellers in the plains, and as affording to an army from the east a safe and protected road down from the mountains.

By a stratagem which threw J. and the leaders of Israel off their guard, representing themselves as jaded and wayworn travelers from a distance, the Gibeonites succeeded in making a compact with Israel, which assured their own lives and safety. They affirmed that they had heard of the Israelite victories beyond Jordan, and also of the gift to them by Jeh of the whole land (9 9 f.24). J. and the princes were deceived and entered too readily into covenant with them, a covenant and promise that was scrupulously observed when on the 3d day of traveling the Israelites reached their cities and found them to be close at hand (vs 16 ff). While, however, their lives were preserved, the men of Gibeon were reduced to the position of menial servants, "hewers of wood and drawers of water"; and the writer adds, it is thus "unto this day" (vs 21.27). See GIBEON.

The treaty of peace with the Gibeonites and the indignation thereby aroused among the neighboring kings, who naturally regarded the independent action of the men of Gibeon as treachery toward themselves, gave rise to one of the most formidable coalitions and one of the most dramatic incidents of the whole war. The king of Jerus, Adoni-zedek ("the Lord of righteousness" or "the Lord is righteousness," 10 1; cf Melchizedek, "the king of righteousness," Gen 14 18; in Jgs 1 5 ff the name appears as Adoni-bezek, and so LXX reads here), with the 4 kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon (10 3), formed a plan to destroy Gibeon in revenge, and the Gibeonites sent hastily for assistance to J., who had returned with his army to Gilgal. The Israelites made a forced march from Gilgal, came upon the allied kings near Gibeon, and attacked and defeated them with great slaughter. The routed army fled westward "by the way of the ascent to Beth-horon" (ver 10), and in the pass was overtaken by a violent hailstorm, by which more perished than had fallen beneath the swords of the Israelites (ver 11). The 5 kings were shut up in a cave at Makkedah, in which they had taken refuge, whence they were subsequently brought forth and put to death. The actual pursuit, however, was not stayed until the remnant had found temporary security behind the walls of their fortified cities (10 16 ff). The victory of Israel was commemorated by J. in a song of which some words are preserved (10 12 f). See BETH-HORON, BATTLE OF.

(7) Conquest of the south.—With almost severe simplicity it is further recorded how the confederate cities in turn were captured by J. and utterly destroyed (10 28-39). And the account is closed by a summary statement of the conquest of the entire country from Kadesh-barnea in the extreme south as far as Gibeon, after which the people returned to their camp at Gilgal (10 40-43).

(8) Northern conquests.—A hostile coalition of northern rulers had finally to be met and defeated before the occupation and pacification of the land could be said to be complete. Jabin, king of Hazor, the "fort," was at the head of an alliance of northern kings who gathered together to oppose Israel in the neighborhood of the waters of Merom (11 1 ff). Hazor has been doubtfully identified with the modern Jebel Hadirch, some 5 miles W. of the lake. No details of the fighting that ensued are given. The victory, however, of the Israelites was decisive, although chariots and horses were employed against them apparently for the first time on Can. soil. The pursuit was maintained as far as Sidon, and Misrephoth-maim, perhaps the "boilings" or "tumults of the waters," the later Zarephath on the coast S. of the former city (11 8; cf 13 6); and the valley of Mizpeh must have been one of the many wadies leading down to the Phoen coast land. The cities were taken, and their inhabitants put to the sword; but Hazor alone appears to have been burnt to the ground (11 11 ff). That the royal city recovered itself later is clear from the fact that a king of Hazor was among the oppressors of Israel in the days of the Judges (Jgs 4). For the time being, however, the fruit of these victories was a widespread and much-needed peace. "The land had rest from war" (11 23).

(9) Allotment of territory.—Thus the work of conquest, as far as it was effected under J.'s command, was now ended; but much yet remained to be done that was left over for future generations. The ideal limits of Israel's possession; as set forth by Jeh in promise to Moses, from the Shihor or Brook of Egypt (cf 1 Ch 13 5) to Lebanon and the entering in of Hamath (Nu 34), had not been and indeed never were reached. In view, however, of J.'s age (13 1), it was necessary that an allotment of their inheritance W. of the Jordan should at once be made to the remaining tribes. Reuben, Gad and half the tribe of Manassah had been already provided for by Moses in Eastern Pal (13 15-32). Chs 14-21 accordingly contain a detailed account of the arrangements made by the Israelite leader for the settlement of the land and trace the boundaries of the several tribal possessions. The actual division appears to have been made on two separate occasions, and possibly from two distinct centers. Provision was first made for Judah and the children of Joseph; and between the northern border of the former tribe, recorded in detail in 15 5-11, and the inheritance of the sons of Joseph, a tract of land for the present left unassigned was later given to the tribes of Benjamin and Dan. An extra portion also was promised by J. to the descendants of Joseph on the ground of their numbers and strength (17 14 ff).

For the 7 tribes that were yet without defined inheritance a rough survey of the land appears to have been made, and the unallotted districts were divided into 7 portions, for which lots were then cast at Shiloh in the presence of the assembled tribes (chs 18, 19). The express mention of Shiloh here (18 1.10) suggests that the previous division was carried out at some other place, and if so, probably at Gilgal, the earlier resting-place of the ark and the tabernacle. No definite statement, however, to that effect is made. Benjamin's portion was assigned between the territories of Judah and the children of Joseph (18 11). Simeon received his inheritance out of the land given to Judah, a part on the south being taken away on the ground that the whole was too great for a single tribe (19 1-9). Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali were established in the north (19 10-39). And Dan was settled on the seacoast by Joppa, with additional territory in the extreme north, of which they apparently took independent and forcible possession, beyond the inheritance of the other tribes (19 40-48; cf Jgs 18 27-29).

(10) Cities of refuge.—Finally the 6 cities of refuge were appointed, 3 on each side of the Jordan, and the 48 cities of the Levites taken out of the territories of the several tribes (Josh 20, 21; cf Nu 35; Dt 4 41-43). The two and a half tribes whose inheritance lay in Eastern Pal were then dismissed, their promise of assistance to their brethren having been fulfilled (ch 22); and an altar was erected by them on the right bank of the Jordan whose purpose is explained to be to serve as a standing witness to the common origin of all the tribes, and to frustrate any future attempt to cut off those on the E. from the brotherhood of Israel.

(11) Final address and death.—In a closing assembly of the Israelites at Shechem, J. delivered to the people his final charge, as Moses had done before his death, reminding them of their own wonderful history, and of the promises and claims of God, and exhorting them to faithful and loyal obedience in His service (23, 24). A stone also was set up under the oak in the sacred precinct of Jeh, to be a memorial of the renewed covenant between God and His people (24 26 f). Then at the age of 110 the second great leader of Israel died, and was laid to his rest within his own inheritance in Timnath-serah (vs 29.30; in Jgs 2 9, Timnath-heres), in the hill country of Ephraim. The site of his grave is unknown. Tradition has placed it at Kejr Hâris, 9 miles S. of Nablus or Shechem. But the localizing by tradition of the burying-place of a hero or saint is often little more than accidental, nor can any reliance be placed upon it in this instance.

III. Sources of History.—That the narratives concerning the life and work of J. rest in the main upon a basis of tradition can hardly be doubted. How far the details have been modified, or a different coloring imparted in the course of a long transmission, it is impossible to determine. There is a remarkable similarity or parallelism between many of the leading events of J.'s life as ruler and captain of Israel and the experiences of his predecessor Moses, which, apart from any literary criticism, suggests that the narratives have been drawn from the same general source, and subjected to the same conditions of environment and transmission. Thus both are called to and strengthened for their work by a special Divine revelation, Moses at Horeb in the burning bush, J. at Jericho. Both lead the people across the bed of waters miraculously driven back to afford them passage. And both at no long interval after the passage win a notable victory over their adversaries—a victory ascribed in each case to direct Divine intervention on their behalf, although in different ways. At the close of their life-work, moreover, both Moses and J. deliver stirring addresses of appeal and warning to the assembled Israelites; and both are laid in nameless graves. These all, however, are occurrences perfectly natural and indeed inevitable in the position in which each found himself. Nor do they afford adequate ground for the supposition that the achievements of the greater leader have been duplicated, or by mistake attributed to the less. To cross the Jordan and to defeat the Canaanite confederacy were as essential to the progress of Israel as the passage of the Red Sea and the breaking up of the gathering of Amalekite clans; and no true or sufficient history could have evaded the narration of these events. The position of Israel also on the E. of the Jordan about to undertake the invasion and conquest of the Promised Land as imperatively demanded a specially qualified captain and guide, a mastermind to control the work, as did the oppressed people in Egypt or the wanderers in the desert. That J. was not so great a man as his predecessor the entire narrative testifies. Moses, however, must of necessity have had a successor to take up his unfinished work and to carry it to completion.

IV. Character and Work of Joshua.—As to the personal character of J., there is little to be inferred from the narrative of his campaigns. In this respect indeed they are singularly colorless. In early life his loyalty to Moses was conspicuous and unswerving. As his successor, he seems to have faithfully acted upon his principles, and in the direction of the Israelite campaigns to have proved himself a brave and competent general, as wise in counsel as he was strong in fight. The putting to death of captives and the handing over to the sword of the inhabitants of hostile cities, which the historian so often records as the consequence of his victories, must evidently be judged by the customs of the times, and have perhaps lost nothing in the narration. They do not in any case justify the attribution to Joshua of an especially inhumane disposition, or a delight in slaughter for its own sake. After the death of Moses he would appear to have been reluctant to undertake the onerous position and duty assigned to him through mistrust of his own ability and lack of self-confidence, and needed more than once to be encouraged in his work and assured of Divine support. In the language of his closing discourse there is apparent a foresight and appreciation of the character and tendencies of the people who had followed him, which is hardly inferior to that of Moses himself.

In a real sense also his work was left unfinished at his death. The settlement of Canaan by the tribes of Israel within the appointed and promised limits was never more than partial. The new colonists failed to enjoy that absolute and undisturbed possession of the land to which they had looked forward; witness the unrest of the period of the Judges, prolonged and perpetuated through monarchical times. For all this, however, the blame cannot justly be laid to the account of J. Many causes undoubtedly concurred to an issue which was fatal to the future unity and happiness and prosperity of Israel. The chief cause, as J. warned them would be the case, was the persistent idolatry of the people themselves, their neglect of duty, and disregard of the commands and claims of their God.

A. S. GEDEN

JOSHUA: Son of Jehozadak (Hag 1 1.12.14; 2 2.4; Zec 3 1.3.6.8.9; 6 11 form [b]) and high priest in Jerus, called "Jeshua" in Ezr-Neh. His father was among the captives at the fall of Jerus in 586 BC, and also his grandfather Seraiah, who was put to death at Riblah (2 K 25 18 ff; 1 Ch 6 15).

Joshua appears in Ezr 3 2 with Zerubbabel at the head of the returned exiles and as leader in the work of building an altar and reestablishing sacrificial worship (538 or 537 BC). Ezr 3 8 tells of their laying the foundation of the temple, and in 4 1 ff the two heads of the community refuse to allow the Samaritans to cooperate in the building operations, with the result that the would-be helpers became active opponents of the work. Building then ceased until Haggai and Zechariah in 520 (Ezr 5; Hag 1 1-11) exhort the community to re-start work, and the two leaders take the lead (Hag 1 12-15). The following are, in chronological order, the prophetic utterances in which J. is spoken of: (1) Hag 1 1-11; (2) Hag 2 1-9; (3) Zec 1 1-6; (4) Hag 2 10-19; (5) Hag 2 20-23; (6) the visions of Zec 1 7-6 8 together with (7) the undated utterance of Zec 6 9-15.

Two of these call for special attention. First, the vision of a trial in which J. is prosecuted before the angel of Jeh by Satan (ha-sāṭān, "the adversary"), who is, according to one view, "not the spirit of evil who appears in later Jewish writings; he is only the officer of justice whose business is to see that the case against criminals is properly presented" in the heavenly court of justice (H. P. Smith, OT History, 356); while others regard him as the enemy of God's people (cf Orelli, Minor Prophets, ET, 327). We are not told what the charge against J. is: some hold him to be tried as in some way a representative of the people or the priesthood, and his filthy garments as symbolical of sin; while others explain the garments as put on to excite the court's pity. The adversary is rebuked by "the angel of Jeh" (read at beginning of ver 2, "and the angel of Jeh said," etc), and J. is acquitted. He is then ordered to be stripped of his old clothes and to be arrayed in "rich apparel" (ver 4), while a "clean turban" (ARV<sup>m</sup>) is to be put on his head. Conditional upon his walking in God's ways, he is promised the government of the temple and "free access" to God, being placed among the servants of the "angel of Jeh." J. and his companions "are men that are a sign" (ver 8), i.e. a guaranty of the coming of the Messiah; there is set before J. a stone which is to be inscribed upon, and the iniquity of the land will be removed, an event to be followed by peace and plenty (vs 9 f).

In vs 4 ff Nowack and Wellhausen (with the LXX mostly) read, "And he answered and spake unto those that stood before him [i.e. his servants] thus: Take the filthy garments from off him, and clothe him with rich apparel, [5] and set a clean turban upon his head. So they set a clean turban upon his head and clothed him with clean garments. And the angel of Jeh stood up, [6] and solemnly exhorted J., etc." They also omit the first "for" in ver 8 as a dittography.

Different interpretations are given of the vision:

(1) Some claim to see here a contest between the civil and religious powers as represented by Zerubbabel and J. respectively (6 13), and that Zechariah decides for the supremacy of the latter. The Messiah-King is indeed in Jerus in the person of Zerubbabel, though as yet uncrowned; but J. is to be supreme (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 303; H. P. Smith, OT History, 356 f). This explanation is dependent to a large extent upon 6 9-15, and is not supported by 3 8. It is difficult to explain ver 2 on this view, for Zerubbabel could also be described as a "brand plucked out of the fire." What the vision says is that the vindication of J. is a sign for the coming of Jeh's "servant, the Branch," a title that is not given to J. (cf ver 7).

(2) Others maintain that the garments are symbolical of the sins of the predecessors of J., who is tried for their offences and himself regarded as being unworthy of the office because he had been brought up in a foreign and heathen land (so Keil, Orelli).

(3) Hitzig, followed by Nowack (Kleine Propheten, 325), holds that the idea which lies at the basis of the vision is that Satan is responsible for the ills which the community had suffered (cf Job 1, 2). The people had begun to think that their offerings were not acceptable to God and that He would not have pity upon them. There was a feeling among the most pious ones that God's righteousness would not allow of their restoration to their former glory. This conflict between righteousness and mercy is decided by silencing the accuser and vindicating J.

It is difficult to decide which view, if any, is correct. "The brand plucked out of the fire" seems to point to God's recognizing that the community, or perhaps the priestly succession, had almost been exterminated by the exile. It reminds us of the oak of which, after its felling, the stump remaineth (Isa 6 13), and may perhaps point to God's pity being excited for the community. The people, attacked by their enemies and represented by J., are to be restored to their old glory: that act being symbolized by the clothing of J. in clean raiment; and that symbolical act (cf Isa 6 18) is a sign, a guaranty, of the coming of the Messiah-King. The ritualistic tone of Mal will then follow naturally after the high place given here to the high priest. It is noteworthy that the promise of 3 7 is conditional.

One more point remains, viz. the meaning of the stone in 3 9. It has been differently explained as a jewel in the new king's crown (Nowack); a foundation stone of the temple, which, however, was already laid (Hitzig); the chief stone of 4 7 (Ewald, Steiner); the Messiah Himself (Keil); the stone in the high priest's breastplate (Bredenkamp), and the stone which served as an altar (Orelli). Commentators tend to regard the words "upon one stone are seven eyes" as a parenthetical addition characteristic of the author of Zec 9 ff.

The utterance of Zec 6 9-15 presents to us some more exiles coming from Babylon with silver and gold apparently for the temple.

2. Joshua's Crown. According to the present text, Zechariah is commanded to see that this is used to make a crown for J. who is to be a priest-king. This is taken to mean that he is to be given the crown that had been meant for Zerubbabel. But commentators hold that the text has been altered: that the context demands the crowning of Zerubbabel—the Branch of Davidic descent. This view is supported by ver 13, "And the counsel of peace shall be between them both"; and therefore the last clause of ver 11 is omitted. Wellhausen keeps vs 9 and 10, and then reads: "[11] Yea, take of them silver and gold and make a crown, [12] and say to them: Thus saith Jeh of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, from whose root there will be a sprout, [13] and he will build the Temple of Jeh, and he will obtain glory and sit and rule upon his throne. And Joshua will be a priest on his right hand, and there will be friendly peace between them both. [14] The crown shall be," etc; ver 15 is incomplete.

It will be objected that this does away with the idea of a priest-king, an idea found also in Ps 110. But it seems fairly certain that Ps 110 (see Kirkpatrick, The Book of Psalms) does not refer to J., the point there being that the king referred to was a priest, although not descended from Aaron, being a priest after the order of Melchizedek, while here the point is, if the present text be correct, that a priest is crowned king. What became of Zerubbabel after this is not known. See Ed. Meyer, Der Papyrus- fund von Elephantine<sup>2</sup>, 70 ff, 86 ff. J. is called Jesus in Sir 49 12. See ZERUBBABEL; HAGGAI; ZECHARIAH.

LITERATURE

I. Title and Authorship.—The name Joshua signifies "Jeh is deliverance" or "salvation" (see JOSHUA). The Gr form of the name is Jesus (Ἰησοῦς, Iēsōūs, Acts 7 45; He 4 8). In later Jewish history the name appears to have become popular, and is even found with a local significance, as the designation of a small town in Southern Pal (יְשׁוּעָה, yēshūā', Neh 11 26). The use of the title by the Jews to denote the Book of Josh did not imply a belief that the book was actually written or dictated by him; or even that the narratives themselves were in substance derived from him, and owed their authenticity and reliability to his sanction and control. In the earliest Jewish literature the association of a name with a book was not intended in any case to indicate authorship. And the Book of Josh is no exception to the rule that such early writings, esp. when their contents are of a historical nature, are usually anonymous. The title is intended to describe, not authorship, but theme; and to represent that the life and deeds of Joshua form the main subject with which the book is concerned.

II. Contents.—With regard to the contents of Josh, it will be found to consist of two well-marked divisions, in the first of which (chs 1-12) are narrated the invasion and gradual conquest under the command of J. of the land on the W. of the Jordan; while the 2d part describes in detail the allotment of the country to the several tribes with the boundaries of their territories, and concludes with a brief notice of the death and burial of J. himself.

Ch 1: Renewal of the Divine promise to J. and exhortation to fearlessness and courage (vs 1-9); directions to the people to prepare for the passage of the river, and a reminder to the eastern tribes (Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh) of the condition under which they held their possession beyond Jordan; the renewal by these tribes of their pledge of loyalty to Moses' successor (vs 10-18).

1. Invasion and Conquest of Western Palestine

Ch 2: The sending of the two spies from Shittim and their escape from Jericho through the stratagem of Rahab.

Ch 3: The passage of Jordan by the people over against Jericho, the priests bearing the ark, and standing in the dry bed of the river until all the people had crossed over.

Ch 4: Erection of 12 memorial stones on the other side of Jordan, where the people encamped after the passage of the river (vs 1-14); the priests with the Ark of the Covenant ascend in their turn from out of the river-bed, and the waters return into their wonted course (vs 15-24).

Ch 5: Alarm excited among the kings on the W. of Jordan by the news of the successful crossing of the river (ver 1); circumcision of the people at Gilgal (vs 2-9); celebration of the Passover at Gilgal in the plains of Jericho (vs 10.11); cessation of the supply of the manna (ver 12); appearance to J. of the captain of the Lord's host (vs 13-15).

Ch 6: Directions given to J. for the siege and taking of Jericho (vs 1-5); capture of the city, which is destroyed by fire, Rahab and her household alone being saved (vs 6-25); a curse is pronounced on the man who rebuilds Jericho (ver 26).

Ch 7: The crime and punishment of Achan, who stole for himself part of the spoil of the captured city (vs 1. 16-26); incidentally his sin is the cause of a disastrous defeat before Ai (vs 2-12).

Ch 8: The taking of Ai by a stratagem, destruction of the city, and death of its king (vs 1-29); erection of an altar on Mt. Ebal, and reading of the Law before the assembled people (vs 30-35).

Ch 9: Gathering of the peoples of Pal to oppose J. (vs 1-2); a covenant of peace made with the Gibeonites, who represent themselves as strangers from a far country (vs 3-26); they are, however, reduced to a condition of servitude (ver 27).

Ch 10: Combination of 5 kings of the Amorites to punish the inhabitants of Gibeon for their defection, and defeat and rout of the kings by J. at Beth-horon (vs 1-14); return of the Israelites to Gilgal (ver 15); capture and death by hanging of the 5 kings at Makkedah (vs 16-27); taking and destruction of Makkedah (ver 28), Libnah (vs 29.30), Lachish (vs 31.32), Gezer (ver 33), Eglon (vs 34.35), Hebron (vs 36.37), Debir (vs 38.39), and summarily all the land, defined as from Kadesh-barnea unto Gaza, and as far N. as Gibeon (40-42); return to Gilgal (ver 43).

Ch 11: Defeat of Jabin, king of Hazor, and allied kings at the waters of Merom (vs 1-9); destruction of Hazor (vs 10-15); reiterated summary of J.'s conquests (vs 16-23).

Ch 12: Final summary of the Israelite conquests in Canaan, of Sihon and Og on the E. of the Jordan under the leadership of Moses (vs 1-6); of 31 kings and their cities on the W. of the river under J. (vs 7-24).

Ch 13: Command to J. to allot the land on the W. of the Jordan, even that which was still unsubdued, to the nine and a half tribes (vs 1-7); recapitulation of the inheritance given by Moses on the E. of the river (vs 8-13.32); the border of Reuben (vs 15-23), of Gad (vs 24-28), of the half-tribe of Manasseh (vs 29-31); the tribe of Levi alone received no landed inheritance (vs 14.33).

Ch 14: Renewed statement of the principle on which the division of the land had been made (vs 1-5); Hebron given to Caleb for his inheritance (vs 6-15).

Ch 15: The inheritance of Judah, and the boundaries of his territory (vs 1-20), including that of Caleb (vs 13-19); enumeration of the cities of Judah (vs 21-63).

Ch 16: Inheritance of the sons of Joseph (vs 1-4); the border of Ephraim (vs 5-10).

Ch 17: Inheritance of Manasseh and the border of the half-tribe on the W. of the Jordan (vs 1-13); complaint of the sons of Joseph of the insufficiency of their inheritance, and grant to them by J. of an extension of territory (vs 14-18).

Ch 18: The land yet unsubdued divided by lot into 7 portions for the remaining 7 tribes (vs 1-10); inheritance of the sons of Benjamin and the border of their territory (vs 11-20); enumeration of their cities (vs 21-28).

Ch 19: Inheritance of Simeon and his border (vs 1-9); of Zebulun and his border (vs 10-16); of Issachar and his border (vs 17-23); of Asher and his border (vs 24-31); of Naphtali and his border (vs 32-39); and of Dan and his border (vs 40-48); inheritance of Joshua (vs 49.50); concluding statement (ver 51).

Ch 20: Cities of Refuge appointed, three on each side of the Jordan.

Ch 21: 48 cities with their suburbs given to the Levites out of the territories of the several tribes (vs 1-41); the people had rest in the land, their enemies being subdued, according to the Divine promise (vs 43-45).

Ch 22: Dismissal of the eastern tribes to their inheritance, their duty to their brethren having been fulfilled (vs 1-9); the erection by them of a great altar by the side of the Jordan aroused the suspicion of the western tribes, who feared that they intended to separate themselves from the common cause (vs 10-20); their reply that the altar is to serve the purpose of a witness between themselves and their brethren (vs 21-34).

Ch 23: J.'s address of encouragement and warning to the people.

Ch 24: Second address of J., recalling to the people their history, and the Divine interventions on their behalf (vs 1-23); the people's pledge of loyalty to the Lord, and formal covenant in Shechem (vs 24.25); the book of the law of God is committed to writing, and a stone is erected as a permanent memorial (vs 26-28); death and burial of J. (vs 29-31); burial in Shechem of the bones of Joseph, brought from Egypt (ver 32); death and burial of Eleazar, son of Aaron (ver 33).

III. Historical Character and Chronology.—As a historical narrative, therefore, detailing the steps taken to secure the conquest and possession of Canaan, Josh is incomplete and is marked by many omissions, and in some instances at least includes phrases or expressions which seem to imply the existence of parallel or even divergent accounts of the same event, e.g. in the passage of the Jordan and the erection of memorial stones (chs 3, 4), the summary of the conquests of Joshua (10 40-43; 11 16-23), or the references to Moses' victories over the Amorite kings on the E. of the Jordan.

1. The Book of Josh as History

This last fact suggests, what is in itself sufficiently probable, that the writer or compiler of the book made use of previously existing records or narratives, not necessarily in every instance written, but probably also oral and traditional, upon which he relied and out of which by means of excerpts with modifications and omissions, the resultant history was composed. The incomplete and defective character of the book therefore, considered merely as a history of the conquest of Western Pal and its allotment among the new settlers, would seem to indicate that the "sources" available for the writer's use were fragmentary also in their nature, and did not present a complete view either of the life of J. or of the experiences of Israel while under his direction.

Within the limits of the book itself, moreover, notifications of chronological sequence, or of the length of time occupied in the various campaigns, are almost entirely wanting. Almost the only references to date or period are the statements that Joshua himself was 110 years old at the time of his death (24 29), and that his wars lasted "a long time" (11 18; cf 23 1). Caleb also, the son of Jephunneh, companion of J. in the mission of the spies from Kadesh-barnea, describes himself as 85 years old, when he receives Hebron as his inheritance (14 10; cf 15 13 ff); the inference would be, assuming 40 years for the wanderings in the desert, that 5 years had then elapsed since the passage of the Jordan ("on the tenth day of the first month" (4 19)). No indication, however, is given of the chronological relation of this event to the rest of the history; and 5 years would be too short a period for the conquest of Pal, if it is to be understood that the whole was carried out in consecutive campaigns under the immediate command of J. himself. On the other hand, "very much land" remained still unsubdued at his death (13 1). Christian tradition seems to have assumed that J. was about the same age as Caleb, although no definite statement to that effect is made in the book itself; and that, therefore, a quarter of a century, more or less, elapsed between the settlement of the latter at Hebron and Joshua's death (14 10; 24 29). The entire period from the crossing of the Jordan would then be reckoned at from 28 to 30 years.

IV. Sources of the Written Narrative.—The attempt to define the "sources" of Josh as it now exists, and to disentangle them one from another, presents considerably more difficulty than is to be encountered for the most part in the Pent. The distinguishing criteria upon which scholars rely and which have led serious students of the book to conclude that there may be traced here also the use of the same "documents" or "documentary sources" as are to be found in the Pent, are essentially the same. Existing and traditional accounts, however, have been used apparently with greater freedom, and the writer has allowed himself a fuller liberty of adaptation and combination, while the personal element has been permitted wider scope in molding the resultant form which the composition should take. For the most part, therefore, the broad line of distinction between the various "sources" which have been utilized may easily be discerned on the ground of their characteristic traits, in style, vocabulary or general conception; in regard to detail, however, the precise point at which one "source" has been abandoned for another, or the writer himself has supplied deficiencies and bridged over gaps, there is frequent uncertainty, and the evidence available is insufficient to justify an absolute conclusion. The fusion of material has been more complete than in the 5 books of the law, perhaps because the latter were hedged about with a more reverential regard for the letter, and at an earlier period attained the standing of canonicity.

A detailed analysis of the sources as they have been distinguished and related to one another by scholars is here unnecessary. A complete discussion of the subject will be found in Dr. Driver's LOTs, 105 ff, in other introductions, or in the Comms. on Josh. Not seldom in the ultimate detail the distinctions are precarious, and there are differences of opinion among scholars themselves as to the precise limit or limits of the use made of any given source, or at what point the dividing line should be drawn. It is only in a broad and general sense that in Josh esp. the literary theory of the use of "documents," as generally understood and as interpreted in the case of the Pent, can be shown to be well founded. In itself, however, such a theory is eminently reasonable, and is both in harmony with the general usage and methods of ancient composition, and affords ground for additional confidence in the good faith and reliability of the narrative as a whole.

V. Relation to the Book of Jgs.—A comparison moreover of the history recorded in Josh with the brief account in Jgs furnishes

1. Parallel Narratives ground for believing that a detailed or chronological narrative was not contemplated by the writer or writers themselves. The introductory vs of Jgs (1 1-2 5) are in part a summary of incidents recorded in Josh, and in part supply new details or present a different view of the whole. The original notices that are added relate almost entirely to the invasion and conquest of Southern Pal by the united or allied tribes of Judah and Simeon and the destruction of Bethel by the "house of Joseph." The action of the remaining tribes is narrated in a few words, the brief record closing in each case with a reference to the condition of servitude to which the original inhabitants of the land were reduced. And the general scheme of the invasion as there represented is apparently that of a series of disconnected raids or campaigns undertaken by the several tribes independently, each having for its object the subjection of the territory assigned to the individual tribe. A general and comprehensive plan of conquest under the supreme leadership of Joshua appears to be entirely wanting. In detail, however, the only real inconsistency between the two narratives would appear to be that in Jgs (1 21) the failure to expel the Jebusites from Jerus is laid to the account of the Benjamites, while in Josh (15 63) it is charged against the children of Judah. The difficulties in the way of the formation of a clear conception of the incidents attending the capture of Jerus are perhaps insuperable upon any hypothesis; and the variation of the tribal name in the two texts may be no more than a copyist's error.

A perhaps more striking omission in both narratives is the absence of any reference to the conquest of Central Pal. The narrative of the overthrow of Bethel and Ai (6 1-8 29) is followed immediately by the record of the building of an altar on Mt. Ebal and the recitation of the Law before the people of Israel assembled in front of Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (8 30 ff). Joshua then turns aside to defeat at Beth-horon the combination of the Amorite kings, and completes the conquest of the southern country as far south as Kadesh-barnea (10 41). Immediately thereafter he is engaged in overthrowing a confederacy in the far north (11 1-15), a work which clearly could not have been undertaken or successfully accomplished, unless the central region had been already subdued; but of its reduction no account is given. It has been supposed that the silence of the narrator is an indication that at the period of the invasion this district was in the occupation of tribes friendly or even related to the Israelite clans; and in support of the conjecture reference has been made to the mention of Israel on the stele of Merneptah, the Egypt ruler in whose reign, according to the most probable view, the exodus took place. In this record the nation or a part thereof is regarded as already settled in Pal at a date earlier by half a century than their appearance under Moses and Joshua on the borders of the Promised Land. The explanation is possible, but perhaps hardly probable. The defects of the historical record are irremediable at this distance of time, and it must be acknowledged that with the available material no complete and consistent narrative of the events of the Israelite conquest of Pal can be constructed.

VI. Place of Josh in the Heb Canon.—In the Heb Canon Josh is the first in order of the prophetic books, and the first of the group of 4, viz. Josh, Jgs, S, K, which form the "Earlier Prophets" (n'bhî'im rî'shônîm). These books, the contents of which are history, not prophecy in the ordinary sense of the term, were assigned by the Jews to the 2d division of their sacred Canon, and found a place by the side of the great writings of the "Later Prophets" (n'bhî'im 'ahărônîm). This position was given to them in part perhaps because they were believed to have been written or composed by prophets, but mainly because Jewish history was regarded as in purpose and intent "prophetic," being directed and presided over by Jeh Himself, and conveying direct spiritual instruction and example. The Canon of the Law, moreover, was already closed; and however patent and striking might be the resemblance of Josh in style and method of composition to the books of the Pent, it was impossible to admit it therein, or to give a place within the Torah, a group of writings which were regarded as of Mosaic authorship, to a narrative of events which occurred after Moses' death. Later criticism reviewed and reversed the verdict as to the true character of the book. In every Canon except the Heb, its historical nature was recognized, and the work was classified accordingly. Modern criticism has gone further, and, with increasing consciousness of its close literary relationship to the books of the Law, has united it with them in a Hexateuch, or even under the more comprehensive title of Octateuch combines together the books of Jgs and Ruth with the preceding six on the ground of similarity of origin and style.

VII. Greek and Other Ancient Versions.—In the ancient VSS of Josh there is not much that is of interest. The Gr tr bears witness to a Heb original differing little from the MT. In their renderings, however, and general treatment of the Heb text, the translators seem to have felt themselves at liberty to take up a position of greater independence and freedom than in dealing with the 5 books of the Law. Probably also the rendering of Josh into Gr is not to be ascribed to the same authors as the tr of the Pent. While faithful to the Heb, it is less constantly and exactly literal, and contains many slight variations, the most important of which are found in the last 6 chs.

Ch 19: The LXX transposes vs 47, 48, and, omitting the first clause of ver 47, refers the whole to the sons of Judah, without mention of Dan; it further adds vs 47a, 48a on the relation between the Amorites and Ephraim, and the Amorites and the Danites respectively. With ver 47a of 16 10 and Jgs 1 29, and with ver 48a of 19 47 (Heb) and Jgs 1 34.

Ch 20: Vs 4-6 inclusive are omitted in B, except a clause from ver 6; A, however, inserts them in full. Cf Driver, LOT, 112, who, on the ground of their Deuteronomistic tone, regards it as probable that the verses are an addition to P, and therefore did not form part of the original text as used by the Gr translators.

Ch 21: Vs 36, 37, which give the names of the Levitical cities in Judah, are omitted in the Heb printed text although found in many Heb MSS. Four vs also are added after ver 42, the first three of which repeat 19 50 f, and the last is a reminiscence of 5 3.

Ch 24: Vs 29 f which narrate the death and burial of J. are placed in the Gr text after ver 31; and a verse is inserted after ver 30 recording that the stone knives used for the purposes of the circumcision (5 2 f) were buried with Joshua in his tomb (cf 21 42d). After ver 33 also two new verses appear, apparently a miscellany from Jgs 2 6, 11-15; 3 7, 12, 14, with a statement of the death and burial of Phinehas, son and successor of Eleazar, of the idolatrous worship by the children of Israel of Astarte and Ashtaroth, and the oppression under Eglon, king of Moab.

The other VSS, with the exception of Jerome's tr from the Heb, are secondary, derived mediately through the Gr. The Old Lat is contained in a manuscript at Lyons, Cod. Lugdunensis, which is referred to the 6th cent. Of the Coptic version only small portions are extant; they have been published by G. Maspero, Mémoires de la mission archéologique française, tom. VI, fasc. 1, le Caire, 1892, and elsewhere. A Sam tr also is known, for parts of which at least an early origin and an independent derivation from the Heb have been claimed. The ancient character of the version, however, is contested, and it has been shown that the arguments on which reliance was placed are insufficient to justify the conclusions drawn. The tr appears to be in reality of quite recent date, and to have been made originally from the Arab, perhaps in part compared with and corrected by the MT. The subject was fully and conclusively discussed by Dr. Yehuda of Berlin, at the Oriental Congress in the summer of 1908, and in a separate pamphlet subsequently published. It was even stated that the author of the version was still living, and his name was given. Dr. Gaster, the original discoverer of the Sam MS, in various articles and letters maintains his contention that the tr is really antique, and therefore of great value, but he has failed to convince scholars. (See M. Gaster in JR, 15 [1908], 795 ff, 1148 ff; E. N. Adler, ib., 1143 ff. The text of the MS was published by Dr. Gaster in ZDMG [1908], 209 ff, and a specimen ch with Eng. rendering and notes in PSBA, XXXI [1909], 115 ff, 149 ff.)

VIII. Religious Purpose and Teaching.—As a whole, then, Josh is dominated by the same religious and hortatory purpose as the earlier writings of the Pent; and in this respect as well as in authorship and structure the classification which assigns to it a place by the side of the 5 books of Moses and gives to the whole the title of Hexateuch is not unjustified. The author or authors had in view not merely the narration of incident, nor the record of events in the past history of their people of which they judged it desirable that a correct account should be preserved, but they endeavored in all to subserve a practical and religious aim. The history is not for its own sake, or for the sake of the literal facts which it enshrines, but for the sake of the moral and spiritual lessons which may be elucidated therein, and enforced from its teaching. The Divine leading in history is the first thought with the writer. And the record of Israel's past presents itself as of interest to him, not because it is a record of events that actually happened, but because he sees in it the ever-present guidance and overruling determination of God, and would draw from it instruction and warning for the men of his own time and for those that come after him. Not the history itself, but the meaning and interpretation of the history are of value. Its importance lies in the illustrations it affords of the controlling working of a Divine Ruler who is faithful to His promises, loving righteousness and hating iniquity, and swaying the destinies of men in truth. Thus the selection of materials, and the form and arrangement of the book are determined by a definite aim: to set forth and enforce moral lessons, and to exhibit Israel's past as the working out of a Divine purpose which has chosen the nation to be the recipient of the Divine favor, and the instrument for the carrying forward of His purposes upon earth.

II. TRAITS OF HIS REIGN

1. Situation at the Beginning
2. Finding of the Law
3. The Great Reform
4. Disaster at Megiddo

The name given 6 years before the death of his grandfather Manassch resumes the Judaic custom, suspended in the case of that king and Amon, of compounding royal names with that of Jeh; perhaps a hint of the time, when, according to the Chronicler, Manassch realized Jeh's claim on his realm (2 Ch 33 12.13). One of the most eminent of the kings of Judah; came to the throne at 8 years of age and reigned c 637-608 BC.

I. Sources for His Life and Times.—The earliest history (2 K 22 1-23 30) is dispassionate in tone, betraying its prophetic feeling, however, in its acknowledgment of Jeh's wrath, still menacing in spite of Josiah's unique piety (2 K 23 26.27).

For "the rest of his acts" (to which the rather bald account of his death is relegated as a kind of appendix), it refers to "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah." In the later history (2 Ch 34, 35), written from the developed ecclesiastical point of view, he is considerably idealized: the festal and ceremonial aspects of his reform are more fully detailed, and the story of his campaign and death is more sympathetically told in the sense of it as a great national calamity.

For the spiritual atmosphere of his time and the prophetic consciousness of a day of wrath impending, the prophet Zephaniah is illustrating, the prophet Zephaniah is illustrating,

2. Prophetic minating, esp. for the first half of the reign. Jeremiah, born at about the same time as J., began prophesying in the 13th year of the reign (Jer 1 2). His intimate connection with state affairs, however, belongs to succeeding reigns; but some prophecies of his, notably those revealing his attitude toward the temple misuse (7 1-15) and toward the Deuteronomic reform (11 1-13), throw much light on the prevailing conditions. Nahum, writing near the end of the reign, and from an outlying village, is less concerned with home affairs than with the approaching end of Nineveh (fell 606 BC).

In Jesus Sirach's Praise of Famous Men there is a passage (Sir 49 1-4), wholly eulogistic of J., on the score that "in the days of wicked

3. Memorial men he made godliness to prevail"; and along with David and Hezekiah he is one of the three who alone did not "commit trespass." Jeremiah's lamentation for J., mentioned in 2 Ch 35 25, is not preserved to us; instead there is only an allusion (Jer 22 10), naming his successor Shallum (Jehoahaz) as a fitter subject. The lamentations which became "an ordinance in Israel" (2 Ch 35 25) are not to be referred to the Scripture book of that name; which has no hint of J., unless Lam 4 20 be so construed.

II. Traits of His Reign.—Until his 18th year 2 K gives no events of J.'s reign; 2 Ch, however, relates that in his 8th year (at 16 years of

1. Situation age) he "began to seek after the God at Beginning of David his father," and that in the 12th year he began the purgation of Judah and Jerus. The Chronicler may be mistaken in putting the completion of this work before the finding of the law (2 Ch 34 8), but of his disposition and of his beginning without documentary warrant on a work which Hezekiah had attempted before him, there is no reason to doubt. And indeed various influences were working together to make his procedure natural. The staunch loyalty to the Davidic house, as emphasized by the popular movement which seated him (see under AMON), would in itself be an influence to turn his mind to the God of David his father.

Manasseh's all-embracing idolatry had indeed reduced his aristocracy to a people "settled on their lees, that say in their heart, Jeh will not do good, neither will he do evil" (Zeph 1 12); but these represented merely the inertia, not the intelligence, of the people. Over against them is to be reckoned the spiritually-minded "remnant" with which since Isaiah the prophets had been working; a remnant now seasoned by persecution, and already committed to the virtue of meekness (Zeph 2 3) and the willing acceptance of affliction as their appointed lot, as against the arrogance of the "proudly exulting ones" (Zeph 3 11-13). To such courage and hope the redeeming element of Israel had grown in the midst of a blatant infidelity and worldliness. Nor were they so unconnected with the established order as formerly. The ministers of the temple-service, if not subjected to persecution, had been ranked on a level with devotees of other cults, and so had a common cause which would work to unite the sympathies of priests and prophets in one loyalty to Jeh. All this is adduced as indicating how the better elements of the nation were ripening for a forward step in enlightened religious progress.

The providential moment arrived when in the 18th year of his reign J. sent Shaphan the scribe to the temple to arrange with Hilkiah the high priest for the prescribed

2. Finding of the Law temple repairs. On giving his account of the funds for that purpose, Hilkiah also delivered to Shaphan a book which he had found in the "house of Jeh," that is, in the temple proper; which book, when Shaphan read therefrom to the king, caused the latter to rend his robe in dismay and consternation. It was a book in which were commands of Jeh that had long been unknown or disregarded, and along with these, fearful curses to follow the infraction of them. Such a discovery could not be treated lightly, as one might spurn a prophet or priest; nay, it immediately called the authority of the prophet into requisition. The king sent a deputation to Huldah the prophetess for her verdict on the book; and she, whether aware of its contents or not, assured him that the curses were valid, and that for impieties against which the prophets continually warned, all the woes written in the book were impending. One of the most voluminous discussions of Bib. scholarship has centered round the question what this book was, what its origin, and how it came there in the temple. The Chronicler says roundly it was "the book of the law of Jeh by the hand of Moses." That it was from the nation's great first prophet and lawgiver was the implicit belief of the king and all his contemporaries. There can be little doubt, judging from the nature of the reforms it elicited and the fact that the curses it contained are still extant, that this "book of the law" was virtually identical with our Book of Dt. But is this the work of Moses, or the product of a later literary activity? In answer, it is fair to say that it is so true to the soundest interpretation of the spirit and power of Moses that there need be no hesitation in calling it genuinely Mosaic, whatever adaptations and supplementations its laws received after his time. Its highly developed style, however, and its imperfect conformity to the nomadic conditions of Moses' time, make so remote an origin of its present form very doubtful. It comes to us written with the matured skill of Israel's literary prime, in a time too when, as we know (see under HEZEKIAH), men of letters were keenly interested in rescuing and putting to present use the literary treasures of their past. As to how it came to be left in the temple at a time so much before its discovery that none questioned its being what it purported to be, each scholar must answer for himself. Some have conjectured that it may have been a product of Solomon's time, and deposited, according to immemorial custom in temple-building, in the foundation of Solomon's temple, where it was found when certain ruins made repairs necessary. To the present writer it seems likelier that it was one of the literary products of Hezekiah's time, compiled from scattered statutes, precedents, and customs long in the keeping—or neglect—of priests and judges, put into the attractive form of oratory, and left for its providential moment. See further, DEUTERONOMY; WRITING.

J.'s immediate procedure was to call to the temple a representative assemblage—elders, prophets, priests, populace—and to read to them this "book of the covenant" (2 K 23 2). Then he made a solemn Reform covenant before Jeh to obey it, and all the people stood to the covenant.

So, perhaps for the first time, the people of Judah and Jerus had for their guidance not only the case decisions of judges and priests, nor only the emergency warnings and predictions of prophets, but a written and accessible document, covering in a large and liberal way the duties of their civic, social and religious life. One of the most momentous productions of all history, the book became the constitution of the Jewish race; nor were its noble provisions superseded when, centuries later, the tethers of race were broken and a Christian civilization came into its heritage. But the book that was destined to have so large a significance in all coming history had its immediate significance too, and never had this been so pressing. J.'s consternation arose from the sense of how much of the nation's obvious duty had been left undone and unregarded. First of all, they had through heedless years and ages drifted into a medley of religious ideas and customs which had accumulated until all this lumber of Manasseh's idolatry was upon them. Hezekiah had tried to clear away some of its most crude and superstitious elements (see under HEZEKIAH), but he was handicapped by the lack of its clear issue and objective, which now this book supplied. Zephaniah too was showing what Jeh's will was (Zeph 1 2-6); there must be a clean sweep of the debasing and obscuring cults, and the purgation must be done to stay. So J.'s first reforming step was to break up the high places, the numerous centers of the evil, to destroy the symbols and utensils of the idolatrous shrines and rites, and to defile them past resuscitation. His zeal did not stop with Jerus and Judah; he went on to Bethel, which had been the chief sanctuary of the now defunct Northern Kingdom, and in his work here was recognized the fulfillment of an old prophecy dating from the time of its first king (2 K 23 17; cf 1 K 13 1.2). This necessitated the concentration of public worship in the temple at Jerus, and in Dt was found the warrant for this, in the prescript, natural to Moses' point of view, that the worship of Israel must have a single center as it had in the wilderness. From this negative procedure he went on to the positive measure of reviving the festival services inseparable from a religion requiring pilgrimage, instituting a grand Passover on a scale unheard of since the time of the Judges (2 K 23 21.22), a feature of his reform on which the Chronicler dwells with peculiar zest (2 Ch 35 1-15). Thus both in the idolatries they must abolish and in the organized worship that they must maintain, the people were committed to a definite and documented issue; this it was which made J.'s reform so momentous. That the reform seemed after J.'s untimely death to have been merely outward, is what might reasonably be expected from the inveteracy of the unspirituality that it must encounter. Jeremiah had small faith in its saving power against the stubborn perversity of the people (Jer 11 1-14); and the historian of 2 K intimates that more than the piety of a zealous king was needed to turn away the stern decree of Jeh's anger (2 K 23 26.27). In spite of all hardness and apostasy, however, the nation that had once "stood to the covenant" of Dt could never again be at heart the nation it was before.

Ardent and pious as he was, there seems to have been a lack of balance in J.'s character. His extreme dismay and dread of the curse

4. Disaster pronounced on the realm's neglect of at Megiddo the law seems to have been followed, after his great reform had seemed to set things right, by an excess of confidence in Jeh's restored favor which went beyond sound wisdom, and amounted to presumption. The power of Assyria was weakening, and Pharaoh-necoh of Egypt, ambitious to secure control of Mesopotamia, started on the campaign in which he was eventually to suffer defeat at Carchemish. J., whose reforming zeal had already achieved success in Northern Israel, apparently cherished inordinate dreams of invincibility in Jeh's name, and went forth with a little army to withstand the Egypt monarch on his march through the northern provinces. At the first onset he was killed, and his expedition came to nothing. In his untimely death the fervid hopes of the pious received a set-back which was long lamented as one of the cardinal disasters of Israel. It was a sore calamity, but also a stern education. Israel must learn not only the enthusiasm but also the prudence and wisdom of its new-found faith.

JOSIAS, jō-si'as (TR Ἰωσίας, Iōsias; WH Ἰωσίας, Iōsēias):

(1) Gr form in AV of Josiah (Mt 1 10.11; cf 1 Esd 1; Bar 1 8), king of Judah.

(2) In 1 Esd 8 33 AV for JESIAS (q.v.).

JOSIBIAH, jos-i-bi'a. See JOSHIBIAH.

JOSIPHIAH, jos-i-fi'a (יוסףיה, yōsiphayāh, "Jeh adds"): Found in Ezr 8 10, where MT is "and of the sons of . . . Shelomith the son of Josiphiah." With the help of LXX A and 1 Esd 8 36, the name "Bani" (which is the same in the unpointed text as "the sons of" and was omitted through haplography) can be supplied above before "Shelomith." J. is thus the father of Shelomith, one of Ezra's companions. 1 Esd 8 36 has "Josaphias."

JOT, jot: "Jot" (RV, later edd of AV) is a corruption of iote (early edd of AV, Geneva, Rheims, Bishops—pronounced i-ō'te), an Eng. transliteration of iota, iota, the 9th letter of the Gr alphabet (Mt 5 18 ||). "Iota," in turn, is the nearest Gr equivalent for the Heb yōdh (י), the smallest letter of the Heb alphabet, in NT times being little larger than an Eng. accent ('). The tittle (q.v.) is the smallest part of a letter (not part of a 'i, however). Consequently, thinking of the law as written out, the sense of Mt 5 17, is: "From this code, so written, not the smallest letter nor part of a letter—not an 'i nor the crossing of a 't—shall be erased until all things come to pass." (For the meaning, see LAW.) The reference is to the synagogue rolls, which were written in Heb, so that the passage has no bearing on the language used by Christ. For the form of the "jot," cf the tables in HDB, art. "Alphabet," more fully in Chwolson, Corp. Inscr. Heb. (1882). See TITTLE.

JOTAPATA, jō-tap'a-ta (BJ, III, iii, 7). See JOTBATHAH.

JOTBAH, jōt'ba (יֹטְבָּחַ, yotbāh, "pleasantness"): The home of Meshullemeth, the mother of King Amon, daughter of Haruz (2 K 21 19). It may be the same as JOTBATHAH (q.v.).

JOTBATHAH, jōt'ba-tha (יֹטְבָּתָחַ, yotbāthāh): A desert camp of the Israelites between Hor-hagidgad and Abironah (Nu 33 33.34; Dt 10 7). It was "a land of brooks of water" (Dt 10 7). Site is unknown. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

JOTHAM, jō'tham (יֹחָזָבָב, yōhām, "Jeh is perfect"; יֹחָזָבָב, Iōthām):

(1) The youngest son of Gideon-Jerubbaal, the sole survivor of the massacre of his seventy brothers by Abimelech (Jgs 9 5), and (by 8 22) the legitimate ruler of Shechem after their death. Recognizing, however, that he is powerless to assert his claim, J. delivers from the summit of Gerizim his famous fable (9 7-15), applies it to the situation in hand, and then flees for his life to Beer (ver 21). Nothing more is told of him, but the downfall of Abimelech is referred in part to his "curse" (ver 57). The fable tells of the kingship of the trees which, after having been declined by all useful plants, was finally offered to the bramble. The latter, inflated by its unexpected dignity, pompously offers its "shade" to its faithful subjects, while threatening all traitors with punishment (brambles carry forest fires), quite in the manner of an oriental monarch on assuming the throne. Having thus parodied the relationship of the worthless Abimelech to the Shechemites, J. ironically wishes both parties joy of their bargain, which will end in destruction for all concerned. Otherwise the connection between the fable and its application is loose, for, while the fable depicts the kingship as refused by all properly qualified persons, in the application the Shechemites are upbraided for their treachery and their murder of the rightful heirs. In fact, the fable taken by itself would seem rather to be a protest against kings as a class (cf 1 S 8 10-18; 12 19, etc); so it is possible that either the fable or its application has become expanded in transmission. Or an older fable may have been used for the sake of a single salient point, for nothing is more common than such an imperfect reapplication of fables, allegories and parables.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

(2) Twelfth king of Judah, son of Uzziah and Jerusha, daughter of Zadok (2 K 15 32-38; 2 Ch 27 1-9). J. was 25 years of age

1. Accession at the time of his father's attack of and leprosy, and was at once called upon Regency to take the administration of the kingdom (2 K 15 5; 2 Ch 26 21). In doing this he not only judged the people of the land by presiding at the administration of justice, but also was over the household of the king, showing how complete was the isolation of his father. He was thus king in all but name, and is invariably spoken of as reigning in Jerus. His reign lasted for 16 years (2 K 15 33; 2 Ch 27 1), 759-744 (others put later). While the father loved husbandry and had much cattle (2 Ch 26 10)—external affairs with which he could occupy himself in his retirement—to the son fell the sterner duties and heavier responsibilities of the state.

The relation between father and son is well brought out in the Chronicler's account of the Ammonite war. In 2 Ch 26 8 we are told that "the Ammonites gave tribute [AV "gifts"] to Uzziah," such gifts being compulsory, and of the nature of tribute. In 2 Ch 27 5 we are told that the actual conquest of Ammon was made by J., and that for 3 successive years he compelled them to pay an annual subsidy of 100 talents of silver and 10,000 "cors" each of wheat and barley (the cor [Heb kōr] was about 10 bushels). The campaign on the E. of the Jordan was the only one in which J. took part, but as the state suffered no loss of territory during his regency, the external provinces must have been strongly held and well governed.

It is probable that before attempting to win any extension of territory, J. had spent some years in completing the unfinished building

3. Jotham's schemes in which his father was engaged at the time of his affliction. Building Like him, he became an enthusiastic Operations builder (2 Ch 27 3.4). He is recorded to have built towers, castles and cities, and specifically to have completed the Ophel wall in Jerus, which is still standing to the S. of the Haram area. But the crowning architectural glory of his reign was the completion of the temple court by erecting, or setting up, "the upper gate of the house of Jeh" (ver 3; 2 K 15 35). This particular gate was the entrance to, and exit from, the upper or new court of the temple, which had been begun so long ago as the time of Asa (cf the writer's Solomon's Temple, Part II, ch viii). Its situation is perfectly known, as it bore the same name and place in the Herodian temple as in each of its predecessors. It stood facing the S., and was on higher ground than any other of the temple gates. Hence its name. It gave entrance to that upper court of the temple, mentioned in Jer 36 10, where it is spoken of as "the new gate of Jeh's house." As Jeremiah began his ministry about a century after J.'s death, Jeremiah's use of the name commemorates the fact that the gate was not built till long after the other parts of the structure.

During J.'s regency, a formidable combination of the Northern Kingdom and the Syrian state, with 4. The Damascus as capital, began to show signs of hostility to Judah. For 4 years before J.'s death, Pekah occupied the throne of Samaria. The Syrian Assyrian king, Tiglath-pileser III, was then pushing his arms westward, and a League Syrian league was formed to oppose them. J. may have refused to join this league. The political situation at his death is thus described: "In those days Jeh began to send against Judah Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah" (2 K 15 37).

J.'s character is represented in a moderately favorable light, it being put to his credit that he did not enter the temple (2 Ch 27 2). The wisdom and

5. Condition vigor of his administration, and of his of Judah policy for the defence of the country, are recognized. It was owing to his completion of his father's plans for the protection of Jerus, and of the building of country fortresses, that Hezekiah, a few years afterward, was able to show so stout a resistance to Sennacherib. But within the state itself corruption and oppression were rife. The great prophets, Isaiah, Hosea and Micah, exercised their ministries in J.'s days, and in their pages we have a graphic picture of the moral condition of the time. Isa does not name J., except in the title (Isa 1 1; cf 7 1), but chs 1-5 of his book were probably written in this reign. Hosea's writings go back to the last years of Jeroboam II, who died the year J. came to the throne. Micah's evidence is valuable, telling us that Omri had formulated and published rules for the cult of the Zidonian Baal, and that these "statutes" were kept by some of the citizens of Samaria, and, possibly, of Jerus (Mic 6 16).

J.'s name appears in the royal genealogical list of 1 Ch 3 12, and in the genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1 9).

JOURNEY, jûr'ni. See DAY'S JOURNEY; SAB-BATH DAY'S JOURNEY.

JOY, joi (שִׂמְחָה, simhâh; χαρά, chard): The idea of joy is expressed in the OT by a wealth of synonymous terms that cannot easily be

1. Terms differentiated. The commonest is simhâh (1 S 18 6, etc), variously tr'd in EV "joy," "gladness," "mirth"; from sāmēh, properly "to be bright," "to shine" (Prov 13 9, "The light of the righteous rejoiceth," lit. "is bright"), but generally used fig. "to rejoice," "be glad" (Lev 23 40 and very frequent).

Other nouns are māsôs and sāsôn, both from sûs, properly "to spring," "leap," hence "exult," "rejoice"; rinnâh, "shouting," "joy"; gîl, from vb. gîl or gûl, "to go in a circle," hence "be excited" (dancing round for joy), "rejoice." In the NT, far the commonest are chara, "joy," chairo, "to rejoice" (cf χαίρει, châris, "grace"). But we have also agalliasis, which expresses "exuberant joy," "exultation" (not used in classical Gr, but often in LXX; in the NT, Lk 1 14.44; Acts 2 46; Jude ver 24; He 1 9), and the corresponding vb. agallidô (-domai), "to exult," "rejoice exceedingly" (Mt 5 12, etc). In EV we have sometimes "to joy" (now obsolete as a vb.), used in an intransitive sense = "to rejoice" (Hab 3 18; 2 Cor 7 13, etc).

Besides joy in a general sense, as the response of the mind to any pleasurable event or state (1 K 1 40; Est 8 17, etc), joy as a religious

2. In the emotion is very frequently referred to in the OT. Religion is conceived of as touching the deepest springs of emotion, including the feeling of exultant gladness which often finds outward expression in such actions as leaping, shouting, and singing. Joy is repeatedly shown to be the natural outcome of fellowship with God. "In thy presence is fulness of joy; in thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (Ps 16 11; cf vs 8.9). God is at once the source (Ps 4 7; 61 12) and the object (Ps 35 9; Isa 29 19) of religious joy. The phrase "rejoice [be glad] in Jeh" and similar expressions are of frequent occurrence (e.g. Ps 97 12; 149 2; Isa 61 10; Zec 10 7). Many aspects of the Divine character call forth this emotion, such as His lovingkindness (Ps 21 6.7; 31 7), His salvation (Ps 21 1; Isa 25 9; Hab 3 18), His laws and statutes (Ps 1 2; 119 passim), His judgments (Ps 48 11), His words of comfort in dark days (Jer 15 15.16). The fundamental fact of the sovereignty of God, of the equity of the Divine government of the world, gives to the pious a joyous sense of security in life (Ps 93 1 f; 96 10; 97 1) which breaks forth into songs of praises in which even inanimate Nature is poetically called upon to join (Ps 96 11-13; 98 4-9). In the case of those who held such views of God, it was natural that the service of God should elicit a joyous spirit ("I will offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy," Ps 27 6; cf 1 Ch 29 9), a spirit which is abundantly manifest in the jubilant shouting with which religious festivities were celebrated, and the trumpet-sound which accompanied certain sacrifices (2 S 6 15; Ps 33 1-3; Nu 10 10; 2 Ch 29 27), and esp. in psalms of praise, thanksgiving and adoration (Pss 47, 81, 100, etc). "Rejoice before Jeh your God" is an oft-repeated phrase in Dt with reference to the sacrificial feast (e.g. 12 12). But joy is a Divine, as well as a human, emotion; for God Himself is represented in the OT, not as a rigid, impassible Being, but as susceptible to pleasure and pain. God may be conceived of as "rejoicing in his works" (Ps 104 31; cf Gen 1 31), and over His people "for good" (Dt 30 9). "He will rejoice over thee [Zion] with joy; he will rest in his love; he will joy over thee with singing" (Zeph 3 17). Such noble and vivid anthropomorphisms are a nearer approach to the truth than the abstract doctrine of the impassibility of God which, owing to Platonic influences, dominated the theology of the early Christian centuries.

The element of joy in religion is still more prominent in the NT. It is the appropriate response of the believer to the "good tidings of

3. In the great joy" which constitute the gospel NT (Lk 2 10). In the four Gospels, esp.

Lk, this element is conspicuous. It is seen in the canticles of Lk 1 and 2. It is both exemplified in the life and character, and set forth in the teaching of Jesus. There are many intimations that, in spite of the profound elements of grief and tragedy in His life, His habitual demeanor was gladsome and joyous, certainly not gloomy or ascetic: such as, His description of Himself as bridegroom, in defence of His disciples for not fasting (Mk 2 18-20); the fact that He came "eating and drinking," giving occasion to the charge that He was "a gluttonous man and a winebibber" (Mt 11 19); His "rejoicing in the Holy Spirit" (Lk 10 21); the fact that His presence was found to be congenial at social festivities (Mk 14 3; Lk 14 1; Jn 12 1), and at the wedding in Cana (Jn 12 1 ff); His mention of "my joy" (Jn 15 11; 17 13). His teaching with reference to His followers harmonizes with this. The Christian virtues confer on those who attain them not only beatitude, a calm and composed state of felicity (Mt 5 3-11), but also a more exuberant state of joy, which is in sharp contrast to the "sad countenance" of the hypocrites (6 16) ("Rejoice, and be exceeding glad," 5 12). This spirit is reflected in many of the parables. The discovery of the true treasure of life brings joy (Mt 13 44). The three parables in Lk 15 reveal the joy of the Divine heart itself at the repentance of sinners (see esp. vs 5-7.9.10.22-24.32). The parable of the Talents lays stress on the "joy of the Lord" which is the reward of faithfulness (Mt 25 21.23). Jesus confers on His followers not only peace (Jn 14 27; 16 33), but participation in His own fulness of joy (Jn 15 11; 16 24; 17 13), a joy which is permanent, in contrast to the sorrow which is transient (16 22). In the dark days of disappointment that succeeded the crucifixion, the joy of the disciples passed under a cloud, but at the resurrection (Lk 24 41) and still more on the day of Pentecost it emerged into light, and afterward remained a marked characteristic of the early church (Acts 2 46 f; 8 39; 13 52; 15 3). Paul speaks of joy as one of the fruits of the spirit (Gal 5 22) and of "joy in the Holy Spirit" as an essential mark of the kingdom of God (Rom 14 17). This joy is associated with faith (Phil 1 25), hope (Rom 5 2; 12 12), brotherly fellowship and sympathy (Rom 12 15; 2 Cor 7 13; Phil 2 1 f). To "rejoice in the Lord" is enjoined as a Christian duty (Phil 3 1; 4 4; cf 2 17 f; 1 Thess 5 16). In Christ, the Christian "rejoices with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (1 Pet 1 8), in spite of his temporary afflictions (ver 6). Christian joy is no mere gaiety that knows no gloom, but is the result of the triumph of faith over adverse and trying circumstances, which, instead of hindering, actually enhance it (Acts 5 41; Rom 5 3 f; Jas 1 2.12; 5 11; 1 Pet 4 13; cf Mt 5 11.12). Even Our Lord Himself "for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame" (He 12 2).

JUBILEE, jōw'bi-lē, jū'bi-lē, CYCLE OF THE. See Luni-solar cycle, under ASTRONOMY, I, 5.

JUBILEE YEAR (שָׁנַת הַיְּבִיבֹת, shēnath ha-yōbbhēl; ἔτος τῆς ἀφέσεως, étos tēs aphéseōs; annus jubilaus, "year of jubilee" [Lev 25 13], or simply יִבְיָבֹל, ha-yōbbhēl, "the jubilee" [25 28; cf Nu 36 4], AV and ERV Jubile): The Heb word yōbbhēl stands for keren ha-yōbbhēl, meaning the horn of a ram. Now, such a horn can be made into a trumpet, and thus the word yōbbhēl came to be used as a synonym of trumpet. According to Lev 25 9 a loud trumpet should proclaim liberty throughout the country on the 10th day of the 7th month (the Day of Atonement), after the lapse of 7 sabbaths of years=49 years. In this manner, every 50th year was to be announced as a jubilee year. All real property should automatically revert to its original owner (25 10; cf ver 13), and those who, compelled by poverty, had sold themselves as slaves to their brothers, should regain their liberty (25 10; cf ver 39).

In addition to this, the Jubilee Year was to be observed after the manner of the sabbatic year, i.e. there should be neither sowing nor reaping nor pruning of vines, and everybody was expected to live on what the fields and the vineyards produced "of themselves," and no attempt should be made at storing up the products of the land (25 11 f). Thus there are three distinct factors constituting the essential features of the Jubilee Year: personal liberty, restitution of property, and what we might call the simple life.

The 50th year was to be a time in which liberty should be proclaimed to all the inhabitants of the country. We should, indeed, diminish

1. Personal Liberty the import of this institution if we should apply it only to those who were to be freed from the bonds of physical servitude. Undoubtedly, they must have been the foremost in realizing its beneficial effects. But the law was intended to benefit all, the masters as well as the servants. They should never lose sight of their being brothers and citizens of the theocratic kingdom. They owed their life to God and were subject to His sovereign will. Only through loyalty to Him were they free and could ever hope to be free and independent of all other masters.

The institution of the Jubilee Year should become the means of fixing the price of real property (25 15 f; cf vs 25-28); moreover, it

2. Restitu- tion of Property should exclude the possibility of selling any piece of land permanently (25 23), the next verse furnishing the motive:

"The land is mine: for ye are strangers and sojourners with me." The same rule was to be applied to dwelling-houses outside of the walled cities (25 31), and also to the houses owned by Levites, although they were built within walled cities (ver 32).

In the same manner the price of Heb slaves was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year (25 47-54). This passage deals with the enslaving of a Hebrew by a foreigner living among the Jews; it goes without saying that the same rule would hold good in the case of a Hebrew selling himself to one of his own people.

In 27 17-25 we find a similar arrangement respecting such lands that were "sanctified unto Jeh." In all these cases the original owner was at liberty to redeem his property at any time, or have it redeemed by some of his nearest relatives (25 27-29.48 ff; 27 19).

The crowning feature, though, was the full restitution of all real property in the Jubilee Year. The primary object of this regulation was, of course, the reversion of all hereditary property to the family which originally possessed it, and the reestablishment of the original arrangement regarding the division of the land. But that was not all; for this legal disposition and regulation of external matters was closely connected with the high calling of the Jewish people. It was a part of the Divine plan looking forward to the salvation of mankind. "The deepest meaning of it (the Jubilee Year) is to be found in the ἀποκατάστασις τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ, apokatástasis tēs basileías tou theou, i.e. in the restoring of all that which in the course of time was perverted by man's sin, in the removing of all slavery of sin, in the establishing of the true liberty of the children of God, and in the delivering of the creation from the bondage of corruption to which it was subjected on account of man's depravity" (Rom 8 19 ff) (cf Keil, Manual of Bib. Archaeology). In the Year of Jubilee a great future era of Jeh's favor is foreshadowed, that period which, according to Isa 61 1-3, shall be ushered in to all those that labor and are heavy laden, by Him who was anointed by the spirit of the Lord Jehovah.

The Jubilee Year, being the crowning point of all sabbatical institutions, gave the finishing touch as it were to the whole cycle of sabbatic

3. The Simple Life days, months and years. It is, therefore, quite appropriate that it should be a year of rest for the land like the preceding sabbatic year (Lev 25 11 f). It follows, of course, that in this instance there were two years, one after the other, in which there should be no sowing or systematic ingathering. This seems to be clear from Lev 25 18-22: "And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat of the fruits, the old store; until the ninth year, until its fruits come in, ye shall eat the old store." Thus in the 7th and 8th years the people were to live on what the fields had produced in the 6th year and whatever grew spontaneously. This shows the reason why we may say that one of the factors constituting the Jubilee Year was the "simple life." They could not help but live simply for two consecutive years. Nobody can deny that this afforded ample opportunity to develop the habit of living within very limited means. And again we see that this external part of the matter did not fully come up to the intention of the Lawgiver. It was not the simple life as such that He had in view, but rather the laying down of its moral and religious foundations. In this connection we must again refer to 25 18-22, "What shall we eat the seventh year?" The answer is very simple and yet of surpassing grandeur: "Then I will command my blessing upon you," etc. Nothing was expected of the people but faith in Jeh and confidence in His power, which was not to be shaken by any doubtful reflection. And right here we have found the root of the simple life: no life without the true God, and no simplicity of life without true faith in Him. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Mt 4 4; cf Dt 8 3).

We may well ask: Did the Jewish people ever observe the Jubilee Year? There is no reason why they should not have observed it in pre-exilic times (cf Lotz in New Sch-Herz, X, s.v. "Sabbatical Year" and "Year of Jubilee"). Perhaps they signally failed in it, and if so, we should not be surprised at all. Not that the institution in itself was cumbered with any obstacles that could not have been overcome; but what is more common than unbelief and unwillingness to trust absolutely in Jeh? Or, was it observed in post-exilic times? Here, too, we are in the dark. There is, indeed, a tradition according to which the Jubilee Year has never been observed—neither in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah nor at any later period. The truth of this seems to be corroborated by the silence of Jos, who, while referring quite frequently to the sabbatic year, never once mentions the Year of Jubilee.

JUDAEA, jōō-dē'a, jū-dē'a ('Ioudaia, Ioudata): The "land of the Jews," the Gr-Rom equivalent of Judah. As most of the Israelites returning from the captivity belonged to the tribe of Judah, they came to be called Jews and their land Judaea. In Tob 1 18 the name is applied to the old kingdom of Judah. For a general description of the physical geography and early history of this region see JUDAH. The limits of this district varied greatly, extending as the Jewish population increased, but in many periods with very indefinite boundaries.

Under the Pers empire, Judaea (or Judah) was a district administered by a governor who, like Zerubbabel (Hag 1 14; 2 2), was probably usually a Jew. Even as late as Judas Maccabaeus, Hebron and its surroundings—the very heart of old Judah—was under the domination of the Edomites, whom, however, Judas conquered (1 Macc 5 65); in the time of his brother Jonathan (145 BC), three tetrarchies of Samaria, Aphacrema, Lydda and Ramathaim, were added to Judaea (1 Macc 10 30.38; 11 34); in some passages it is referred to at this time as the "land of Judah" ('Iouda) (1 Macc 10 30.33.37). The land was then roughly limited by what may be called the "natural boundaries of Judah" (see JUDAH).

Strabo (xvi.11, 21) extends the name Judaea to include practically all Pal; as does Lk (4 44m; 23 5; Acts 2 9; 10 37, etc). In several NT references (Mt 4 25; Mk 1 5; 3 7; Lk 5 17; Jn 3 22; Acts 1 8), Judaea is contrasted with its capital Jerus. The country bordering on the shores of the Dead Sea for some miles inland was known as the Wilderness of Judaea (see JUDAH; JESHIMON) (Mt 3 1), or "the wilderness" (Mk 1 4; Lk 3 2); here John the Baptist appeared as a preacher.

According to Mt 19 1 (but cf Mk 10 1, where RV has "Judaea and beyond Jordan"), some cities beyond Jordan belonged to Judaea. That this was an actual fact we know from Ptolemy (v.16,9) and Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 11).

According to Jos (BJ, III, iii, 5), Judaea extended from Anuath-Borkacos (i.e. Khan Berkil near Khan es Sâweh, close to the most northerly frontier of Judah as described in JUDAH [q.v.]) to the village Jordan, possibly Tell 'Arād, near Arabia in the S. Its breadth was from Joppa in the W. to Wilderness of Judaea.

Jordan in the E. The seacoast also as far north as Ptolemais ('Akka), except Jamnia, Joppa and (according to the Talm) Caesarea, belonged to this province.

After the death of Herod the Great, Archelaus received Judaea, Samaria and Idumaea as his ethnarchy, but on his deposition Judaea was absorbed into the Rom province of Syria, the procurator of which lived at Caesarea.

Of later history it is only necessary to notice that in the 5th cent. Judaea became part of the land known as Palaestina Prima; that at the time of the Lat kingdom of Jerus (12th cent.) all the hill country of Judah from Sujil to Tekoa was the royal domain, while the southern section to Beer-sheba belonged to the Seigneur de St. Abraham (i.e. of Hebron); and lastly that a district, the rough equivalent of the kingdom of Judah, though larger, and of the Judaea described by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 5), though slightly smaller, forms today the Mutasarrif of el Kuds, an administrative area where more than in any spot in the world the problem of the "land of the Jews" is today increasingly acute.

JUDAH (יְהוּדָה, y'hūdāh; in Gen 29 35 B, 'Ioudav, Ioudan, A, 'Iouda, Iouda; elsewhere B and A, 'Ioudas, Ioudas): The 4th son born

1. Jacob's to Jacob by Leah in Paddan-aram (Gen 29 35, etc.). Of this patriarch's life only scanty details remain to us. He turned his brethren from their purpose to slay Joseph, persuading them to sell him to the Midianites at Dothan (37 26 ff). A dark stain is left upon his memory by the disgraceful story told in ch 38. Reuben forfeited the rights of primogeniture by an act of infamy; Simeon and Levi, who came next in order, were passed over because of their cruel and treacherous conduct at Shechem; to J., therefore, were assigned the honors and responsibilities of the firstborn (34; 35 22; 49 5 ff). On the occasion of their first visit to Egypt, Reuben acted as spokesman for his brethren (42 22, 37). Then the leadership passed to J. (43 3, etc). The sons of Joseph evidently looked askance upon J.'s promotion, and their own claims to hegemony were backed by considerable resources (49 22 ff). The rivalry between the two tribes, thus early visible, culminated in the disruption of the kingdom. To J., the "lion's whelp," a prolonged dominion was assured (49 9 ff).

The tribe of Judah, of which the patriarch was the name-father, at the first census in the wilderness numbered 74,600 fighting men; 2. Tribe of at Sinai the number "from 20 years old and upward" was 76,500 (Nu 1 27; 26 22; see NUMBERS). The standard of the camp of J., with which were also the tribes of Zebulun and Issachar, was to the E. of the tabernacle "toward the sunrising," the prince of J. being Nahshon, the son of Amminadab (2 3). Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, represented J. among the spies (13 6); he also was told off to assist at the future allocation of the tribal portions (34 19).

The land assigned to J. lay in the S. of Pal (see JUDAH, TERRITORY OF), comprising part of the mountain, the Shephelah, and the

3. Territory maritime plain. The information given of its conquest is meager and cannot be arranged in a self-consistent story. In Josh 11 21 ff, the conquest is ascribed to Joshua. Caleb is described as conquering at least a portion in Josh 14 12; 15 13 ff; while in Jgs 1 the tribes of J. and Simeon play a conspicuous part; and the latter found a settlement in the S. within the territory of J. The tribal organization seems to have been maintained after the occupation of the land, and J. was so loosely related to the northern tribes that it was not expected to help them against Sisera. Deborah has no reproaches for absent J. It is remarkable that no judge over Israel (except Othniel, Jgs 3 9-11) arose from the tribe of J. The first king of all Israel was chosen from the tribe of Benjamin. This made acquiescence on the part of J. easier than it would have been had Saul sprung from the ancient rival, Ephraim. But the dignity of J. was fully vindicated by the splendid reigns of David and Solomon, in lineal descent from whom the Saviour of the world should come. The further history of the tribe is merged in that of Israel.

13. Summary

1. Canaan before the Monarchy.—Some 4,000 years BC the land on either side of the valley of the Jordan was peopled by a race who, to whatever stock they belonged, were not Semites. It was not until about the year 2500 BC that the tide of Sem immigration began to flow from North Arabia into the countries watered by the Jordan and the Euphrates. One of the first waves in this human tide consisted of the Phoenicians who settled in the N.W., on the seashore; they were closely followed by other Can. tribes who occupied the country which long bore their name.

The Canaanites are known to us chiefly from the famous letters found at Tell Amarna in Egypt which describe the political state of the country during the years 1415-1360 BC—the years of the reigns of Amenophis III and Canaanites IV. Canaan was at this time slipping out of the hands of Egypt. The native princes were in revolt: tribute was withheld; and but few Egypt garrisons remained. Meantime a fresh tide of invasion was hurling its waves against the eastern frontiers of the land. The newcomers were, like their predecessors, Sem Bedawin from the Syrian desert. Among them the Am Tab name the Chabiri, who are, no doubt, the people known to us as the Hebrews.

The Hebrews are so named by those of other nationality after one of their remoter ancestors (Gen 10 24), or because they had come from beyond ('ēber) the Jordan or the Euphrates. Of themselves they spoke collectively as Israel. Israel was a name assumed by the eponymous hero of the nation whose real name was Jacob. Similarly the Arabian prophet belonged to the tribe called from its ancestor Koraish, whose name was Fihir. The people of Israel were a complex of some 12 or 13 tribes. These 12 tribes were divided into two main sections, one section tracing its descent from Leah, one of Jacob's wives, and the other section tracing its descent from Rachel, his other wife. The names of the tribes which claimed to be descended from Leah were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and, indirectly, Gad and Asher; those which claimed to be descended from Rachel were Joseph, which was divided into two clans; Ephraim and Manasseh, Benjamin, and, indirectly, Dan and Naphtali. The rivalry between these two great divisions runs all through the national history of the Hebrews, and was only brought to an end by the annihilation of one of the opposing factions (Isa 11 13). But not only was the Israelitish nation a combination of many clans; it was united also to other tribes which could not claim descent from Israel or Jacob. Such tribes were the Kenites and the Calebites. Toward such the pure Israelite tribes formed a sort of aristocracy, very much as, to change the parallel, the tribe of Koraish did among the Arabs. It was rarely that a commander was appointed from the allied tribes, at least in the earlier years of the national life.

We find exactly the same state of things obtaining in the history of the Arabian conquests. All through that history there runs the rivalry between the South Arabian tribes descended from Kahtān (the Heb Joktan, Gen 10 25, etc) and the northern or Ishmaelite tribes of Moqār. It is often stated that the OT contains two separate and irreconcilable accounts of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. According to the Book of Josh. it is said the invasion was a movement of the whole people of Israel under the leadership of Joshua; according to the Book of Jgs, it consisted of a series of expeditions made by individual tribes each on its own account (Jgs 1 2,10, etc.). But again, in the history of the Arabs we find precisely the same apparent discrepancy. For Persia, Syria and Egypt were conquered by the Arabs as a whole; but at the same time no tribe lost its individuality; each tribe made expeditions on its own account, and turned its arms against rival tribes even in the enemy's country. On the confines of China in the E. and in Spain on the W., the arms of the Yemen's tribes were employed in the destruction of those of Modar as fiercely as ever they had been within Arabia itself.

The bond which united the Israelite tribes, as well as those of Kayin (the eponym of the Kenites) and Caleb, was that of the common worship of Jeh.

5. The Bond of Union

As Mohammed united all the tribes of Arabia into one whole by the doctrine of monotheism, so did Moses the Israelite tribes by giving them a common object of worship. And the sherifs or descendants of 'Ali today occupy a position very like what the Levites and the descendants of Aaron must have maintained in Israel. In order to keep the Israelite nation pure, intermarriage with the inhabitants of the invaded country was forbidden, though the prohibition was not observed (Jgs 3 5 f.). So too, the Arab women were not permitted to marry non-Arabs during the first years of conquest.

It is customary to date the beginning of monarchy in Israel from Saul the son of Kish, but in point of fact many early leaders were kings in fact if not in name. Moses and Joshua may be compared with Mohammed and his caliph (properly khalifa) or "successor," Abu Bekr.

6. Early Rulers

Their word was law; they reigned supreme over a united nation. Moreover, the word "king" (melekh) often means, both in Heb and Arab., nothing more than governor of a town, or local resident. There was more than one "king" of Midian (Jgs 8 12). Balak seems to have been only a king of Moab (Nu 22 4).

Before the monarchy proper, the people of Israel formed, in theory, a theocracy, as did also the Arabs under the caliphs. In reality they were ruled by temporary kings called judges (shophet, the Carthaginian sufes). Their office was not hereditary, though there were exceptions (cf Jgs 9). On the other hand, the government of the Northern Kingdom of Israel was practically an elective monarchy, so rarely were there more than two of the same dynasty. The judge again was usually appointed in order to meet some special crises, and the theoretically ideal state of things was one in which there was no visible head of the state—a republic without a president. These intervals, however, always ended in disaster, and the appointment of another judge. The first king also was elected to cope with a specially serious crisis. The main distinction between judge and king was that the former, less than the latter, obscured the fact of the true King, upon the recognition of whom alone the continued existence of the nation depended. The rulers then became the "elders" or sheikhs of the tribes, and as these did not act in unison, the nation lost its solidarity and became an easy prey to any invader.

7. The Judges

During the period of the Judges a new factor entered into the disturbed politics of Canaan. This was an invader who came not from the eastern and southern deserts, but from the western sea. Driven out of Crete by invaders of the race of Minos found refuge on the shores of the country which ever after took from them the name it still bears—Philistia or Palestine. At the same time the Ammonites and Midianites were pressing into the country from the E. (1 S 11). Caught between these two opposing forces, the tribes of Israel were threatened with destruction. It was felt that the temporary sovereignty of the judge was no longer equal to the situation. The supreme authority must be permanent. It was thus the monarchy was founded. Three motives are given by tradition as leading up to this step. The pretext alleged by the elders or sheikhs is the worthlessness and incapacity of Samuel's sons, who he intended should succeed him (1 S 8). The immediate cause was the double pressure from the Philis (1 S 9 16) and the Ammonite king (12 12). The real reason was that the system of government by elective kings or judges had proved a failure and had completely broken down. The times called for a hereditary monarchy.

II. The First Three Kings.—The most warlike of the clans of Israel shortly before this had been that of Benjamin—one of the Rachel tribes. The national sanctuary, with the ark and the grandson of Aaron as priest, was at Bethel in their territory.

Moreover, they had defeated the combined forces of the other tribes in two pitched battles. They had at last been defeated and almost exterminated, but they had recovered much of their strength and prestige (Jgs 20; 1 S 4 12). From this tribe the first king was chosen (see SAUL). He, however, proved unequal to his task. After some years spent in war with the Philis and in repressing supposed disloyalty at home, he was defeated and killed.

Meantime, one of the less-known clans was coming to the front. The territory of the tribe of J. lay in the S. After its occupation (cf Jgs 1 2,3), the tribe of J. appears to have settled down to the care of its flocks and herds. It is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah. None of the judges belonged to it, unless Ibzan, who seems to have been of little account (Jgs 12 8 f.). Under the leadership of DAVID (q.v.), this tribe now came to the front, and proved in the end to be endowed with by far the greatest vitality of all the tribes. It outlived them all, and survives to this day.

The Rachel tribes, led by Benjamin and Ephraim (2 S 2, 3), resisted for some time the hegemony of J., but were obliged in the end to submit. Under David Israel became again a united whole. By making Jerus his capital on the borders of J. and Benjamin, he did much to insure the continuance of this union (cf 1 Ch 9 3). The union, however, was only on the surface. By playing off the Rachel tribes, Benjamin and Ephraim, against the rest, Absalom was able to bring the whole structure to the ground (2 S 15 ff), the tribe to which Saul belonged being esp. disloyal (2 S 16 5 ff). Nor was this the only occasion on which the smoldering enmity between the two houses burst out into flame (2 S 20). As soon as the strong hand of David was removed, disaffection showed itself in several quarters (1 K 11 14 ff), and esp. the aspiration of the tribe of Ephraim, after independence was fomented by the prophets (11 26 ff). Egypt afforded a convenient asylum for the disaffected until opportunity should ripen. They had not long to wait.

Solomon was succeeded by Rehoboam, who found it politic to hold a coronation ceremony at Shechem as well, presumably, as at Jerus.

3. The Disruption

The malcontents found themselves strong enough to dictate terms. These Rehoboam rejected, and the northern tribes at once threw off their allegiance to the dynasty of David. The disruption thus created in the Israelite nation was never again healed. The secession was like that of the Moors in Spain from the 'Abbásid caliphs. Henceforth "Israel," except in the Chronicler, denotes the Northern Kingdom only. In that writer, who does not recognize the kingdom of the ten tribes, it means Judah. It is usual at the present day to recognize in the Northern Kingdom the true Israelite kingdom. Certainly in point of extent of territory and in resources it was far the greater of the two. But as regards intellectual power and influence, even down to the present day, not to mention continuity of dynasty, the smaller kingdom is by far the more important. It is, therefore, treated here as the true representative of the nation. Lying, as it did, in the immediate vicinity of Jerus, the tribe of Benjamin could hardly do otherwise than throw in its lot with that of J. Bethel, which became one of the religious capitals of the Northern Kingdom, although nominally within their territory, in fact belonged to Ephraim (Jgs 1 22 ff). With this union of opposing interests may be compared that of the 'Alids and 'Abbásids, both belonging to the house of Mohammed and both aspirants to the caliphate, against the house of Umeiya.

III. The Dual Monarchy.—Rehoboam made no decisive attempt to bring back the recalcitrant tribes to their allegiance (1 K 12 21 ff),

1. War between Two Kingdoms though the two countries made raids, one upon the other (14 30). For his own security he built numerous fortresses, the remains of some of which have, it is probable, been recovered within recent years (2 Ch 11 5 ff). These excited the suspicion of Shishak of Egypt, who invaded the country and reduced it to vassalage (1 K 14 25 ff). Under Rehoboam's son Abijah, actual war broke out between the two kingdoms (15 6 as corrected in ver 7; 2 Ch 13). The war was continued during the long reign of his son Asa, whose opponent, Baasha, built a fort some 6 miles N. of Jerus in order to cut off that city from communication with the N. Asa confessed his weakness by appealing for help to Ben-hadad of Damascus. The end justified the means. The fort was demolished.

The reign of Asa is also remarkable for the first of those reformations of worship which recur at intervals throughout the history of the

2. First Reform of Religion Southern Kingdom. The high places were not yet, however, considered illegitimate (1 K 15 14; but cf 2 Ch 14 5). He also, like his grandfather, was a builder of castles, and with a similar, though more fortunate, result (2 Ch 14 6.9 ff). Asa's old age and illness helped to bring to the rival kingdoms a peace which lasted beyond his own reign (1 K 15 23).

An effect of this peace is seen in the expanding foreign trade of the country under his successor

3. Two Kingdoms at Peace Jehoshaphat. He rebuilt the navy as in the days of Solomon, but a storm ruined the enterprise (1 K 22 48 ff). During this reign the two kingdoms came nearer being united than they had done since the disruption. This was no doubt largely due to the Northern Kingdom having been greatly weakened by the wars with Syria and Assyria, and having given up the idea of annexing the smaller country. Moreover, Jehoshaphat had married his son Joram (Jehoram) to Ahab's daughter Athaliah. From a religious point of view, the two states reacted upon one another. Jehoram of Israel inaugurated a reformation of worship in the Northern Kingdom, and at the same time that of J. was brought into line with the practice of the sister kingdom (2 K 8 18). The peace, from a political point of view, did much to strengthen both countries, and enabled them to render mutual assistance against the common foe.

Up to the death of Jehoram of Israel, which synchronized with that of Joram and Ahaziah of J., 6 kings had reigned in J. Of these the first 4 died in

4. Two Kingdoms Contrasted their beds and were buried in their own mausoleum. During the same period of about 90 years there were in Israel 9 kings divided into 4 dynasties. The second king of the 1st Dynasty was immediately assassinated and the entire family annihilated. Precisely the same fate overtook the 2nd Dynasty. Then followed a civil war in which two pretenders were killed, one perishing by his own hand. The 3rd Dynasty lasted longer than the first two and counted 4 kings. Of these one was defeated and killed in battle and another assassinated. The fate of the kings of Israel is very like that of the middle and later 'Abbasid caliphs. The murder of his brothers by the Judean Jehoram, a proceeding once regular with the sultans of Turkey, must also be put down to the influence of his Israelite wife.

It was obvious that a crisis was impending. Edom and Libnah had thrown off their allegiance, and the Philis had attacked and plundered Jerus, even the king's sons being taken prisoners, with the exception of the youngest (2 Ch 21 16). Moreover, the two kingdoms had become so closely united, not only by intermarriage, but also in religion and politics, that they must stand and fall together. The hurricane which swept

5. Revolution in the Northern Kingdom away the northern dynasty also carried off the members of the southern royal house more nearly connected with Ahab, and the fury of the queen-mother Athaliah made the destruction complete (2 K 11 1).

For 6 years the daughter of Ahab held sway in Jerus. The only woman who sat on the throne of David was a daughter of the hated

6. Effect on the Southern Kingdom Ahab. In her uniqueness, she thus holds a place similar to that of Shejer ed-Durr among the Memlük sultans of Egypt. The character of her reign is not described, but it can easily be imagined. She came to her inevitable end 6 years later.

Successive massacres had reduced the descendants of David until only one representative was left.

7. Davidic House at Lowest Ebb Jehoram, the last king but one, had murdered all his brothers (2 Ch 21 4); the Arab marauders had killed his sons except the youngest (22 1; cf 21 17). The youngest, Ahaziah, after the death of his father, was, with 42 of his "brethren," executed by Jehu (2 K 10 14). Finally, Athaliah "destroyed all the seed royal." The entente with the Northern Kingdom had brought the Davidic dynasty to the brink of extinction.

But just as 'Abd er-Rahmān escaped from the slaughter of the Umayyads to found a new dynasty in Spain, so the Davidic dynasty made

8. Begins to Recover a fresh start under Joash. The church had saved the state, and naturally the years that followed were years in which the religious factor bulked large. The temple of Baal which Athaliah had built and supported was wrecked, the idols broken, and the priest killed. A fund was inaugurated for the repair of the national temple. The religious enthusiasm, however, quickly cooled. The priests were found to be diverting the fund for the restoration of the temple to their own uses. A precisely similar diversion of public funds occurred in connection with the Karawityn mosque in Fez under the Almoravids in the 12th cent. The reign which had begun with so much promise ended in clouds and darkness (2 K 12 17 ff; 2 Ch 24 17 ff; Mt 23 35), and Joash was the first of the Judacan kings to be assassinated by his own people (2 K 12 20 f).

By a curious coincidence, a new king ascended the throne of Syria, of Israel and of Judah about the same time. The death of Hazael,

9. Reviving Fortunes and accession of Ben-hadad III led to a revival in the fortunes of both of the Israelite kingdoms. The act of clemency with which Amaziah commenced his reign (2 K 14 5.6; Dt 24 16) presents a pleasing contrast to the moral code which had come to prevail in the sister kingdom; and the story of his hiring mercenaries from the Ephraimite kingdom (2 Ch 25 5-10) sheds a curious light on the relations subsisting between the two countries, and even on those times generally. It is still more curious to find him, some time after, sending, without provocation, a challenge to Jehoash; and the capture and release of Amaziah evinces some rudimentary ideas of chivalry (2 K 14 8 ff). The chief event of the reign was the reconquest of Edom and taking of Petra (2 K 14 7).

The principle of the election of kings by the people was in force in Judah, although it seemed to be in abeyance since the people were content to limit their choice to the Davidic line. But it was exercised when occasion required.

10. Monarchy Still Elective Joash had been chosen by the people, and it was they who, when the public discontent culminated in the assassination of Amaziah, chose his 16-year-old son Uzziah (or Azariah) to succeed him.

The minority of the king involved something equivalent to a regency. As Jehoiada at first carried on the government for Joash, 11. Government by Regents so Uzziah was at first under the tutelage of Zechariah (2 Ch 26 5), and the latter part of his reign was covered by the regency of his son Jotham.

It is obvious that with the unstable dynasties of the north, such government by deputy would have been impracticable.

The reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26) was one of the most glorious in the annals of the Judaean kingdom. The Philis and southern Arabs, 12. Period of Great Prosperity who had been so powerful in the reign of Jehoram, were subdued, and other Bedawin were held in check.

The frontiers were strengthened with numerous castles. Now that Edom was again annexed, the Red Sea trade was resumed. Irrigation was attended to, and the agricultural resources of the country were developed. Uzziah also established a standing army, properly equipped and trained. Artillery, in the shape of catapults and other siege engines, was manufactured. It is obvious that in this reign we have advanced far beyond the earlier and ruder times.

In this and the preceding reigns, we notice also how the priests are becoming a distinct and powerful caste. Zadok and Abiathar were

13. Rise of Priestly Caste no more than the domestic chaplains of David. The kings might at pleasure discharge the functions of the priest.

But the all-powerful position of Jehoiada seems to have given the order new life; and in the latter part of the reign of Uzziah, king and priest come into conflict, and the king comes off second-best (2 Ch 26 16 ff).

Uzziah is the first king of J. to be mentioned in the Assyrian annals. He was fighting against "Pul" in the years 742-740. The advent of the 14. Advent of Assyria great eastern power upon the scene of Judaean politics could end but in one way—as it was soon to do with Israel also.

The reign of Jotham may be passed over as it coincided almost entirely with that of his father. But in the following reign we find J. already paying tribute to Assyria in the year of the fall of Damascus and the conquest of the East-Jordan land, the year 734.

During the regency of Jotham, the effeminacy and luxury of the Northern Kingdom had already begun to infect the Southern (Mic 1 9;

15. Judah a Protectorate 6 16), and under the irresolute Ahaz the declension went on rapidly. This rapprochement in morals and customs did not prevent Israel under Pekah joining with Rezin of Syria against J., with no less an object than to subvert the dynasty by placing an Aramaean on the throne (Isa 7 6). What the result might have been, had not Isaiah taken the reins out of Ahaz' hands, it is impossible to say. As it was, J. felt the strain of the conflict for many a year. The country was invaded from other points, and many towns were lost, some of which were never recovered (2 Ch 28 17 ff). In despair Ahaz placed himself and his country under the protection of Assyria (2 K 16 7 ff).

It was a part of the cosmopolitan tendencies of the time that the worship became tarnished with foreign innovations (2 K 16 10). The temple for the first time in its history was closed (2 Ch 28 24).

16. Cosmopolitan Tendencies Altars of Baal were set up in all the open spaces of Jerus, each representing some urban god (Jer 11 13). About the closing of the temple Isaiah would not be greatly concerned. Perhaps it was his suggestion (cf Isa 1). The priests who were supreme in the preceding reigns had lost their influence: their place had been taken by the prophets. The introduction of Baalism, however, was no doubt due to Ahaz alone.

IV. Period of Decline.—The following reign—that of Hezekiah—was, perhaps as a result of the

1. Judah Independent disappearance of the Northern Kingdom, a period of reformation. Isaiah is now supreme, and the history of the times will be found in his biography.

It must have been with a sigh of relief that Hezekiah saw the Northern Kingdom disappear forever from the scene. The relations of the two countries had been too uniformly hostile to make that event anything but an omen for good. It was no doubt due to Isaiah that Hezekiah sought to recover the old independence of his country. Their patriotism went near to be their own undoing. Sennacherib invaded Pal, and Hezekiah found himself shorn of everything that was outside the walls of Jerus. Isaiah's patriotism rose to the occasion; the invading armies melted away as by a miracle; J. was once more free (2 K 18 13 ff).

A curious result of Sennacherib's invasion was the disappearance of the high places—local shrines

2. Reform of Religion where Levitical priests officiated in opposition to those of the temple.

When the Judaean territories were limited to the city, these of necessity vanished, and, when the siege was over, they were not restored. They were henceforward regarded as illegal. It is generally held by scholars that this reform occurred later under Josiah, on the discovery of the "Book of the Law" by Hilkiah in the temple (2 K 22 8), and that this book was Dt. The high places, however, are not mentioned in the law book of Dt. The reform was probably the work of Isaiah, and due to considerations of morals.

The Judaeans had always had a friendly feeling toward Egypt. When the great eastern power

3. Egypt and Judah became threatening, it was to Egypt they turned for safety. Recent excavation has shown that the influence of Egypt upon the life and manners of Pal was very great, and that that of Assyria and Babylonia was comparatively slight, and generally confined to the N. In the reign of Hezekiah a powerful party proposed an alliance with Egypt with the view of check-mating the designs of Assyria (2 K 17 4; Isa 30 2,3; 31 1). Hezekiah followed Isaiah's advice in rejecting all alliances.

The commercial and other ties which bound Pal to Egypt were much stronger than those between Pal and the East. One of the most considerable

4. Traffic in Horses of these was the trade in horses. This traffic had been begun by Solomon (1 K 10 28 f). The chief seat of the trade in Pal was Lachish (Mic 1 13). In their nomadic state the Israelites had used camels and donkeys, and the use of the horse was looked upon with suspicion by the prophets (Dt 17 16; Zec 9 10). When the horse is spoken of in the OT, it is as the chief weapon of the enemies of the nation (Ex 15 1; Jgs 5 22, etc.).

On the death of Hezekiah, the nation reverted to the culture and manners of the time of Ahaz and even went farther than he in corrupt

5. Reaction under Manasseh practices. Esp. at this time human sacrifice became common in Israel (Mic 6 7). The influence for good of the prophets had gone (2 K 21). There is a curious story in 2 Ch 33 11 f that Manasseh was taken captive by the Assyrians, and, after spending some time in captivity in Babylon, reformed and was restored to his throne. His son, however, undid these reforms, and public discontent grew to such an extent that he was assassinated (2 K 21 19 ff).

Once more the tide turned in the direction of reform, and on this occasion it rose higher than ever before. The reformation under Josiah

6. Triumph of Reform Party was never again wholly undone. The enthusiasm of the iconoclasts carried them far beyond the frontiers of Judah (2 Ch 34 6), for on this occasion they were backed up by the newly found "Book of the Law." All boded well for a prosperous reign, but unforeseen disasters came from without. The Scythian invasion swept over Southwestern Asia (Jer 1 14-16; 6 1, etc). The storm passed, and hope rose higher than before, for the power of Assyria had been shattered forever.

Already in 722, when Sargon seized the throne on the death of Shalmaneser, Babylonia had revolted, and crowned Marduk-baladan king (Isa 39 1). Hezekiah received a deputation from Babylonia (2 K 20 12 ff), no doubt in the hope of freeing himself from the Assyrian danger by such an alliance. The revolt of Merodach-baladan was maintained for 12 years; then it was suppressed. There was, however, a second revolt of Babylonia on the accession of Sennacherib, Sargon's son, in 705, which went on till 691, and the events referred to in 2 K 20 may have happened at this time, for Hezekiah's reign seems to have ended prosperously.

Sennacherib was assassinated in 681 (Isa 37 38) and was succeeded by his son Esar-haddon, who rebuilt Babylon, razed to the ground by his father, and under whom the province remained quiet. In 674 hostilities with Egypt broke out, and that country was overrun, and TIRHAKAH (q.v.) was expelled in 670. Two years later, however, occurred the revolt of Egypt and the death of Esar-haddon. Assur-bani-pal succeeded, and Egypt regained her independence in 660. The revolt of Babylonia, the incursion of the Scythians (Jer 1 14 ff) and the death of Assur-bani-pal followed. Two more kings sat on the throne of Assyria, and then Nineveh was taken by the combined Scythians (Mandor) and Babylonians (Herod. i.74; Nah; Zeph 2 13-15; Hab 1 5 f).

The Scythian tempest passed quickly, and when it was over the Assyrian peril was no more. Pharaoh-necho seized the opportunity to avenge the injuries of his country by the invasion of the erstwhile Assyrian territories. Josiah, pursuing the policy of alliance with Babylonia inaugurated by Hezekiah, endeavored to arrest his progress. He was defeated and mortally wounded at Megiddo (Zec 12 11).

By the foolhardy action of Josiah, J. lost its independence. The people, indeed, elected Jehoahaz (Shallum) king, but he was imme-

10. Judah Again Dependent diately deposed and carried to Egypt by the Pharaoh (Jer 22 10 ff; Ezk 19 3 f), who appointed Jehoiakim (Eliakim) as vassal-king. After the defeat of the Pharaoh at Carchemish, the old Hittite stronghold, by Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoia- kim submitted, and J. became a dependency of Babylon. There must have been some return of prosperity, for Jehoia- kim is denounced for his luxury and extravagance and oppressive taxation (Jer 22 13 ff), but the country was raided by the neighboring Bedawin (2 K 24 2), and Jehoia- kim came to an untimely end (Jer 22 19).

The prophets were no longer, as under Hezekiah, all-powerful in the state. The influence of Jeremiah was no doubt great, but the majority 11. Prophets was against him. His program was both unpopular in itself and it had the fatal defect of being diametrically opposed to that of Isaiah, the patriot-politician (if such there be), who had saved the state from shipwreck. Isaiah had preached reliance upon the national God and through it the political independence of the nation. It was the sad duty of Jeremiah to advise the surrender of the national independence to the newly risen power of Babylon. (Jer 21 4.9; 38 2, etc). Isaiah had held that the Holy City was impregnable (2 K 19 32); Jeremiah was sure that it would be taken by the Chaldeans (Jer 32 24.43). Events proved that each prophet was right for the time in which he lived.

Jehoia- kim was the only Judacan king who was a vassal first to one overlord and then to another.

12. The Deportations J. took a step downward in his reign. It was under him also that the first deportation of the Judaeans occurred (Dnl 1 1-17). He was succeeded by his son Jehoia- chin who, on account of a rebellion which closed the reign of his father, was ere long deported, along with the best of the nation (Jer 22 24 ff; Ezk 19 5 ff). A 3d son of Josiah, Mattaniah, was set on the throne under the title of Zedekiah. Against the advice of Jeremiah, this, the last king of J., declared himself independent of Babylon, and threw in his lot with Egypt under Pharaoh Hophra (Apries), thus breaking his oath of fealty (Ezk 17 15 ff). On the advance of the Chaldeans, J. was deserted by her allies, the Edomites and Philis (see BOOK OF OB), and soon only Lachish (Tell el-Hesi), Azekah (probably Tell Zakarya) and Jerus remained in the hands of Zedekiah. The siege of the city lasted two years. It was taken on the fatal 9th of Ab in the year 586. Zedekiah's family was put to the sword, and he himself was taken to Babylon. Egypt shared the fate of J., with whom she had been often so closely connected, and Hophra was the last of the Pharaohs.

The kingdom of J. had lasted 480 years, counting from its commencement, exactly twice as long as

13. Summary the kingdom of Israel, counting from the disruption. No doubt this longer existence was due in the first place to the religious faith of the people. This is clear from the fact that the national religion not only survived the extinction of the nation, but spread far beyond its original territories and has endured down to the present day. But there were also circumstances which conspired to foster the growth of the nation in its earliest and most critical period. One of these was the comparative isolation and remoteness of the country. Neither the kingdom of Israel nor that of Judah is for a moment to be compared to those of Egypt and Assyria. Even the combined kingdom under David and Solomon hardly deserves that comparison; and separate, the Northern Kingdom would be about the size of New Hampshire and the Southern Kingdom about that of Connecticut. The smaller kingdom survived the larger because it happened to be slightly farther removed from the danger zone. Even had the two kingdoms held together, it is impossible that they could have withstood the expansion of Assyria and Babylonia on the one side and of Egypt on the other. The Egypt party in Judacan politics in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah were so far in the right, that, if J. could have maintained her independence in alliance with Egypt, these two countries combined might have withstood the power of Assyria or Babylon. But it is because this ancient race, tracing its descent from remote antiquity, preserved its religious, at the expense of its national, independence, that its lit. continues to mold much of the thought of Europe and America today. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. THOMAS HUNTER WEIR

I. Geographical Data.—Although the physical conformation of Western Pal divides this land into very definite areas running longitudinally N. and S., yet all through history there has been a recognition of a further—and politically more important—division into 3 areas running transversely, known in NT times as Galilee, Samaria and Judaea. These districts are differentiated to some extent by distinctive physical features which have in no small degree influenced the history of their inhabitants.

The southernmost of these regions possesses on 3 sides very definite natural boundaries: to the W. the Mediterranean, to the E. the Dead Sea, and the Jordan, and to the S. 60 miles. N. to S., of practically trackless desert, a frontier as secure as sea or mountain range. On the N. no such marked "scientific frontier" exists, and on this the one really accessible side, history bears witness that the frontier has been pushed backward and forward. The most ideal natural northern frontier, which only became the actual one comparatively late in Heb times (see JUDAEA), is that which passes from the river 'Aujeh in the W., up the Wādī Deir Balāt, by the wide and deep Wādī Ishār to 'Akrabbah and thence E. to the Jordan. A second natural frontier commences at the same line on the W., but after following the Wādī Deir Balāt, branches off southward along the Wādī Nīmr (now traversed by the modern carriage road from Jerus to Nablūs), crosses the water-parting close to the lofty Tell Ashūr, and runs successively down the Wādī Sanieh and the Wādī 'Aujeh and by the eastern river 'Aujeh to the Jordan. This division-line is one conformable to the physical features, because north of it the table-lands of "Judaea" give place to the more broken mountain groups of "Samaria." Another less natural, though much more historic, frontier is that which traverses the Vale of Ajalon, follows the Beth-horon pass, and, after crossing the central plateau near el Jib (Gibeon) and er Rām (Ramah of Benjamin), runs down the deep and rugged Wādī Suweint, between Jeba' (Geba) and Mukhmās (Michmash), to Jericho and the Jordan. It was along this line that the great frontier fortresses, Bethel, Gibeon, Ramah, Adasa, Geba and Michmash, were erected. Such, on the N., S., E., and W., were the natural boundaries of the southern third of Pal; yet in all history the land thus inclosed scarcely ever formed a homogeneous whole.

Within these boundaries lay four very different types of land—the maritime plain, the "lowland" or Shephelah, the "hill country" and, the Nat- included usually with the last, the ural Divi- desert or Jeshimon.

2. The Nat- ural Divi- sions of Judah (1) The maritime plain, the "land of the Philis" (1 S 6 1; 27 1; 2 K 8 2; Zeph 2 5), was ideally though never actually, the territory of Judah (cf Josh 15 45-47); it may have been included, as it is by some modern writers, as part of the Shephelah, but this is not the usual use of the word. It is a great stretch of level plain or rolling downs of very fertile soil, capable of supporting a thriving population and cities of considerable size, esp. near the sea-coast.

(2) The Shephelah (sh-phēlāh), or "lowland" of Judah (Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; 11 2.16; 15 33-44; 1 K 10 27; 1 Ch 27 28; Jer 17 26).—In these references the word is variously rendered in AV, usually as "vale" or "valley," sometimes, as in the last two, as "plain." In RV the usual rendering is "lowland." In 1 Macc 12 38, AV has "Shephela" and RV "plain country." The word "Shephelah" appears to survive in the Arab. Sifla about Beit Jibrin.

This is a very important region in the history of Judah. It is a district consisting mainly of rounded hills, 500-800 ft. high, with fertile open valleys full of corn fields; caves abound, and there are abundant evidences of a once crowded population. Situated as it is between the "hill country" and the maritime plain, it was the scene of frequent skirmishes between the Hebrews and the Philis; Judah failed to hold it against the Philis who kept it during most of their history. The Shephelah is somewhat sharply divided off from the central mountain mass by a remarkable series of valleys running N. and S. Commencing at the Vale of Ajalon and passing S., we have in succession the Wādī el Ghurāb and, after crossing the Wādī es Siwān, the Wādī en Najil, the Wādī es Sūnt (Elah) and the Wādī es Sār. It is noticeable that the western extremity of the most historic northern frontier of ancient Judah—that limited by the Vale of Ajalon in the W.—appears to have been determined by the presence of this natural feature. N. of this the hills of Samaria flatten out to the plain without any such intervening valleys.

(3) The hill country of Judah is by far the most characteristic part of that tribe's possessions; it was on account of the shelter of these mountain fastnesses that this people managed to hold their own against their neighbors and hide away from the conquering armies of Assyria and Egypt. No other section of the country was so secluded and protected by her natural borders. It was the environment of these bare hills and rugged valleys which did much to form the character and influence the lit. of the Jews. The hill country is an area well defined, about 35 miles long and some 15 broad, and is protected on three sides by natural frontiers of great strength; on the N. alone it has no "scientific frontier." On the S. lay the Negeb, and beyond that the almost waterless wilderness, a barrier consisting of a series of stony hills running E. and W., difficult for a caravan and almost impracticable for an army. On the W. the hills rise sharply from those valleys which delimit them from the Shephelah, but they are pierced by a series of steep and rugged defiles which wind upward to the central table-land. At the northwestern corner the Beth-horon pass—part of the northern frontier line—runs upward from the wide Vale of Ajalon; this route, the most historic of all, has been associated with a succession of defeats inflicted by those holding the higher ground (see BETH-HORON). S. of this is the Wādī 'Alī, up which runs the modern carriage road to Jerus, and still farther S. lies the winding rocky defile, up part of which the railway from Jaffa is laid, the Wādī es Surār. A more important valley, because of its width and easier gradient, is the great Vale of Elah (Wādī es Sūnt), to guard the highest parts of which (now the Wādī es Sār) was built the powerful fortress of Beth-zur (2 Ch 11 7, etc), which Jos (Ant, XIII, v, 6) describes as "the strongest place in all Judaea" (see BETH-ZUR). Up this pass the Syrians successfully with the aid of elephants (Ant, XII, ix, 4) invaded Judaea. The eastern frontier of the hill country is one of extraordinary natural strength. Firstly, there were the Jordan and the Dead Sea; then along all but the northernmost part of the eastern frontier lay a long line of semi-precipitous cliffs, in places over 1,000 ft. high, absolutely unscalable and pierced at long intervals by passes all steep and dangerous. Within this again came a wide area of waterless and barren desert, the Wilderness of Judah (or Judaea) known in EV as JESHIMON (q.v.). To the northeasterly part of the frontier, where the ascent from the Jericho plain to the mountains presents no special difficulty in gradation, the waterless condition of the Jeshimon greatly restricted the possible routes for an enemy. The natural position for the first line of defence was the fortified city of Jericho, but as a frontier fortress she failed from the days of Joshua onward (see JERICHO). From Jericho four roads pass upward to the plateau of Judah; unlike the corresponding passes on the western frontier, they do not traverse any definite line of valley, but in many places run actually along the ridges.

These roads are: (a) The earliest historically, though now the least frequented, is the most northerly, which passes westward at the back of ancient Jericho (near Ain es Sullân) and ascends by Michmash and Ai to Bethel; (b) the route traversed by the modern Jerusalem road; (c) the more natural route which enters the hills by Wady Joreif Ghûsal and runs by Nebi Mûsa, joining the line of the modern carriage road a mile or so after passing the deserted ruin of the Saracenic Khan el Ahmar. Here runs the road for the thousands of pilgrims who visit the shrine of Nebi Mûsa in the spring. (d) The most natural pass of all is by way of Wady el Kunesterah, across the open plateau of el Bukeia and over the shoulder of Jebel el Muntâr to Bethlehem. From Ain Feshkhah a very steep road, probably ancient, ascends to join this last route in el Bukeia. From En-gedi (Ain Jidy) a steep ascent—almost a stairway—winds abruptly to the plateau above, whence a road passes northwesterly by the Wady Husâgeh past Tekoa to Bethlehem and Jerus, and another branch goes west to Hebron and Juttah.

Somewhere along these routes must have lain the "Ascent of Ziz" and the "Wilderness of Jeruel," the scene of the events of 2 Ch 20. The hill country of Judah is distinguished from other parts of Pal by certain physical characteristics. Its central part is a long plateau—or really series of plateaus—running N. and S., very stony and barren and supplied with but scanty springs: "dew" is less plentiful than in the north; several of the elevated plains, e.g. about Bethlehem, Beit Jâla and Hebron, are well suited to the growth of corn and olive trees; in the sheltered valleys and on the terraced hillsides to the W. of the water-parting, vines, olives, figs and other fruit trees flourish exceedingly. There is evidence everywhere that cultivation was far more highly developed in ancient times; on most of the hill slopes to the W. traces of ancient terraces can still be seen (see BOTANY). This district in many parts, esp. on its eastern slopes, is preëminently a pastoral land, and flocks of sheep and goats abound, invading in the spring even the desert itself. This last is ever in evidence, visible from the environs of all Judah's greater cities and doubtless profoundly influencing the lives and thoughts of their inhabitants.

The altitude attained in this "hill country" is usually below 3,000 ft. in the north (e.g. Ramallah, 2,850 ft., Nebi Samwîl, 2,935 ft.), but is higher near Hebron, where we get 3,545 ft. at Râmet el Khulîl. Many would limit the term "hill country of Judaea" to the higher hills centering around Hebron, but this is unnecessary. Jerus is situated near a lower and more expanded part of the plateau, while the higher hills to its north, are, like that city itself, in the territory of Benjamin.

II. The Tribe of Judah and Its Territory.—In Nu 26 19–22, when the tribes of the Hebrews are enumerated "in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho" (ver 3), Judah is described as made up of the families of the Shelanites, the Perezites, the Zerahites, the Hezronites and the Hamulites. "These are the families of Judah according to those that were numbered of them," a total of 76,500 (ver 22). In Jgs 1 16 we read that the Kenites united with the tribe of J., and from other references (Josh 14 6–15; 15 13–19; Jgs 1 12–15.20) we learn that the two Kenizzite clans of Caleb and Othniel also were absorbed; and it is clear from 1 S 27 10; 30 29 that the Jerahmeelites—closely connected with the Calebites (cf 1 Ch 2 42)—also formed a part of the tribe of J. The Kenizzites and Jerahmeelites were probably of Edomite origin (Gen 36 11; cf 1 Ch 2 42), and this large admixture of foreign blood may partly account for the comparative isolation of J. from the other tribes (e.g. she is not mentioned in Jgs 5).

The territory of the tribe of J. is described ideally in Josh 15, but it never really extended over the maritime plain to the W. The natural frontiers to the W. and E. have already been described as the frontiers of the "hill country"; to the S. the boundary is described as going "even to the wilderness of Zin southward, at the uttermost part of the south," i.e. of the Negeb (ver 1), and (ver 3) as far south as Kadesh-barnea, i.e. the oasis of Ain Kadis, 50 miles S. of Beersheba, far in the desert; the position of the "Ascent of Akabbim," i.e. of scorpions, is not known. The "Brook of Egypt" is generally accepted to be the Wady el 'Arish. The fact is, the actual frontier shaded off imperceptibly into the desert—varying perhaps with the possibilities of agriculture and depending therefore upon the rainfall. The cities mentioned as on the boundaries, whose sites are now lost, probably roughly marked the edge of the habitable area (see NEGEB).

The northern boundary which separated the land of J. from that of Benjamin requires brief mention. The various localities mentioned in Josh 15 5–12 are dealt with in separate articles, but, omitting the very doubtful, the following, which are generally accepted, will show the general direction of the boundary line: The border went from the mouth of the Jordan to Beth-hoglah (Ain Hajlah), and from the Valley of Achor (Wady Kelt) by the ascent of Adummin (Tâla'at ed Dumm) to the waters of En Shemesh (probably Ain Haud), En Rogel (Bir Eyyâb), and the Valley of Hinnom (Wady er Rabâbî). The line then crossed the Vale of Rephaim (el Bukeia) to the waters of Nephtoa (Lifa), Kirjath-jearim (Kuryet el 'Enab), Chesalon (Keslâ), Beth-shemesh (Ain Shems), Ekron ('Akir), and Jambel (Yebnah), "and the goings out of the border were at the sea." According to the above line, Jerus lay entirely within the bounds of Benjamin, though, according to a tradition recorded in the Talm. the site of the altar was in a piece of land belonging to Judah. The above frontier line can be followed on any modern map of Pal, and if it does not in many parts describe a natural frontier, it must be remembered that the frontiers of village and town possessions in modern Pal are extremely arbitrary, and though undetermined by any natural limits such as streams or mountain summits, they persist from generation to generation, and this too during periods—not long past—when there was constant warfare between different clans.

The territory of J. was small; even had it included all within its ideal boundaries, it would have been no more than 2,000 sq. miles; actually it was nearer 1,300 sq. miles, of which nearly half was desert.

III. The Boundaries of the Kingdom of Judah.—These were very circumscribed. In 2 Ch 11 5–12 there is a list of the cities—chiefly those on the frontier—which Rehoboam fortified. On the E. were Bethlehem, Etam and Tekoa; and on the W. and S.W. were Beth-zur, Socô, Adullam, Gath, Mareshah, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Aijalon and Hebron. The sites of the great majority of these are known, and they are all upon the borders of the Shephelah or the hill country. It will be seen too that the military preparation then made was against an attack from the W. In the 5th year of the reign of Rehoboam the expected attack came, and Shishak (Sheshenq I) of Egypt swept over the land and not only conquered all J. and Jerus, but, according to the reading of some authorities in the account of this campaign given in the great temple of Karnak, he handed over to Jeroboam of Israel certain strongholds of Judah.

The usual northern frontier between the two Heb kingdoms appears to have been the southernmost of the three natural lines described in I above, namely by the Valley of Ajalon on the W. and the Gorge of Michmash (Wady Suweinîl) on the E. Along the central plateau the frontier varied. Bethel (1 K 12 29; 2 K 10 29; Am 3 14; 4 4; 7 10.13; Hos 10 15) belonged to Israel, though once it fell to J. when Abijah took it and with it Jeshanah (Ain Sinia) and Ephron (probably et Taiyibeh) (2 Ch 13 19). Geba (Jeba'), just to the S. of the Wady Suweinîl, was on the northern frontier of J., hence instead of the old term "from Dan to Beer-sheba," we read now of "from Geba to Beer-sheba" (2 K 23 8). Baasha, king of Israel, went S. and fortified Ramah (er Râm, but 4 miles from Jerus) against J. (1 K 15 17), but Asa stopped his work, removed the fortifications and with the materials strengthened his own frontier at Geba and Mizpah (1 K 15 21.22). In the Jordan valley Jericho was held by Israel (1 K 16 34; 2 K 2 4).

After the Northern Kingdom fell, the frontier of J. appears to have extended a little farther N., and Bethel (2 K 23 15-19) and Jericho (to judge from Ezr 2 34; Neh 3 2; 7 36) also became part of the kingdom of J. For the further history of this district see JUDAEA.

JUDAH AT (AV UPON) THE JORDAN (יְהוּדָה הַיַּרְדֵּית, y'hūdāh ha-yarden): A place marking the eastern limit of the territory of Naphtali (Josh 19 34). It is generally thought among scholars that the text is corrupt; but no very probable emendation has been suggested. Thomson (LB, II, 466) proposes to identify it with Seiyid Jhūda, a small white-domed sanctuary about 3 miles to the S.E. of Tell el-Kādy.

JUDAISM, jōō'dā-iz'm. See ISRAEL, RELIGION OF.

JUDAS, jōō'das ('Ioudas, Ioudas; Gr form of Heb "Judah"):

(1) A Levite mentioned in 1 Esd 9 23=JUDAH (3).

(2) Judas Maccabaeus, 3d son of Mattathias (1 Macc 2 4). See MACCABEES.

(3) Judas, son of Chalphi, a Jewish officer who supported Jonathan bravely at the battle of Hazor (1 Macc 11 70; Ant, XIII, v, 7).

(4) A person of good position in Jerus at the time of the mission to Aristobulus (2 Macc 1 10); he has been identified with Judas Maccabaeus and also with an Essene prophet (Ant, XIII, xi, 2; BJ, III, 5).

(5) Son of Simon the Maccabee, and brother of John Hyrcanus (1 Macc 16 2). He was wounded in the battle which he fought along with his brother against Cendebeus (1 Macc 16 1 ff; Ant, XIII, vii, 3), and was murdered by Ptolemy the usurper, his brother-in-law, at Dok (1 Macc 16 11 ff).

JUDAS, JUDA:

(1) The name of an ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30). In AV it occurs also in Lk 3 26, but RV has "Joda" (WH 'Iōdā, Iōdā).

(2) Judas Iscariot (see separate art.).

(3) One of the brothers of Jesus (Mt 13 55; Mk 6 3). See JUDE.

(4) An apostle, "not Iscariot" (Jn 14 22). He is generally identified with Lebbaeus (Mt 10 3) and Thaddaeus (Mk 3 18). See LEBBAEUS; THADDAEUS. He is called JUDAS OF JAMES (q.v.) (Lk 6 16; Acts 1 13), which means "the son of James," not (AV) "the brother of James."

(5) A Galilean who stirred up rebellion "in the days of the enrolment" (Acts 5 37). See JUDAS OF GALILEE.

(6) One with whom Paul lodged in Damascus, whose house was in "the street which is called Straight" (Acts 9 11). Nothing further is known of him. A house is pointed out as his, in a lane off the Straight Street.

(7) Judas Barsabbas (Acts 15 22.27.32; see separate art.).

JUDAS BARSABBAS, bār-sab'as ('Ioudas Bar-sabbās, Ioudas Barsabbās): Judas was, with Silas, a delegate from the church in Jerus to the gentile Christians of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia. They were appointed to convey the letter containing the decision of "the apostles and the elders, with the whole church" regarding the attitude to be taken by gentile Christians toward the Mosaic law, and also to explain "the same things by word of mouth." They accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, and, "being themselves also prophets," i.e. preachers, they not only handed over the epistle but stayed some time in the city preaching and teaching. They seem to have gone no farther than Antioch, for "they were dismissed in peace from the brethren unto those that had sent them forth," and it was Paul and Silas who some time afterward strengthened the churches in Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15 40.41).

According to ver 34 AV, Judas returned to Jerus without Silas, who remained at Antioch and afterward became Paul's companion (ver 40). The oldest MSS, however, omit ver 34, and it is therefore omitted from RV. It was probably a marginal note to explain ver 40, and in time it crept into the text. Judas and Silas are called "chief men among the brethren" (ver 22), probably elders, and "prophets" (ver 32).

Barsabbas being a patronymic, Judas was probably the brother of Joseph Barsabbas. He cannot be identified with any other Judas, e.g. "Judas not Iscariot" (Jn 14 22). We hear no more of Judas after his return to Jerus (Acts 15 22 ff).

S. F. HUNTER

JUDAS ISCARIOT, is-kar'i-ot ('Ioudas 'Iskariōt, Ioudas Iskariōtēs, i.e. 'ish k'ariyōth, "Judas, man of Kerioth"): One of the twelve apostles and the betrayer of Jesus; for etymology, etc, see JUDAS.

I. Life.—Judas was, as his second name indicates, a native of Kerioth or Karioth. The exact locality of Kerioth (cf Josh 15 25) is doubtful, but it lay probably to the S. of Judaea, being identified with the ruins of el Karjetein (cf A. Plummer, art. "Judas Iscariot" in HDB).

He was the son of Simon (Jn 13 2) or Simon Iscariot (Jn 6 71; 13 26), the meaning of Iscariot

1. Name and Early History explaining why it was applied to his father also. The first Scriptural reference to J. is his election to the apostleship (cf Mt 10 4; Mk 3 19; Lk 6 16). He may have been present at the preaching of John the Baptist at Bethany beyond Jordan (cf Jn 1 28), but more probably he first met Jesus during the return of the latter through Judaea with His followers (cf Jn 3 22). According to the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles (see SIMON THE CANANAEAN), J. was among those who received the call at the Sea of Tiberias (cf Mt 4 18-22).

For any definite allusion to J. during the interval lying between his call and the events immediately

2. Before the Betrayal preceding the betrayal, we are indebted to St. John alone. These allusions are made with the manifest purpose of showing forth the nefarious character of J. from the beginning; and in their sequence there is a gradual development and growing clearness in the manner in which Jesus makes prophecy regarding his future betrayer. Thus, after the discourse on the Bread of Life in the synagogue of Capernaum (Jn 6 26-59), when many of the disciples deserted Jesus (ver 66) and Peter protested the allegiance of the apostles (ver 69), Jesus answered, "Did not I choose you the twelve, and one of you is a devil" (ver 70). Then follows St. John's commentary, "Now he spake of Judas the son of Simon Iscariot, for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve" (ver 71), implying that Judas was already known to Jesus as being in spirit one of those who "went back, and walked no more with him" (ver 66). But the situation, however disquieting it must have been to the ambitious designs which probably actuated J. in his acceptance of the apostleship (cf below), was not sufficiently critical to call for immediate desertion on his part. Instead, he lulled his fears of exposure by the fact that he was not mentioned by name, and continued ostensibly one of the faithful. Personal motives of a sordid nature had also influence in causing him to remain. Appointed keeper of the purse, he disregarded the warnings of Jesus concerning greed and hypocrisy (cf Mt 6 20; Lk 12 1-3) and appropriated the funds to his own use. As a cloak to his avarice, he pretended to be zealous in their administration, and therefore, at the anointing of Jesus' feet by Mary, he asked "Why was not this ointment sold for 300 shillings, and given to the poor? Now this he said, not because he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and having the bag took away what was put therein" (Jn 12 5-6; cf also Mt 26 7-13; Mk 14 3-8).

Yet, although by this craftiness J. concealed for a time his true nature from the rest of the disciples, and fomented any discontent that

3. The Betrayal might arise among them (cf Mk 14 4), he now felt that his present source of income could not long remain secure.

The pregnant words of his Master regarding the day of his burial (cf Mt 26 12; Mk 14 8; Jn 12 7) revealed to His betrayer that Jesus already knew well the evil powers that were at work against Him; and it is significant that, according to Mt and Mk, who alone of the synoptists mention the anointing, J. departed immediately afterward and made his compact with the chief priests (cf Mt 26 14-15; Mk 14 10-11; cf also Lk 22 3-6). But his absence was only temporary. He was present at the washing of the disciples' feet, there to be differentiated once more by Jesus from the rest of the Twelve (cf "Ye are clean, but not all" and "He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me," Jn 13 10, 18), but again without being named. It seemed as if Jesus wished to give Judas every opportunity, even at this late hour, of repenting and making his confession. For the last time, when they had sat down to eat, Jesus appealed to him thus with the words, "One of you shall betray me" (Mt 26 21; Mk 14 18; Lk 22 21; Jn 13 21). And at the end, in answer to the anxious queries of His disciples, "Is it I?" He indicated his betrayer, not by name, but by a sign: "He it is, for whom I shall dip the sop, and give it him" (Jn 13 26). Immediately upon its reception, J. left the supper room; the opportunity which he sought for was come (cf Jn 13 30; Mt 26 16). There is some doubt as to whether he actually received the eucharistic bread and wine previous to his departure or not, but most modern commentators hold that he did not. On his departure, J. made his way to the high priests and their followers, and coming upon Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane, he betrayed his Master with a kiss (Mt 26 47-50; Mk 14 43, 44; Lk 22 47; Jn 18 2-5).

After the betrayal, Mk, Lk and Jn are silent as regards J., and the accounts given in Mt and Acts

4. His Death of his remorse and death vary in detail. According to Mt, the actual condemnation of Jesus awakened Judas' sense of guilt, and becoming still more despondent at his repulse by the chief priests and elders, "he cast down the pieces of silver into the sanctuary, and departed; and he went away and hanged himself." With the money the chief priests purchased the potter's field, afterward called "the field of blood," and in this way was fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah (11 12-14) ascribed by Matthew to Jeremiah (Mt 27 3-10). The account given in Acts 1 16-20 is much shorter. It mentions neither Judas' repentance nor the chief priests, but simply states that J. "obtained a field with the reward of his iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out" (ver 18). The author of Acts finds in this the fulfilment of the prophecy in Ps 69 25. The Vulg rendering, "When he had hanged himself, he burst asunder," suggests a means of reconciling the two accounts.

According to a legendary account mentioned by Papias, the death of J. was due to elephantiasis (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 5). A so-called "Gospel of Judas" was in use among the gnostic sect of the Cainites.

II. Character and Theories.—Much discussion and controversy have centered, not only around the discrepancies of the Gospel narratives of J.,

1. Joined the Apostles to Betray Jesus but also around his character and the problems connected with it. That the betrayer of Jesus should also be one of the chosen Twelve has given opportunity for the attacks of the foes of Christianity from the earliest times (cf Orig., Con. Cel., II.12); and the difficulty of finding any proper solution has proved so great that some have been induced to regard J. as merely a personification of the spirit of Judaism. The acceptance of this view would, however, invalidate the historical value of much of the Scriptural writings. Other theories are put forward in explanation, viz. that J. joined the apostolic band with the definite intention of betraying Jesus. The aim of this intention has again received two different interpretations, both of which seek to elevate the character of J., and to free him from the charge of sordid motives and cowardly treachery. According to one, J. was a strong patriot, who saw in Jesus the foe of his race and its ancient creed, and therefore betrayed Him in the interests of his country. This view is, however, irreconcilable with the rejection of J. by the chief priests (cf Mt 27 3-10). According to the other, J. regarded himself as a true servant of Christianity, who assumed the rôle of traitor to precipitate the action of the Messiah and induce Him to manifest His miraculous powers by calling down the angels of God from heaven to help Him (cf Mt 26 53). His suicide was further due to his disappointment at the failure of Jesus to fulfil his expectations. This theory found favor in ancient times with the Cainites (cf above), and in modern days with De Quincey and Bishop Whately. But the terms and manner of denunciation employed by Jesus in regard to J. (cf also Jn 17 12) render this view also untenable.

Another view is that J. was foreordained to be the traitor: that Jesus was conscious from the first that He was to suffer death on the cross, and chose J. because He knew that he should betray

2. Fore-ordained to Be a Traitor Him and thus fulfil the Divine decrees (cf Mt 26 54). Those holding this view base their arguments on the omniscience of Jesus implied in Jn 2 24, Jesus "knew all men"; Jn 6 64, "Jesus knew from the beginning who should betray him," and Jn 18 4, "knowing all the things that were coming upon him." Yet to take those texts lit. would mean a too rigid application of the doctrine of predestination. It would treat J. as a mere instrument, as a means and not an end in the hands of a higher power; it would render meaningless the appeals and reproaches made to him by Jesus and deny any real existence of that personal responsibility and sense of guilt which it was Our Lord's very purpose to awaken and stimulate in the hearts of His hearers. John himself wrote after the event, but in the words of Our Lord there was, as we have seen, a growing clearness in the manner in which He foretold His betrayal. The omniscience of Jesus was greater than that of a mere clairvoyant who claimed to foretell the exact course of future events. It was the omniscience of one who knew on the one hand the ways of His Eternal Father among men, and who, on the other, penetrated into the deepest recesses of human character and beheld there all its secret feelings and motives and tendencies.

Although a full discussion of the character of J. would of necessity involve those ultimate problems

3. Betrayal the Result of Gradual Development of Free Will and Original Sin (Westcott) which no theology can adequately solve, the theory which regards the betrayal as the result of a gradual development within the soul of J. seems the most practical. It is significant that J. alone among the disciples was of southern extraction; and the differences in temperament and social outlook, together with the petty prejudices to which these generally give rise, may explain in part, though they do not justify, his after treachery—that lack of inner sympathy which existed between J. and the rest of the apostles. He undoubtedly possessed a certain business ability, and was therefore appointed keeper of the purse. But his heart could not have been clean, even from the first, as he administered even his primary charge dishonestly. The cancer of this greed spread from the material to the spiritual. To none of the disciples did the fading of the dream of an earthly kingdom of pomp and glory bring greater disappointment than to J. The cords of love by which Jesus gradually drew the hearts of the other disciples to Himself, the teaching by which He uplifted their souls above all earthly things, were as chafing bonds to the selfishness of J. And from his fettered greed and disappointed ambition sprang jealousy and spite and hatred. It was the hatred, not of a strong, but of an essentially weak man. Instead of making an open breach with his Lord, he remained ostensibly one of His followers; and this continued contact with a goodness to which he would not yield (cf Swete on Mk 14 10), and his brooding over the rebukes of his Master, gave ready entrance for "Satan into his soul." But if he "knew the good and did not do it" (cf Jn 13 17), so also he was weak in the carrying out of his nefarious designs. It was this hesitancy, rather than a fiendish cunning, which induced him to remain till the last moment in the supper room, and which prompted the remark of Jesus "What thou doest, do quickly" (Jn 13 27). Of a piece with this weak-mindedness was his attempt to cast the blame upon the chief priests and elders (cf Mt 27 3.4). He sought to set himself right, not with the innocent Jesus whom he had betrayed, but with the accomplices in his crime; and because that world which his selfishness had made his god failed him at the last, he went and hanged himself. It was the tragic end of one who espoused a great cause in the spirit of speculation and selfish ambition, and who weighed not the dread consequences to which those impure motives might lead him (cf also Bruce, Training of the Twelve; Latham, Pastor Pastorum; Stalker, Trial and Death of Jesus Christ).

C. M. KERR

JUDAS ISCARIOT, GOSPEL OF: A "Gospel of Judas" is mentioned by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., i.31), Epiphanius (Haer., xxxviii.1), Theodoret, etc., as current in the gnostic sect of the Cainites, to whom Judas was a hero. It must have been in existence in the 2d cent., but no quotation is given from it (see Baring-Gould, Lost and Hostile Gospels, III, ch v).

JUDAS, NOT ISCARIOT (Ἰούδας, οὐχ ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης, Ioudas ouch ho Iskariotēs): One of the Twelve Apostles (Jn 14 22). See JUDAS OF JAMES; LEBBAEUS; THADDAEUS.

JUDAS MACCABAEUS. See MACCABAEUS.

JUDAS OF DAMASCUS. See JUDAS, (6).

JUDAS OF GALILEE (ὁ Γαλιλαῖος, ho Galilaios): Mentioned in Acts 5 37 as the leader of an insurrection occasioned by the census of Quirinius in 7 AD (see QUIRINIUS). He, and those who obeyed him, it is said, perished in that revolt. Jos also repeatedly mentions Judas by this same name, "the Galilean," and speaks of his revolt (Ant., XVIII, i, 6; XX, v, 2; BJ, II, viii, 1; xvii, 8; VII, viii, 1), but in Ant., XVIII, i, names him a Gaulonite, of the city of Gamala. As Gamala was in Gaulonitis, not far from the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, it may be regarded as belonging to that province. The party of Judas seems to have been identified with the Zealots.

JAMES ORR

JUDAS OF JAMES (Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, Ioudas Iakōbou): One of the twelve apostles (Lk 6 16; Acts 1 13; for etymology, etc, see JUDAS). AV has the reading "brother of James," and RV reads "son of James." The latter is to be preferred. In Jn 14 22 he is described as "Judas (not Iscariot)." The name corresponds with the "Thaddaeus" or "Lebbaeus whose surname was Thaddaeus" of Mt 10 3 AV and Mk 3 18 (cf THADDAEUS). The identification of Thaddaeus with Judas is generally accepted, though Ewald and others hold that they were different persons, that Thaddaeus died during Christ's lifetime, and that Judas was chosen in his place (cf Bruce, Training of the Twelve, 34). If the RV is accepted as the correct rendering of Lk 6 16 and Acts 1 13, this Judas cannot be identified either with the Juda (Mk 6 3 AV), Judas (Mk 6 3 RV), or Judas (Mt 13 55), the brother of Jesus; or with the Judas (Jude ver 1 RVm) or Jude (Jude ver 1 AV), the brother of James, whether these two latter Judases are to be regarded as the same or not. The only incident recorded of Judas of James is in Jn 14 22, where during Christ's address to the disciples after the last supper he put the question, "Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?"

LITERATURE

The writer of this short ep. calls himself Jude or Judas (Ἰούδας, Ioudas). His name was a common one among the Jews: there were few others of more frequent use. Two among the apostles bore it, viz. Judas, mentioned in Jn 14 22 (cf Lk 6 16), and Judas Iscariot. Jude describes himself as "a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James" (ver 1). The James here mentioned is no doubt the person who is called "the Lord's brother" (Gal 1 19), the writer of the ep. that bears his name. Neither of the two was an apostle. The opening sentence of Jude simply affirms that the writer is a "servant of Jesus Christ." This, if anywhere, should be the appropriate place for the mention of his apostleship, if he were an apostle. The appellation "servant of Jesus Christ" "is never thus barely used in an address of an ep. to designate an apostle" (Alford). Phil 1 1 has a similar expression, "Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ," but "the designation common to two persons necessarily sinks to the rank of the inferior one." In other instances "servant" is associated with "apostle" (Rom 1 1; Tit 1 1). Jude vs 17.18 speaks of the "apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; that they said to you"—language which an apostle would hardly use of his fellow-apostles.

In Mk 6 3 are found the names of those of whom Jesus is said to be the brother, namely, James and Joses, and Judas and Simon. It is quite generally held by writers that the James and Judas here mentioned are the two whose epp. are found in the NT. It is noteworthy, however, that neither of them hints at his relationship with Jesus; their unaffected humility kept them silent. Jude mentions that he is the "brother of James," perhaps to give authority and weight to his words, for James was far more distinguished and influential than he. The inference seems legitimate that Jude addresses Christians among whom James was highly esteemed, or, if no longer living, among whom his memory was sacredly revered, and accordingly it is altogether probable that Jude writes to the same class of readers as James—Jewish Christians. James writes to the "Twelve Tribes of the Dispersion." Jude likewise addresses a wide circle of believers, viz. the "called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ" (ver 1). While he does not designate a special and distinct class, yet as James's "brother," as belonging to the family of Joseph, and as in some true sense related to the Lord Jesus Himself, it seems probable, if not certain, that his Ep. was intended for Christian Hebrews who stood in urgent need of such testimony and appeal as Jude offers.

I. Jude's Position in the Canon.—It is now and for a long while has been an assured one. Its rank, though not altogether that of 1 Pet and 1 Jn, is high, for centuries indeed undoubted. Almost from the beginning of the Christian era men every way qualified to speak with authority on the question of genuineness and authenticity indorsed it as entitled to a place in the NT Scriptures. Origen repeatedly quotes it, in one place describing it as an "ep. of but few lines, but full of powerful words of heavenly grace" (Matt., tom. X, 17). But Origen knew that it was not universally received. Clement of Alexandria "gave concise expositions of all the canonical Scriptures, not omitting the controverted books—the Ep. of Jude and the other Catholic epp." (quoted by Westcott, Can., 322–23 and Salmon, Intro, 493). Tertullian (Cult. Fem. i.3) in striving to establish the authority of the Book of Enoch urges as a crowning argument that it is quoted by "the apostle Jude." "We may infer that Jude's Ep. was an unquestioned part of Tertullian's Canon." Athanasius inserted it in his list of NT books, but Eusebius placed it among the disputed books in his classification. The Canon of Muratori includes Jude among the books of Scripture, though it omits the Epp. of Jas, Pet and He. This is one of the earliest documents containing a list of the NT books now known. By the great majority of writers the date of the fragment is given as c 170 AD, as it claims to have been written not long after Pius was bishop of Rome, and the latest date of Pius is 142–57 AD. The words of the document are, "The Shepherd was written very recently in our own time by Hermas, while his brother Pius sat in the chair of the Church of Rome." Twenty or twenty-five years would probably satisfy the period indicated by the words, "written very recently in our own time," which would fix the date of the fragment at c 170 AD. Salmon, however, strongly inclines to a later date, viz. c 200–210 AD, as does Zahn.

Zahn (Intro to the NT, II, 259, ET), and Professor Chase (HDB) are of the decided opinion that the Didache, II, 7: "Thou shalt not hate anyone, but some thou shalt rebuke, and for some thou shalt pray, and some thou shalt love above thine own soul [or life]," is founded on Jude ver 22. Dr. Philip Schaff dates the Didache between 90–100 AD. L'Abbé E. Jaquier (La doctrine des Douze Apôtres, 1891) is persuaded that the famous document was written not later than 80 AD. It appears, therefore, more than probable that the Ep. of Jude was known and referred to as Scripture some time before the end of the 1st cent. From the survey we have thus rapidly taken of the field in which the Ep. circulated, we may conclude that in Pal, at Alexandria, in North Africa, and at Rome, it was received as the veritable letter of Jude, "the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James."

The chief reason why it was rejected by some and regarded with suspicion by others in primitive times is its quotation from the apocryphal Book of Enoch, so Jerome informs us (Vir. Ill., 4). It is possible that Jude had in mind another spurious writing, viz. the Assumption of Moses, when he spoke of the contention of Michael the archangel with the devil about the body of Moses (ver 9). This, however, is not quite certain, for the date assigned to that writing is c 44 AD, and although Jude might have seen and read it, yet its composition is so near his own day that it could hardly have exerted much influence on his mind. Besides, the brevity of the Ep. and its dealing with a special class of errorists would limit to a certain extent its circulation among Christians. All this serves to explain its refusal by some and the absence of reference to it by others.

II. The Occasion of Its Composition.—Jude, after his brief introduction (vs 1,2), explains very definitely why he writes as he does. He indicates distinctly his anxiety on behalf of the saints (ver 3): "Beloved, while I was giving all diligence to write unto you of our common salvation, I was constrained to write unto you exhorting you to contend earnestly for the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints." He had received very distressing knowledge of the serious state into which the Christian brotherhood was rapidly drifting, and he must as a faithful servant of Jesus Christ exhort them to steadfastness and warn them of their danger. He had in mind to write them a doctrinal work on the salvation common to all Christians. Perhaps he contemplated the composition of a book or treatise that would have discussed the great subject in an exhaustive manner. But in face of the perils that threatened, of the evils already present in the community, his purpose was indefinitely postponed. We are not told how he became acquainted with the dangers which beset his fellow-believers, but the conjecture is probably correct that it was by means of his journeys as an evangelist. At any rate, he was thoroughly conversant with the evils in the churches, and he deals with them as befitted the enormities that were practised and the ruin that impended.

The address of the Ep. is remarkable for the affection Jude expresses for these saints. Obviously they are distinct from the libertines of whom he speaks with such solemn condemnation. They were the faithful who kept aloof from the ungodly that surrounded them, and who held fast to the truth they had been taught. Jude describes them as those "that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ: Mercy unto you and peace and love be multiplied." At the close of the Ep. he commends them "unto him that is able to guard you from stumbling, and to set you before the presence of his glory without blemish in exceeding joy." A separated and devoted band they certainly were, a noble and trustworthy company of believers for whose well-being Jude was supremely anxious.

III. Description of the Libertines and Apostates.—It is needful to gaze with steady vision on the hideous portrait Jude furnishes of these depraved foes, if we are to appreciate in any measure the force of his language and the corruption already wrought in the brotherhood. Some of their foul teachings and their vicious practices, not all, are here set down.

(1) Surreptitious foes.—"For there are certain men crept in privily . . . ungodly men" (ver 4). They are enemies who feign to be friends, and hence in reality are spies and traitors; like a stealthy beast of prey they creep into the company of the godly, actuated by evil intent.

(2) Perverters of grace and deniers of Christ.—"Turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ" (ver 4). They are those who by a vile perverseness turn the grace and the liberty of the Gospel into a means for gratifying their unholy passions, and who in doctrine and life repudiate their Master and Lord.

(3) Censorious and arrogant detractors.—"In their dreamings defile the flesh, and set at nought dominion, and rail at dignities" (ver 8). Destitute of true reverence, they rail at the holiest and best things, and sit in judgment on all rule and all authority. They have the proud tongue of the lawless: "Our lips are our own: who is lord over us?" (Ps 12 4).

(4) Ignorant calumniators and brutish sensualists.—"These rail at whatsoever things they know not: and what they understand naturally, like the creatures without reason, in these things are they destroyed" (ver 10). What they do not know, as something lofty and noble, they deride and denounce; what they know is that which ministers to their disordered appetites and their debased tastes.

(5) Hypocrites and deceivers.—"These are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you, shepherds that without fear feed themselves; clouds without water . . . autumn trees without fruit . . . wild waves of the sea . . . wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved forever" (vs 12, 13). A most graphic picture of the insincerity, the depravity, and the doom of these insolents! And yet they are found in the bosom of the Christian body, even sitting with the saints at their love-feasts!

(6) Grumblers, fault-finders, pleasure-seekers, boasters, parasites.—"These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts . . . showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage" (ver 16). They impeach Divine wisdom, are the foes of peace and quietness, boast of their capacities to manage things, and yet they can be servile, even sycophants, when thereby advantage is secured.

(7) Schismatics and sensualists.—"These are they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit" (ver 19). It was characteristic of the false teachers and mockers who had invaded the Christian church that they drew lines of demarcation between themselves and others, or between different classes of believers, which the Holy Spirit did not warrant, but which was the product of their own crafty and wicked wills. There seems to be a hint in these words of incipient Gnosticism, that fatal heresy that boasted of a recondite knowledge, a deep mystery which only the initiated possessed, of which the great mass of Christians were ignorant. Jude brands the pretension as the offspring of their own sensuality, not at all of God's Spirit.

Such is the forbidding portrait drawn of the libertines in the Ep. But Jude adds other and even darker features. He furnishes a number of examples of apostates and of apostasy which disclose even more strikingly the spirit and the doom of them that pervert the truth, that deny the Lord Jesus Christ, and that mock at the things of God. These all mark a fatal degeneracy, a "falling away," which bodes nothing but evil and judgment. Against the corrupters and skeptics Jude writes with a vehemence that in the NT is without a parallel. Matters must have come to a dreadful pass when the Spirit of God is compelled to use such stern and awful language.

IV. Relation of Jude to the Second Epistle of Peter.—The relation is confined to 2 Pet 2—3 4.

A large portion of Peter's Ep., viz. ch 1 and 3 5-18, bears no resemblance to Jude, at least no more than does Jas or 1 Pet. Between the sections of 2 Pet indicated above and Jude the parallelism is close, both as to the subjects treated and the historical illustrations introduced, and the language itself to some considerable extent is common to both. All readers must be impressed with the similarity. Accordingly, it is very generally held by interpreters that one of the writers copied from the other. There is not entire agreement as to which of the two epp. is the older, that is, whether Peter copied from Jude, or Jude from Peter. Perhaps a majority favor the former of the two alternatives, though some of the very latest and most learned of those who write on Introductions to the NT hold strongly to the view that Jude copied from 2 Pet. Reference is made particularly to Dr. Theodore v. Zahn, whose magnificent work on Introduction has been but recently tr'd into Eng., and who argues convincingly that Jude copied from 2 Pet.

However, it must be admitted that there are in the two epp. as pronounced differences and divergences as there are resemblances. If one of the two did actually copy from the other, he was careful to add, subtract, and change what

2. Differences he found in his "source" as best suited his purpose. A servile copyist he certainly was not. He maintained his independence throughout, as an exact comparison of the one with the other will demonstrate.

If we bring them into close proximity, following the example of Professor Lumby in the "Bible Comm." (Intro to 2 Pet), we shall discover a marked difference between the two pictures drawn by the writers. We cannot fail to perceive how much darker and more sinister is that of Jude. The evil, alarming certainly in Peter, becomes appalling in Jude. Subjoined are proofs of the fact above stated:

2 Pet 2 1

But there arose false prophets also among the people, as among you also there shall be false teachers . . .

Jude ver 4

For there are certain men crept in privily . . .

2 Pet 2 1

who shall privily bring in destructive heresies, denying even the Master that bought them . . .

Jude ver 4

. . . ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.

2 Pet 2 3

And in covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you . . .

Jude ver 16

. . . murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts (and their mouth speaketh great swelling words), showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage.

These contrasts and comparisons between the two epp. prove (1) that in Jude the false teachers are worse, more virulent than in Peter, and (2) that in Peter the whole description is predictive, whereas in Jude the deplorable condition is actually present. If 2 Pet is dependent on Jude, if the apostle cited from Jude, how explain the strong predictive element in his opening verses (2 Pet 2 1-3)? If as Peter wrote he had lying before him Jude's letter, which represents the corrupters as already within the Christian community and doing their deadly work, his repeated use of the future tense is absolutely inexplicable. Assuming, however, that he wrote prior to Jude, his predictions become perfectly intelligible. No doubt the virus was working when he wrote, but it was latent, undeveloped; far worse would appear; but when Jude wrote the poison was widely diffused, as vs 12, 19 clearly show. The very life of the churches was endangered.

2 Pet 2 4 5

For if God spared not the angels when they sinned . . . and spared not the ancient world, but preserved Noah with seven others . . .

Jude vs 5 6

. . . The Lord, having saved a people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them . . . and angels that . . . left their proper habitation . . .

Peter speaks of the angels that sinned, Jude of their apostasy. Peter makes prominent the salvation of Noah and his family when the flood overwhelmed the world of the 3. Further Contrasts ungodly, while Jude tells of those who, delivered from bondage, afterward were destroyed because of their unbelief. He speaks of no rescue; we know of but two who survived the judgments of the wilderness and who entered the Land of Promise, Caleb and Joshua. Peter mentions the fate of the guilty cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, but he is careful to remind us of the deliverance of righteous Lot, while Jude makes prominent their nameless crimes and consigns them to "the punishment of eternal fire," but he is silent on the rescue of Lot. Manifestly Jude's illustrations are darker and more hopeless than Peter's.

Peter instances Balaam as an example of one who loved the hire of wrongdoing and who was rebuked for his transgression. But Jude cites three notable instances in the OT to indicate how far in apostasy and rebellion the libertines had gone. Three words mark their course, rising into a climax, "way," "error," "gainsaying." They went in the way of Cain, i.e. in the way of self-will, of hate, and the spirit of murder. Moreover, they "ran riotously in the error of Balaam for hire." The words denote an activity of viciousness that enlisted all their eagerness and all their might. Balaam's error was one that led into error, one that seduced others into the commission of the like sins. The reference seems to be to the whole career of this heathen prophet, and includes his betrayal of the Israelites through the women of Moab (Nu 31 16). Balaam is the prototype of Jude's libertines, both in his covetousness and his seductive counsel. Furthermore, they "perished in the gainsaying of Korah." This man with 250 followers rebelled against the Divinely appointed leaders and rulers of Israel, Moses and Aaron, and sought to share their authority in Israel, if not to displace them altogether. Comparable with these rebels in ancient Israel are the treacherous and malignant foes whom Jude so vigorously denounces.

Peter speaks of them as "daring, self-willed, they tremble not to rail at dignities: whereas angels, though greater in might and power, bring not a railing judgment against them before the Lord" (vs 10.11). Jude is more specific: These dreamers "defile the flesh, and set at naught dominion, and rail at dignities." They repudiate all authority, despise every form of lordship, and revile those in positions of power. He cites the contention of Michael the archangel with the devil about the body of Moses, and yet this loftiest of the heavenly spirits brought no railing judgment against the adversary. Jude's description is more vivid and definite: he describes an advanced stage of apostasy.

Very noteworthy is Jude vs 22.23. He here turns again to the loyal and steadfast believers whom he addresses at the beginning of his letter, and he gives them directions how they are to deal with those who were ensnared by the wily foes. (The text in ver 22 is somewhat uncertain, but the revision is followed.) There were some who were "in doubt." They were those who had been fascinated by the new teaching, and although not captured by it, they were engaged in its study, were drawn toward it and almost ready to yield. On these the faithful were to have mercy, were to convince them of their danger, show them the enormities to which the false system inevitably leads, and so win them back to Christ's allegiance. As if Jude said, Deal with the wavering in love and fidelity; but rescue them if possible.

There were others whose peril was greater: "And some save, snatching them out of the fire." These were identified with the wicked, were scorched by the fires of destruction and hence almost beyond reach of rescue; but if possible they are to be saved, however scathed and blackened. Others still there were who were in worse state than the preceding, who were polluted and smirched by the foul contamination of the guilty seducers, and such were to be saved, and the rescuers were to fear lest they should be soiled by contact with the horrible defilement. This is Jude's tremendous summary of the shameful work and frightful evils wrought in the bosom of the church by the libertines. He discloses in these trenchant verses how deeply sunk in sin the false teachers were, and how awful the ruin they had wrought. The description is quite unparalleled in 2 Pet. The shadings in Jude are darker and deeper than those in 2 Pet.

The comparison between the two writings warrants, we believe, the following conclusions: (1) that Peter and Jude have in view the

4. Summary same corrupt parties; (2) that Peter paints them as godless and extremely dangerous, though not yet at their worst; while Jude sets them forth as depraved and as lawless as they can well be; (3) that Peter's is the older writing and that Jude was acquainted with what the apostle had written.

Stronger evidence than any yet produced of Peter's priority is now to be submitted, and here we avail ourselves in part of Zahn's array of evidence.

Jude asserts with great positiveness that (ver 4) certain men had crept in privily into the Christian fold, "even they who were of old

5. Evidence of Priority of Peter written of beforehand unto this condemnation, ungodly men." Obviously Jude is here speaking of the enemies whom he afterward goes on to describe and denounce in his Ep. He distinctly affirms that these foes had been of old written of and beforehand designated unto "this condemnation."

He clearly has in mind an authoritative writing that spoke of the identical parties Jude himself deals with. He does not tell us whose writing it is that contains the "condemnation" of the errorists; he only declares that there is such a Scripture existing and that he is acquainted with it. Now, to what writing does he refer? Not to any OT prophecy, for none can be found that answers to the words. Nor yet to the prediction of Enoch (vs 14.15), for it speaks of the advent of the Lord in judgment at the last day, whereas Jude applies his reference to the ungodly who were then present in the Christian assemblies, corrupting the churches with their wicked teaching and practices. "In 2 Pet 2—3 4, we have a prophecy which exactly suits, namely, the announcement that false teachers whose theory and practice exactly correspond to those godless bearers of the Christian name in Jude will appear among a certain group of Jewish Christian churches" (Zahn). Peter's account of them is so particular that Jude would encounter no difficulty in identifying them. He is furnished by the apostle with such characteristics of them, with such illustrations and even words and phrases that he has only to place the description alongside of the reality to see how completely they match.

It may be objected that the words, "were of old written of beforehand," denote a long period, longer than that which elapsed between the two epp. But the objection is groundless. The original term for "of old" (palai) sometimes indicates but a brief space of time, e.g. Mk 15 44 (according to the text of Weymouth and Nestle, and RV) relates that Pilate asked the centurion if Jesus had been "any while" (palai) dead, which limits the term to a few hours. In 2 Cor 12 19 the word occurs, and there it must be restricted to Paul's self-defence which occupies the part of the Ep. preceding, and hence does not extend beyond a day or two. Probably some years lie between the composition of these two epp., ample time to justify Jude's use of the word if he is referring to 2 Pet 2—3 4, as we certainly believe he is.

This interpretation of Jude ver 4 is confirmed by Jude vs 17.18. These verses are intimately connected with 2 Pet 3 2-4. Jude's

6. Confirmatory References readers are told to keep in remembrance the words spoken by the apostles of Christ, namely, "In the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their own ungodly lusts." Peter writes, "that in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts." The resemblance of the one passage to the other is very close, indeed, they are almost identical. Both urge their readers to remember what had been said by the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ, and both speak of the immoral scoffers who would invade or had invaded the Christian brotherhood. But Peter distinctly asserts that these mockers shall appear in the last days. His words are, "Knowing this first, that in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts." Jude writes that "in the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their own ungodly lusts." The phrases, "the last days," and "the last time," denote our age, the dispensation in which we live, as He 1 2 proves. Peter puts the appearance of the scoffers in the future, whereas Jude, after quoting the words, significantly adds, "These are they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit." He means, of course the mockers just mentioned, and he affirms they are now present. With Peter they are yet to come when he wrote, but with Jude the prediction is already fulfilled, so far as the scoffers are concerned. Therefore Jude's writing is subsequent to Peter's, and if there be copying on the part of either, it is Jude who copies.

Peter mentions "your apostles," including himself in the phrase, but Jude does not employ the pl. pronoun, for he was not of the apostolic body. But why the pl. "apostles"? Because at least one other apostle had spoken of the perilous times which were coming on the church of God. Paul unites his testimony with that of Peter, and writes, "But know this, that in the last days grievous times shall come" (2 Tim 3 1-5). His prediction is near akin to that of Peter; it belongs apparently to the same historic time and to the same perilous class of evil-doers and corrupters. In 2 Pet 3 15 the apostle lovingly and tenderly speaks of his "brother Paul," and says suggestively that in his Ep. he speaks of these things—"no doubt about the scoffers of the last days among the rest." He certainly seems to have Paul in mind when he penned the words, "Knowing this first, that in the last days mockers shall come."

Hence, then, is positive ground for the reference in Jude ver 4 to a writing concerning those who had crept into the fold and who were of old doomed to this condemnation, with which writing his readers were acquainted; they had it in the writing of the apostles Peter and Paul both, and so were forewarned as to the impending danger. Jude's Ep. is subsequent to Peter's.

V. Date of the Epistle.—There is little or no agreement as to the year, yet the majority of writers hold that it belongs to the latter half of the 1st cent. Zahn assigns it to 70-75 AD; Lumby, c 80 AD; Salmon, before the reign of Domitian (81 AD); Sieffert, shortly prior to Domitian; Chase, not later than 80 AD, probably within a year or two of the Pastoral Epp. Zahn strongly insists on 64 AD as the date of Peter's death. If the 2d Ep. bearing his name is authentic, the apostle could not possibly have copied from Jude, for Jude's letter was not in existence when he died. Even on the supposition that he suffered death 65-66 AD, there could have been no copying done save by Jude, for it is almost demonstrable that Jude was written after the destruction of Jerus in 70 AD. If 2 Pet is pseudonymous and written about the middle of the 2d cent., as some confidently affirm, it has no right to a place in the Canon nor any legitimate relation to Jude. If genuine, it antedates Jude.

VI. The Libertines of Jude's Epistle.—Their character is very forcibly exhibited, but no information is given us of their origin or to what particular region they belonged. They bore the Christian name, were of the loosest morals, and were guilty of shameful excesses. Their influence seems to have been widespread and powerful, else Jude would not denounce them in such severe language. Their guilty departure from the truth must not be confounded with the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., though it tended strongly in that direction; it was a 1st-cent. defection. Were they newly risen sensualists, without predecessors? To some extent their forerunners had already appeared. Sensuality in some of its grosser forms disgraced the church at Corinth (1 Cor 5 1-13; 6 13-20). In the common meals of this congregation which ended in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, they indulged in revelry and gluttony, some of them even being intoxicated (1 Cor 11 17-22). Participation in a heathen festival exposed the Christians to the danger of sharing in idolatry, and yet some of the Corinthians were addicted to it (1 Cor 8; 10 14-32). In reading of the state of things in the church at Colosse, one perceives how fatal certain views and practices there would soon become if suffered to grow (Col 2 16-23; 3 5-11). Twenty years after the probable date of Jude, in some of the churches of Asia Minor, wicked parties flourished and dominated Christian assemblies that were closely allied in teaching and conduct with the ungodly of Jude. The Nicolaitans, and the "woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess; and she teacheth and seduceth my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols" (Rev 2 20) belong to the same company of libertines as those of Jude. It should be no surprise to us with these examples before us, that according to Jude there were found in the bosom of the Christian community moral delinquents and shameless profligates whose conduct shocks our sense of propriety and decency, for the like evils, though not so flagrant, troubled the churches in Paul's lifetime.

Jude brands them as enemies and apostates. He pronounces their doom in the words of Enoch: "Behold, the Lord came with ten thousands of his holy ones, to execute judgment upon all" (vs 14.15). It is generally believed that this prophecy of Enoch is quoted by Jude from the apocryphal Book of Enoch. Granting such quotation, that fact does not warrant us to affirm that he indorses the book. Paul cites from three Gr poets: from Aratus (Acts 17 28), from Menander (1 Cor 15 33; see Earle, Euripides, "Medea," Intro, 30, where this is attributed to Euripides), and from Epimenides (Tit 1 12). Does anyone imagine that Paul indorses all that these poets wrote? To the quotation from Epimenides the apostle adds, "This testimony is true" (Tit 1 13), but no one imagines he means to say the whole poem is true. So Jude cites a passage from a non-canonical book, not because he accepts the whole book as true, but this particular prediction he receives as from God. Whence the writer of Enoch derived it is unknown. It may have been cherished and transmitted from generation to generation, or in some other way faithfully preserved, but at any rate Jude accepted it as authentic. Paul quotes a saying of the Lord Jesus (Acts 20 35) not recorded in the Gospels, but whence he derived it is unknown. As much may be said of this of Enoch which Jude receives as true.

JUDEA, jōō-dē'a: In Ezr 5 8 for "Judah"; thus RV. In the NT the form is JUDAEA (q.v.).

JUDGE, juj (שֹׁפֵט, shōphēṭ; NT δικαστής, dikas-tēs, κριτής, kritēs): In the early patriarchal times the heads of families and the elders of the tribes were the judges (cf Gen 38 24), and their authority was based on custom. In the wilderness Moses alone was the judge until Jethro suggested a scheme of devolution. On his advice Moses divided the people into groups of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, and over each group a wise and good man was set as a judge. Thereafter only the most important cases were brought before Moses (Ex 18 13-26; Dt 1 9-17). This arrangement ceased to be practicable when the children of Israel settled down in Canaan. Although David took counsel with the heads of thousands and hundreds (1 Ch 13 1), it need not be assumed that this was a continuation of the plan adopted by Moses. Probably the local courts were not organized till the time of David. In the days of the Judges justice was administered by those who had risen by wisdom or valor to that rank (Jgs 4 5). An organized circuit court was established by Samuel, who judged cases himself, and also made his sons judges (1 S 7 16; 8 1). After the monarchy was instituted, the king tried all cases, when requested to do so by the wronged person, in the palace gate (1 K 7 7; Prov 20 8). There was no public prosecutor (2 S 14 4; 15 2-6; 1 Ch 18 14; 1 K 3 16; 2 K 15 5). Under David and Solomon there were probably local courts (1 Ch 23 4; 26 29). Jehoshaphat organized a high court of justice (2 Ch 19 8). The prophets often complain bitterly that the purity of justice is corrupted by bribery and false witness (Isa 1 23; 5 23; 10 1; Am 5 12; 6 12; Mic 3 11; 7 3; Prov 6 19; 12 17; 18 5). Even kings sometimes pronounced unjust sentences, esp. in criminal cases (1 S 22 6-19; 1 K 22 26; 2 K 21 16; Jer 36 26). An evil king could also bend local courts to do his will, as may be gathered from the case of Naboth's vineyard (1 K 21 1-13).

The first duty of a judge was to execute absolute justice, showing the same impartiality to rich and poor, to Jew and foreigner. He was forbidden to accept bribes or to wrest the judgment of the poor (Ex 23 6-8; Dt 16 19). He must not let himself be swayed by popular opinion, or unduly favor the poor (Ex 23 2,3).

The court was open to the public (Ex 18 13; Ruth 4 1,2). Each party presented his view of the case to the judge (Dt 1 16; 25 1). Possibly the accused appeared in court clad in mourning (Zec 3 3). The accuser stood on the right hand of the accused (Zec 3 1; Ps 109 6). Sentence was pronounced after the hearing of the case, and the judgment carried out (Josh 7 24,25). The only evidence considered by the court was that given by the witnesses. In criminal cases, not less than two witnesses were necessary (Dt 19 15; Nu 35 30; Dt 17 6; cf Mt 18 16; 2 Cor 13 1; 1 Tim 5 19). In cases other than criminal the oath (see OATH) was applied (Ex 22 11; cf He 6 16). The lot was sometimes appealed to (Josh 7 14-18), esp. in private disputes (Prov 18 18), but this was exceptional. When the law was not quite definite, recourse was had to the Divine oracle (Lev 24 12; Nu 15 34).

LITERATURE

The Eng. name of the Book of Jgs is a tr of the Heb title (שִׁפְטִים, shōph'ṭīm), which is reproduced in the Gr Kritai, Kritai, and the Lat

1. Title Liber Judicum. In the list of the canonical books of the OT given by Origen (apud Euseb., HE, VI, 25) the name is transliterated Σαφατεμ, Saphateim, which represents rather "judgments" (sh'phātīm; κρίματα, krimata) than "judges." A passage also is quoted from Philo (De Confus. Linguarum, 26), which indicates that he recognized the same form of the name; compare the Gr title of "Kingdoms" (Βασιλείαι, Basileiai) for the four books of S and K.

In the order of the Heb Canon the Book of Jgs invariably occupies the 7th place, following immediately upon Josh and preceding S and K. With

2. Place in the Canon these it formed the group of the four "earlier prophets" (נביאים ראשונים).

(nebbi'im ri'shōnim), the first moiety of the 2d great division of the Heb Scriptures. As such the Book of Jgs was classified and regarded as "prophetical," equally with the other historical books, on the ground of the religious and spiritual teaching which its history conveyed. In the rearrangement of the books, which was undertaken for the purposes of the Gr tr and Canon, Jgs maintained its position as 7th in order from the beginning, but the short historical Book of Ruth was removed from the place which it held among the Rolls (meghillōth) in the 3d division of the Jewish Canon, and attached to Jgs as a kind of appendix, probably because the narrative was understood to presuppose the same conditions and to have reference to the same period of time. The Gr order was followed in all later VSS, and has maintained itself in modern Bibles. Origen (loc. cit.) even states, probably by a mere misunderstanding, that Jgs and Ruth were comprehended by the Jews under the one title Saphateim.

The Book of Jgs consists of 3 main parts or divisions, which are readily distinguished.

(1) Introductory (1-2 5).—A brief

3. Contents summary and recapitulation of the events of the conquest of Western Pal, for the most part parallel to the narrative of Josh, but with a few additional details and some divergences from the earlier account, in particular emphasizing (1 27-36) the general failure of the Israelites to expel completely the original inhabitants of the land, which is described as a violation of their covenant with Jeh (2 1-3), entailing upon them suffering and permanent weakness. The introductory ver (1 1), which refers to the death of Joshua as having already taken place, seems to be intended as a general indication of the historical period of the book as a whole; for some at least of the events narrated in 1-2 5 took place during Joshua's lifetime.

(2) The central and main portion (2 6-16).—A series of narratives of 12 "judges," each of whom in turn, by his devotion and prowess, was enabled to deliver Israel from thralldom and oppression, and for a longer or shorter term ruled over the people whom he had thus saved from their enemies. Each successive repentance on the part of the people, however, and their deliverance are followed, on the death of the judge, by renewed apostasy, which entails upon them renewed misery and servitude, from which they are again rescued when in response to their prayer the Lord "raises up" for them another judge and deliverer. Thus the entire history is set as it were in a recurrent framework of moral and religious teaching and warning; and the lesson is enforced that it is the sin of the people, their abandonment of Jeh and persistent idolatry, which entails upon them calamity, from which the Divine long-suffering and forbearance alone makes for them a way of escape.

(a) 2 6-3 6: A second brief introduction, conceived entirely in the spirit of the following narratives, which seems to attach itself to the close of the Book of Josh, and in part repeats almost verbally the account there given of the death and burial of Israel's leader (Jgs 2 6-9 || Josh 24 28-31), and proceeds to describe the condition of the land and people in the succeeding generation, ascribing their misfortunes to their idolatry and repeated neglect of the warnings and commands of the judges; closing with an enumeration of the peoples left in the land, whose presence was to be the test of Israel's willingness to obey Jeh and at the same time to prevent the nation from sinking into a condition of lethargy and ease.

(b) 3 7—3 11: Judgeship of Othniel who delivered Israel from the hand of Cushan-rishathaim.

(c) 3 12—30: Victory of Ehud over the Moabites, to whom the Israelites had been in servitude 18 years. Ehud slew their king Eglon, and won for the nation a long period of tranquillity.

(d) 3 31: In a few brief words Shamgar is named as the deliverer of Israel from the Philis. The title of "judge" is not accorded to him, nor is he said to have exercised authority in any way. It is doubtful, therefore, whether the writer intended him to be regarded as one of the judges.

(e) Chs 4, 5: Victory of Deborah and Barak over Jabin the Can. king, and death of Sisera, captain of his army, at the hands of Jael, the wife of a Kenite chief; followed by a Song of Triumph, descriptive and commemorative of the event.

(f) Chs 6—8: A 7-year oppression at the hands of the Midianites, which is described as peculiarly severe, so that the land became desolate on account of the perpetual raids to which it was subject. After a period of hesitation and delay, Gideon defeats the combined forces of the Midianites and Amalekites and the "children of the east," i.e. the wandering Bedawin bands from the eastern deserts, in the valley of Jezreel. The locality and course of the battle are traced by the sacred writer, but it is not possible to follow his account in detail because of our inability to identify the places named. After the victory, Gideon is formally offered the position of ruler for himself and his descendants, but refuses; nevertheless, he seems to have exercised a measure of restraining influence over the people until his death, although he himself and his family apparently through covetousness fell away from their faithfulness to Jeh (8 27.33).

(g) Ch 9: Episode of Abimelech, son of Gideon by a concubine, who by the murder of all but one of his brethren, the legitimate sons of Gideon, secured the throne at Shechem for himself, and for 3 years ruled Israel. After successfully stamping out a revolt at Shechem against his authority, he is himself killed when engaged in the siege of the citadel or tower of Thebez by a stone thrown by a woman.

(h) (i) 10 1—5: Tola and Jair are briefly named as successive judges of Israel for 23 and 22 years respectively.

(j) 10 6—12 7: Oppression of Israel for 18 years by the Philis and Ammonites. The national deliverance is effected by Jephthah, who is described as an illegitimate son of Gilead who had been on that account driven out from his home and had become the captain of a band of outlaws. Jephthah stipulates with the elders of Gilead that if he undertakes to do battle on their behalf with the Ammonites, he is afterward to be recognized as their ruler; and in accordance with the agreement, when the victory has been won, he becomes judge over Israel (11 9f; 12 7). See JEPHTHAH.

(k) (l) (m) 12 8—15: Three of the so-called "minor" judges, Ibzan, Elon and Abdon, judged Israel in succession for 7, 10 and 8 years respectively. As they are not said to have delivered the nation from any calamity or oppression, it is perhaps to be understood that the whole period was a time of rest and tranquillity.

(n) Chs 13—16: The history of Samson (see separate art.).

(3) An appendix, chs 17—21.—The final section, in the nature of an appendix, consisting of two narratives, independent apparently of the main portion of the book and of one another. They contain no indication of date, except the statement 4 t repeated that "in those days there was no king in Israel" (17 6; 18 1; 19 1; 21 25). The natural inference is that the narratives were committed to writing in the days of the monarchy; but the events themselves were understood by the compiler or historian to have taken place during the period of the Judges, or at least anterior to the establishment of the kingdom. The lawless state of society, the violence and disorder among the tribes, would suggest the same conclusion. No name of a judge appears, however, and there is no direct reference to the office or to any central or controlling authority. Jos also seems to have known them in reverse order, and in a position preceding the histories of the judges themselves, and not at the close of the book (Ant, V, ii, 8—12; iii, 1; see E. König in HDB, II, 810). Even if the present form of the narratives is thus late, there can be little doubt that they contain elements of considerable antiquity.

(a) Chs 17—18: The episode of Micah the Ephraimite and the young Levite who is consecrated as priest in his house. A war party, however, of the tribe of Dan during a migration northward, by threats and promises induced the Levite to accompany them, taking with him the priestly ephod, the household goods of his patron, and a costly image which Micah had caused to be made. These Micah in vain endeavors to recover from the Danites. The latter sack and burn Laish in the extreme N. of Pal, rebuilding the city on the same site and renaming it "Dan." There they set up the image which they had stolen, and establish a rival priesthood and worship, which is said to have endured "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (18 31).

(b) Chs 19—21: Outrage of the Benjamites of Gibeah against the concubine of a Levite lodging for a night in the city on his way from Bethlehem to the hill country of Ephraim. The united tribes, after twice suffering defeat at the hands of the men of Benjamin, exact full vengeance; the tribe of Benjamin is almost annihilated, and their cities, including Gibeah, are destroyed. In order that the tribe may not utterly perish, peace is declared with the 600 survivors, and they are provided with wives by stratagem and force, the Israelites having taken a solemn vow not to permit intermarriage between their own daughters and the members of the guilty tribe.

The period covered by the history of the Book of Jgs extends from the death of Joshua to the death of Samson, and adds perhaps a later reference in 18 31, "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (cf 1 S 1 3).

It is, however, difficult, perhaps impossible, to compute in years the length of time that the writer had in mind. That he proceeded upon a fixed chronological basis, supplied probably by tradition but modified or arranged on a systematic principle, seems evident. The difficulty may be due in part to the corruption which the figures have suffered in the course of the transmission of the text. In 1 K 6 1 an inclusive total of 480 years is given as the period from the Exodus to the building of the Temple in the 4th year of the reign of Solomon. This total, however, includes the 40 years' wandering in the desert, the time occupied in the conquest and settlement of the Promised Land, and an uncertain period after the death of Joshua, referred to in the Book of Jgs itself (2 10), until the older generation that had taken part in the invasion had passed away. There is also to be reckoned the 40 years' judgeship of Eli (1 S 4 18), the unknown length of the judgeship of Samuel (7 15), the years of the reign of Saul (cf 1 S 13 1, where, however, no statement is made as to the length of his reign), the 40 years during which David was king (1 K 2 11), and the 4 years of Solomon before the building of the Temple. The recurrence of the number 40 is already noticeable; but if for the unknown periods under and after Joshua, of Samuel and of Saul, 50 or 60 years be allowed—a moderate estimate—there would remain from the total of 480 years a period of 300 years in round numbers for the duration of the times of the Judges. It may be doubted whether the writer conceived of the period of unsettlement and distress, of alternate oppression and peace, as lasting for so long a time.

The chronological data contained in the Book of Jgs itself are as follows:

	Years
Oppression of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia (3 8) . . . . .	8
Deliverance by Othniel and rest (3 11) . . . . .	40

A total of 410 years, or, if the years of foreign oppression and of the usurpation of Abimelech are omitted, of 296.

It has been supposed that in some instances the rule of the several judges was contemporaneous, not successive, and that therefore the total period during which the judges ruled should be reduced accordingly. In itself this is sufficiently probable. It is evident, however, that this thought was not in the mind of the writer, for in each case he describes the rule of the judge as over "Israel" with no indication that "Israel" is to be understood in a partial and limited signification. His words must therefore be interpreted in their natural sense, that in his own belief the rulers whose deeds he related exercised control in the order named over the entire nation. Almost certainly, however, he did not intend to include in his scheme the years of oppression or the 3 years of Abimelech's rule. If these be deducted, the resultant number (296) is very near the total which the statement in 1 K 6 1 suggests.

No stress, however, must be laid upon this fact. The repeated occurrence of the number 40, with its double and half, can hardly be accidental. The same fact was noted above in connection with earlier and later rulers in Israel. It suggests that there is present an element of artificiality and conscious arrangement in the scheme of chronology, which makes it impossible to rely upon it as it stands for any definite or reliable historical conclusion.

Within the Book of Jgs itself no author is named, nor is any indication given of the writer or writers who are responsible for the form in

5. Author-ship and Sources which the book appears; and it would seem evident, also, that the 3 parts or divisions of which the book is composed are on a different footing as regards the sources from which they are drawn.

The Talmudic tradition which names Samuel as the author can hardly be seriously regarded. The historical introduction presents a form of the traditional narrative of the conquest of Pal which is parallel to but not identical with that contained in the Book of Josh. Brief and disconnected as it is, it is of the greatest value as a historical authority, and contains elements which in origin, if not in their present form, are of considerable antiquity. The main portion of the book, comprising the narratives of the judges, is based upon oral or written traditions of a local and perhaps a tribal character, the value of which it is difficult to estimate, but which undoubtedly in some instances have been more carefully preserved than in others. In particular, around the story of Samson there seem to have gathered elements derived from the folklore and the wonder-loving spirit of the countryside; and the exploits of a national hero have been enhanced and surrounded with a glamor of romance as the story of them has passed from lip to lip among a people who themselves or their forefathers owed so much to his prowess. Of this central part of Jgs the Song of Deborah (ch 5) is the most ancient, and bears every mark of being a contemporary record of a remarkable conflict and victory. The text is often difficult, almost unintelligible, and has so greatly suffered in the course of transmission as in some passages to be beyond repair. As a whole the song is an eloquent and impassioned ode of triumph, ascribing to Jeh the great deliverance which has been wrought for His people over their foes.

The narratives of Jgs, moreover, are set in a framework of chronology and of ethical comment and teaching, which are probably independent of one another. The moral exhortations and the lessons drawn from hardships and sufferings, which the people of Israel incur as the consequence of their idolatry and sin, are conceived entirely in the spirit of Dt, and even in the letter and form bear a considerable resemblance to the writings of that book. In the judgment of some scholars, therefore, they are to be ascribed to the same author or authors. Of this, however, there is no proof. It is possible, but perhaps hardly probable. They certainly belong to the same school of thought, of clear-sighted doctrine, of reverent piety, and of jealous concern for the honor of Jeh. With the system of chronology, the figures and dates, the ethical commentary and inferences would seem to have no direct relation. The former is perhaps a later addition, based in part at least upon tradition, and applied to existing accounts, in order to give them their definite place and succession in the historical record. Finally, the three strands of traditional narrative, moral comment, and chronological framework were woven into one whole by a compiler or reviser who completed the book in the form in which it now exists. Concerning the absolute dates, however, at which these processes took place very little can be determined.

The two concluding episodes are distinct, both in form and character, from the rest of the book. They do not relate the life or deeds of a judge, nor do they, explicitly at least, convey any moral teaching or warning. They are also mutually independent. It would seem therefore that they are to be regarded as accounts of national events or experiences, preserved by tradition, which, because they were understood to have reference to the period of the Judges, were included in this book. The internal nature of the narratives themselves would suggest that they belong rather to the earlier than the later part of the time during which the judges held rule; and their ancient character is similarly attested. There is no clue, however, to the actual date of their composition, or to the time or circumstances under which they were incorporated in the Book of Jgs.

The discussion of the relation of the Book of Jgs to the generally recognized sources of the Pent and to Josh has been in part anticipated in

6. Relation to Preceding Books the previous paragraph. In the earliest introductory section of the book, and in some of the histories of the judges, esp. in that of Gideon (chs 6-8), it is not difficult to distinguish two threads of narrative, which have been combined together in the account as it now stands; and by some scholars these are identified with J and E in the Pent. The conclusion, however, is precarious and uncertain, for the characteristic marks of the Pent "sources" are in great measure absent. There is more to be said for the view that regards the introduction (1-2 5), with its verbal parallels to Josh as derived ultimately from the history of JE, from which, however, very much has been omitted, and the remainder adapted and abbreviated. Even this moderate conclusion cannot be regarded as definitely established. The later author or compiler was in possession of ancient documents or traditions, of which he made use in his composite narrative, but whether these were parts of the same historical accounts that are present in the books of Moses and in Josh must be regarded as undetermined. There is no trace, moreover, in Jgs of extracts from the writing or school of P; nor do the two concluding episodes of the book (chs 17-21) present any features which would suggest an identification with any of the leading "sources" of the Pent.

The moral and religious teaching, on the other hand, which makes the varied national experiences in the times of the Judges a vehicle for ethical instruction and warning, is certainly derived from the same school as Dt, and reproduces the whole tone and spirit of that book. There is no evidence, however, to identify the writer or reviser who thus turned to spiritual profit the lessons of the age of the Judges with the author of Dt itself, but he was animated by the same principles, and endeavored in the same way to expound the same great truths of religion and the Providence of God.

There are two early Gr trs of the Book of Jgs, which seem to be on the whole independent of one another.

7. Relation to LXX and Other Versions

These are represented by the two great uncial MSS, B (Vatican) and A (Alexandrine). With the former is associated a group of cursive MSS and the Sahidic or Upper Egypt VS. It is therefore probable that the tr is of Egypt origin, and by some it has been identified with that of Hesychius. It has been shown, moreover, that in this book, and probably elsewhere, the ancient character of the text of B is not always maintained, but in parts at least betrays a later origin. The other VS is contained in A and the majority of the uncial and cursive MSS of the Gr texts, and, while certainly a real and independent tr from the original, is thought by some to show acquaintance with the VS of B. There is, however, no definite evidence that B's tr is really older. Some of the cursives which agree in general with A form sub-groups, thus the recension of Lucian is believed to be represented by a small number of cursives, the text of which is printed by Lagarde (Librorum VT Canoniorum, Pars Prior, 1883), and is substantially identical with that in the "Complutensian Polyglot" (see G. F. Moore, Critical and Exegetical Comm. on Jgs, Edinburgh, 1895, xliii ff). It is probable that the true original text of the LXX is not represented completely either by the one or the other VS, but that it partially underlies both, and may be traced in the conflicting readings which must be judged each on its own merits.

Of the other principal VSS, the Old Lat and the Hexaplar Syr, together with the Armenian and the Ethiopic, attach themselves to a sub-group of the MSS associated with A. The Bohairic VS of the Book of Jgs has not hitherto been published, but, like the rest of the OT, its text would no doubt be found to agree substantially with B. Jerome's tr follows closely the MT, and is independent of both Gr VSS; and the Pesh also is a direct rendering from the Heb.

Thus the main purpose of the Book of Jgs in the form in which it has been preserved in the OT is not to record Israel's past for its own sake, or to place before the writer's contemporaries a historical narrative of the achievements of their great men and rulers, but to use these events and the national experiences of adversity as a text from which to educe religious warning and instruction. With the author or authors spiritual edification is the first interest, and the facts or details of the history, worthy of faithful records, because it is the history of God's people, find their chief value in that they are and were designed to be admonitory, exhibiting the Divine judgments upon idolatry and sin, and conveying the lesson that disobedience and rebellion, a hard and defiant spirit that was forgetful of Jeh, could not fail to entail the same disastrous consequences. The author is preëminently a preacher of righteousness to his fellow-countrymen, and to this aim all other elements in the book, whether chronological or historical, are secondary and subordinate. In his narrative he sets down the whole truth, so far as it has become known to him through tradition or written document, however discreditable it may be to his nation. There is no ground for believing that he either extenuates on the one hand, or on the other paints in darker colors than the record of the transgressions of the people deserved. Neither he nor they are to be judged by the standards of the 20th cent., with its accumulated wealth of spiritual experience and long training in the principles of righteousness and truth. But he holds and asserts a lofty view of the character of Jeh, of the immutability of His wrath against obstinate transgression and of the certainty of its punishment, and yet of the Divine pitifulness and mercy to the man or nation that turns to Him with a penitent heart. The Jews were not mistaken when they counted the Book of Jgs among the Prophets. It is prophecy, more than history, because it exhibits and enforces the permanent lessons of the righteousness and justice and loving-kindness of God.

LITERATURE

I. Sources.—Our chief sources of information are the Book of Jgs and 1 S 1-12. The material contained in these is not all of the same age. The oldest part, by common consent, is the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5). It is a contemporaneous document. The prose narratives, however, are also early, and are generally regarded as presenting a faithful picture of the times with which they deal. The Book of Ruth, which also refers to this period, is probably in its present form a later composition, but there is no adequate ground for denying to it a historical basis (Konig, Einleitung, 286 ff; Kent, Student's OT, I, 310 f).

II. Chronology.—The period of the Judges extends from the death of Joshua to the establishment of the monarchy. How long a time elapsed between these limits is a matter of wide difference of opinion. The chronological data in the Book of Jgs, i.e. omitting Eli and Samuel, make a total of 410 years. But this is inconsistent with 1 K 6 1, where the whole period from the Exodus to the 4th year of Solomon is reckoned at 480 years. Various attempts have been made to harmonize these divergent figures, e.g. by eliminating the 70 years attributed to the Minor Judges (10 1-5; 12 7-15), by not counting the 71 years of foreign domination, and by the theory that some of the judges were contemporaneous. It is probable that the 480 years of 1 K 6 1 was a round number and did not rest on exact records. Indeed, it is doubtful if there was any fixed calendar in Israel before the time of the monarchy. The only way then to determine the length of the period of the Judges is from the date of the Exodus. The common view is that the Exodus took place during or just after the reign of Merenptah in the latter half of the 13th cent. BC. This, however, leaves hardly more than 150 years to the period of the Judges, for Saul's reign fell in the 2d half of the 11th cent. BC. Hence some, to whom this seems too short, assign the Exodus to the reign of Amenophis II, about 1450 BC. This harmonizes with the 480 years of 1 K 6 1, and is supported by other considerations (POT, 422-24). Still others have connected the Exodus with the expulsion of the Hyksos about 1580 BC (G. A. Reisner); and this would fit in very well with the chronological data in the Book of Jgs. The objection to the last two views is that they require a rather long period of subjection of the Israelites in Canaan to Egypt, of which there is no trace in the Book of Jgs. See, further, JUDGES, BOOK OF, IV.

III. General Political Situation.—The death of Joshua left much land yet to be possessed by the Israelites. The different tribes had received their respective allotments

1. The Canaanites (Jgs 1 3), but the actual possession of the territory assigned each still lay in the future and was only gradually achieved. The Canaanites remained in the land, and were for a time a serious menace to the power of Israel. They retained possession of the plains and many of the fortified cities, e.g. Gezer, Harheres, Aijalon, Shaalbim, and Jerus on the northern border of Judah (Jgs 1 21.29.35), and Bethshean, Ibleam, Taanach, Megiddo, and Dor along the northern border of Manasseh (Jgs 1 27.28).

Besides these foes within Canaan, the Israelites had enemies from without to contend with, viz. the

2. Foes Without Moabites, Midianites, Ammonites, and Philis. The danger from each of these quarters, except that from the Philis, was successfully warded off. The conflicts in which the Israelites were thus involved were all more or less local in character. In no case did all the tribes act together, though the duty of such united action is clearly taught in the Song of Deborah, at least so far as the 10 northern tribes are concerned. The omission of Judah and Simeon from this ancient song is strange, but may not be so significant as is sometimes supposed. The judges, who were raised up to meet the various emergencies, seem to have exercised jurisdiction only over limited areas. In general the different tribes and clans acted independently of each other. Local home rule prevailed. "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Jgs 17 6).

That Canaan was not during this period subdued and kept in subjection by one of the great world-powers, Egypt or Babylonia, is to be regarded as providential (HPM, I, 214f). Such subjection would have made impossible the development of a free national and religious life in Israel. The Cushan-rishathaim of Jgs 3 7-10 was more likely a king of Edom than of Mesopotamia (Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine, 161-62).

IV. Main Events.—Much of what took place during this period is unrecorded. Of the struggles

1. Struggles of Individual Tribes passed before they succeeded in establishing themselves in the land, little is known. One interesting episode is preserved for us in Jgs 17, 18. A considerable portion of the tribe of Dan, hard pressed by the Amorites (Jgs 1 34f), migrated from their allotted home W. of Judah to Laish in the distant north, where they put the inhabitants to the sword, burnt the city and then rebuilt it under the name of Dan. This took place early in the period of the Judges, apparently during the first generation after the conquest (Jgs 18 30).

At about the same time also (Jgs 20 28) seems to have occurred the war with Benjamin (Jgs 19-

2. Civil Strife 21), which grew out of an outrage perpetrated at Gibeah and the refusal of the Benjamites to surrender the guilty parties for punishment. The historicity of this war has been called in question, but it seems to be attested by Hos 9 9; 10 9. And that civil strife in Israel was not otherwise unknown during this period is clear from the experiences of Gideon (Jgs 8 1-3) and Jephthah (Jgs 12 1-6), not to mention those of Abimelech (Jgs 9). It is a current theory that the tribes of Simeon and Levi early in this period suffered a serious reverse (Gen 49 5-7), and that a reflection of this event is to be found in Gen 34; but the data are too uncertain to warrant any confidence in this view.

Six wars with other nations are recorded as taking place in this period, and each called forth its judge or judges. Othniel delivered the Is-

3. The Six raelites from the Mesopotamians or

Invasions Edomites (Jgs 3 7-11), Ehud from the Moabites (3 12-30), Deborah and Barak from the Canaanites (chs 4, 5), Gideon from the Midianites (chs 6-8), and Jephthah from the Ammonites (10 6-12.17). In the strife with the Philis, which was not terminated during this period,

Samson (Jgs 13-16), Eli (1 S 4-6), and Samuel

(1 S 7 3-14; 9 16) figure. Of these six wars those which brought Othniel, Ehud and Jephthah to the front were less serious and significant than the other three. The conflicts with the Canaanites, Midianites and Philis mark distinct stages in the history of the period.

After the first successes of the Israelites in Canaan

a period of weakness and disintegration set in.

The Canaanites, who still held the fortified cities in the plain of Esdraelon, banded themselves together and terrorized the region round about.

The Hebrews fled from their villages to the caves and dens. None had the heart to offer resistance (Jgs

5 6.8). It seemed as though they were about to be subdued by the people they had a short time before dispossessed. Then it was that Deborah appeared on the scene. With her passionate appeals in the name of Jeh she awakened a new sense of national unity, rallied the discouraged forces of the nation, and administered a final crushing defeat upon the Canaanites in the plain of Megiddo.

But the flame thus kindled after a time went out.

New enemies came from without. The Midianites invaded the land year after year, robbing it of its produce (Jgs 6 1.3). This evil was suddenly put an end to by the bold stroke of Gideon, whose victory was long treasured in the public memory (Isa

9 4; 10 26; Ps 83 9-12). But the people, at least of Manasseh and perhaps also of Ephraim, now realized that it was no longer safe to depend upon such temporary leadership. They needed a permanent organization to ward off the dangers that beset them. They therefore offered the kingship to Gideon. He formally declined it (Jgs 8 22.23), but still set up a government at Ophrah which the people looked upon as hereditary (Jgs

9 2). He was succeeded by his son Abimelech, who, after slaying all but one of his 70 brothers, assumed the title of king. The new kingdom, however, was of short duration. It ended after three years with the ignominious death of the king.

A great danger was needed before the people of Israel could be welded into unity and made to see the necessity of a strong central gov-

4. Need of ernment. This came eventually from Central the Philis, who twice defeated the Government Israelites in battle, captured the ark, and overran a large part of the country

(1 S 4-6). In the face of such a foe as this it was clear that only a strong and permanent leadership of the whole people would suffice (1 S 9 15; 10 1); and thus the rule of the Judges gave way to the monarchy.

V. Religious Conditions.—The Heb mind to which Moses addressed himself was not a tabula

rasa, and the Palestinian world into which the Israelites entered was not an intellectual blank.

Formative influences had for ages been at work on the Heb mind, and Pal had long been inhabited by a people with fixed institutions, customs and ideas. When then Israel settled in Canaan, they had both a heathen inheritance and a heathen environment to contend with. It should therefore occasion no surprise to find during this period such lapses from the purity of the Mosaic faith as appear in the ephod of Gideon (Jgs 8 24-27), the images of Micah (Jgs 17-18), and the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter (11 34-40). In the transition from a nomadic to an agricultural life it was inevitable that the Hebrews with their native heathen proclivities would adopt many of the crude and even immoral religious customs and beliefs of the people among whom they settled. But the purer Mosaic faith still had its representatives. The worship of the central sanctuary at Shiloh remained imageless. Leaders like Deborah and Samuel revived the spirit of Moses. And there can hardly be a doubt that in many a quiet home a true and earnest piety was cultivated like that in the home of Elimelech and Naomi.

VI. Theological Interpretation.—The Bib. historian was not content simply to narrate events. What concerned him most was the meaning lying back of them. And this meaning he was interested in, not for its own sake, but because of its application to the people of his own day. Hence intermingled with the narratives of the period of the Judges are to be found religious interpretations of the events recorded and exhortations based upon them. The fundamental lesson thus inculcated is the same as that continually insisted upon by the prophets. The Divine government of the world is based upon justice. Disobedience to the moral law and disloyalty to Jeh means, therefore, to Israel suffering and disaster. All the oppressions of the period of the Judges arose in this way. Relief and deliverance came only when the people turned unto Jeh. This religious pragmatism, as it is called, does not lie on the surface of the events, so that a naturalistic historian might see it. But it is a correlate of the ethical monotheism of the prophets, and constitutes the one element in the OT which makes the study of Israel's history supremely worth while.

JUDGING, juj'ing, JUDGMENT, juj'ment: Often in the OT for "to act as a magistrate" (Ex 18 13; Dt 1 16; 16 18, etc), justice being administered generally by "elders" (Ex 18 13-27), or "kings" (1 S 8 20) or "priests" (Dt 18 15); applied to God as the Supreme Judge (Ps 9 7 8; 10 18; 96 13; Mic 4 3, etc; Ps 7 8: "Jeh ministereth judgment," vividly describes a court scene, with Jeh as Judge).

Often in the NT, ethically, for (1) "to decide," "give a verdict," "declare an opinion" (Gr krinō); (2) "to investigate," "scrutinize" (Gr anakrinō); (3) "to discriminate," "distinguish" (Gr diakrinō). For (1), see Lk 7 43; Acts 15 19; for (2) see 1 Cor 2 15; 4 3; for (3) see 1 Cor 11 31; 14 29 m. Used also forensically in Lk 22 30; Acts 25 10; and applied to God in Jn 5 22; He 10 30. The judgments of God are the expression of His justice, the formal declarations of His judgments, whether embodied in words (Dt 5 1 AV, RV "statutes"), or deeds (Ex 6 6; Rev 16 7), or in decisions that are yet to be published (Ps 36 6). Man's consciousness of guilt inevitably associates God's judgments as declarations of the Divine justice, with his own condemnation, i.e. he knows that a strict exercise of justice means his condemnation, and thus "judgment" and "condemnation" become in his mind synonymous (Rom 5 16); hence the prayer of Ps 143 2, "Enter not into judgment"; also, Jn 6 29,

"the resurrection of judgment" (AV "damnation"); 1 Cor 11 29, "eateth and drinketh judgment" (AV "damnation"). H. E. JACOBS

JUDGMENT, DAY OF. See JUDGMENT, LAST.

JUDGMENT HALL, juj'ment hól (τὸ πραιτώριον, tō praitōrion, "Then led they Jesus . . . unto the hall of judgment . . . and they themselves went not into the judgment hall" [Jn 18 28 AV]; "Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again" [18 33 AV]; "[Pilate] went again into the judgment hall" [19 9]; "He commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment hall" [Acts 23 35]):

"Judgment hall" is one of the ways in which AV translates praitōrion, which it elsewhere renders "Praetorium" (Mk 15 16); "the common hall" (Mt 27 27). In this passage ERV renders it "palace"; in Jn 18 33; 19 9; Acts 23 35, "palace" is also given by ERV; in Phil 1 13, AV renders "palace," while RV gives "the praetorian guard." Praitōrion accordingly is tr'd in all these ways, "Praetorium," "the common hall," "the judgment hall," "the palace," "the praetorian guard." In the passages in the Gospels, ARV renders uniformly "Praetorium."

The word originally meant the headquarters in the Rom camp, the space where the general's tent stood, with the camp altar; the tent of the commander-in-chief. It next came to mean the military council, meeting in the general's tent. Then it came to be applied to the palace in which the Rom governor or procurator of a province resided. In Jerus it was the magnificent palace which Herod the Great had built for himself, and which the Rom procurators seem to have occupied when they came from Caesarea to Jerus to transact public business.

Praitōrion in Phil 1 13 has been variously rendered, "the camp of the praetorian soldiers," "the praetorian guard," etc. For what is now believed to be its true meaning, see PRAETORIUM.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

JUDGMENT, LAST: In Christian theology the Last Judgment is an act in which God interposes directly into human history, brings the course of this world to a final close, determines the eternal fate of human beings, and places them in surroundings spiritually adapted to their final condition. The concept is purely transcendental, and is to be distinguished from the hope that God will interfere in the history of this world to determine it undeviatingly toward good. The transcendental doctrine is possible only when an exalted idea of God has been attained, although it may afterward be united with crasser theories, as in certain naive conceptions of Christianity at the present day.

In the religion of Israel, the doctrine of the Last Judgment arose from "transcendentalizing" the concept of the "Day of the Lord."

2. The Doctrine in the Religion of Israel Just as hope of immortality replaced desire for length of days on earth, just as "the rejuvenation of Pal" was substituted "an eternal abode in a new earth," so the ideal of a military victory over Israel's enemies expanded into God's solemn condemnation of evil. The concept thus strictly defined is hardly to be sought in the OT, but Dnl 12 1-3 may contain it. The first unequivocal assertion would appear to be in En 91 17, where the final state is contrasted with a preceding reign of earthly happiness. (If there has been no redaction in the latter part of this section, its date is prior to 165 BC.) Hereafter the idea is so prevalent in the Jewish writings that detailed reference is needless. But it is by no means universal. Writings touched with Gr thought (En 108; 4 Macc;

Philo) are content with an individual judgment at death. A unique theory is that of the Test. XII P (Levi 18 8-14, e.g.), where the world grows into final blessedness without catastrophe. But much more common is the persistence of the non-transcendental ideas, ingrained as they were in the thought of the people (even in Philo; cf his prophecy of national earthly glory in Eccr 9). This type of thought was so tenacious that it held its own alongside of the transcendental, and both points of view were accepted by more than one writer. Then the earthly happiness precedes the heavenly (as in En 91), and there are two judgments, one by the Messiah and the other by God (2 Esd 7; Syr Bar 29, 30). So in Rev, where in ch 19 Christ overcomes the enemies in battle-symbolism and establishes the Millennium, while the Last Judgment is held by God (20 11 ff). Otherwise the Messiah is never the judge except in the Parables of Enoch, where He appears as God's vicar uniformly (in 47 3 God fixes the time of judgment only). Possibly in Wisd 4 16; 5 1 men share in the judgment-act but otherwise they (and angels) appear only as "assessors" or as executors of the sentence. In Wisd 3 8, "judging" is used in the OT sense of "rule" (Jgs 3 10, etc), as is the case in Mt 19 28 || Lk 22 30; 1 Cor 6 2,3 (in the last case with the word in two senses). Further studies in the variation of the (rather conventionally fixed) details of the judgment will interest the special student only.

For discussions of the relevant Bib. passages, see DAY OF THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; PAROUSIA. The doctrine has real religious value, for it insists on a culmination in the evolution (or degeneration!) of the race as well as of the individual. So it is contrasted with the pessimism of natural science, which points only toward the gradual extinction of humanity through the cooling of the sun.

LITERATURE.—The variations of the concept are treated fully only in Volz, Judische Eschatologie. For general lit. see ESCHATOLOGY; PAROUSIA.

The word κριτήριον, kritērion, "a tribunal," "bench of judges" (Jas 2 6) occurs also in 1 Cor 6 2-4, and is there tr'd in RVm by "tribunals." See also JUDGE.

LITERATURE

I. Name.—This apocryphal book is called after the name of its principal character Judith (יהודית, y'hūdhit, "a Jewess"; Ἰουδῖθ, Ioudith, Ἰουδῆθ, Ioudēth). The name occurs in Gen 26 34 and the corresponding masc. form (יְהוּדִי, y'hūdhi, "a Jew") in Jer 36 14.21 23 (name of a scribe). In other great crises in Heb history women have played a great part (cf Deborah, Jgs 5, and Esther). The Books of Ruth, Est, Jth and Susannah are the only ones in the Bible (including the Apoc) called by the names of women, these women being the principal characters in each case.

II. Canonicity.—Though a tale of Jewish patriotism written originally in Heb. this book was never admitted into the Heb Canon, and the same applies to the Book of Tob. But both Jth and Tob were recognized as canonical by the Council of Carthage (397 AD) and by the Council of Trent (1545 AD). Though, however, all Romanists include these books in their Bible (the Vulg), Protestant VSS of the Bible, with very few exceptions, exclude the whole of the Apoc (see APOCRYPHA). In the LXX and Vulg, Tob and Jth (in that order) follow Neh and precede Est. In the EV of the Apoc, which unfortunately for its understanding stands alone, 1 Esd, 2 Esd, Tob and Jth occupy the first place and in the order named. In his tr of the Apoc, Luther, for some unexplained reason, puts Jth at the head of the apocryphal books, Wisdom taking the next place.

III. Contents.—The book opens with an account of the immense power of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, whose capital was Nineveh. (In the days of the real Nebuchadnezzar, Assyria had ceased to be, and its capital was destroyed.) He calls upon the peoples living in the western country, including Pal, to help him to subdue a rival king whose power he feared—Arphaxad, king of the Medes (otherwise quite unknown). But as they refused the help he demanded, he first conquered his rival, annexing his territory, and then sent his general Holofernes to subdue the western nations and to punish them for their defiance of his authority. The Assyrian general marched at the head of an army 132,000 strong and soon took possession of the lands N. and E. of Pal, demolishing their idols and sanctuaries that Nebuchadnezzar alone might be worshipped as god (chs 1-3). He now directed his forces against the Jews who had recently returned from exile and newly rebuilt and rededicated their temple. Having heard of the ruin of other temples caused by the invading foe, the Jews became greatly alarmed for the safety of their own, and fortified the mountains and villages in the south, providing themselves with food to meet their needs in the event of war. At the urgent request of Joakim ("Eliakim" in the Vulg and Pesh), the inhabitants of Bethulia (so the Lat, Eng., and other VSS, but Βερυλοία, Betuloiá is more correct according to the Gr) and of Betomestham (both places otherwise unknown) defended the adjoining mountain passes which commanded the way to Jerus. Holofernes at once laid siege to Bethulia, and by cutting off the water supply aimed at starving the people to submission. But he knows little of the people he is seeking to conquer, and asks the chiefs who are with him who and what these Jews are. Achior, the Ammonite chief, gives an account of the Israelites, concluding that when faithful to their God they were invincible, but that when they disobeyed Him they were easily overcome. Achior is for this saying expelled and handed over to the Jews. After holding out for some days, the besieged people insisted that Onias their governor should surrender. This he promises to do if no relief comes in the course of five days. A rich, devout and beautiful widow called Judith (daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon [8 1]), hearing of these things, rebukes the murmurers for their lack of faith and exhorts them to trust in God. As Onias abides by his promise to the people, she resolves to attempt another mode of deliverance. She obtains consent to leave the fortress in the dead of night, accompanied by her maidservant, in order to join the Assyrian camp. First of all she prays earnestly for guidance and success; then donning her mourning garb, she puts on her most gorgeous attire together with jewels and other ornaments. She takes with her food allowed by Jewish law, that she might have no necessity to eat the forbidden meats of the Gentiles. Passing through the gates, she soon reaches the Assyrians. First of all, the soldiers on watch take her captive, but on her assuring them that she is a fugitive from the Hebrews and desires to put Holofernes in the way of achieving a cheap and easy victory over her fellow-countrymen, she is warmly welcomed and made much of. She reiterates to Holofernes the doctrine taught by Achior that these Jews can easily be conquered when they break the laws of their Deity, and she knows the necessities of their situation would lead them to eat food prohibited in their sacred laws, and when this takes place she informs him that he might at once attack them. Holofernes listens, applauds, and is at once captured by her personal charms. He agrees to her proposal and consents that she and her maid should be allowed each night to say their prayers out in the valley near the Heb fortress. On the 4th night after her arrival, Holofernes arranges a banquet to which only his household servants and the two Jewesses are invited. When all is over, by a preconcerted plan the Assyrian general and the beautiful Jewish widow are left alone. He, however, is dead drunk and heavily asleep. With his own scimitar she cuts off his head, calls her maid who puts it into the provision bag, and together they leave the camp as if for their usual prayers and join their Heb compatriots, still frantic about the immediate future. But the sight of the head of their arch foe puts new heart into them, and next day they march upon the enemy now in panic at what had happened, and win an easy victory. Judith became ever after a heroine in Jewish romance and poetry, a Heb Joan of Arc, and the tale of the deliverance she wrought for her people has been told in many languages. For later and shorter forms of the tale see VII, 4 (Heb Midrashim).

IV. Fact or Fiction?—The majority of theologians down to the 19th cent. regarded the story of Jth as pure history; but with the exception of O. Wolf (1861) and von Gumpach, Protestant scholars in recent times are practically agreed that the Book of Jth is a historical novel with a purpose similar to Dnl, Est and Tob. Schürer classes it with "parenetic narratives" (paranetische Erzählung). The Heb novel is perhaps the earliest of all novels, but it is always a didactic novel written to enforce some principle or principles. Roman Catholic scholars defend the literal historicity of the book, though they allow that the proper names are more or less disguised. But the book abounds with anachronisms, inconsistencies and impossibilities, and was evidently written for the lesson it teaches: obey God and trust Him, and all will be well. The author had no intention to teach history.

Torrey, however, goes too far when he says (see Jew Enc., "Book of Jth") that the writer aimed at nothing more than to write a tale that would amuse. A tone of religious fervor and of intense patriotism runs through the narrative, and no opportunity of enforcing the claims of the Jewish law is lost. Note esp. what is taught in the speeches of Achior (5 12-21) and Judith (8 17-24; cf 11 10), that, trusting in God and keeping His commandments, the nation is invulnerable.

According to the narrative Nebuchadnezzar has been for 12 years king of Assyria and has his capital at Nineveh, though we know he never was or could be king of Assyria. He became king of Babylon in 604 BC, upon the death of his father Nabopolassar, who in 608 had destroyed Assyria. The Jews had but recently returned from exile (4 3; 5 19), but were independent, and Holofernes knew nothing about them (5 3). Nebuchadnezzar died in 561 BC and the Jews returned under Cyrus in 538. Bethulia to which Holofernes lay siege was otherwise quite unknown: it is probably a disguised form of Beth 'Ēlōhim or Beth 'Ēlōh, "house of God," and means the place where God is with His people. The detailed description of the site is but part of the writer's art; it was the place which every army must pass on its way to Jerus. As a matter of fact, there is no such position in Pal, and least of all Shechem, which Torrey identified with Bethulia. We know nothing besides what ch 1 tells us of "Arphaxad who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana"; on the contrary, in every other mention of the name it stands for a country or a race (see Gen 10 22, 24; 11 10-13).

V. Date.—It is evident that this religious romance was prompted by some severe persecution in which the faith of the Jews was sorely tried, and the writer's dominant aim is identical with that of the author of Dnl, viz. to encourage those suffering for their religion by giving instances of Divine deliverance in the darkest hour.

"Only trust and keep the law; then deliverance will unfailingly come"—that is the teaching. Jth might well have been written during the persecution of the Maccabean age, as was almost certainly the Book of Dnl. We have in this book that zeal for orthodox Judaism which marked the age of the Maccabees, and the same strong belief that the war in which the nation was engaged was a holy one. The high priest is head of the state (see 4 6), as suiting a period when the religious interest is uppermost and politics are merged in religion, though some say wrongly that John Hyrcanus (135-106 BC) was the first to combine priestly and princely dignities. We have another support for a Maccabean date in the fact that Onias was high priest during the siege of Bethulia (4 6), the name being suggested almost certainly by Onias III, who became high priest in 195 (or 198) BC, and who died in 171 after consistently opposing the Hellenizing policy of the Syrians and their Jewish allies.

That the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 BC) supply as good a background for this book as any other event in Jewish history is the least that can be said; but one may not be dogmatic on the matter, as similar conditions recurred in the nation's history, and there is no external or internal evidence that fixes the date definitely. The following scholars decide for a date in the Maccabean age: Fritzsche, Ewald, Hilgenfeld, Schürer, Ball, Cornill and Lohr. The author was certainly a resident in Pal, as his local knowledge and interest show; and from his punctilious regard for the law one may judge that he belonged to the Hasidaeans (hāšīdīm) party. Since he so often mentions Dothan (Gr Dothae, Dothaim) (3 9; 4 6; 7 3, 18; 8 3), it is probable that he belonged to that neighborhood. Though, however, the author wrote in the time of the Maccabees, he seems to set his history in a framework that is some 200 years earlier, as Nöldeke (Die alttest. Lit., 1868, 96; Aufsätze zur persischen Geschichte, 1887, 78) and Schürer (GJV, III, 323 ff) show. In 350 BC, Artaxerxes Ochus (361–338 BC) invaded Phoenicia and Egypt, his chief generals being Holofernes (2 4, etc) and Bagoas (12 11), both of whom are in Jth officials of King Nebuchadnezzar and take part in the expedition against the Jews. This was intended probably to disarm the criticism of enemies who might resent any writing in which they were painted in unfavorable colors.

(1) Invasion of Pompey.—That it was the invasion of Pompey which gave rise to the book is the opinion held by Gaster. If this were so, Jth and the Ps Sol arose under the pressure of the same circumstances (see Ryle and James, The Psalms of Solomon, XL, and J. Rendel Harris, The Odes and Psalms of Solomon, XIII). But in the Ps Sol the supreme ruler is a king (17 22), not a high priest (Jth 4 6). Besides, anyone who reads the Ps Sol and Jth will feel that in the former he has to do with a different and later age.

(2) Insurrection under Bar Cochba.—Hitzig (who held that the insurrection under Bar Cochba, 132 AD, is the event referred to), Volkmar and Graetz date this book in the days of the emperor Trajan (or Hadrian?). Volkmar gives himself much trouble in his attempt to prove that the campaigns of Nebuchadnezzar stand really for those of Trajan. But it is a sufficient refutation of this opinion that the book is quoted by Clement of Rome (55), who died in 100 AD, and whose reference to the book shows that it was regarded in his day as authoritative and even as canonical, so that it must have been written long before.

VI. Original Language.—That a Heb or (less likely) an Aram. original once existed is the opinion of almost all modern scholars, and the evidence for this seems conclusive. There are many Hebraisms in the book, e.g. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ("in the days of," 1 7, and 9 t besides); the frequent use of σφόδρα, sphódra, in the sense of the Heb מְאֹד, m'ôdh, and even its repetition (also a Hebraism, 4 8); cf ἐπὶ πολὺ σφόδρα, ἐπὶ πολὺ sphódra (5 18) and πλήθος πολὺ σφόδρα, plēthos polú sphódra (2 17). Note further the following: "Let not thy eye spare," etc (2 11; cf Ezk 5 11, etc); "as I live" (in an oath, 2 12); "God of heaven" (5 8; 11 17); "son of man," parallel with "man," and in the same sense (8 16); "and it came to pass when she had ceased crying," etc (10 1); "the priests who serve in Jerus before the face of our God" (11 13). In 16 3 we have the words: "For a god that shatters battle is [the] Lord." Now "Lord" without the article can be only the Heb "Yahweh," read always dhōnāy, "Lord." But the phrase, "to shatter battle," is not good Gr or good sense. The Heb words shābhath ("to rest"; cf shabbāth, "Sabbath") and shābhar ("to break") are written much alike, and in the original Heb we must have had the causative form of the first vb.: "A God that makes war cease is [the] Lord" (see Ps 46 9). Moreover, the Heb idiom which strengthens a finite vb. by placing a cognate (absolute) infinitive before it is represented in the Gr of this book in the usual form in which it occurs in the LXX (and in Welsh), viz. a participle followed by a finite vb. (see 2 13). The present writer has noted other examples, but is prevented by lack of space from adding them here. That the original book was Heb and not Aram. is made extremely likely by the fact that the above examples of Heb idiom are peculiar to this language. Note esp. the idiom, "and it came to pass that," etc (2 4), with the implied "waw consecutive," and what is said above about 11 13, where the senseless Gr arose through the confusion of two similarly written Heb (not Aram.) words. There are cases also of mistakes in the Gr text due to wrong tr from the Heb, as in 1 8 (where for "nations" read "cities" or "mountains"); 2 2 (where for "concluded," Heb וַיִּכְלֶה, wa-y'khal, read "revealed," וַיִּגְלֶה, wa-y'-ghal); 3 1 9 10 (see Fritzsche, s.v.), etc.

VII. Versions.—The Gr text appears in three forms: (1) that of the principal Gr uncials (A, B, agreeing closely), which is followed in printed editions of the LXX; (2) that of codd. 19, 108 (Lucian's text), an evident revision of (1); (3) cod. 58 which closely resembles (2) and with which the Old Lat and Pesh agree in most points.

There are two extant Syr VSS, both of them dependent on the Gr text (3) noted above. The Pesh is given in Walton's Polyglot and in a critically revised form in Lagarde, Lab. Vet. Test. Apoc. Syr., 104–26. The so-called Hexaplar Syr text was made by Paul of Tella in the 6th cent.

(1) The Old Lat seems to have been made from the Gr text, cod. 58 (see above). (2) Jerome made his Lat VS (with which the Vulg is identical) from a lost Chaldaic VS. That this last is not the original text of the book is certain, because neither Origen nor his Jewish teachers knew anything of a Heb or Aram. text of Jth.

Several late Heb VSS of the book have been found, no one of them with strong claims to be considered the original text, though Gaster (see EB, II, col 2, 642) does make such a claim for the MS found, edited and tr by him (see PSBA, XVI, 156–63). The Heb midrashes were made to be read in Jewish homes and vary according to the circumstances of their origin. But they agree in these points: Proper names are often omitted. Jerus is the scene of action, the wars being those of the Maccabees. Judith is a Jewish maiden and daughter of Ahiath, according to the Gaster MS, and she belongs apparently to the Macrabean family. It is Nicanor who is beheaded, the occasion being the Feast of Dedication; in the Gaster MS it is the king who is killed. Translations of these midrashes may be seen in Jellinek, Beth Hamidrash, I, 130–41; II, 12 f; Lepsius, Zeitschr. für wiss. Theologie, 1867, 337 ff; Ball, Speaker's Apoc., I, 25 ff; Scholz, Comm., Anhang I and II; Gaster, op. cit. Gaster argues that the much shorter form of the tale in his MS is older than the longer VS. But if a writer were to expand a short story, he would hardly be likely to invent several proper names and to change others. It is probable that Judith came to be represented as a pure maiden (a virgin) under the influence of the low conception of marriage fostered in the mediaeval Christian church.

LITERATURE.—For the editions of the Gr text and for comms. on the Apoc, see under APOCRYPHAL LITERATURE. But on Jth note in particular the commentaries by Fritzsche and Ball, the latter containing elaborate bibliography. But the following must in addition be mentioned: Scholz, Commentar über das Buch Judith und über Bel und Drache, 1896; a 2d ed has appeared; A. S. Weissmann, Das Buch Judith historisch-kritisch beleuchtet, Wien, 1891; Schürer, GJV, III, 230–37, with full bibliography; cf HJP, II, iii, 32–37; Pentin, The Apoc in English Lit., Judith, 1908; and the relevant articles in the Bible dict., esp. that by F. JUEL, jōō'el ([1] Ἰουῦά, Iouná; [2] Ἰουήλ, Iouēl):

- (1) 1 Esd 9 34 = "Uel" in Ezr 10 34.
- (2) 1 Esd 9 35 = "Joel" in Ezr 10 43.

JUGGLERY, jug'lēr-i (γοητρία, goētia): The word occurs once in 2 Macc 12 24 RVM (AV "craft," RV "crafty guile").

JUICE, jōōs, jūs: The word occurs once in Cant 8 2 (tr of צִיִּיץ, 'āsiṣ, RVM "sweet wine"), and once in RVM of Job 6 6, where for "the white of an egg" m reads, "the juice of purslain." LXX has ῥήμασιν κενοῖς, rhēmasin kenois, "empty words."

JULIA, jōō'li-a (Ἰουλίᾱ, Ioulia): The name of a Rom Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings, the wife or sister of Philologus with whose name hers is coupled (Rom 16 15). The name points to a member of the imperial household.

JULIUS, jōō'li-us (Ἰούλιος, Ioulios): The centurion of the Augustan cohort under whose charge Paul was sent a prisoner to Rome (Acts 27 1 3). See ARMY, ROMAN; BAND, AUGUSTAN.

JUMPING, jum'ping. See GAMES.

JUNIAS, jōō'ni-as or JUNIA, jōō'ni-a (Ἰουνίας, Iounías, Ἰουνία, Iountía): One to whom, with Andronicus, greetings are sent by Paul at the close of his letter to the Romans (Rom 16 7). The name may be masc., Junias, a contraction of Junianus, or fem. Junia; it is Iounian, the accus. form, that is given. In all probability this is the masc., Junias. Paul defines the two as (1) "my kinsmen," (2) "my fellow-prisoners," (3) "who are of note among the apostles," and (4) "who also have been in Christ before me."

(1) They were Jews. Paul calls the Jews "my brethren," "my kinsmen according to the flesh" (Rom 9 3). Because Prisca and Aquila, a Jew and Jewess, are not designated as kinsfolk, Conybeare and Howson suppose "the epithet to denote that the persons mentioned were of the tribe of Benjamin."

(2) They had been companions of Paul in some unrecorded imprisonment. The phrase denotes more than the fact that they, like Paul, had suffered imprisonment for the sake of Christ.

(3) This may mean (a) that they were well known to the apostolic circle (so Gifford and Weiss), or (b) distinguished as apostles. The latter is probably correct, "apostle" being used in a wide sense (cf 1 Cor 15 7). The prophetic ministry of the early church consisted of apostles, prophets and teachers (1 Cor 12 28; Eph 4 11), the apostles being missionaries in the modern sense (see Lindsay, Church and Ministry, ch iii). Some apostles were missionaries sent out by particular churches (Acts 13 2,3; 2 Cor 8 23; Phil 2 25).

(4) They were among the first converts, "early disciples" like Mnason of Cyprus (Acts 21 16).

JUNIPER, jōō'ni-pēr (רִיחַן, rōthem; ῥαβμίν, rhathmên, 1 K 19 4f, m "broom"; Ps 120 4, m "broom"; Job 30 4 tr<sup>d</sup> "broom"): This is quite certainly the Arab. retam (Retama retem, N.O.

Leguminosae), a variety of broom which is one of the most characteristic shrubs of the deserts of Southern Pal and southward to Egypt. Though the shade it affords is but scanty, in the absence of other shrubs it is frequently used by desert travelers as a refuge from the sun's scorching rays (cf 1 K 19 4). The root yields good charcoal, giving out much heat (Ps 120 4). For people to be reduced to chew it for nourishment betokens the lowest depth of starvation (Job 30 4). Indeed so hopeless is this root as a source of food that many commentators believe that the accepted text is in error, and by altering a single letter, substituting ר for ח, they get a reading, which has been adopted in RVm, "to warm them" instead of "their meat," which certainly is much more probable.

JUPITER, jōō'pi-tēr, jū'pi-tēr (Zeús, Zeús): "Jupiter" is mentioned in 2 Macc 6 2; Acts 14 12,13, with "Zeus" in the RVm in all cases. In addition the Gr stem appears in διωροῦς, diopetorús, in Acts 19 35, EV "which fell down from Jupiter"; but the word means "from the clear sky" (cf "from heaven" in the RVm). "Jupiter" was considered the Lat equivalent of the Gr "Zeus," the highest god in the developed Gr pantheon, and Zeus in turn, in accord with the syncretism of the period, was identified with countless deities in the local cults of Asia Minor and elsewhere. So in Acts 14 12,13, "Zeus" and "Hermes" are local deities that had been renamed. On the other hand, the Zeus of 2 Macc 6 2 is the genuine Gr deity, who had been adopted as a special patron by Antiochus Epiphanes and to whose temple in Athens Antiochus had contributed largely. The title "Olympius" (2 Macc 6 2) is derived from the early worship on Mt. Olympus, but had come to be thought one of the god's highest appellations; Xenios, "protector of strangers," was a title in a cult particularly popular with travelers. See ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION, and Smith, HGHL, 333-34. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

JUPITER AND MERCURY. See ASTROLOGY, III, 1; MERCURY; JUPITER.

JURISDICTION, jōō-ris-dik'shun (ἐξουσία, exousia): The word exousia is well known in NT Gr. It is derived from the word éxesti, and suggests the absence of any hindrance to an act. It contains the idea of right and might (Cremer). In the NT it means right, authority, capability (Rom 9 21); power, strength (Mt 9 8); right and might (Jn 5 27). Thus it gets the meaning of the powers of the magistrate, which it bears in later Gr (Tit 3 1; Rom 13 1-3). And in this sense it is used in Lk 23 7, where it is tr<sup>d</sup> "jurisdiction."

JUSHAB-HESED, jōō'shab-hē'sed (יְשׁוּבָה חֶסֶד, yūshabh ḥesedh, "loving-kindness is returned"): Son of Zerubbabel. The name is probably symbolic (1 Ch 3 20); cf SHEAR-JASHUB.

JUSTICE, jus'tis (צְדָקָה, ḥdhākāh, צֶדֶק, ḥedhek; δικαιοσύνη, dikaíosunē): The original Heb and Gr words are the same as those rendered "righteousness." This is the common rendering, and in about half the cases where we have "just" and "justice" in AV, ARV has changed to "righteous" and "righteousness." It must be constantly borne in mind that the two ideas are essentially the same. See RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Justice had primarily to do with conduct in relation to others, esp. with regard to the rights of others. It is applied to business,

1. Human where just weights and measures are demanded (Lev 19 35,36; Dt 25 13-16; Am 8 5; Prov 11 1; 16 11; Ezk 45 9,10). It is demanded in courts, where the rights of rich and poor; Israelite and sojourner, are equally to be regarded. Neither station nor bribe nor popular clamor shall influence judge or witness. "Justice, justice shalt thou follow" (Dt 16 20 m; cf vs 18-20; Ex 23 1-3,6-9). In general this justice is contrasted with that wickedness which "feared not God, and regarded not man" (Lk 18 2).

In a larger sense justice is not only giving to others their rights, but involves the active duty of establishing their rights. So Israel waits upon God's justice or cries out: "The justice due to me [lit. "my justice"] is passed away from my God" (Isa 40 27). Jch is to show her to be in the right as over against the nations. Justice here becomes mercy. To "seek justice" means to "relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow" (Isa 1 17; cf 11 4; Jer 22 15,16; Ps 82 2-4). The same idea appears in Dt 24 12,13; Ps 37 21,26; 112 4-6, where the tr is "righteous" instead of "just."

In this conception of justice the full meaning of the NT is not yet reached. It does not mean sinlessness or moral perfection. Job knows the sin in his heart (Job 13 23.26; 7 21), and yet speaks of himself as a just or righteous man (12 4; 13 18). The Psalmist confidently depends upon the righteousness of God though he knows that no man is righteous in God's sight (Ps 143 1.2; cf 7 8; 18 20-24). It is not a lack of humility or dependence upon God when the Psalmist asks to be judged according to his righteousness. In relation to God, the just, or righteous, man is the one who holds to God and trusts in Him (Ps 33 18-22). This is not the later Judaistic legalism with its merit and reward, where God's justice is simply a matter of giving each man what he has earned.

The word "justice" does not occur in the NT, and in most cases where we find "just" in AV it is changed to "righteous" in ARV. The idea of justice or righteousness (remembering that these are essentially the same) becomes more spiritual and ethical in the NT. It is a matter of character, and God's own spirit is the standard (1 Jn 3 7; Mt 5 48). The mere give-and-take justice is not enough. We are to be merciful, and that to all. The ideal is righteousness, not rights. As Holtzmann says, "The keynote of the Sermon on the Mount is justitia and not ius."

God's justice, or righteousness, is founded in His essential nature. But, just as with man, it is not something abstract, but is seen in His relation to the world. It is His kingship establishing and maintaining the right. It appears as retributive justice, "that reaction of His holy will, as grounded in His eternal being, against evil wherever found." He cannot be indifferent to good and evil (Hab 1 13). The great prophets, Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea, all insist upon Jeh's demand for righteousness.

But this is not the main aspect of God's justice. Theology has been wont to set forth God's justice as the fundamental fact in His nature with which we must reconcile His mercy as best we may, the two being conceived as in conflict. As a matter of fact, the Scriptures most often conceive God's justice, or righteousness, as the action of His mercy. Just as with man justice means the relief of the oppressed and needy, so God's justice is His kingly power engaged on behalf of men, and justice and mercy are constantly joined together. He is "a just God and a Saviour" (Isa 45 21). "I bring near my righteousness [or "justice"] . . . and my salvation shall not tarry" (Isa 46 13; cf Ps 51 14; 103 17; 71 15; 116 5; Isa 51 5.6). The "righteous acts of Jeh" mean His deeds of deliverance (Jgs 5 11). And so Israel sings of the justice, or judgments, or righteousness of Jeh (they are the same), and proclaims her trust in these (Ps 7 17; 35 23.24.28; 36 6; 140 12.13; 50 5.6; 94 14.15; 103 6; 143 1).

The NT, too, does not lack the idea of retributive justice. The Son of Man "shall render unto every man according to his deeds" (Mt 16 27; cf 25 14-46; Lk 12 45-48; Rom 2 2-16; 6 23; 2 Cor 5 10; Col 3 24.25; 2 Thess 1 8.9; He 2 2.3; 10 26-31). But God's justice is far more than this. The idea of merit and reward is really superseded by a higher viewpoint in the teaching of Jesus. He speaks, indeed, of recompense, but it is the Father and not the judge that gives this (Mt 6 1.4.6.18). And it is no mere justice of earth, because the reward transcends all merit (Mt 24 46.47; Mk 10 30; Lk 12 37). This is grace not desert (Lk 17 10). And the parable of Mt 20 1-15 gives at length the deathblow to the whole Judaistic scheme of merit and reward.

And God's justice is not merely gracious, but redemptive. It not simply apportion rights, it establishes righteousness. Thus, just as in the OT, the judge is the Saviour. The difference is simply here: in the OT the salvation was more national and temporal, here it is personal and spiritual. But mercy is opposed to justice no more here than in the OT. It is by the forgiveness of sins that God establishes righteousness, and this is the supreme task of justice. Thus it is that God is at the same time "just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus" (Rom 3 26). "He is faithful and righteous [or "just"; see AV] to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 Jn 1 9).

LITERATURE

I. The Writings of Paul.—In this article reference will first be made to the writings of Paul, where justification receives its classic expression, and from there as a center, the other NT writers, and finally the OT, will be drawn in. According to Paul, justification rests on the following presuppositions:

The universality of sin. All men are not only born in sin (Eph 2 3), but they have committed many actual transgressions, which render them liable to condemnation. Paul proves this by an appeal to the OT witnesses (Rom 3 9 ff), as well as by universal experience, both of the heathen (1 18-32) and Jews (2 17-28; 3 9).

The perfection of the Law of God and the necessity of its perfect observance, if justification is to come by it (3 10). The modern

2. The Perfection of the Law of God notion of God as a good-natured, more or less nonchalant ruler, to whom perfect holiness is not inexorable, was not that of Paul. If one had indeed kept the law, God could not hold him guilty

(2 13), but such an obedience never existed. Paul had no trouble with the law as such. Those who have tried to find a difference here between Gal and Rom have failed. The reminder that the law was ordained by angels (Gal 3 19) does not mean that it was not also given by God. It might be reckoned in a sense among the elements of the world (kósmos,

4 3), as it is an essential part of an ordered universe, but that does not at all mean that it is not also holy, right and good (Rom 7 12). It was added, of course, on account of transgressions (Gal 3 19), for it is only a world of intelligent, free spirits capable of sin which needs it, and its high and beautiful sanctions make the sin seem all the more sinful (Rom 7 13).

It was fundamental in Paul's thinking that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures (1 Cor 15 3). In due season He died for the 3. The Life, ungodly (Rom 5 6); while we were Work and yet sinners He died for us (ver 8); we Death of are justified in His blood (ver 9), and the Atoning it is through Him that we are saved Saviour from the wrath (ver 9). While we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son (ver 10), being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus whom God set forth as a propitiation (3 24, 25). There is no reconciliation, no justification, except through and by and for Christ.

(1) Paul's own experience.—Paul's own experience cannot be left out of the account. He lived through the doctrine, as well as found it through illumination of the Spirit in the OT. It was not that he had only outwardly kept the law. He had been jealous for it, and had been blameless in every requirement of its righteousness (Phil 3 6). What was borne in upon him was how little such blamelessness could stand before the absolute standard of God. Just how far he was shaken with doubts of this kind we cannot say with certainty; but it seems impossible to conceive the Damascus conversion scene in the case of such an upright man and strenuous zealot without supposing a psychological preparation, without supposing doubts as to whether his fulfilling of the law enabled him to stand before God. Now, for a Pharisaically educated man like himself, there was no way of overcoming these doubts but in a renewed struggle for his own righteousness shown in the fiery zeal of his Damascus journey, pressing on even in the blazing light of noonday. This conversion broke down his philosophy of life, his Lebensgewissheit, his assurance of salvation through works of the law done never so conscientiously and perfectly. The revelation of the glorified Christ, with the assurance that He, the God-sent Messiah, was the very one whom he was persecuting, destroyed his dependence on his own righteousness, a righteousness which had led him to such shocking consequences. Although this was for him an individual experience, yet it had universal applications. It showed him that there was an inherent weakness in the law through flesh, that is, through the whole physical, psychological and spiritual nature of man considered as sinful, as working only on this lower plane, and that the law needed bracing and illuminating by the Son, who, though sent in the likeness of the flesh of sin, yet (as an offering) for sin condemned sin and cast it out (Rom 8 3), to the end that the law might be fulfilled in those who through Him walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit (ver 4). That was the glory of the new righteousness thus revealed. If the law had been able to do that, to give life, Christ need not have come, righteousness would have been by the law (Gal 3 21). But the facts show that the law was not thus able, neither the law written on the heart given to all, nor the law given to Moses (Rom 1 18—3 19). Therefore every mouth is stopped, and all flesh is silent before God. On the ground of law-keeping, what the modern man would call morality, our hope of salvation has been shattered. The law has spoken its judgment against us (Gal 3 10). It cannot therefore lead us to righteousness and life, nor was that its supreme intention: it was a pedagogue or tutor ("paidagogos") to lead us to Christ that we might be justified by faith (ver 24; see Ihmels in RE<sup>3</sup>, 16, 483—84). What made Paul to differ from his companions in the faith was that his own bitter experience under the revelation of Christ had led him to these facts.

(2) The resurrection connected with the death.—It was remarked above that the ground of justification according to Paul is the work of Christ. This means esp. His death as a sacrifice, in which, as Ritschl well says (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 3. Aufl., 1899, II, 157), the apostles saw exercised the whole power of His redemption. But that death cannot be separated from His resurrection, which first awakened them to a knowledge of its decisive worth for salvation, as well as finally confirmed their faith in Jesus as the Son of God. "The objective salvation," says Ritschl (p. 158), "which was connected with the sacrificial death of Christ and which continued on for the church, was made secure by this, that it was asserted also as an attribute of the resurrected one," who was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification (Rom 4 25). But this last expression is not to be interpreted with literal preciseness, as though Paul intended to distinguish between the forgiveness of sins as brought about by the death, and justification, by the resurrection, for both forgiveness and justification are identified in 4 6—8. It was the resurrection which gave Christians their assurance concerning Christ (Acts 17 31); by that resurrection He has been exalted to the right hand of God, where He maketh intercession for His people (Rom 8 34), which mediatorship is founded upon His death—the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (Rev 13 8 m; cf Gr text).

B. Weiss well says: "It was by the certainty of the exaltation of Christ to Messianic sovereignty brought about by the resurrection that Paul attained to faith in the saving significance of His death, and not conversely. Accordingly, the assurance that God cannot condemn us is owing primarily to the death of Christ, but still more to His resurrection and exaltation to God's right hand (Rom 8 34), inasmuch as these first prove that His death was the death of the mediator of salvation, who has redeemed us from condemnation. The objective atonement was accomplished by the death of Christ, but the appropriation of it in justification is possible only if we believe in the saving significance of His death, and we can attain to faith in that only as it is sealed by the resurrection" (Bib. Theol. of NT, I, 436—37).

(3) Faith, not works, the means of justification.—The means or condition of justification is faith (Rom 3 22, 25, 26, 28, etc) which rests upon the pure grace of God and is itself, therefore, His gift (Eph 2 8). This making faith the only instrument of justification is not arbitrary, but because, being the receptive attitude of the soul, it is in the nature of the case the only avenue through which Divine blessing can come. The gifts of God are not against the laws of the soul which He has made, but rather are in and through those laws. Faith is the hand outstretched to the Divine Giver, who, though He sends rain without our consent, does not give salvation except through an appropriate spiritual response. This faith is not simply belief in historical facts, though this is presupposed as to the atoning death (Rom 3 25), and the resurrection (10 9) of Jesus, but is a real heart reception of the gift (ver 10), and is therefore able to bring peace in our relation to God (5 1). The object of this faith is Jesus Christ (3 22, etc), through whom only comes the gift of righteousness and the reigning in life (5 17), not Mary, not angels, not doctrine, not the church, but Jesus only. This, to be sure, does not exclude God the Father as an object of faith, as the redeeming act of Christ is itself the work of God (2 Cor 5 19), whose love expressed itself toward us in this way (Rom 5 8). Faith in the only one God is always presupposed (1 Cor 8 6), but it was the apostolic custom rather to refer repentance to God and faith to Christ (Acts 20 21). But the oneness of God the Father and Christ the Son in a work of salvation is the best guaranty of the Divinity of the latter, both as an objective fact and as an inner experience of the Christian.

The justification being by faith, it is not by works or by love, or by both in one. It cannot be by the former, because they are lacking either in time or amount or quality, nor could they be accepted in any case until they spring from a heart renewed, for which faith is the necessary presupposition. It cannot be by the latter, for it exists only where the Spirit has shed it abroad in the heart (Rom 5 5), the indispensable prerequisite for receiving which is faith. This does not mean that the crown of Christianity is not love, for it is (1 Cor 13 13); it means only that the root is faith. Nor can love be foisted in as a partial condition of justification on the strength of the word often quoted for that purpose, "faith working through love" (Gal 5 6). The apostle is speaking here only of those who are already "in Christ," and he says that over against the Galatian believers bringing in a lot of legal observances, the only availing thing is not circumcision or its lack, but faith energizing through love. Here the interest is, as Ritschl says (II, 343), in the kingdom of God, but justification proper has reference to the sinner in relation to God and Christ. See the excellent remarks of Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, 226-27. At the same time this text reveals the tremendous ethical religious force abiding in faith, according to St. Paul. It reminds us of the great sentence of Luther in his preface to the Ep. to the Rom, where he says: "Faith is a Divine work within us which changes and renews us in God according to Jn 1 13, 'who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' This destroys the old Adam and makes new creatures of us in heart, will, disposition, and all our powers. Oh, faith is a living, active, jealous, mighty thing, inasmuch as it cannot possibly remain unproductive of good works" (Werke, Erl. Ausg., 63, 124-25).

(4) Baptism also eliminated.—Not only are good works and love removed as conditions or means of justification of the sinner, but baptism is also eliminated. According to Paul, it is the office of baptism not to justify, but to cleanse, that is, symbolically to set forth and seal the washing away of sin and the entrance into the new life by a dramatic act of burial, which for the subject and all witnesses would mark a never-to-be-forgotten era in the history of the believer. "Baptism," says Weiss (I, 454), "presupposes faith in Him as the one whom the church designates as Lord, and also binds to adherence to Him which excludes every dependence upon any other, inasmuch as He has acquired a claim upon their devotion by the saving deed of His self-surrender on the cross." So important was baptism in the religious atmosphere at that time that hyperbolic expressions were used to express its cleansing and illuminating office, but these need not mislead us. We must interpret them according to the fundamental conceptions of Christianity as a religion of the Spirit, not of magic nor of material media. Baptism pointed to a complete parting with the old life by previous renewal through faith in Christ, which renewal baptism in its turn sealed and announced in a climax of self-dedication to him, and this, while symbolically and in contemporary parlance of both Jew and Gentile called a new birth, was probably often actually so in the psychological experience of the baptized. But while justification is often attributed to faith, it is never to baptism.

(5) Elements of justification.—What are the elements of this justification? There are two: (a) Forgiveness of sins (Rom 4 5-8; cf Acts 13 38, 39). With this are connected peace and reconciliation (Rom 5 1.9.10; cf 10 11). (b) The declaring or approving as righteous or just (Rom 3 21-30; 4 2-9.22; 5 1.9-11.16-21, etc.). C. F. Schmid is perfectly right when he says that Paul (and James) always uses dikaïoun in the sense of esteeming and pronouncing and treating as righteous, both according to the measure of the law (Rom 2 13; 3 20) and also according to grace (Bib. Theol. of the NT, 1870, 497). The word is a forensic one, and Godel goes so far as to say that the word is never used in all Gr lit. for making righteous (Comm. on Rom, ET, I, 157, Amer. ed., 95). This is shown further by the fact that it is the ungodly who are justified (Rom 4 5), and that the justification is a reckoning or imputation (logizesthai) of righteousness (Rom 4 6.22), not an infusing or making righteous. The contrast of "to justify" is not "to be a sinner," but is "to accuse" or "to condemn" (Rom 8 33.34), and the contrast of "justification" is "condemnation" (5 18). Besides, it is not the infusing of a new life, of a new holiness, which is counted for righteousness, but it is faith which is so counted (Rom 4 5; Phil 3 9). That upon which God looks when He justifies is not the righteousness He has imparted or is to impart, but the atonement He has made in Christ. It is one of the truest paradoxes of Christianity that unless a righteous life follows, there has been no justification, while the justification itself is for the sake of Christ alone through faith alone. It is a "status, rather than a character," says Stevens (The Pauline Theology, 1892, 265); "it bears the stamp of a legal rather than of an ethical conception," and he refers to the elaborate and convincing proof of the forensic character of Paul's doctrine of justification," in Morison, Exposition of Romans, ch III, 163-200. An interesting illustration of how further study may correct a wrong impression is given by Lipsius, who, in his Die Paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre, 1853, maintained that righteousness or justification meant not "exclusively an objectively given external relation to God, but always at the same time a real inner condition of righteousness" (p. 10), whereas in his Lehrbuch der evangelisch-protestantischen Dogmatik, 1876, 3. Aufl., 1893, he makes the righteousness of God properly an "objective gift of grace, not simply in the sense in which the OT just one judged his position of salvation as a gift of grace, but as a righteousness specially reckoned and adjudicated by way of grace and acknowledged before the judgment (or court, Gericht) of God (Rom 4 6; cf vs 1-8.11; 3 23; Gal 3 6). This is always the meaning of dikaïoun, dikaïoústhai, or dikaïōsis in Paul. It consists in the not-reckoning of sins," etc (p. 658). Of course justification is only a part of the process of salvation, which includes regeneration and sanctification, but these are one thing and justification is another.

(6) Justification has to do with the individual.—Finally it is asked whether justification in Paul's mind has to do with the individual believer or with the society or Christian congregation. Ritschl (II, 217 f) and Sanday-Headlam (The Ep. to the Rom, 122-23) say the latter; Weiss (I, 442), the former. It is indeed true that Paul refers to the church as purchased with Christ's blood (Acts 20 28, or God's blood, according to the two oldest MSS and ancient authorities; cf Eph 5 25), and he uses the pronoun "we" as those who have received redemption, etc (Col 1 14; Eph 2 18); but it is evident on the other hand that faith is an individual matter, a thing first between man and his God, and only after a man has been united to Christ by faith can he enter into a spiritual fellowship with fellow-believers. Therefore the subject of justification must be in the first place the individual, and only in the second place and by consequence the society. Besides, those justified are not the cleansed and sanctified members of churches, but the ungodly (Rom 4 5).

As to the argument from baptism urged by Sanday-Headlam, it must be said that Paul always conceives of baptism as taking place in the Christian community with believers and for believers, that that for and to which they are baptized is not justification, but the death and resurrection of Christ (6 3.4), and that the righteousness of God has been manifested not through baptism but through faith in Jesus Christ unto all that believe (3 22), being justified freely, not through baptism, but through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (ver 24). With Paul baptism has always a mystical significance as symbolizing and externally actualizing union with the death of the Lord, and would be both impossible and impertinent in the case of those not already believers in Christ and thus inwardly united to His society.

II. The Other NT Writings.—So much for Paul. Let us now take a glance at the other NT books. It is a commonplace of the theology that is called "modern" or "critical," that Paul and not Jesus is the founder of Christianity as we know it, that the doctrines of the Divinity of Christ, atonement, justification, etc., are Paul's work, and not his Master's. There is truth in this. It was part of the humiliation of Christ as well as His pedagogical method to live, teach and act under the conditions of His time and country, on the background of Pal of 30 AD; and it was specially His method to do His work and not His disciples', to live a life of love and light, to die for the sins of the world, and then go back to the Father that the Holy Spirit might come and lead His followers into all truth. A full statement of the doctrines of Christianity on His part would have been premature (Jn 16 12), would have been pedagogically unwise, if not worthless. First the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear (Mk 4 28). It would also have been spiritually and philosophically impossible, for Christianity was not a set of teachings by Christ—but a religion springing out of His life, death, resurrection, ascension, intercession, mediatorial activity in history through the Spirit who works in His disciples and on the world through and by that life, death, etc. The only question is whether the apostles were true to the spirit and content of His teachings in its moral and religious outlines. And esp. in this matter of justification, a teaching by Christ is not to be looked for, because it is the very peculiarity of it that its middle point is the exalted Lord, who has become the mediator of salvation by His death and resurrection. Did the Pauline doctrine fit into the concrete situation made by the facts of Christ mentioned above, and was it the necessary consequence of His self-witness? Let us look into the Synoptic Gospels.

So far is it from being true, as Harnack says (What Is Christianity? 2d ed., rev., New York, 1901, 68), that the "whole of Jesus' message may be reduced to these two heads: God as Father, and the human soul so ennobled that it can and does unite with Him," that an essential part of His message is omitted, viz. that salvation is bound up in His (Christ's) own person. (The reader is asked to verify the references for himself, as space will not allow quotation.) See Mt 10 37-39; 16 24-27. Confession of Him (not simply of the Father) determines acknowledgment above (10 32), where judgment is rendered according to our attitude to Him in His unfortunate ones (25 35 ff.). No sooner was His person rightly estimated than He began to unfold the necessity of His death and resurrection (16 21). The evening before that death occurred, He brings out its significance, perpetuates the lesson in the institution of the Supper (Mk 14 24), and reinforces it after His resurrection (Lk 24 26). Paul himself could hardly have expressed the fact of the atonement through Christ's death more decisively than Mt 20 28; 26 28. With this foundation, could the Christian doctrine of salvation take any other course than that it actually did take? Instead of referring men to the Father, Christ forgives sins Himself (9 2-6), and here reckons all men as needing this forgiveness (6 12). While the time had not arrived for the Pauline doctrine of righteousness, Jesus prepared the way for it, negatively, in demanding a humble sense of sin (5 3), inner fitness and perfection (vs 6.8.20.48), and positively in requiring recourse to Him by those who felt the burden of their sins (11 28), to Him who was the rest-giver, and not simply to God the Father, a passage of which Rom 5 1 is an echo. For it was specially to those to whom, as to the awakened Paul, the law brought condemnation that He came, came to heal and to save (Mk 2 17; Mt 9 13; Lk 15 7). It was for sinners and to sinners that He came (Lk 15 2; 7 39; 19 7; Mt 11 19), just as Paul understood; and the way for their salvation was not better law-keeping, but trusting prayer in the confession of sin (Lk 18 13), really equivalent to faith, the humble heart and a hunger for righteousness (=faith). See Mt 5 3.6. He who brings most of himself, of his own pride and works, is the least likely to obtain the kingdom of heaven (18 3.4; Mk 10 14). Not only entrance, but the final reward itself is of grace (Mt 19 30; 20 1-16), a parable in the true spirit of Paul, and in anticipation of whose message was the promise of Paradise to the penitent robber (Lk 23 43). At the very beginning the message sounded out, "Repent ye, and believe in the gospel" (Mk 1 15), the gospel which was summed up in Christ, who would gather the people, not directly to God the Father, but to Himself (Mt 23 37). All this means justification through that faith in Himself, in His Divine-human manifestation (Mt 16 13-16), of which faith He expresses Himself with anxiety in Lk 18 8, and the presence of which he greeted with joy in Mt 8 10. Ihmels is right therefore in holding (RE, XVI, 490) that Paul's proclamation was continuous with the self-witness of Jesus, which conversely pointed as a consequence to the witness of Paul.

Justification by faith is not more implicit in John's Gospel than in the first three; it is only more explicit (Jn 3 14-16). Eternal life is the blessing secured, but this of course Writings is only possible to one not under condemnation (3 36). The new Sonship of God came also in the wake of the same faith (1 12). The Epp. of John vary from Paul in word rather than in substance. The atoning work of Jesus is still in the background; walking in the light is not conceivable in those under condemnation and without faith; and the confession of sins that leads to forgiveness seems only another name for the justification that brings peace (1 Jn 1 9.10; cf 2 1.2). Everything is, as with Paul (Eph 2 7; Tit 3 4), led back to the love of God (1 Jn 3 1), who sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins (4 10).

Seeberg's point that the "Pauline doctrine of justification is not found in any other NT writer" (History of Doctrine, I, 48) is true when you emphasize the word "doctrine." Paul gave it full scientific treatment, the others presuppose the fact, but do not unfold the doctrine. Peter's "Repent ye, and be baptized . . . in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 2 38) is meaningless unless faith were exercised in Christ. It is He in whom, though we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice greatly with joy unspeakable (1 Pet 1 8), receiving the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls (ver 9). It is only, however, through the precious blood as of a lamb without blemish, even that of Christ (ver 19), and is only through Him that we are believers in God (ver 21). The familiar expression, "Come to Jesus," which simply means have faith in Jesus for justification and salvation, goes back to Peter (2 4). The Ep. to the He has other interests to look after, but it does not deny faith, but rather exhorts us to draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith (10 22), which it lays at the foundation of all true religion, thinking and achievement (ch 11). The writer can give no better exhortation than to look unto Jesus the author and perfecter of our faith (12 2), an exhortation in the true spirit of Paul, whose gospel of faith for justification is also summed up in 4 16.

We come lastly to the core of the matter in regard to NT representations of justification—the famous passage in Jas 2 14-26, which at first sight seems a direct blow at Paul. Here we are met by the interesting question of the date of James. As we cannot enter into this (see JAMES, EPISTLE OF), what we say must be independent of this question. A careful look at this vigorous and most valuable letter (valuable in its own place, which is not that of Paul's letters, in comparison with which it is a "right strawy epistle," as Luther truthfully said [Erl. Ausg., 63, 115; see also pp. 156-57], in saying which he did not mean to reject it as useless [straw has most important uses], but as giving the doctrine of salvation, for which we must look to Paul) will show us that contradiction on the part of James to Paul is apparent and not real.

(1) In this section James uses the word faith simply for intellectual belief in God, and esp. in the unity of God (2 19; see also context), whereas Paul uses it for a saving trust in Christ. As Feine well says (Theol. d. NT, Leipzig, 1911, 660-63), for Paul faith is the appropriation of the life-power of the heavenly Christ. Therefore he knows no faith which does not bring forth good works corresponding to it. What does not come from faith is sin. For James faith is subordination of man to the heavenly Christ (2 1), or it is the theoretic acknowledgment of one God (2 19). Justification is for James a speaking just of him who is righteous, an analytical judgment. (Feine also says that James did not understand Paul, but he did not fight him. It was left to Luther through his deep religious experience first to understand Paul's doctrine of justification.) (2) James uses the word "works" as meaning practical morality, going back behind legalism, behind Pharisaism, to the position of the OT prophets, whereas Paul uses the word as meritorious action deserving reward. (3) When James is thinking of a deeper view, faith stands central in Christianity (1 3-6; 2 1; 5 15). (4) Paul also on his part is as anxious as James vitally to connect Christianity and good works through faith (1 Thess 1 3; Gal 5 6; 1 Cor 13 2; Rom 2 6-7; see Mayor, The Ep. of Jas., 1892, lxxxviii ff.; Franks, in DCG, I, 919-20; Findlay in HDB, 1-vol ed, 511). (5) The whole argument of James is bent on preserving a real practical Christianity that is not content with words merely (2 15-16), but shows itself in deeds. He is not trying to show, as Paul, how men get rid of their guilt and become Christians, but how they prove the reality of their profession after they receive the faith. He is not only writing to Christians, as of course Paul was, but he was writing to them as Christians ("my brethren," ver 14), as already justified and standing on the "faith of our Lord Jesus Christ" (ver 1), whereas Paul was thinking of men, Gentile and Jew, shivering in their guilt before the Eternal Justice, and asking, How can we get peace with God? "There is not," says Beyschlag (VT Th. d. NT, Edinburgh, 1895, I, 367-68), "an objective conflict between the Pauline and Jacobean doctrines; both forms of teaching exist peacefully beside each other. James thought of justification in the simple and most natural sense of justificatio iusti, as the Divine recognition of an actually righteous man, and he thought of it as the final judgment of God upon a man who is to stand in the last judgment and become a partaker of the final sôleria ('salvation'). Paul also demands as a requisite for this last judgment and the final sôleria right works, the love that fulfils the law and the perfected sanctification, but he (except in Rom 2 13) does not apply the expression dikaïousinai ('to be justified') to the final judgment of God, which recognizes this righteousness of life as actual. He applies it rather to that first sentence of God with which He graciously receives the believing sinner returning to Him, and takes him into fellowship with Himself." Beyschlag rightly insists that James undoubtedly taught with the first apostles that whoever believes in Christ and is baptized receives the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2 38; 3 19, 10 43), and that he would not have contested the Pauline idea of justification by grace on account of faith, insisting only that works must follow. Theologically, the chief if not the only difference is that James has not yet made the cross of Christ the center of his point of view, while the atonement was fundamental with all Paul's thinking. See, further, JAMES, EPISTLE OF.

III. The Old Testament.—A word in conclusion as to the OT. All the NT writers built on the OT. That there should be a cleft or contradiction between the OT and what we call the NT would have been to them inconceivable. But they realized that that was the early dawn, while they lived in the light of day. Abraham believed in Jeh; and He reckoned it to him for righteousness (Gen 15 6; Rom 4 3). Who does not keep all parts of the law all the time is condemned (Dt 27 26 LXX; Gal 3 10; cf Ps 14; 143 2; Rom 3 20; see vs 9-20, and the references to the OT in ARV). The prophets insisted upon the practical works of righteousness—"What doth Jeh require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic 6 8). No religious attitude or services could take the place of uprightness of life. This does not mean that the OT writers understood that men were justified simply by their good deeds, for it was always believed that underneath all was the mercy and lovingkindness of God, whose forgiving grace was toward the broken and contrite spirit, the iniquities of whom were to be carried by the Servant of Jeh, who shall justify many (Ps 103 8-13; 85 10; Isa 57 15; 53 11, and many other passages).

IV. Later Development.—A brief statement now on the development of the doctrine in the Christian church.

It is humiliating to confess that the witness immediately after the apostles (the apostolic Fathers) did not reach the serene heights of Paul, or even the lower levels of his brethren. There are passages which remind one of him, but one feels at once that the atmosphere is different. Christianity is conceived as a new law rather than as a gospel of the grace of God. We cannot go into the reasons for this: suffice it to say that in gentle Christendom the presuppositions for that gospel failed, and the NT writings were not yet in the consciousness of the church to the extent that they dominated her thinking. The fine passage in Clement of Rome (97 AD, ch xxxii: "They all therefore [i.e. Abraham and other early saints] were glorified and magnified, not through themselves or their own works or the righteous doings which they wrought, but through His [God's] will. And so we, having been called through His will in Christ Jesus, are not justified through ourselves or through our own wisdom or understanding or piety or works which we wrought in holiness of heart, but through faith, whereby the Almighty God justified all men that ever have been from the beginning; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen") is not at all on a par with his whole Ep., as he coordinates faith with other virtues in ch xxxv, makes hospitality and godliness the saving virtues for Lot in ch xi, couples hospitality and faith together as equal for Rahab in ch xii, and represents forgiveness of sins through keeping commandments and love in ch i. Ignatius (about 110-15 AD) speaks in one place about Jesus Christ dying for us, that believing on His death we might escape death (Trial. 2), but with him the real saving things are love, concord, obedience to bishops, and the indwelling God = Christ, though he has also the excellent passage "None of these things is hidden from you if ye be perfect in your faith and love toward Jesus Christ, for these things are the beginning and end of life—faith is the beginning and love the end, and the two being found in unit are God, while all things else follow in their train unto true nobility" (Eph 14). The so-called Barnabas (date uncertain) puts the death of Christ Jesus at the foundation of salvation, which is expressed by the remission of sins through His blood (Eph 5), the kingdom of Jesus being on the cross, so that they whose their hope on Him shall live forever (ch 8), while at the time even believers are not yet justified (ch 4), for which finally a whole series of works of light must be done and works of darkness avoided (ch 19). The Shepherd of Hermas and the Ancient Homily = 2 Clem are even more moralistic, where with whatever praise of faith we have the beginning of merit. The same legalistic tone sounds through that invaluable little roll found by Bryennios in 1873 and first published by him in Constantinople in December, 1883, The Teaching (Didache) of the XII Apostles. That Catholic trend went forward till it is almost full-fledged as early as Tertullian (fl. 200 AD) and Cyprian (250 AD). See a full statement in my Cyprian, 1906, 146 ff. And thus it continued until—so far as our outline is concerned—it struck Augustine, bishop of Hippo (396 ff.), who in a masterly and living way united, so far as they could be united, the Pauline thoughts of sin, grace, and justification with the regular Catholic legalism. His book, De Spiritu et Litera (412 AD), was largely after Paul's own heart, and the Reformers hailed it with joy. But the Catholic elements he still kept, as for instance, that in justification a good conscience and a good-will are infused, that justification grows, that our merits must be taken into the account even though they are God's merits, that the faith which justifies is a faith which works by love, that faith is the holding true what God (and the church) says, though occasionally a deeper view of faith is seen, and that works are emphasized, as in De fide et operibus, in a Catholic fashion. With profound and thoroughly Christian thoughts, Augustine had not so worked himself clear of his Catholic inheritance that he could reproduce Paul purely. He made a bridge by which we could go either back to Paul or forward to Aquinas. As Harnack well says, Augustine experienced, on the one hand, the last revival in the ancient church of the principle that "faith alone saves," and, on the other, he silenced that principle for a thousand years. The very Catholic theologian who stood nearest to that principle overcame it (Zeitschrift f. Theol. u. Kirche, 1891, 177). His misunderstanding of Paul's "faith that worketh through love" had momentous consequences.

Those consequences are best seen in the decrees of the Council of Trent (Session 6, 1547), to which we now turn, and which are the definite and final crystallization of the mediaeval development, so far as that development was Catholic. (1) Justification is a translation from a natural state to a state of grace. With this

2. Council of Trent works prevent grace, awakening and assisting, and with this in his turn man coöperates and prepares himself for justification. This coöperation has the merit of congruity, though the first call comes before any merit. (2) Faith is an element in justification. "Receiving faith by hearing, they of free will draw near to God, believing those things to be true which have been Divinely revealed and promised." Faith as a living trust in a personal Saviour for salvation is lacking. Among the truths believed is the mercy of God and that He wishes to justify the sinner in Christ. (3) This faith begets love to Christ and hatred to sin, which are elements also of the justifying process. (4) Now follows justification itself, "which is not a bare remission of sins, but also sanctification and renewal of the inner man through the voluntary reception of grace and of gifts." (5) But this renewal must take place through baptism, which, to the prepared adult, both gives and seals all the graces of salvation, forgiveness, cleansing, faith, hope and love. (6) Justification is preserved by obeying the commandments and by good works, which also increase it. (7) In case it is lost—and it can be lost, not by venial, but by mortal sin and by unbelief—it can be regained by the sacrament of penance. (8) To get it, to keep or regain it, it is also necessary to believe the doctrines as thus laid down and to be laid down by this Council (see the decrees in any ed. or in Mirbt, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums, 2. Aufl., 206–16, or in Buckley's or in Waterworth's translations, and for an admirable and objective summary see Seeberg, History of Doctrine, II, 433–38).

Recent researches in Luther's early writings have shown that almost from the beginning of his earnest study of religious questions, he mounted up to Paul's view of justification by faith alone (Loofs, DG, 4. Aufl., 1906, 696–98). Faith is the trust in the mercy of God through Christ, and justification is the declaring righteous for His sake, which is followed by a real making righteous. From the beginning to the end of his life as a religious teacher these are the elements of his doctrine. Speaking of 1513–15, Loofs says (p. 697): "Upon these equations [to justify = to forgive, grace = mercy of the non-imputing God; faith = trust in His mercy] as the regulators of his religious self-judgment, Luther's piety rests, and corresponding to them his view of Christianity, and even later" (than 1513–15); and he adds that "to reckon as righteous" (reputari justum) must not be understood with Luther as an opposition "to make righteous," for his "to be justified without merits" in the sense of "to forgive" (absolvi) is at the same time the beginning of a new life: remissio peccati . . . ipsa resurrectio. "His constantly and firmly held view, even more deeply understood later than in 1513–15, that 'to be justified without merit' = 'to be resurrected [to be born again]' = 'to be sanctified' is a pregnant formulation of his Christianity." So much being said, it is not necessary to draw out Luther's doctrine further, who in this respect "rediscovered Christianity as a religion," but it will suffice to refer to the Histories of Doctrine (Seeberg gives a full and brilliant exposition), to Köstlin, Luthers Theologie, 2. Aufl., 1901 (see Index s.v. "Rechtfertigung," and I, 349), and esp. to Thieme, Die sittliche Triebkraft des Glaubens: eine Untersuchung zu Luthers Theologie, 1895, 103–314.

From Luther and the other reformers the NT doctrine went over to the Protestant churches without essential modification, and has remained their nominal testimony until the present. A classic expression of it, which may be taken as representing evangelical Christendom, is the 11th of the 39 Articles of Religion of the Church of England: "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings: wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the Homily of Justification." It is true that at one time Wesley's opponents accused him of departing from this doctrine, esp. on account of his famous Minute of 1770, but this was due to a radical misunderstanding of that Minute, for to the last he held staunchly Paul's doctrine (for proof see my article in Lutheran Quarterly, April, 1906, 171–75).

A new point of view was brought into modern theology by Schleiermacher, who starts from the fundamental fact of Christian experience that we have redemption and reconciliation with Christ, which fact becomes ours by union with Christ through faith. This union brings justification with other blessings, but justification is not considered as even in thought a separate act based on Christ's death, but as part of a great whole of salvation, historically realized step by step in Christ. The trend of his teaching is to break down the distinction between justification and regeneration, as they are simply different aspects of union with Christ.

Ritschl carried forward this thought by emphasizing the grace of the heavenly Father mediated in the first instance through the Son to the Christian community, "to which God imputes the position toward him of Christ its founder," and in the second instance to individuals "as by faith in the Gospel they attach themselves to this community." Faith is simply obedience to God and trust in the revelation of his grace in Christ. "This brings sinners into fellowship with God which means eternal life, which is here and now realized, as the Fourth Gospel points out, in lordship over the world (cf. Franks in DG, I, 922–23). The judicial or forensic aspect of justification so thoroughly in-wrought in Paul's thought is denied by Ritschl. "In whatsoever way we view the matter," he says, "the attitude of God in the act of justification cannot be conceived as that of a judge" (Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, ET, 1900, 90). W. N. Clarke agrees with Schleiermacher in eliminating justification as a separate element in the work of salvation, and harks back to the Catholic view in making it dependent on the new life and subsequent to it (Christian Theology, 407–8). No book has had as much influence in destroying the NT conception of justification among English-speaking readers as that of J. H. Newman, Lectures on Justification, 1838, 3d ed. 1874, which contains some of the finest passages in religious literature (pp. 270–73, 302, 338–39), but which was so sympathetic to the Catholic view that the author had nothing essential to retract when he joined Rome in 1845. "Whether we say we are justified by faith, or by works, or by sacraments, all these but mean this one doctrine that we are justified by grace which is given through sacraments, impetrated by faith, manifested in works" (p. 303).

Lastly, has the NT conception of justification by faith any message to the modern man, or is it, as Lagarde held, dead in the Protestant churches, something which went overboard with the old doctrine of the Trinity and of Atonement? After an able historical survey, Holl concludes (Die Rechtfertigungslehre im Licht der Geschichte d. Protestantismus, Tübingen, 1906, 40–42) that there are two principles thoroughly congenial to modern thought which favor this doctrine, viz. that of the sanctity and importance of personality, the "I" that stands face to face with God, responsible to Him alone; and second, the restoration of the Reformation-thought of an all-working God. Whoever feels the pressure of these two principles, for him the question of justification becomes a living one. "The standard on which he must measure himself is the Absolute God, and who can stand in this judgment? Not simply on account of single acts, but with his 'I' and even with his good-willing. For that is just the curse which rests upon a man that his 'I' is the thing with which alone he wills and can seek God, and that it is this very 'I' which by its wilfulness, vanity and self-love poisons all his willing. Accordingly, it remains true, what the Reformers said, that man is entirely corrupt, and that he can do no otherwise than to despair when the majesty of God dawns upon him" (p. 41). There is, then, no other solution than the venture of faith that the same God who crushes our self-deceit lifts up with His sovereign grace, that we live through Him and before Him. Luther is right that religiously we can find no hold except on the Divine act of grace, which through faith in the Divine love and power working in us and for us ever makes us new in Christ. To give up the doctrine of justification, says Holl rightly (p. 42), is to give up conscious personal religion. Holl writes as a liberal, and he quotes a stronger liberal still, Treitschke, as saying that in the 19th cent. it was the orthodox preachers who proclaimed this doctrine, who built better than the liberals. Nor, says Holl in another book (Was hat die Rechtfertigungslehre dem modernen Menschen zu sagen? Tübingen, 1907, 26), can anyone who has experienced justification as an inner transformation be misled into moral unconcern. A moral ideal becomes his, much stronger and more compelling than worldly ethics. The new attitude toward God constituted by justification impels to an unending movement in the service of God and man. The doctrine has not had its day. It is a part of the eternal gospel. As long as sinful man has to do with an all-holy God, the experience of Paul, Luther and Wesley becomes in a sense normative for the race.

JUSTLE, jus'tl (קָשַׁק, shāḥaḥ): The word occurs once in Nah 2 4 (in AV and RV), where ARV has "rush to and fro."

JUSTUS, jus'tus (Ἰουστος, Ioustos): There are three of this name mentioned in the NT.

(1) It was the Rom surname of JOSEPH BAR-SABBAS (q.v.) (Acts 1 23).

(2) A Corinthian proselyte (sebómenos tón Theón), whose house adjoined the synagogue and who received Paul when the Jews opposed him (Acts 18 7). He was probably a Rom citizen, one of the coloni, and so he would be of assistance to the apostle in his work among the better class of Corinth. There is some disagreement among MSS regarding the name. TR gives "Justus" alone. RV following NE, Vulg, Boh, Arm, gives "Titus Justus"; WH, Tisch., B,D, give "Titius Justus"; Cheyne (EB, s.v. "Justus") thinks these forms a corruption of "Tertius Justus," and that the bearer of the name was the "Tertius" of Rom 16 22. Paul still continued his lodgings with Aquila and Priscilla, but made the house of Justus his own synagogue.

(3) A Jew, Jesus Justus, mentioned with Mark and Aristarchus by Paul in his letters to the Colossians (Col 4 11), is a fellow-worker and one that had been a comfort unto him. S. F. HUNTER

JUTTĀH, jut'a (יֻטָּא, yūṭṭāh, Josh 21 16; LXX Taví, Tanú; and in Josh 15 55 AV, LXX Ἰράν, Iṭán, A, Ietá); JUTĀH, joo'ta, jū'ta (יֻטָּה, yūṭāh, Josh 15 55): A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned with Maon, Carmel and Ziph; a Levitical city (Josh 21 16). In some VSS of LXX it occurs (Ἰορά, Iotá) in 1 Ch 6 57. In the Onom (266 49; 133 10) a large village called "Juttah" is described as 18 Rom miles from Eleutheropolis. This agrees with the position of Yūṭā, a large and prosperous Moslem village, 3,740 ft. above sea-level, 5½ miles S. of Hebron and 15½ miles from Beit Jebrin (Eleutheropolis). There are many rock-cut tombs and ancient winepresses all around the village.

Reland (Pal, 870) suggested (and many others have followed him) that the πόλις Iouda, pólis Iouda, tr'd "city of Judah," in Lk 1 39, should be pólis Iouta, "the city Yuta." The tr "city of Judah" is suspicious, because Iouda is without the article, which is usually put before the name of a district; the interchange of t and d is a very common one. Dr. Paterson, resident many years in Hebron, states that there is a local Moslem tradition in the district that Yūṭa was the home of John the Baptist. For Yūṭa see PEF, III, 310, Sh XXI.

KAB, kab (כַּב, kabh, "something hollowed out," 2 K 6 25; AV Cab): A Heb dry measure and liquid measure equal to about 2 quarts. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

KABZEEL, kab'zē-el, kab'zēl (כַּבְּזֵאֵל, kabhç'zēl "[whom] God collects"): One of the "utmost cities" of Judah toward the border of Edom in the S. (Negeb) (Josh 15 21). It was the native place of Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 20; 1 Ch 11 22). "Jekabzeel and the villages thereof," one of the places re-inhabited by the men of Judah (Neh 11 25), appears to be the same place. The site is unknown.

KADESH, ka'desh (קָדֵשׁ, kādhēsh; Καδής, Kadēs, Ps 29 8; Jth 1 9). See KADESH-BARNEA.

KADESH-BARNEA, ka'desh-bār'nē-a (קָדֵשׁ בְּרִנָּה, kādhēsh barnē'a; Καδής, Kadēs): Mentioned 10 t; called also "Kadesh" simply. The name perhaps means "the holy place of the desert of wandering." There are references to Kadesh in early history. At En-mishpat ("the same is Kadesh") Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Amalekite and Amorite. Abraham dwelt near Kadesh, and it was at Beer-lahai-roi between Kadesh and Bered that the Angel of Jeh appeared to Hagar (Gen 14 7; 16 14; 20 1). It was an important camp of the Israelites during their wanderings, and seems to have been their headquarters for 38 years (Dt 1 2; 2 14; Jth 5 14). There the returning spies found the camp (Nu 13 26); there Miriam died and was buried (Nu 20 1); from thence messengers were sent to the king of Edom (Nu 20 14; Jgs 11 16 ff). There the people rebelled because of the want of water, and Moses brought water from the rock (Nu 20 2 ff); it was called therefore Meribath—or Meriboth-Kadesh (Nu 27 14; Ezk 47 19; 48 28). It was situated in the wilderness of Zin (Nu 20 1; 33 36.37) in the hill country of the Amorites (Dt 1 19), 11 days' journey from Horeb, by the way of Mt. Seir (Dt 1 2), "in the uttermost" of the border of Edom (Nu 20 16), and on the southern border, probably the S.E. corner, of Judah (Ezk 47 19; cf Jth 1 9). See Coburn, Homiletic Review, April and May, 1914.

KADESH ON THE ORONTES, ḡ-ron'tēz (in MT of 2 S 24 6, under the corrupt form תַּהֲרִישׁ, tahtīm ḥodhshū, which should be corrected from the LXX [Luc.] reading: εἰς τὴν γῆν Χερυεῖμ Kadhīs, eis tēn gēn Cheticiēm Kadēs, "to the land of the Hittites unto Kadesh," into אֶרֶץ חֲרִישׁ, 'ereṣ ha-ḥittīm kadhēshāh. Ewald and others, fixing the northern ideal boundary of Israel at the sources of the Jordan, would read "Hermon" for ḥodhshū, but the conjectures of Thénien and Hitzig of a reference to the northern Kadesh are fully confirmed by the reading given): Kadesh was the southern capital of the Hittites, and was situated on the upper waters of the Orontes, 80 miles N. of Damascus. It is now represented by a large mound 5 miles S. of what, till the Middle Ages, was called the Lake of Kades, but now the Lake of Homs. Here Thothes III of Egypt (fl. 1650 BC), after the battle of Megiddo, met and received hostages from the Assyrians, and here too Rameses II defeated Hatesar, king of the Hittites (c 1320 BC), and concluded with him a treaty, which was formally inscribed on a disk of silver. The incidents of the battle are depicted on the walls of the Ramesseum, and an Egyp epic records the heroic deeds of Rameses. Under the name Kadytis, it is mentioned as being taken by Pharaoh-necoh (Herod. ii.159) in 609 BC. In the only Bible reference (2 S 24 6), it is named as the northern limit of the census made by David.

W. M. CHRISTIE

KADMIEL, kad'mi-el (קַדְמִיֵּל, kadhmi'el, "before God," "priest" [?]; "Cadmiel" in || lists in 1 Esd 5 26 58 AV; omitted in LXX B; A reads kat Kadmi'lon): A Levite (Ezr 2 40; Neh 7 43), founder of a family whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 1; Neh 7 43; 12 1.8). He is named among those who praise God for the return (Neh 9 4.5; 12 24); was of those who "set forward" the work of the Lord's house (Ezr 3 9; 1 Esd 5 26.58), and is again mentioned with those who "seal" the new Return Covenant (Neh 10 23 ff) after the reestablishment of worship (Neh 10 1.9).

KADMONITE, kad'mon-it (קַדְמוֹנִי, kadhmoni; Κεδμωνῆται, Kedmōnatōi, signifies "the Easterner," or, less probably, "one of the ancient race"): The Kadmonites are mentioned in Gen 15 19 along with the Kenites and Kenizzites of Edom, and are doubtless the same as "the children of the east," whose wisdom was celebrated (1 K 4 30). קַדְמוֹה, kadh-māh, "the East," was a son of Ishmael (Gen 25 15; cf ver 6). In an Egyp story describing the adventures of a political refugee who fled from Egypt in the time of the XIIth Dynasty, it is said that he found a refuge in Canaan in the land of Kaduma or Kedem.

A. H. SAYCE

KAIN, kân (קַיִן, ha-kayin; AV Cain): A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 57). There is, too, apparently a reference to this place in Nu 24 21.22:

"And he looked on the Kenite, and took up his parable, and said,
Strong is thy dwelling-place.
And thy nest is set in the rock.
Nevertheless Kain shall be wasted.
Until Asshur shall carry thee away captive."

This place has been very doubtfully identified as the ruin Yukin, a place on a lofty hill S.E. of Hebron, overlooking the wilderness of Judah; the tomb of Cain is shown there. See PEF, III, 312, Sh XXI.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

KAIN (קַיִן, kāyin): A clan name, AV "the Kenite" (Nu 24 22; Jgs 4 11). In the first passage RV has "Kain" and m "the Kenites"; in the second, RV has "the Kenite" in text and m "Kain." Cf preceding article.

KALLAI, kal'ā-i, kal'ī (קָלַי, kallay, √ קָל, kal, "swift"): A priest among those who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 1). He represented the family of Sallai (Neh 12 20).

KAMON, kā'mon (קַמּוֹן, kāmōn; AV Camon): The place where Jair was buried (Jgs 10 3-5). It is possibly represented either by Kamm or Kumeim, ruins which lie about 6 and 7 miles respectively to the S.E. of Umm Keis. See further HAVVOTHA-JAIR. The ruins of Kamm, about 200 yds. square, crown a small elevation, and point to an important place in the past. There are large rock-hewn cisterns to the S. Among the ruins of Kumeim, which are not considerable, a few mud huts are built, occupied today by about 200 souls (Schumacher, Northern 'Ajlūn, 137).

KANAH, kā'na (קָנָה, kānāh, "reeds"):

(1) The name of a "brook," i.e. wādy, or "torrent bed," which formed part of the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh 16 8; 17 9). The border of Ephraim went out westward from Tappuah to the brook Kanah, ending at the sea; the border of Manasseh from Tappuah, which belonged to Ephraim, "went down unto the brook of Kanah, southward of the brook." There seems no good reason to doubt the identification of "the brook Kanah" with the modern Wādy Kanah. The transition from the heavy k to the lighter k is easy, so the phonetic difficulty is not serious. The stream rises in the S.W. of Shechem, flows through Wādy Ishkar, and, joining the 'Aujeh, reaches the sea not far to the N. of Jaffa. Guérin, influenced, apparently, by the masses of reeds of various kinds which fill the river, argues in favor of Nahr el-Fāliḳ, to the N. of Arsūf. He identifies it with Nahr el-Kaṣab, "river of reeds," mentioned by Behā ed-Dīn, the Moslem historian. But this last must be identified with Nahr el-Mafjir, 13 miles farther N., too far N. for "the brook Kanah."

(2) A town on the northern boundary of Asher (Josh 19 28), probably identical with the village of Kana, about 7 miles S.E. of Tyre (SWP, I, 51, 64, Sh I).

KAPH, kāf (כּ, כַּ, כֶּ, כֵּ): The 11th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as k, with daghesh, and kh (= German ch) without daghesh. It came also to be used for the number 20. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

KAREAH, ka-rē'a (כָּרְעָה, kārēah, "bald head"): The father of Johanan and Jonathan, who after the fall of Jerus joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25 23; Jer 40 8).

KARIATHIARIUS, kā-ri-ath-i-ā-ri-us (Καριαθιαρίους, Kariathiarious; B reads Kartatheiareios; AV Kiriathiarim [1 Esd 5 19]) = Kiriath-jearim in Neh 7 29.

KARKA, kār'ka (קָרְקָה, ha-karkā'ah—with the art. and locale; AV Karkaa): A place in the S. of Judah, between Addar and Wady el-'Arish (Josh 15 3). Onom speaks of a village in Judah lying toward the wilderness, named Akarka. It cannot now be identified. The name means "the pavement," or "ground."

KARKOR, kār'kor (קָרְקֹר, karqōr): An unidentified place where Gideon surprised and overwhelmed the remnants of the army of Zeba and Zalmunnah (Jgs 8 10 ff). It probably corresponds to Karkar mentioned by Shalmaneser II, S. of Hamath (KB, I, 173).

KARTAH, kār'ta (קָרְתָּה, kartāh): A city in the territory of Zebulun, assigned to the Levites (Josh 21 34). It is not identified. Possibly it is a variant of KATTATH, or of KARTAN (q.v.).

KARTAN, kār'tan (קָרְתָּן, kartān): A city in the territory of Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 32). It is called Kiriathaim in 1 Ch 6 76. Kartan may be a contraction of this. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) suggests that both names may be corruptions from "Chinnereth." Neither is mentioned in Josh 19 32,38, in the list of Naphtalite cities, while Chinnereth is.

KATTATH, kat'ath (קָטָתָה, kattāth): A city in the territory of Zebulun, named with Iphtah-el, Nahalel, and Shimron (Josh 19 15), perhaps to be identified with Kitron (Jgs 1 30), from which Zebulun did not expel the Canaanites; and with Kartah (Josh 21 34), which was given to the Merarite Levites. The Bab Talm (Meg. 6a) identifies Kattath with Sepphoris, the modern Seffūriyeh (but see Neubauer, Géographie du Talmud, 191). The Jerus Talm takes it as identical with Ketūnith, Kūṭineh, to the W. of Esdraelon. It should probably, however, be sought near to Shimron, the modern Semūniyeh. W. EWING

KEDAR, kē'dar (קֶדָר, kēdhār; קֶדָר, Kēdār): Second in order of the sons of Ishmael (Gen 25 13 || 1 Ch 1 29). The name occurs as typical of a distant eastern country in opposition to the lands of the Mediterranean (Jer 2 10). The author of Second Isa introduces this tribe in company with Nebaioth, and both are represented as owners of flocks (Isa 60 7). Evidence of their nomadic habits appears in Jer 49 28,29, where they are classed among the Bnē-Kedem, and mention is made of their flocks, camels, tents, curtains and furniture. They are spoken of (Isa 42 11) as dwelling in hācērīm ("villages"), from which it would appear that they were a somewhat settled tribe, corresponding to the Arab. ḥadārīya or "town-dwellers," as distinct from wabārīya or "nomads." Ezekiel (27 21) gives another hint of their pastoral nature where, in his detailed picture of the wealth of Tyre, Kedar and Arabia provide the Tyrians with lambs, rams and goats. The fame of the tribe is further reflected in Isa 21 16,17 (the only allusion to their might in war), and in the figurative references to their tents (Ps 120 5; Cant 1 5). In this last passage where the tents are made symbolic of dark beauty, the word kādhār ("to be black") may have been in the writer's mind.

The settlements of Kedar were probably in the N.W. of Arabia, not far from the borders of Pal. Assyrian inscriptions have thrown light upon the history of the tribe. There Kedar is mentioned along with the Arabs and Nebaioth, which decides its identity with Kedar of the OT, and there is found also an account of the conflicts between the tribe and King Assurbanipal (see Margolouth in HDB).

Of the Ishmaelite tribes, Kedar must have been one of the most important, and thus in later times the name came to be applied to all the wild tribes of the desert. It is through Kedar (Arab. ḳeidār) that Muslim genealogists trace the descent of Mohammed from Ishmael. A. S. FULTON

KEDEMAH, ked'ē-ma, kē-dē'ma (קֶדְמָה, kēdh-māh, "eastward"): Son of Ishmael (Gen 25 16), head of a clan (1 Ch 1 31). See KADMONITE.

KEDEMOTH, ked'ē-moth, kē-dē'moth (קֶדְמוֹת, kēdhēmōth, "eastern parts"): From the wilderness to which this town gave its name, Moses sent messengers to Sihon, king of the Amorites in Heshbon (Dt 2 26). It was given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13 18), and assigned to the Merarite Levites (21 37; 1 Ch 6 79). It must probably be sought on the upper course of the Arnon. Buhl (GAP, 268) suggests that it may be identified with Umm er-Resāṣ. See JAHAZ.

KEDESH, kē'desh (קֶדֶשׁ, kēdhesh; Κᾰδῆς, Kādēs):

(1) One of the "uttermost cities" of Judah "toward the border of Edom in the S." (Josh 15 23). Possibly it is to be identified with KADESH-BARNEA (q.v.); otherwise it is strange that this latter should be omitted from the list. Dillmann would identify it with Kādūs, to the S. of Hebron, mentioned by Mukaddasi.

(2) A town in the territory of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 72). In the list of Joshua (21 28) its place is taken by KISHION (q.v.). Conder suggests identification with Tell Abu Kādēs, near Megiddo.

(3) Kedesh-naphtali, the famous city of refuge in the uplands of Naphtali. It is called "Kedesh," simply, in Josh 12 22, etc; Kedesh-

Kedesh-naphtali in Jgs 4 6; Tob 1 2; Kedesh in Galilee in Josh 20 7, etc. It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 76). From the name "holy," we gather that it was a sanctuary from old time. It was therefore a place of asylum, and only preserved its ancient character in this respect when chosen as one of the cities of refuge. It was the home of Barak, and here his host assembled. When the Assyrians invaded the land under Tiglath-pileser, it was among the first cities to be captured, and its inhabitants were deported (2 K 15 29). Near Kedesh was fought the great battle between Jonathan the Maccabee and Demetrius (1 Macc 11 63 ff). Jos says that in his time it belonged to the Tyrians, lying between their land and that of Galilee (Ant. XIII, v, 6; BJ, II, xviii, 1; IV, ii, 3, etc). Onom places it 20 miles from Tyre, near to Paneas. It is represented by the modern village of Kedes, which lies on the plateau to the W. of el-Hūleh. It crowns a tell which runs out in a low ridge into the little plain to the W. Near the fountain, which rises under the ridge to the N., are the most interesting of the ancient remains. There are many fine sarcophagi, some of them being used as watering-troughs. From its lofty situation, Kedesh commanded a spacious view over a richly varied landscape, with smiling cornfields, and hills clothed with oak and terebinth. W. EWING

KEDESH (1 Macc 11 63.73, A, Κήδες, Kēdes; AV Cades): Scene of a battle between Judas Macabaeus and the forces of Demetrius. See KEDESH-NAPHTALI, under KEDESH, 3.

KEDESH-NAPHTALI, kē'desh-naf'ta-li. See KEDESH, 3.

KEEPER, kēp'ēr, KEEPERS (mostly from שָׁמַר, shāmar; φύλαξ, phúlax): The word is used of keepers of sheep, vineyards, doors, prisons (in Gen 39 21 ff, šar; cf Acts 5 23), etc. In Eccl 12 3, "The keepers of the house shall tremble," the allusion is to the decay of bodily powers, the "keepers" being specially the arms, which had become feeble through age.

KEHELATHAH, kē-hē-lā'tha, kē-hel'a-tha (קְהֵלָתָה, k'hēlāthāh, "gathering," "assembly"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Rissah and Mt. Shepher (Nu 33 22.23). Situation is unknown. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

KEILAH, kē-lā (קַיִלָּה, k'īlāh; Κειλάμ, Keelām):

(1) A city of the Shephelah mentioned (Josh 15 44) along with Nezib, Achzib and Mareshah. Among those who repaired the walls of Jerus was "Hashabiah, the ruler of half the district of Keilah, for his district. After him repaired their brethren, Bavvai the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Keilah" (Neh 3 17.18).

It is, however, from the story of the wandering of David that we have most information regarding this place. It was a city with gates

1. David and Keilah came against it and commenced robbing the threshing-floors. David, after twice inquiring of Jeh, went down with his 600 men (ver 13) and "fought with the Philis, and brought away their cattle, and slew them with a great slaughter." Saul hearing that David and his men were within a fortified town "summoned all the people to war, to go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men" (ver 8). Then David asked Abiathar the priest to bring him an ephod, and he inquired of Jeh whether, if Saul came, the men of Keilah would surrender him to save that city; hearing from Jeh, "They will deliver thee up," he and all his men escaped from Keilah and went into the wilderness. The reputed strength of Keilah is confirmed by its mention in 5 tablets in the Am Tab under the name of Killa (qilti, Petrie) with Gedor, Gath, Rabbah and Gezer.

Although other identifications were proposed by the older topographers, there is now a general consensus of opinion that the site of this

2. Identification city is Khurbet Kīlā (Jos, Ant, VI, xiii, 1, in his account of David's adventure calls the place "Killa"). It is a hill covered with ruins in the higher part of Wādy es Sār, 1,575 ft. above sea-level, whose terraced sides are covered with cornfields. The Onom (Lat text) states that it was 8 miles from Eleutheropolis, which is about the distance of Kh. Kīlā from Beit Jibrin. Beit Nusb (Nezib) is a couple of miles away, and Tell Sandahannah (Mareshah) but 7 miles to the W. (Josh 15 44). An early Christian tradition states that the prophet Habakkuk was buried at Keilah.

KELAIAH, kē-lā'ya, kē-lī'a (קְלַיָּה, kēlāyāh, "swift for Jeh" [?]; Καλιος, Kōlios, B, Κάνος, Kōnos): One of the priests who had "foreign wives" (Ezr 10 23, also "Kelita"). In || list of 1 Esd 9 23, he again has a double name—"Colius" and "Calitas." A "Kelita" is named as helping Ezra at the expounding of the law (Neh 8 7; cf 1 Esd 9 48, "Calitas"), and also among the signatories of the covenant (Neh 10 9; for nature of covenant see vs 28 ff). They may not, however, be the same person.

KEMUEL, kem'ū-el, kē-mū'el (קִמּוּאֵל, k'mū'ēl, "God's mound"):

(1) Nephew of Abraham (Gen 22 21), father of Aram, whom Ewald identifies with Ram of Job 32 2; but cf Gen 10 22, where Aram is described as one of the children of Shem. They may not be the same person.

(2) Prince of Ephraim, one of the land commissioners who divided Canaan (Nu 34 24).

(3) A Levite, father of Hashabiah, one of the tribal princes of David's time, a ruler among the Levites (1 Ch 27 17).

KENAN, kē'nan (קֵינָן, kēnān; Καινάν, Kainān): A son of Enosh, the son of Seth (Gen 5 9.10.12.13. 14; 1 Ch 1 2). AV form (except in 1 Ch 1 2), is "Cainan."

KENATH, kē'nath (קִנְיָה, k'nāth; Καάθ, Kaáth, Kaanāth in LXX, A): A city in Bashan, taken along with its "daughters," i.e. "villages" from the Amorites by Nobah who gave it his own name (Nu 32 42). It was recaptured by Geshur and Aram (1 Ch 2 23). It is probably identical with the modern Kanawāt, which is built on the site, and largely from the materials of an ancient city. It lies about 16 miles to the N. of Boşra eski Şām, the Bostra of the Romans, on both sides of Wādy Kanawāt, where, descending from the slopes of Jebel ed-Druze, it plunges over a precipice, forming a picturesque waterfall. On the plateau above the modern village, there is a striking collection of Rom and Christian remains, the shapely forms of many columns lending distinction to the scene. One large building is associated with the name of the patriarch Job—Maḳām Ayyūb. The position commands a spacious and interesting view over the whole of the Haurān. The identification has been rejected by Šocin (Baedeker, Pal<sup>3</sup>, 207), but his reasons are not given. Moore (Jgs, 222) also rejects it, but for reasons that are not convincing. W. EWING

KENAZ, kē'naz, KENEZ, kē'nez (קִנְיָה, k'naz, "hunting"):

(1) A "duke" of Edom, grandson of Esau (Gen 36 11.15.42; 1 Ch 1 36.53).

(2) Father of Othniel (Josh 15 17; Jgs 1 13; 3 9.11; 1 Ch 4 13).

(3) The unidentified k'naz of 1 Ch 4 15, who appears to be a descendant of (2). There is, however, some difficulty with the passage here.

KENEZITE, kē'nez-it (קִנְיָי, k'nizzī; Κενεζαίος, Kenezaios): AV in Gen 15 19 and RV uniformly, spell "Kenizzite." The Kenezites were the clan whose name-father was KENAZ (q.v.). Their land, along with that of their Canaanite tribes, was promised to Abram (Gen 15 19). To this clan belonged Jephunneh, the father of Caleb (Nu 32 12; Josh 14 6.14). It had evidently been absorbed by the tribe of Judah. If the Kenezites went down with Jacob into Egypt, they may have become identified with his family there.

KENITES, kē'nīts (קִנִּי, ha-kēnī, קִנִּי, ha-kēnī; in Nu 24 22 and Jgs 4 11, קִנִּי, kāyin; cf. Kenaitoi, hoi Kenaitoi, cf. Kenaitoi, hoi Kenaitoi): A tribe of nomads named in association with various other peoples. They are first mentioned along with the Kadmonites and Kenizzites among the peoples whose land was promised to Abram (Gen 15 19). Balaam, seeing them from the heights of Moab, puns upon their name, which resembles the Heb kēn, "a nest," prophesying their destruction although their nest was "set in the rock"—possibly a reference to Sela, the city. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, is called "the priest of Midian" in Ex 3 1; 18 1; but in Jgs 1 16 he is described as a Kenite, showing a close relation between the Kenites and Midian. At the time of Sisera's overthrow, Heber, a Kenite, at "peace" with Jabin, king of Hazor, pitched his tent far N. of his ancestral seats (Jgs 4 17). There were Kenites dwelling among the Amalekites in the time of Saul (1 S 15 6). They were spared because they had "showed kindness to all the children of Israel, when they came up out of Egypt." David, in his answer to Achish, links the Kenites with the inhabitants of the S. of Judah (27 10). Among the ancestors of the tribe of Judah, the Chronicler includes the Kenite Hammath, the father of the Rechabites (1 Ch 2 55). These last continued to live in tents, practising the ancient nomadic customs (Jer 35 6 ff).

The word kēnī in Aram. means "smith." Professor Sayce thinks they may really have been a tribe of smiths, resembling "the gipsies of modern Europe, as well as the traveling tinkers or blacksmiths of the Middle Ages" (HDB, s.v.). This would account for their relations with the different peoples, among whom they would reside in pursuit of their calling.

In Jos they appear as Kenitides, and in Ant, IV, vii, 3 he calls them "the race of the Shechemites."

KENIZZITE, ken'i-zīt. See KENEZITE.

KENOSIS, kē-nō'sis: The word "kenosis" (κένωσις, kēnōsis) has entered theological language from Phil 2 7, where in the sentence he "emptied himself" the Gr.vb. is ekénōsen. "Kenosis," then, the corresponding noun, has become a technical term for the humiliation of the Son in the incarnation, but in recent years has acquired a still more technical sense, i.e. of the Son's emptying Himself of certain attributes, esp. of omniscience.

(1) The theological question involved was one about as far as possible from the minds of the Christians of the apostolic age and appar-

1. The NT tly one that never occurred to St. Paul. For in Phil 2 7 the only "emptying" in point is that of the (external) change from the "form of God" to the "form of a servant." Elsewhere in the NT it is usually taken as a matter of course that Christ's knowledge was far higher than that of other men (Jn 2 24 is the clearest example). But passages that imply a limitation of that knowledge do exist and are of various classes. Of not much importance are the entirely incidental references to the authorship of OT passages where the traditional authorship is considered erroneous, as no other method of quotation would have been possible. Somewhat different are the references to the nearness of the Parousia (esp. Mt 10 23; 24 29). But with these it is always a question how far the exact phraseology has been framed by the evangelists and, apart from this, how far Christ may not have been consciously using current imagery for the impending spiritual revolution, although knowing that the details would be quite different (see PAROUSIA). Limitation of knowledge may perhaps be deduced from the fact that Christ could be amazed (Mt 8 10, etc.), that He could be really tempted (esp. He 4 15), or that He possessed faith (He 12 2; see comm.). More explicitly Christ is said to have learned in Lk 2 52; He 5 8. And, finally, in Mk 13 32 || Mt 24 36, Christ states categorically that He is ignorant of the exact time of the Parousia.

(2) An older exegesis felt only the last of these passages as a real difficulty. A distinction constructed between knowledge naturally possessed and knowledge gained by experience (i.e. although the child Jesus knew the alphabet naturally, He was obliged to learn it by experience) covered most of the others. For Mk 13 32 a variety of explanations were offered. The passage was tr<sup>d</sup> "neither the Son, except the Father know it," a tr that can be borne by the Gr. But it simply transfers the difficulty by speaking of the Father's knowledge as hypothetical, and is an impossible tr of Mt 24 36, where the word "only" is added. The explanations that assume that Christ knew the day but had no commission to reveal it are most unsatisfactory, for they place insincere words in His mouth; "It is not for you to know the day" would have been the inevitable form of the saying (Acts 1 7).

(1) Yet the attempt so to misinterpret the verses is not the outcome of a barren dogmatic prejudice,

2. Dogmatic but results from a dread lest real injury be done to the fundamentals of Christian consciousness. Not only does the mind of the Christian revolt from seeing in Christ anything less than true God, but it revolts from finding in Him two centers of personality—Christ was One. But as omniscience is an essential attribute of God, it is an essential attribute of the incarnate Son. So does not any limitation of Christ's human knowledge tend to vitiate a sound doctrine of the incarnation? Certainly, to say with the upholders of the kenosis in its "classical" form that the Son, by an exercise of His will, determined to be ignorant as man, is not helpful, as the abandonment by God of one of His own essential attributes would be the preposterous corollary. (2) Yet the Bib. data are explicit, and an explanation of some kind must be found. And the solution seems to lie in an ambiguous use of the word "knowledge," as applied to Christ as God and as man. When we speak of a man's knowledge in the sense discussed in the kenotic doctrine, we mean the totality of facts present in his intellect, and by his ignorance we mean the absence of a fact or of facts from that intellect. Now in the older discussions of the subject, this intellectual knowledge was tacitly assumed (mystical theology apart) to be the only knowledge worthy of the name, and so it was at the same time also assumed that God's knowledge is intellectual also—"God geometrizes." Under this assumption God's knowledge is essentially of the same kind as man's, differing from man's only in its purity and extent. And this assumption is made in all discussions that speak of the knowledge of the Son as God illuminating His mind as man. (3) Modern critical epistemology has, however, taught man a sharp lesson in humility by demonstrating that the intellect is by no means the perfect instrument that it has been assumed to be. And the faults are by no means faults due to lack of instruction, evil desires, etc, but are resident in the intellect itself, and inseparable from it as an intellect. Certain recent writers (Bergson, most notably) have even built up a case of great strength for regarding the intellect as a mere product of utilitarian development, with the defects resulting naturally from such an evolution. More esp. does this restriction of the intellect seem to be true in religious knowledge, even if the contentions of Kant and (esp.) Ritschl be not fully admitted. Certain it is, in any case, that even human knowledge is something far wider than intellectual knowledge, for there are many things that we know that we never could have learned through the intellect, and, apparently, many elements of our knowledge are almost or quite incapable of translation into intellectual terms. Omniscience, then, is by no means intellectual omniscience, and it is not to be reached by any mere process of expansion of an intellect. An "omniscient intellect" is a contradiction in terms. (4) In other words, God's omniscience is not merely human intellectual knowledge raised to the infinite power, but something of an entirely different quality, hardly conceivable to human thought—as different from human intellectual knowledge as the Divine omnipotence is different from muscular strength. Consequently, the passage of this knowledge into a human intellect is impossible, and the problem of the incarnation should be stated: What effect did Divine omniscience in the person have on the conscious intellect of the manhood? There is so little help from the past to be gained in answering this question, that it must remain open at present—if, indeed, it is ever capable of a full answer. But that ignorance in the intellect of the manhood is fully consistent with omniscience in the person seems to be not merely a safe answer to the question as stated, but an inevitable answer if the true humanity of Christ is to be maintained at all.

LITERATURE.—Sanday's Christology and Personality, 1911, and La Zouche, The Person of Christ in Modern Thought, 1912, are among the latest discussions of the subject, with very full references to the modern literature.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

KERAS, kē'ras (Κίρας, Kíras): In 1 Esd 5 29, the head of a family of temple-servants, called "Keroz" in Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47.

KERCHIEF, kēr'chif (מִסְפָּחֹת, mispāhōth; ἐπιβόλαια, epibolaia): Occurs only in Ezk 13 18,21, in a passage which refers to some species of divination. Their exact shape or use is unknown. They were apparently long veils or coverings put over the heads of those consulting the false prophetesses and reaching down to the feet, for they were for "persons of every stature."

KEREN-HAPPUCH, ker'en-hap'uk, kē'ren-hap'uk (קֶרֶן חַפְּזִי, keren happūkh, "horn of antimony," i.e. beautifier; LXX Ἀμαλθείας κέρας, Amaltheias kēras): The 3d daughter of Job (Job 42 14), born after his restoration from affliction. Antimony, producing a brilliant black, was used among the Orientals for coloring the edges of the eyelids, making the eyes large and lustrous. Hence the suggestiveness of this name of an article of the ladies' toilet, a little horn or receptacle for the eye-paint.

KERIOTH, kē'ri-oth, -ōth (קִרְיֹת, kē'riyōth):

(1) A city of Moab, named with Beth-meon and Bozrah (Jer 48 24,41). Here was a sanctuary of Chemosh, to which Mesha says (M S, l. 13) he dragged "the altar hearths of Davdoh." It may possibly be represented by the modern Kuraiāt, between Dibān and Aḥārūs. Some (e.g. Driver on Am 2 2) think it may be only another name for Ar-Moab. Buhl (GAP, 270) would identify it with Kir of Moab (Kerak). No certainty is yet possible.

(2) A city of Judah (Josh 15 25; RV KERIOTH-HEZRON [q.v.]), possibly the modern el-Kuryatāin, to the N.E. of Tell 'Arād. W. EWING

KERIOTH-HEZRON, kē'ri-oth-hez'ron (קִרְיֹת הַחֶזְרוֹן, kē'riyōth hezrōn; Josh 15 25 says, "The same is Hazor"; AV "Kerioth and Hezron which is Hazor"): One of the cities in the "south" of Judah. Robinson (BR, II, 101) identifies it with the ruined site of Kuryatāin, 4½ miles N. of Tell 'Arād. It has been suggested that Kerioth was the birth place of JUDAS ISCARIOT (q.v.). Cf KERIOTH, 2.

KERNEL, kūr'nel (קֶרֶן, harçannim, EV "kernels"; LXX reads stēmphullon used by Aristophanes as=olives from which oil has been pressed, later, in same, of raisin pulp): Mentioned in Nu 6 4 along with זֶי, zāgh, tr<sup>d</sup> "husks." This tr, "kernels" or "grape stones," is from the Tg and Talm, but is doubtful, and it may be the word should be tr<sup>d</sup> "sour grapes."

KEROS, kē'ros (קִירוֹס, kērōs, "fortress" [?]): One of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47), an order appointed to the liturgical offices of the temple. See NETHINIM.

KESIL, kē'zil (Orion). See ASTRONOMY.

KESITAH, kes'i-tā, ke-sē'ta (קֶשֶׁתִּיחַ, kē'sitāh). See PIECE OF MONEY.

KETAB, kē'tab (קְטָב, Kēlāb): Ancestor of a family of Nethinim (1 Esd 5 30).

KETTLE, ket'!l: In EV only in 1 S 2 14 for dūdh, "a vessel for cooking." The same word in 2 Ch 35 13 is rendered "caldrons," and in Job 41 20 (Heb 12), "pot." Ps 81 6 (Heb 7) (AV "pots") belongs rather to another signification of the word (RV "basket," for carrying clay or bricks).

KETURAH, ke-tū'rā, ke-tōō'rā (קֶטֶרֶחַ, kē'turāh; Χεττούρα, Chettoura, "incense"): The second wife of Abraham (Gen 25 1; 1 Ch 1 32 f). According to the Bib. tradition, he contracted this second marriage after the death of Sarah (cf Gen 23), and very likely after the marriage of Isaac (cf Gen 24). It is not improbable that, as some writers have suggested, this change in the life of his son prompted Abraham to remarry in order to overcome the feeling of lonesomeness caused by Isaac's entering the state of matrimony.

1 Ch 1 32 (and also Gen 25 6) shows us that K. was not considered to be of the same dignity as Sarah who, indeed, was the mother of the son of promise, and, for obvious reasons, the sons of Abraham's concubines were separated from Isaac. She was the mother of 6 sons representing Arab tribes S. and E. of Pal (Gen 25 1-6), so that through the offspring of Keturah Abraham became "the father of many nations." WILLIAM BAUR

KEY, kē (מַפְתֵּחַ, maphṭēḥ, an "opener"; cf κλεις, klets, "that which shuts"): Made of wood, usually with nails which fitted into corresponding holes in the lock, or rather bolt (Jgs 3 25). Same is rendered "opening" in 1 Ch 9 27. See HOUSE.

Figurative: Used fig. for power, since the key was sometimes worn on the shoulder as a sign of official authority (Isa 22 22). In the NT it is used several times thus fig.: of Peter: "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 16 19); of Christ, in Rev, having the "keys of death and of Hades" (1 18), also having "the key of David" (3 7). An angel was given "the key of the pit of the abyss" (9 1; 20 1). Our Lord accused the teachers of the law of His day of taking away "the key of knowledge" from men, that is, locking the doors of truth against them (Lk 11 52; cf Mt 23 13).

  3. Scope of the Power

There is no more stubbornly contested conception in Christian terminology. The thought connects itself immediately with Mt 16 19, but it is hardly correct to say that it originates there, for the controversy is one that grows out of the conflict of forces inherent in the institutional development of religion and of society. It must have arisen, in any event, if there had been no such word as that in Mt 16 19, although not in the same terms as it is now found. Since the Reformation it has been recognized, by Catholic and Protestant, that on the interpretation of this passage depends the authority of the Church of Rome and its exclusive claims, so far as their foundation in Scripture is concerned; while on the other hand there is involved the "validity" of the "sacraments," "ordinances" and "orders" of Protestantism and the very hope of salvation of Protestants.

I. The Problems Involved.—The crucial passage has two declarations, commonly spoken of as promises to Peter: to him Christ will

1. The give the keys of the kingdom of Keys; and heaven; whatsoever he shall bind on the Binding earth shall be bound in heaven, while and Loosing whatsoever he shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. How are the facts of having committed to him the keys and the function of binding and loosing related? Are they two forms of one declaration? Is the first general, and the second a specific sphere of its application?

Both statements are made in figurative terms. That of the keys is supposed to be drawn from the duties of the chief steward of a house, or establishment. The idea of the keys of a city turned over to some distinguished person is advanced, but is hardly to be considered. We need, then, to know the functions of the chief steward and how they apply to the kingdom of heaven, and to Peter as its steward. What was Peter to

2. Meaning bind and loose, men or things, per-
of the sons or teachings? Numerous examples
Statements could be cited of the use of these terms to signify forbidding (binding) and permitting (loosing) conduct as legitimate under the law of the OT (Lightfoot, McClintock and Strong, Schaff-Herzog, Hastings, etc.). The strict school of Shammai bound many things loosed by the laxer school of Hillel (Broadus, Mt). Is this conclusive that Jesus is here giving Peter authority for "laying down the law for his fellow-disciples," "authority to say what the law of God allows, and what it forbids," "the power of legislation for the church"? (Cf Mason in HDB, IV, 30.)

Ecclesiastical contentions turn esp. on Peter's relation to these words of Jesus. Do they signify powers and "privileges" conferred on Peter, exclusively or representatively? 3. How Are they official or personal? Do Peter Is they belong to other apostles, and to Related to other officers besides apostles? Can These the powers be exercised by individuals or by the church alone? If any besides Peter have these powers, do they pass to them from Peter, and how?

What seems to the writer a fundamental question here is either passed over very lightly or entirely omitted in the discussions of this subject. Did Jesus mean by these words to confer on Peter, or on anyone to whom they may apply, authority, or obligation; privilege, or responsibility? Does He promise position, or does He impose duty? These alternatives are not necessarily exclusive, but the interpretation of the thought will be determined in no small measure by where the stress is laid.

II. Views Maintained.—The possibilities have been exhausted in the interpretations and applications advocated. It is not possible to classify on lines of the creeds, except very generally, for there is little uniformity of view existing within the various communions.

(1) Generally speaking, the Roman Catholic church gives to Peter a unique position. Her theologians also agree that all the powers and privileges of Peter descend to his successors in the vicarate of Christ. When the question is raised of the extension of these prerogatives beyond Peter and the popes, all sorts of views are held, concerning both the fact and the method of that extension.

(2) Among Protestants there is general agreement that the church is the agent of this power, but there is not uniformity as to the nature of the authority or the manner of its exercise.

(3) Some think that Peter has no peculiar relation to the keys; that these words were spoken to him only as the first who gave expression to that conception and experience, on the basis of which Jesus commits the keys of the kingdom to any believer in Him as the Christ of God.

We may summarize the more important views as to Peter thus: (a) the power committed to him alone and exercised, (i) at Pentecost, or (ii) at Pentecost, Caesarea and other places; (b) the power committed to Peter and to the other apostles, including Paul, discharged by them, and descended to no others; (c) the power conferred on Peter officially and on his official successors; (d) the power conferred on Peter and the other apostles and to such as hold their place in the church; (e) that the power belongs to Peter as representative of the church, and so to the church to be exercised (i) by the officials of the church, (ii) by the officials and those to whom they commit it, (iii) by all priests and persons allowed to represent the church, de facto, (iv) by the church in its councils, or other formal and official decisions, (v) by the church in a less formal way than (iv), (vi) by all members of the church as representing it without specific commission; (f) that it belongs to the Christian as such, and so is imposed upon, or offered to, all Christians.

There is general—not absolute—agreement that the holder of the keys is to admit men into the kingdom. It is not agreed that the

2. Nature of the Power holder of the keys may, or can, determine who are members of the kingdom. Both sides are taken. Some think that the power is that of announcing authoritatively the conditions of entrance, while others insist that the holder of the keys also determines what individuals have accepted the conditions.

(1) There is strong support for the view that the primary function of the keys lies in determining the teaching of the kingdom, main-

3. Scope of the Power taining purity of doctrine. Emphasis is laid on the use of the neuter, "whatsoever"—not "whomsoever"—with the binding and loosing. This would lead, however, to the secondary and implied function of declaring who had or had not accepted the teaching of the kingdom.

(2) In the Roman Catholic church we find insistence on distinguishing between the general authority of the keys in all affairs of the church and religion, and the binding and loosing which they specifically apply to absolution. Only on this last are Catholics in full agreement. That the church administers salvation is held by Rom and Gr Catholics and by not a few Protestants, although Protestants do not, as a rule, claim exclusive power in salvation as do the others. Absolution is held to be a general (derived) priestly function, while the authority of the keys resides in the pope alone.

(3) Eminent Catholic authorities admit that the Fathers generally understood the keys to signify the power of forgiving sins, and that they seldom make any reference to the supremacy of Peter. But they claim that rarely the Fathers do take "Christ's promise in the fuller meaning of the gift of authority over the church." Suarez was the first to develop the doctrine that it conferred on Peter and his successors authority in its widest sense, administrative and legislative.

(4) The extension of the authority of the keys to include civil matters is a contention of the Rom church, shared in modified form by some Protestants. Indeed the relation of ecclesiastical to civil authority must be said still to be awaiting clear definition in Protestantism. Maccdo (De Clavibus Petri) claims the theologians of the church for the civil authority of the keys. Joyce in the Catholic Enc affirms that he is unable to verify this claim, but, on the contrary, finds that the opponents of the extension of the authority of the church to civil matters use Mt 16 19 in support of their position on the ground that to Peter were committed the keys of the kingdom of heaven, not of the kingdoms of this world.

III. Data for Deciding the Questions Involved.—We must first examine the Scriptures employing the terms we seek to define. (1) Mt

1. Passages 16 19, the crucial passage, is part of a paragraph over which there is no end of the controversy. The incident at Caesarea Philippi was understood then and afterward to mark an epoch in the life and teaching of Jesus. Having elicited Peter's confession, Jesus pronounces a benediction on him because his insight represented a Divinely mediated experience of fundamental significance in His own plan and mission. Jesus goes on to say: "And I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter ['a stone'], and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it" (ver 18). The controversy rages about "Peter" (πέτρος, pétros) and the "rock" (πέτρα, pétra), "gates of Hades," and "prevail against it." Are the church to be built on the rock and the kingdom whose keys are to be given to Peter the same? Such a shifting of figure is not conclusive against the thought. Perhaps the church is the organic form of the kingdom, its personal content and expression on earth at any given time. This church exists wherever men consciously accept and are included in the kingdom. The kingdom will always embrace influences, institutions, individuals, not be reckoned in any organized or visible church. The church has never had—in the nature of the case can never have—one complete organization including all the organized life of the kingdom, or even of the church. Any claims to this are contradicted by facts obvious at every moment of history. The change in figure from ver 18 to ver 19 is not conclusive against supposing the church to be built in him. But it seems far better to understand that Peter is the first stone in the building, while the foundation is that vital experience in which Peter came to know Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God. On this is erected the church, out of those living stones (λίθοι ζῶντες, líthoi zōntes, 1 Pet 2 4) that know and confess Jesus the Christ. The transition is thus easy to giving Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and the reason for giving them to him rather than to any other may be found in the fact that he is now the first so to enter into the kingdom as to be fitted for church functions.

It is not needful to determine, for our purpose, the exact meaning of "gates of Hades" and their not prevailing against the church (cf various comms.). It is clear that the church is to persist in the life of the world and so the kingdom will not lack organized and aggressive expression. Nor does the relation of binding and loosing depend at all upon the critical question of reading or omitting "and" between the two parts of the verse. The conviction could hardly be escaped that the latter function is intimately related to the former, and is either directly or indirectly involved within it.

(2) The pl. "keys," occurs elsewhere only in Rev 1 18, where the Christ represents Himself as holding the keys of death and of Hades. The word "Hades" might connect this with Mt 16 19. The immediate occasion for the statement is that He who was dead, is alive; He has not only overcome death in His own person but has conquered it and its realm, so that they can no more have power except as subject to Him, since He holds their keys. Men on earth will either fall under the power of death and Hades or they must enter the kingdom of heaven. If the living Christ has the keys of the kingdom in the hands of Peter, or other friends, and holds the keys of its enemies in His own hands, the work will go on with success. It is not certain that the two passages can properly be so closely connected, but they thus afford just the assurance that is contained for the churches in Rev.

(3) In Rev 3 7 Christ appears in the character, "he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key [sing.] of David, he that openeth and none can shut, and that shutteth and none openeth." The idea is not restricted but indicates mastery over all things in the Messianic kingdom, its own operations and all forms of opposition. In the next verse, as a specific instance, He has set before the church at Philadelphia an open door (opportunity and progress) which none can shut. Cf as to this Eph 1 22.

(4) It seems to be taken for granted that Jesus, in Mt 16 19, had direct reference to Isa 22 22, yet the passage is not Messianic except in a general sense and on the assumption that the power of Jeh over the nations in the OT is wielded by the Christ in the NT (see ЯЕВОВАИ; LORD). Eliakim is to have absolute power, holding the key of the house of David. The use of the words "open" and "shut," as well as the general conception, connects the passage rather with Rev 3 7.

(5) Rev 9 1; 20 1 are to be taken together. "The key of the pit of the abyss" in the hands of the angel or angels signifies, in these specific circumstances, the same power as that indicated in 1 18.

(6) In Lk 11 52 Jesus pronounces a woe upon the "lawyers" who had "taken away the key of knowledge" from the people, neither entering in nor allowing those about to go in, to enter. The knowledge of God and Divine things was in the control, in great measure, of these scribes. This connects the figure directly with the idea of Mt 16 19, and the connection is emphasized by comparing Mt 23 2f; and is made definite by the word of Jesus in Mt 13 52 with which is to be compared Lk 12 42, where it would not be allowable to suppose that Jesus meant to limit the idea of "the faithful and wise steward" to Peter. This passage with the references seems to be highly important for our subject.

Light is to be drawn from several passages that do not use the exact terms of Mt 16 19, but that deal with the same general ideas.

2. Related Passages (1) Mt 18 18 places the responsibility for binding and loosing on all disciples (18 1), and the reason is explained in the assured presence of the Christ Himself in any company of two or three who have come together in prayer touching any matter in His name, i.e. as His representatives. The immediate reference is to matters of discipline in the effort to rescue any "brother" from sin. The passage is to be taken of sin generally, for the reading "against thee" (ver 15) is to be rejected, in spite of both revised VSS. The reference of binding and loosing here to the man is conclusive against limiting the idea in 16 19 to teaching (cf also Lk 17 1ff). It is also to be noted that the responsibility is placed upon the individual Christian to coöperate with others when necessary.

(2) Mt 9 8 shows that the multitude recognized that God had given power on earth to pronounce forgiveness of sins, and apparently they do not limit this power to the Divine Person, for they do not yet know Him as such.

(3) Jas 5 14ff recognizes the value of elders, and probably of others also, in securing the forgiveness of them that have sinned.

(4) What one must regard as the proper starting-point for studying this subject is Jn 20 21 ff. Appearing to ten of the apostles and to others on the first night after the resurrection, Jesus says: "As the Father sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whose soever ye retain, they are retained." By comparing this with the corresponding account in Lk 24 we see that Jesus is directing that they shall carry on His work (see also Jn 14 12-14; 15 15.16), that He teaches them at length of the nature of His work as seen in the OT, and that the method of their work is to be preaching repentance and remission of sins in His name among all nations. Significant for our purpose are the presence of others than the apostles, the gift of the Holy Spirit, His own self-projection in His messengers, and the solemn statement that the sins of men will be retained or forgiven as it is done through these followers.

(1) It is remarkable that there is no distinct reference to this authority of the keys in the records of the work of the apostles and others

3. Examples of Exercise of This Power in the NT. Their consciousness seems most of all to have been dominated by the fact that they were witnesses of Jesus, and this corresponds exactly with the point of emphasis in all the various forms and occasions of the giving of the commission (see Acts 2 32; 3 15; 4 33; 5 32; 10 39.41; 13 31; 1 Pet 5 1; cf Carver, Missions in the Plan of the Ages). It is said of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14 27) that after their first missionary journey they rehearsed to the church at Antioch "all things that God had done with them, and that he had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles." At Pentecost and at other times Peter was the chief speaker, and so opened the door of the kingdom. Referring to his preaching to Cornelius and his friends, Peter reminds the saints in the conference at Jerus (Acts 15) that God made choice among them, that by his mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of God and believe, but this was said by way of conciliating the Jewish party and not as claiming any priority in authority. It was Philip, the deacon-evangelist, who first preached to the Samaritans (Acts 8), and some "men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Greeks also, preaching the Lord Jesus" (Acts 11 20), the first example of "opening a door of faith" to full heathen. Peter appears in the Jerus conference with no authority above that of other apostles and elders. By reference to Gal 2 we see that Paul was here only as a matter of prudence and fraternity, not recognizing any authority to legislate for his churches or his ministry. The decision there reached is promulgated as that of the brethren as a body, loosing all the law of Moses save four matters that were "necessary" on account of fundamental morals and of the universal presence of Jews in every city (Acts 15 20 f.28f). In the sense of teaching Christian conduct all Paul's letters are examples of binding and loosing.

(2) As to binding and loosing sins Peter speaks in the cases of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5), Simon Magus (ch 8), and in deciding upon the baptism of Cornelius and his household (10 48). Paul speaks with equal boldness in the judgment of Elymas (13 10), where we are told that he was under the Spirit; passes upon the faith of a dozen men at Ephesus, and requires their new baptism after instruction (19 3-7); commands the church at Corinth to turn over to Satan the incestuous man (1 Cor 5 5; cf 1 Tim 1 20), and later urges the man's restoration to loving fellowship, declaring that he has been forgiven (2 Cor 2 5 ff). Obscure men like Philip (Acts 8) and Ananias of Damascus in the case of Paul himself (Acts 9) exercised the same sort of judgment as to the forgiveness and reception of men into the fellowship.

IV. Conclusion.—We sum up what seems to be the teaching of Scripture. We conclude that the power is not a special privilege and extraordinary authority, but a responsibility intrusted by Jesus Christ as the method of extending His work.

There is in it nothing magical, mysterious, or arbitrary; not ecclesiastical or official, but spiritual and primarily personal. The keys of the kingdom of heaven are first of all the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ. By this means men are admitted into the kingdom. The fully attested method of using the keys is that of witnessing personally to an experience of Jesus Christ. He was conferring power for saving and not for barring from salvation. Let it be borne in mind always that Jesus was offering Peter not power but duty, not privilege but responsibility. Neither of these terms, "power" and "privilege," that have come to be associated with the gift of the keys occurs with that gift in the words of the Master. The keys are primarily for admitting to the kingdom of heaven, not for barring from the church.

The holder of the keys is any man with that experience that called forth from Jesus the assurance that Peter should have the keys. Such a man will be in fellowship and coöperation with like men, in a church, and the Spirit of Jesus will be present in them, so that their decisions and their testimony will be His as well as theirs. There is a corporate, or church, agency, therefore, and the man who would ignore that lacks the experience or the Spirit needful for the use of the keys. Yet the church is never to overshadow or exclude the individual responsibility and authority.

It is to be understood that the keys of the kingdom of heaven confer no political authority or

2. Agent of the Power power, save that of holy and redemptive influence. The kingdom of Jesus is not of this world. Its power is spiritual and is to be exercised always primarily in the saving of men. Men do not need to be locked out of the kingdom. They are out, and too contented to remain so. It does happen that evil men seek to take possession of the kingdom for evil ends, and then it is that the authority rests in spiritual men to exclude. Men that are to be brought into the kingdom of heaven are now in sin, and where the duty of releasing them is not discharged by Christians, the sinners are left bound in their sins.

There is also involved of necessity the duty of declaring not only the conditions of entrance into the kingdom, but the courses of conduct appropriate to the kingdom. It is thus that binding and loosing in teaching devolve upon the holders of the keys. To that extent, and in that sense, alone, is there the power of "legislating" within the kingdom. This is only interpreting and applying the principles that are given us in the Scriptures. See further ABSOLUTION; IMPOSITION OF HANDS; PETER; ROCK.

KEZIAH, kē-zī'a (קֶזְיָה, k'zī'āh, "cassia"); Kasia, Kasia, A, Kassia): The 2d daughter of Job (Job 42 14), born after his restoration from affliction. The word "cassia" became a feminine name from the fragrance of the flower.

KEZIZ, kē'ziz (קֶזִיז, k'zīz). See EMEK-KEZIZ.

KHAN, kân, kan. See INN.

KIBROTH-HATTA'VAH, kib-roth-ha-tā'a-va, kib-rōth- (קִבְרוֹת הַתְּאֵבָה, kībhroth ha-tā'āwāh, "the graves of greed"): A desert camp of the Israelites, one day's journey from the wilderness of Sinai. There the people lusted for flesh to eat, and, a great number of quails being sent, a plague resulted; hence the name (Nu 11 34; 33 16; Dt 9 22).

KIBZAIM, kib-zā'im, kib'zā-im. See JOKMEAM.

KICK (λακτίζω, laktizō): In the famous vision on the road to Damascus the unseen voice said to Saul: "Why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (Acts 9 4f; 26 14). The words are omitted from the best MSS in 9 4. This was a familiar proverb in both Gr and Lat lit., and refers to the severer goading received by an ox which kicks back at the goad used to guide or urge him on. The words seem to mean that Paul's paroxysm of persecution was a painful as well as profitless resistance to the pricks of conscience by which God was leading him into the light.

KID: (1) קִידָּה, g'dhī (Ex 23 19, etc); (2) fem. g'dhīyāh (Isa 11 6, etc); (3) קִידִּים, g'dhī 'izzīm, EV "kid," lit. "kid of the goats," AVm (Jgs 6 19, etc); (4) קִידָּה, ez, lit. "goat" (Dt 14 21; 1 K 20 27); (5) קִידִּים, s'ir 'izzīm, AV "kid of the goats," RV "he-goat" (Gen 37 31; Lev 9 3, etc); (6) ἑρίφος, érifhos (Lk 15 29). See GOAT.

KIDNAPPING, kid'nap-ing (MANSTEALING): The term itself occurs only in the NT (ἀνδραποδιστής, andrapodistēs = "manstealer") in 1 Tim 1 10. The crime was directly forbidden in the Heb law (Ex 21 16; Dt 24 7), and was made punishable with death.

KIDNEYS, kid'niz (always in the pl.: קִלְיֹת, kīlāyōth; νεφροί, nephroí; Lat renes, whence the Eng. "reins"): "Reins" and "kidneys" are synonyms, but AV undertook a distinction by using the former word in the figurative, the latter in the literal passages. ERV has followed AV exactly, but ARV has retained "reins" only in Job 16 13; Lam 3 13; Rev 2 23, elsewhere substituting "heart," except in Ps 139 13, where "inward parts" is used. AV and ERV also have "reins" for קִלְיֹת, kīlācāyim, in Isa 11 5 (ARV "loins"). The physiological function of the kidneys is not referred to in the Bible, but has been introduced (quite wrongly) by AVm to Lev 15 2; 22 4.

(1) The kidneys owe their importance in the Bible partly to the fact that they are imbedded in fat, and fat of such purity that "fat of the kidneys" was a proverbial term for surpassing excellence (Dt 32 14m). For the visceral fat was the part of the animal best adapted for sacrificial burning, and hence came to be deemed peculiarly sacred (Lev 7 22-25; 1 S 2 16). Accordingly, the kidneys with the fat surrounding them were burned in every sacrifice in which the entire animal was not consumed, whether in peace (Lev 3 4.10.15; 9 19), sin (Ex 29 13; Lev 4 9; 8 16; 9 10), or trespass (Lev 7 4) offerings; of the "ram of consecration" (Ex 29 22; Lev 8 25). So in Isa 34 6, "fat of the kidneys of rams" is chosen as a typical sacrificial term to parallel "blood of lambs and goats."

(2) The position of the kidneys in the body makes them particularly inaccessible, and in cutting up an animal they are the last organs to be reached. Consequently, they were a natural symbol for the most hidden part of a man (Ps 139 13), and in Job 16 13 to "cleave the reins asunder" is to effect the total destruction of the individual (cf 19 27; Lam 3 13). This hidden location, coupled with the sacred sacrificial use, caused the kidneys to be thought of as the seat of the innermost moral (and emotional) impulses. So the reins instruct (Ps 16 7) or are "pricked" (Ps 73 21), and God can be said to be far from the reins of sinners (Jer 12 2). In all of these passages "conscience" gives the exact meaning. So the reins rejoice (Prov 23 16), cause torment (2 Esd 5 34), or tremble in wrath (1 Macc 2 24). And to "know" or "try the reins" (usually joined with "the heart") is an essential power of God's, denoting His complete knowledge of the nature of every human being (Ps 7 9; 26 2; Jer 11 20; 17 10; 20 12; Wisd 1 6; Rev 2 23). See FAT; PSYCHOLOGY; SACRIFICE. Cf RS<sup>2</sup>, 379-80, and for Gr sacrificial parallels Journal of Philology, XIX (1890), 46. The anatomical relations are well exhibited in the plate in SBOT, "Leviticus." BURTON SCOTT EASTON

KIDRON, kid'ron (Κεδρών, Kedrōn; AV Cedron): A place which, in obedience to Antiochus Sidetes, Cendebeaus fortified (1 Macc 15 39 ff), to which, when defeated, he fled, hotly pursued by John and Judas, sons of Simon the Maccabee, who burned the city (16 4 ff). It is named along with Jamnia (Yebna) and Azotus (Esdūd). It is possibly identical with kaṭrah, a village about 3 miles S.W. of 'āṭir (Ekron).

KIDRON, THE BROOK (נַחַל קִדְרֹן, naḥal kidhrōn; in Jn 18 1 [AV Cedron], δ χειμάρρου τῶν Κεδρων, ho cheimārrouh tōn Kēdrōn, according to RVm, the last two words are to be considered as meaning "of the cedars." The Heb word has been very generally accepted as from קָדַר, kāḏhar, "to become black," but it is an attractive suggestion [Cheyne] that it may be a phonetic variation of קִדְרֹן, giddērōn, "a spot for inclosures for cattle," of which latter there must have been many around the now buried caves which lay at the base of the cliffs around the spring Gihon):

The Nahal Kidron is the valley known today as the Wādy Sitti Miriam, which lies between the eastern walls of Jerus and the Mount of Olives. It commences in the plateau to the N. of the city, and after making a wide sweep S.E., under the name Wādy el Jōz ("Valley of the Walnuts"), passes S. until level with the south-eastern corner of the temple-area where its bed is spanned by an old bridge; here the bottom of the valley, 40 ft. beneath the present surface level, is 400 ft. below the temple-platform. From this point it narrows and deepens gradually, bending slightly W. of S., and, after receiving the Tyropæon valley, joins a little farther S.W. with the Valley of Hinnom to form the Wādy en Nār, which winds on through the "wilderness of Judaea" to the Dead Sea. Where the three valleys run together is a large open space filled with gardens (the KING'S GARDENS, q.v.), which are kept irrigated all the year round by means of the overflow waters from the 'Ain Silwān (see SILOAM). It is where the Hinnom valley runs into the Kidron that some would locate TOPHETH (q.v.). Except at the irrigated gardens, the ravine is a dry valley containing water only during and immediately after heavy rain, but in ancient times the rocky bottom—now buried beneath many feet of rich soil—must have contained a little stream from Gihon for at least some hundreds of yards. This was the "brook that flowed through the midst of the land" (2 Ch 32 4). The length of the valley from its head to Bir Eyyāb is 2½ miles.

Since the 4th cent. AD, this valley has been known as the VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT (q.v.), and from quite early times it was a favorite situation for interments (2 K 23 4.6.12; 2 Ch 34 4.5); it is by Moslem and Jewish tradition the scene of the last judgment, and was known to the Moslems in the Middle Ages as Wādy Jehannum;

2. Traditions see GEHENNA. It is probable that the "graves of the common people," where King Jehoiakim cast the body of the prophet Uriah, were here (Jer 26 23), and it has been suggested, with less probability, that here too may have been the scene of Ezekiel's vision of the "valley of dry bones" (Ezk 37; cf Jer 31 40).

The Fields of Kidron (2 K 23 4), though generally identified with the open, lower part of this valley, where it is joined by the Tyropæon valley, may more probably have been in the upper part where the wide expanded valley receives the name Wādy el Jōz; this part is actually on the road to Bethel.

The most dramatic scene associated with the Kidron is that recorded in connection with its earliest Scriptural mention (2 S 15

4. Historical Associations 23), when David, flying before his rebellious son Absalom, here stood on the Jerus side of the valley while all his adherents passed over. "And all the country wept with a loud voice, and all the people passed over: the king also himself passed over the brook Kidron . . . toward the way of the wilderness." The passing over this brook appears to have been viewed as the solemn abandonment of the Jerus territory (cf 1 K 2 37). In 1 K 15 13; 2 Ch 15 16, we read that Asa burnt at the brook Kidron "an abominable image for an Asherah" which Maacah, his mother, had set up. In the reforms of Hezekiah, "all the uncleanness that they found in the temple of Jeh" was carried by the Levites to the brook Kidron (2 Ch 29 16); "All the altars for incense took they away, and cast them into the brook Kidron" (30 14). This locality was again used in the reforms of Josiah when the king "brought out the Asherah from the house of Jeh, without Jerus, unto the brook Kidron, and burned it at the brook Kidron, and beat it to dust, and cast the dust thereof upon the graves of the common people" (2 K 23 6). The same treatment was given to the vessels made for Baal, the Asherah and the host of heaven (ver 4), and the two idolatrous altars of Manasseh (ver 12). Jos (Ant, IX, vii, 3) states that Athaliah was slain in the valley of Kidron, but this does not quite tally with the account (2 K 11 16). It was a valley associated with graves and the ashes of abominations, but it was prophesied that it should be "holy unto Jeh" (Jer 31 40). Twice it is mentioned simply as "the valley," naḥal (2 Ch 33 14; Neh 2 15). Very different from these earlier scenes is the last Scriptural reference (Jn 18 1), when Jesus "went forth with his disciples over the brook Kidron" for His last hours of spiritual struggle and prayer before the turmoil of the end.

KILAN, ki'lan (Κιλάν, Kilán; AV Ceilan): Mentioned with Azetas in 1 Esd 5 15; their sons returned among the exiles with Zerubbabel. The names do not appear in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

KIMAH, ki'ma (Pleiades). See ASTRONOMY.

KIN. See KINDRED.

KIN, NEXT OF. See KINSMAN.

KINAH, ki'na (קִנְיָה, kīnāh): An unidentified town on the southern boundary of Judah, toward Edom (Josh 15 22). The word kīnāh means "elegy," "dirge," "lament for the dead." The name, however, may have been derived from the Kenites, קניזי, who had settlements in the S. (1 S 27 10, etc.).

KINDNESS, kind'nes (חֶסֶד, hesedh; χρηστότης, chrēstotēs): "Kindness" in the OT is (with one exception) the tr of hesedh, "kindness," "favor," "mercy," etc, used chiefly of man but also of God (Gen 20 13; 40 14; 1 S 15 6; 20 14.15; 2 S 9 3; Neh 9 17; Ps 141 5; Isa 54 8.10, etc); ḥōbh, "good," is once so tr<sup>d</sup> (2 S 2 6). In the NT chrēstotēs, "usefulness," "beneficence," is rendered "kindness" 4 t in AV (2 Cor 6 6; Eph 2 7; Col 3 12; Tit 3 4, and in Gal 5 22 RV); see GENTLENESS; GOODNESS. Philanthrōpia, "love of mankind," is tr<sup>d</sup> "kindness" (Acts 28 2), and philadelphia, "love of the brotherhood" (2 Pet 1 7, ERV "love of the brethren," ARVm "Gr, love of the brethren").

For "kindness" (Ps 31 21) RV has "lovingkindness," and ARV in other places where the reference is to God; for "shew" "shewed kindness" (Josh 2 12) "deal," "dealt kindly"; for "The desire of man is his kindness" (Prov 19 22) ARV has "That which maketh a man to be desired is his kindness." ERV "The desire of man is [the measure of] his kindness," like ARV in m; for "merciful kindness" (Ps 117 2) ARV has "lovingkindness," ERV "mercy"; both have "lovingkindness" (Ps 119 76); for "of great kindness" (Neh 9 17; Joel 2 13; Jon 4 2) ARV has "abundant in lovingkindness," ERV "plenteous in mercy"; RV has "kindness" for "mercy" (Gen 39 21); for "pity" (Job 6 14); for "goodness" (Prov 20 6); "favor and kindness" ARV, for "grace and favor" (Est 2 17). See LOVINGKINDNESS; MERCY.

KINDRED, kin'dred: Several words are rendered "kindred" in AV. אָה, 'āh, "brother," was used loosely among Hebrews for a member of the same tribe or family, a relative; and is once tr<sup>d</sup> "kindred" (1 Ch 12 29 AV). Once also somewhat loosely as the tr of מוֹדָה, mōdha'ah, lit. "acquaintance" (Ruth 3 2; cf same root in 2 1, rendered "kinsman"); once, for the figurative expression, "men of thy redemption" (יְשׁוּעָה, y'shu'ah, referring to the law of the redemption of land by kinsmen, Lev 25 25). The two most common words for kindred are: (1) מוֹלֶדֶת, mōledeth, "related by birth" (Gen 12 1; 24 4.7; 31 3.13; 32 9; 43 7; Nu 10 30; Est 2 10.20; 8 6); (2) מִשְׁפָּחָה, mishpāhah, "family" (Gen 24 38.40.41; Josh 6 23; Ruth 2 3; 1 Ch 16 28; Job 32 2; Ps 22 27; 96 7).

In the NT (several times), γένος, génos, "kindred by birth," so, of same family, tribe or race (Acts 4 6; 7 13.19 RV "race"); so also συγγένεια, syngeneia (Lk 1 61; Acts 7 3.14). In AV φυλή, phulē, "tribe," rendered "kindred" (Rev 1 7; 5 9; 7 9; 11 9; 13 7; 14 6), but better "tribe" as in RV. πατριά, patriá, rendered "kindred" in Acts 3 25, is better "families," as in RV.

LITERATURE

I. King.—The Heb word, for king is מֶלֶךְ, melek; its denominative מַלְאֵךְ, mālakh, "to reign," "to be king." The word is apparently derived from the √ mlkh which de-

1. Etymology and Definition notes: (1) in the Arab. مَلِك, mlk, vb., and مَلِك, mlk, n.), "to possess," "to reign," inasmuch as the possessor is also lord and ruler; (2) in the Aram. (ܡܠܟܐ), and Assyrian "counsel," and in the Syrian "to consult"; cf Lat consul.

If, as has been suggested, the root idea of "king" is "counsellor" and not "ruler," then the rise of the kingly office and power would be due to intellectual superiority rather than to physical prowess. And since the first form of monarchy known was that of a "city-state," the office of king may have evolved from that of the chief "elder," or intellectual head of the clan.

The first king of whom we read in the Bible was Nimrod (Gen 10 8-10), who was supposedly the founder of the Bab empire. His-

2. Earliest Kings torical research regarding the kings of Babylonia and Egypt corroborates this Bib. statement in so far as the ancestry of these kings is traced back to the earliest times of antiquity. According to Isa 19 11, it was the pride of the Egyp princes that they could trace their lineage to most ancient kings. The Canaanites and Philis had kings as early as the times of Abraham (Gen 14 2; 20 2). Thus also the Edomites, who were related to Israel (Gen 36 31), the Moabites, and the Midianites had kings (Nu 22 4; 31 8) earlier than the Israelites.

In Gen 14 18 we read of Melchizedek, who was a priest, and king of Salem. At first the extent of the dominion of kings was often very limited, as appears from 70 of them being conquered by Adonibezek (Jgs 1 7), 31 by Joshua (Josh 12 7 ff), and 32 being subject to Ben-hadad (1 K 20 1).

The earliest Bib. usage of this title "king," in consonance with the general oriental practice, denotes an absolute monarch who exercises unchecked control over his subjects. In this sense the title is applied to Jeh, and to human rulers. No constitutional obligations were laid upon the ruler nor were any restrictions put upon his arbitrary authority. His good or bad conduct depended upon his own free will.

The title "king" was applied also to dependent kings. In the NT it is used even for the head of a province (Rev 17 12). To distinguish him from the smaller and dependent kings, the king of Assyria bore the title "king of kings."

II. Kingdom.—The notable fact that Israel attained to the degree of a kingdom rather late, as compared with the other Sem nations, does not imply that Israel, before the establishment of the monarchy, had not arrived at the stage of constitutional government, or that the idea of a kingdom had no room in the original plan of the founder of the Heb nation. For a satisfactory explanation we must take cognizance of the unique place that Israel held among the Sem peoples.

It is universally recognized that Israel was a singular community. From the beginning of its existence as a nation it bore the character of a religious and moral community, a theocratic commonwealth, having Jeh Himself as the Head and Ruler. The theocracy is not to be mistaken for a hierarchy, nor can it strictly be identified with

1. Israel's Theocracy any existent form of political organization. It was rather something over and above, and therefore independent of the political organization. It did not supersede the tribal organization of Israel, but it supplied the centralizing power, constituting Israel a nation. In lieu of a strong political center, the unifying bond of a common allegiance to Jeh, i.e. the common faith in Him, the God of Israel, kept the tribes together. The consciousness that Jeh was Israel's king was deeply rooted, was a national feeling, and the inspiration of a true patriotism (Ex 15 18; 19 6; Jgs 5). Jeh's kingship is evinced by the laws He gave to Israel, by the fact that justice was administered in His name (Ex 22 28), and by His leading and aiding Israel in its wars (Ex 14 14; 15 3; Nu 21 14; 1 S 18 17; 25 28). This decentralized system which characterized the early government of Israel politically, in spite of some great disadvantages, proved advantageous for Israel on the whole and served a great providential purpose. It safeguarded the individual liberties and rights of the Israelites. When later the monarchy was established, they enjoyed a degree of local freedom and self-control that was unknown in the rest of the Sem world; there was home rule for every community, which admitted the untrammelled cultivation of their inherited religious and social institutions.

From the political point of view Israel, through the absence of a strong central government, was at a great disadvantage, making almost impossible its development into a world-empire. But this barrier to a policy of self-aggrandizement was a decided blessing from the viewpoint of Israel's providential mission to the world. It made possible the transmission of the pure religion intrusted to it, to later generations of men without destructive contamination from the ungodly forces with which Israel would inevitably have come into closer contact, had it not been for its self-contained character, resulting from the fashion of a state it was providentially molded into. Only as the small and insignificant nation that it was, could Israel perform its mission as "the depository and perpetuating agency of truths vital to the welfare of humanity." Thus its religion was the central authority of this nation, supplying the lack of a centralized government. Herein lay Israel's uniqueness and greatness, and also the secret of its strength as a nation, as long as the loyalty and devotion to Jeh lasted. Under the leadership of Moses and Joshua who, though they exercised a royal authority, acted merely as representatives of Jeh, the influence of religion of which these leaders were a personal embodiment was still so strong as to keep the tribes united for common action. But when, after the removal of these strong leaders, Israel no longer had a standing representative of Jeh, those changes took place which eventually necessitated the establishment of the monarchy.

In the absence of a special representative of Jeh, His will as Israel's King was divined by the use of the holy lot in the hand of the highest

2. Period of Judges priest. But the lot would not supply the place of a strong personal leader.

Besides, many of the Israelites came under the deteriorating influence of the Can. worship and began to adopt heathenish customs. The sense of religious unity weakened, the tribes became disunited and ceased to act in common, and as a result they were conquered by their foes. Jeh came to their assistance by sending them leaders, who released the regions where they lived from foreign attacks. But these leaders were not the strong religious personalities that Moses and Joshua had been; besides, they had no official authority, and their rule was only temporary and local. It was now that the need of a centralized political government was felt, and the only type of permanent organization of which the age was cognizant was the kingship. The crown was offered to Gideon, but he declined it, saying: "Jeh shall rule over you" (Jgs 8 22,23). The attempt of his son, Abimelech, to establish a kingship over Shechem and the adjacent country, after the Canaanitic fashion, was abortive.

The general political condition of this period is briefly and pertinently described by the oft-recurring statement in Jgs: "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

Not until the time of Samuel was a formal kingdom established over Israel. An attempt to ameliorate conditions by a union of civil

3. Establishment of the Monarchy and religious functions in the hands of Eli, the priest, had failed through the degeneracy of his sons. Similarly the hopes of Israel in a hereditary judgeship had been disappointed through the corruption of the sons of Samuel. The Philis were threatening the independence and hope of Israel. Its very existence as a distinct race, and consequently the future of Jeh's religion, imperatively demanded a king. Considering that it was the moral decline of the nation that had created the necessity for a monarchy, and moreover that the people's desire for a king originated from a purely national and not from a religious motive, the unwillingness of Samuel, at first, to comply with the demand for a king is not surprising. Even Jeh declared: "They have not rejected thee but they have rejected me," etc. Instead of recognizing that they themselves were responsible for the failures of the past, they blamed the form of government they had, and put all their hopes upon a king. That it was not the monarchy as such that was objectionable to Jeh and His prophet is evidenced by the fact that to the patriarchs the promise had been given: "Kings shall come out of thy loins" (Gen 17 6; 35 11). In view of this Moses had made provision for a kingship (Dt 17 14-20). According to the Mosaic charter for the kingship, the monarchy when established must be brought into consonance with the fact that Jeh was Israel's king. Of this fact Israel had lost sight when it requested a kingship like that of the neighboring peoples. Samuel's gloomy prognostications were perfectly justified in view of such a kingship as they desired, which would inevitably tend to selfish despotism (1 S 8 11 f). Therefore God directs Samuel to give them a king—since the introduction of a kingship typifying the kingship of Christ lay within the plan of His economy—not according to their desire, but in accordance with the instructions of the law concerning kings (Dt 17 14-20), in order to safeguard their liberties and prevent the forfeiture of their mission.

According to the Law of Moses Jeh was to choose the king of Israel, who was to be His representative.

The choice of Jeh in the case of Saul is implied by the anointing of Saul by Samuel and through the confirmation of this choice by the holy lot (1 S 10 1-20). This method of choosing the king did not exclude the people altogether, since Saul was publicly presented to them, and acknowledged as king (1 S 10 24). The participation of the people in the choice of their king is more pronounced in the case of David, who, having been designated as Jeh's choice by being anointed by Samuel, was anointed again by the elders of Israel before he actually became king (2 S 2 4).

The anointing itself signified the consecration to an office in the theocracy. The custom of anointing kings was an old one, and by no means peculiar to Israel (Jgs 9 8.15). The hereditary kingship began with David. Usually the firstborn succeeded to the throne, but not necessarily. The king might choose as his successor from among his sons the one whom he thought best qualified.

The king of Israel was not a constitutional monarch in the modern sense, nor was he an autocrat in the oriental sense. He was

5. Authority of the King responsible to Jeh, who had chosen him and whose vicegerent and servant he was. Furthermore, his authority was more or less limited on the religious side by the prophets, the representatives of Jeh, and in the political sphere by the "elders," the representatives of the people, though as king he stood above all. Rightly conceived, his kingship in relation to Jeh, who was Israel's true king, implied that he was Jeh's servant and His earthly substitute. In relation to his subjects his kingship demanded of him, according to the Law, "that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren" (Dt 17 20).

In a summary way the king was held responsible for all Israel as the Lord's people. His main duty was to defend it against its enemies, and for this reason it devolved upon 6. Duties of the King him to raise and maintain a standing army; and it was expected of him that he be its leader in case of war (1 S 8 20). In respect to the judiciary the king was a kind of supreme court, or court of final appeal, and as such, as in the days of Solomon, might be approached by his most humble subjects (2 S 15 2; 1 K 3 16 ff). Legislative functions he had none and was himself under the law (1 K 21 4; Dt 17 19). The king was also in a way the summus episcopus in Israel. His very kingship was of an entirely religious character and implied a unity of the heavenly and earthly rule over Israel through him who as Jeh's substitute sat "upon the throne of the kingdom of Jeh over Israel" (1 Ch 17 14; 28 5; 29 23), who was "Jeh's anointed" (1 S 24 10; 26 9; 2 S 1 14), and also bore the title of "son of Jeh" and "the first-born," the same as Israel did (Ex 4 22; Hos 11 1; 2 S 7 14; Ps 89 27; 2 7). Thus a place of honor was assigned to the king in the temple (2 K 11 4; 23 3; Ezk 46 1.2); besides, he officiated at the national sacrifices (esp. mentioned of David and Solomon). He prayed for his people and blessed them in the name of Jeh (2 S 6 18; 24 25; 1 K 3 4.8; 8 14.55.62; 9 25). Apparently it was the king's right to appoint and dismiss the chief priests at the sanctuaries, though in his choice he was doubtless restricted to the Aaronites (1 Ch 16 37.39; 2 S 8 17; 1 K 2 27.35). The priesthood was under the king's supervision to such an extent that he might concern himself about its organization and duties (1 Ch 15 16.23.24; 16 4-6), and that he was responsible for the purity of the cult and the maintenance of the order of worship. In general he was to watch over the religious life and conduct of his people, to eradicate the high places and every form of idolatry in the land (2 K 18 4). Ezk 45 22 demands of the prince that he shall provide at the Passover a bullock for a sin offering for all the people.

The marks of royal dignity, besides the beautiful robes in which the king was attired (1 K 22 10), were: (1) the diadem (כִּנֹּר, nēzer) and the crown (קִטְרֹן, qīṭrāh, 2 S 1 10; 2 K 11 12; 2 S 12 30), the headtire; (2) the scepter (שֵׁבֶט, shēḇet), originally a long, straight staff, the primitive sign of dominion and authority (Gen 49 10; Nu 24 17; Isa 14 5; Jer 48 17; Ps 2 9; 45 7). Saul had a spear (1 S 18 10; 22 6); (3) the throne (כִּסֵּי, kissē, 1 K 10 18-20), the symbol of majesty. Israel's kings also had a palace (1 K 7 1-12; 22 39; Jer 22 14), a royal harem (2 S 16 21), and a body-guard (2 S 8 18; 15 18).

(1) Income.—(a) According to the custom of the times presents were expected of the subjects (1 S 10 27; 16 20) and of foreigners (2 S 8 2; 1 K 5 1 ff; 10 25; 2 Ch 32 23), and these often took the form of an annual tribute. (b) In time of war the king would lay claim to his share of the booty (2 S 8 11; 12 30; 1 Ch 26 27). (c) Various forms of taxes were in vogue, as a part of the produce of the land (1 K 9 11; 1 S 17 25), forced labor of the Canaanites (1 K 9 20; 2 Ch 2 16) and also of the Israelites (1 K 5 13; 11 28; 12 4), the first growth of the pasture lands (Am 7 1), toll collected from caravans (1 K 10 15). (d) Subdued nations had to pay a heavy tribute (2 K 3 4). (e) The royal domain often comprised extensive possessions (1 Ch 27 25-31).

(2) The royal court.—The highest office was that of the princes (1 K 4 2), who were the king's advisers or counsellors. In 2 K 25 19 and Jer 52 25 they are called "they that saw the king's face" (cf also 1 K 12 6, "stood before Solomon"). The following officers of King David are mentioned: the captain of the host (commander-in-chief), the captain of the Cherethites and the Pelethites (body-guard), the recorder (chronicler and reminder), the scribe (secretary of state), the overseer of the forced labor, the chief ministers or priests (confidants of the king, usually selected from the royal family) (2 S 8 16-18; 20 23-26).

During the reign of Solomon other officers were added as follows: the overseer over the twelve men "who provided victuals for the king and his household" (1 K 4 5.7), the officer over the household (1 K 4 6; 18 3) (steward, the head of the palace who had "the key" in his possession, Isa 22 22); the king's friend (1 K 4 5; 1 Ch 27 33) is probably the same as the king's servant mentioned among the high officials in 2 K 22 12. It is not stated what his duties were. Minor officials are servants, cupbearer (1 K 10 5), keeper of the wardrobe (2 K 22 14; 10 22), eunuchs (chamberlains, not mentioned before the division of the kingdom) (1 K 22 9; 2 K 8 6).

No higher conceptions of a good king have ever been given to the world than those which are presented in the representations of king-

9. Short Character Sketch of Israel's Kingdom ship in the OT, both actual and ideal. Though Samuel's characterization of the kingship was borne out in the example of a great number of kings of Israel, the Divine ideal of a true king came as near to its realization in the case of one king of Israel, at least, as possibly nowhere else, viz. in the case of David. Therefore King David appears as the type of that king in whom the Divine ideal of a Jeh-king was to find its perfect realization; toward whose reign the kingship in Israel tended. The history of the kingship in Israel after David is, indeed, characterized by that desire for political aggrandizement which had prompted the establishment of the monarchy, which was contrary to Israel's Divine mission as the peculiar people of the Jeh-king. When Israel's kingdom terminated in the Bab exile, it became evident that the continued existence of the nation was possible even without a monarchical form of government. Though a kingdom was established again under the Maccabees, as a result of the attempt of Antiochus to extinguish Israel's religion, this kingdom was neither as perfectly national nor as truly religious in its character as the Davidic. It soon became dependent on Rome. The kingship of Herod was entirely alien to the true Israelitish conception.

It remains to be said only that the final attempt of Israel in its revolt against the Rom Empire, to establish the old monarchy, resulted in its downfall as a nation, because it would not learn the lesson that the future of a nation does not depend upon political greatness, but upon the fulfilment of its Divine mission.

I. The Reality of Christ's Kingship.—There can be no question but that Christ is set before us in Scripture as a king. The very title Christ or "Messiah" suggests kingship, for though the priest is spoken of as "anointed," and full elucidation of the title as applied to Jesus must take account of His threefold office of prophet, priest and king, yet generally in the OT it is the king to whom the epithet is applied.

We may briefly note some of the OT predictions of Christ as king. The first prediction which represents the Christ as having dominion is that of Jacob concerning the tribe of Judah:

1. The OT Fore-shadowings "Until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the obedience of the peoples be" (Gen 49 10); then kingly dignity and dominion are suggested by the star and scepter in Balaam's prophecy (Nu 24 15-17). As yet, however, Israel has no king but God, but when afterward a king is given and the people become familiar with the idea, the prophecies all more or less have a regal tint, and the coming one is preëminently the coming king.

In the Ps and Prophets.—We can only indicate a few of the many royal predictions, but these will readily suggest others. In Ps 2 the voice of Jeh is heard above all the tumult of earth, declaring, "Yet I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." So in Pss 24, 45, 72, 89 and 110 we have special foreshadowings of the Messianic king. "The babe that Isaiah sees born of a virgin is also the 'Prince of Peace' (Isa 9 6, 7), of the increase of whose government there shall be no end, and as the prophet gazes on him he joyfully exclaims: 'Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness' (Isa 32 1). Jeremiah, the prophet of woe, catches bright glimpses of his coming Lord, and with rapture intensified by the surrounding sorrow cries: 'Behold, the days come, saith Jeh, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and he shall reign as king and deal wisely, and shall execute justice and righteousness in the land' (23 5). Ezekiel, dwelling amid his wheels, sees in the course of Providence many revolutions, but they are all to bring about the dominion of Christ: 'I will overturn, overturn, overturn . . . until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him' (21 27). Daniel sees the rise and progress, the decline and fall of many mighty empires, but beyond all he sees the Son of man inheriting an everlasting kingdom (7 13). Hosea sees the repentant people of Israel in the latter days seeking Jeh their God, and David (the greater David) their king (3 5). Micah sees the everlasting Ruler coming out of Bethlehem clad in the strength and majesty of Jeh, who shall "be great unto the ends of the earth" (5 4). Zechariah, exulting in His near approach, cries: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerus: behold, thy king cometh unto thee" (9 9), and he follows His varied course through gloom and through glory, until the strong conviction is born in his heart and expressed in the glowing words: "Jeh shall be King over all the earth" (14 9). The more extreme higher critics would, of course, deny that these are direct predictions of Jesus Christ, but most, if not all, would admit that they are ideal representations which were only fully realized in Jesus of Nazareth.

The Gospels present Christ as king. Mt, tracing His genealogy, gives special prominence to His royal lineage as son of David. He would be a "governor," and would rule, "be shepherd of my people Israel" (2 5, 6). Lk's account of the Nativity contains the angel's declaration that the child to be born and named Jesus would occupy the throne of David and reign over the house of Jacob forever (1 32, 33). In John's account of the beginning of Christ's ministry, one of His early disciples, Nathanael, hails Him as "King of Israel" (1 49), and Jesus does not repudiate the title. If Mark has no such definite word, he nevertheless describes the message with which Jesus opens His ministry as the "gospel" of "the kingdom of God" (1 14, 15). The people nurtured in the prophetic teaching expect the coming one to be a king, and when Jesus seems to answer to their ideal of the Messiah, they propose taking Him by force and making Him king (Jn 6 15).

2. The Gospel Presentation tells of the visit of the Magi who inquire for the newborn king of the Jews, and the scribes answer Herod's question by showing from Micah's prophecy that the Christ to be born in Bethlehem

(1) Christ's claim to be king.—Christ Himself claimed to be king. In claiming to be the Messiah He tacitly claimed kingship, but there are specific indications of the claim besides. In all His teaching of the kingdom it is implied, for though He usually calls it the "kingdom of God" or "of heaven," yet it is plain that He is the administrator of its affairs. He assumes to Himself the highest place in it. Admission into the kingdom or exclusion from it depends upon men's attitude toward Him. In His explanation of the parable of the Tares, He distinctly speaks of His kingdom, identifying it with the kingdom of God. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity. . . . Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Mt 13 41-43). He speaks of some seeing "the Son of man coming in his kingdom" (Mt 16 28), of the regeneration, "when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory" (Mt 19 28), of Himself under the guise of a nobleman who goes "into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom," and does receive it (Lk 19 12-15).

(2) Christ's acceptance of the title.—When the mother of John and James comes asking that her two sons may occupy the chief places of honor in His kingdom, He does not deny that He is a king and has a kingdom, while indicating that the places on His right and left hand are already determined by the appointment of the Father (Mt 20 21-23). He deliberately takes steps to fulfil the prediction of Zec: "Behold, thy king cometh," and He accepts, approves and justifies the hosannas and the homage of the multitude (Mt 21 1-16; Mk 11; Lk 19; Jn 12). In His great picture of the coming judgment (Mt 25), the Son of man sits upon the throne of His glory, and it is as "the king" that He blesses and condemns. The dying thief prays, "Remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom" (Lk 23 42), and Jesus gives His royal response which implies full acceptance of the position.

(3) Christ charged and condemned as king.—His claim throughout had been so definite that His enemies make this the basis of their charge against Him before Pilate, that He said that "he himself is Christ a king," and when Pilate asks, "Art thou the King?" He answers, "Thou sayest," which was equivalent to "yes" (Lk 23 23). In the fuller account of Jn, Jesus speaks to Pilate of "my kingdom," and says "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end have I been born" (Jn 18 37). His claim is perpetuated in the superscription of the cross in the three languages: "This is the King of the Jews," and although the priests wished it to be altered so as to detract from His claim, they yet affirm the fact of that claim when they say: "Write not, The King of the Jews; but, that he said, I am King of the Jews" (Jn 19 21). The curtain of His earthly life falls upon the king in seeming failure; the taunt of the multitude, "Let the Christ, the King of Israel, now come down from the cross" (Mk 15 32), meets with no response, and the title on the cross seems a solemn mockery, like the elaborate, cruel jest of the brutal soldiers clothing Him with purple, crowning Him with thorns and hailing Him King of the Jews.

(4) The witness of the resurrection and of apostolic preaching.—But the resurrection throws new light upon the scene, and fully vindicates His claims, and the sermon of Peter on the day of Pentecost proclaims the fact that the crucified one occupies the throne. "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly, that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified" (Acts 2 36). The early preaching of the apostles, as recorded in the Acts, emphasizes His lordship, His kingship; these men were preachers in the literal sense—heralds of the king.

(5) The testimony of the Epistles and Apocalypse.—We need not consider in detail the testimony of the Epp. The fact that Christ is king is everywhere implied and not infrequently asserted. He is "Lord of both the dead and the living" (Rom 14 9). He is risen "to rule over the Gentiles" (Rom 15 12). "He must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15 25). He is at the right hand of God "above all rule, and authority," etc (Eph 1 20-22). Evil men have no "inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God" (Eph 5 5), and believers are "translated into the kingdom of the Son of his love" (Col 1 13). He has been given the name that is above every name "that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow," etc (Phil 2 9-11). Those who suffer with Christ are to "reign with him" (2 Tim 2 12), at "his appearing and his kingdom" (2 Tim 4 1), and He will save them "unto his heavenly kingdom" (2 Tim 4 18); "the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1 11). Of the Son it is said: "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (He 1 8), and He is a King-Priest "after the order of Melchizedek" (He 7 17). In the Apocalypse, appropriately, the predominant aspect of Christ is that of a king. He is the "ruler of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1 5), "King of the ages" (Rev 15 3), "King of kings" (17 14; 19 16), "and he shall reign for ever and ever" (11 15). The reality of Christ's kingship is thus placed beyond all doubt.

II. Christ's Title to Kingship.—After the analogy of earthly kingdoms it might be said that Jesus Christ is a king by birth. He was

1. By Birth born a king. His mother, like His reputed father, "was of the house and family of David" (Lk 2 4). The angel in announcing His birth declares that He will occupy the throne of His father David. The Pharisees have no hesitation in affirming that the Christ would be Son of David (Mt 22 45; Mk 12 35; Lk 20 41). Frequently in life He was hailed as "Son of David," and after His ascension, Peter declares that the promise God had made to David that "of the fruit of his loins he would set one upon his throne" (Acts 2 30) was fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; while Paul declares that the gospel of God was "concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rom 1 3). So that on the human side He had the title to kingship as son of David, while on the Divine side as Son of God He had also the right to the throne.

David was king by Divine choice and appointment, and this was the ideal in the case of his successors. The figment of "Divine right"—by virtue of which modern kings have claimed to rule—was, in the first instance, a reminiscence of the Bib. ideal. But the ideal is realized in Christ. Of the coming Messianic King, Jeh said: "Yet I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion" (Ps 2 6), and the great proclamation of Pentecost was an echo of that decree: "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly, that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified" (Acts 2 36), while the apostle declares that "God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name" (Phil 2 9), and again and again the great OT word of Jeh is applied to Christ: "Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet" (He 1 13).

Often in the olden times kingship was acquired by conquest, by superior prowess. According to one etymology of our word "king," it means the "able man," "the one who can," and everyone remembers Carlyle's fine passage thereon. In the highest sense, this is true of Christ, who establishes His sway over men's hearts by His matchless prowess, the power of His infinite love and the charm of His perfect character.

Except in the most autocratic form of kingship, some place has been given to the suffrage of the people, and the other phases of the title have been confirmed and ratified by the voice of the people as they cry, "God save the king!" and no king is well established on the throne if he is not supported by the free homage of his subjects. Christ as king wins the love of His people, and they gladly acknowledge His sway. They are of one heart to make Him king.

III. The Nature of Christ's Kingship.—We know that the Jews expected a material kingdom, marked by earthly pomp and state; a kingdom on the lines of the Davidic or Solomonic kingdom, and others since have made the same mistake.

The Scriptures plainly declare, Christ Himself clearly taught, that His kingship was spiritual.

"My kingdom," said He, "is not of this world" (Jn 18 36), and all the representations given of it are all consistent with this declaration. Some have emphasized the preposition ek here, as if that made a difference in the conception: "My kingdom is not of this world." Granted that the preposition indicates origin, it still leaves the statement an assertion of the spirituality of the kingdom, for if it is not from this kosmos, from this earthly state of things, it must be from the other world—not the earthly but the heavenly; not the material but the spiritual. The whole context shows that origin here includes character, for Christ adds, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews." Because it is of an unworldly origin, it is not to be propagated by worldly means, and the non-use of worldly means declares it to be of an unworldly character. So that to assert that Christ means that His kingdom was not to arise out of this world, but to come down from heaven, is not at all to deny, but rather, indeed, to declare its essential spirituality, its unworldliness, its otherworldliness.

Throughout the NT, spirituality appears as the prevailing characteristic of Christ's reign. Earthly kingdoms are based upon material power, the power of the sword, the power of wealth, etc, but the basal factor of Christ's kingdom is righteousness (Mt 5 20; 6 33; Rom 14 17; He 1 8, etc). The ruling principle in earthly kingdoms is selfish or sectional or national aggrandizement; in the kingdom of Christ it is truth. Christ is king of truth. "Art thou a king then?" said Pilate. "I am," said Christ (for that is the force of "thou sayest that I am a king"). "To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth," and He adds, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice" (Jn 18 37). Elsewhere He says: "I am the . . . truth" (Jn 14 6), and at the head of the armies of heaven He still wears the title "Faithful and True" (Rev 19 11); but if righteousness and truth occupy such a prominent place in His kingdom, it follows that it must be distinguished by its spirituality. His immediate subjects are spiritual men and women; its laws are spiritual; its work is spiritual; all the forces emanating from it, operating through it, centering in it, are spiritual.

The Jewish idea of the Messiah's reign was a narrow national one. For them it meant the glorification of the sons of Abraham, the

2. Universal supremacy of Judaism over all forms of faith and all systems of philosophy; the subjection to Jewish sway of the haughty Roman, the cultured Greek and the rude barbarian. The Messiah was to be a greater king than David or Solomon, but still a king after the same sort; much as the limits of the kingdom might extend, it would be but an extension on Jewish lines; others might be admitted to a share in its privileges, but they would have to become naturalized Jews, or occupy a very subordinate place. The prophetic ideal, however, was a universal kingdom, and that was the conception indorsed and emphasized by Christ. (For the prophetic ideal such passages may be noted as Pss 2, 22, 72; Isa 11 10; Dnl 7 13, 14, etc.) Of course, the predictions have a Jewish coloring, and people who did not apprehend the spirituality might well construe this amiss; but, closely examined, it will be found that the prophets indicate that men's position in the coming kingdom is to be determined by their relation to the king, and in that we get the preparation for the full NT ideal. The note of universality is very marked in the teaching of Christ. All barriers are to be broken down, and Jews and Gentiles are to share alike in the privileges of the new order. "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 8 11), and stranger still to the Jewish ear: "The sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12). In the parables of the kingdom (Mt 13), the field, in which is sown the good seed of the kingdom, is the world, and the various other figures give the same idea of unlimited extent. The same thought is suggested by the declaration, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold" (Jn 10 16), also by the confident affirmation: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself" (Jn 12 32), and so with many other statements of the Gospels.

The terms of the commission are enough to show

the universal sovereignty which Christ claims over men: "Go ye therefore," He says, as possessing all authority in heaven and on earth, "and make disciples of all the nations" (Mt 28 19), coupled with the royal assurance, "Ye shall be my witnesses . . . unto the uttermost part of the earth" (Acts 1 8). The Book of Acts shows, in the carrying out of the commission, the actual widening of the borders of Christ's kingdom to include believers of all nations. Peter is taught, and announces clearly, the great truth that Gentiles are to be received upon the same terms as the Jews. But through Paul as the apostle of the Gentiles this glorious truth is most fully and jubilantly made known. In the dogmatic teaching of his Ep. he shows that all barriers are broken down, the middle wall of the fence between Jew and Gentile no longer exists. Those who were aliens and strangers are now made nigh in Christ, and "are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Eph 2 19). That household, that commonwealth, is, in Pauline language, equivalent to the kingdom, and in the same Ep. he describes the same privileged position as being an "inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God" (5 5). The Saviour's kingdom cannot be bounded by earthly limits, and all attempts to map it out according to human rules imply a failure to recognize the true Scriptural idea of its universality.

(1) Kingdom of grace.—Most of what we have said applies to that phase of Christ's kingdom which is generally called his kingdom of grace; there is another phase called the kingdom of power. Christ is in a special sense king in Zion, king in His church—that is universal in conception and destined to be so in reality—but He is also king of the universe. He is "head over all things"; Eph 1 22; Col 1 18, and other passages clearly intimate this. He rules over all. He does so not simply as God, but as God-man, as mediator. It is as mediator that He has the name above every name; it is as mediator that He sits upon the throne of universal power.

(2) Kingdom of glory.—There is also the phase of the kingdom of glory. Christ's reign now is truly glorious. The essential spirituality of it implies its glory, for as the spiritual far surpasses the material in value, so the glory of the spiritual far transcends the glory of the material. The glory of worldly pomp, of physical force, of human prowess or genius, must ever pale before the glory of righteousness, truth, spirituality. But Christ's kingdom is glorious in another sense; it is a heavenly kingdom. It is the kingdom of grace into which saved sinners now enter, but it is also the kingdom of heavenly glory, and in it the glorified saints have a place. Entrance into the kingdom of grace in this earthly state secures entrance into the kingdom of glory. Rightly does the church confess: "Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ." The kingdom is yet to assume an externally glorious form. That is connected with the appearing of Christ (2 Tim 4 1), the glory that shall be revealed, the heavenly kingdom. The kingdom in that stage cannot be entered by flesh and blood (1 Cor 15 50), man in his mortality—but the resurrection change will give the fitness, when in the fullest sense the kingdom of this world shall have "become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ" (Rev 11 15).

It would be easy to multiply quotations in proof of this. The great passage in Dnl 7 emphatically declares it. The echo of this is heard in

3. Eternal the angel's announcement: "He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Lk 1 33). The reign of 1,000 years which so greatly occupies the thoughts of so many brethren, whatever we may decide as to its nature, is but an episode in the reign of Christ. He is reigning now, He shall reign forever. Rev 11 15, above quoted, is often cited as applying to the millennium, but it goes on to say "and he shall reign [not for 1,000 years simply, but] for ever and ever." So, many of the glowing predictions of the OT, which are often assigned to the millennium, indicate no limit, but deal with the enduring and eternal.

The difficult passage in 1 Cor 15 24-28 must be interpreted in the light of those declarations concerning the eternity of Christ's reign. It is evidently as mediator that He delivers up the kingdom to the Father. The dispensation of mediator comes to an end. All has been done according to the purpose of redemption. All the ransomed are finally gathered home. He sees of the travail of His soul and is satisfied. Obdurate enemies are subdued. God's glory has been fully vindicated. The Son becoming subject to the Father, God governs directly and is all in all. But the Son in some sense still reigns and through Him God's glory will ever shine, while the kingdom eternally rests upon redemption.

We may summarize by saying that Christ is king of truth, king of salvation (Mt 21 5; Zec 9 9); king of grace; king of peace (Lk 19 38; He 7 2); king of righteousness (He 1 8; 7 2); king of glory (Mt 25 31-34); king eternal; king of saints, king of the ages; king of kings (Rev 19 16). "Upon his head are many diadems" (Rev 19 12). See also CHRIST, OFFICES OF. ARCHIBALD M'CAIG

The "kingdom of God" is one of the most remarkable ideas and phrases of all time, having begun to be used very near the beginnings of history and continuing in force down to the present day.

I. Meaning and Origin of the Term.—Its use by Jesus is by far its most interesting aspect; for, in the Synoptists, at least, it is His

1. Place in watchword, or a comprehensive term the Gospels for the whole of His teaching. Of this the ordinary reader of Scripture may hardly be aware, but it becomes evident and significant to the student. Thus, in Mt 4 23, the commencement of the ministry is described in these words, "And Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people"; and, somewhat later, in Lk 8 1, the expansion of His activity is described in the following terms, "And it came to pass soon afterwards, that he went about through cities and villages, preaching and bringing the good tidings of the kingdom of God, and with him the twelve." When the Twelve are sent forth by themselves, the purpose of their mission is, in Lk 9 2, given in these words, "And he sent them forth to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick." In Mt 13 11, the parables, which formed so large and prominent a portion of His teaching, are denominated collectively "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven"; and it will be remembered how many of these commence with the phrase, "The kingdom of heaven is like."

In these quotations, and in others which might easily be adduced, it will be observed that the phrases "the kingdom," "the kingdom of God," "the kingdom of heaven" are used interchangeably. The last of the three, "the kingdom of heaven," is confined to the First Gospel, which does not, however, always make use of it; and it is not certain what may have been the reason for the substitution. The simplest explanation would be that heaven is a name for God, as, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, the penitent says, "I have sinned against heaven," and we ourselves might say, "Heaven forbid!" It is not, however, improbable that the true meaning has to be learned from two petitions of the Lord's Prayer, the one of which is epexegetic of the other, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven."

Here the disciples are instructed to pray that the kingdom of God may come, but this is equivalent to the petition that the will of God may be done on earth; Jesus is, however, aware of a region in the universe where the will of God is at present being perfectly and universally done, and, for reasons not difficult to surmise, He elevates thither the minds and hearts of those who pray. The kingdom of heaven would thus be so entitled because it is already realized there, and is, through prayer and effort, to be transferred thence to this earth.

Although, however, the phrase held this master-position in the teaching of Jesus, it was not of His invention. It was employed before Him by John the Baptist, of whom we read, in Mt 3 1 f, "And in those days cometh John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judaea, saying, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Indeed, the phrase is far older; for, on glancing toward the OT, we come at once, in Dnl 2 44, to a passage where the young prophet, explaining to the monarch the image of gold, silver, iron and clay, which, in his dream, he had seen shattered by "a stone cut out without hands," interprets it as a succession of world-kingsdoms, destined to be destroyed by "a kingdom of God," which shall last forever; and, in his famous vision of the "son of man" in 7 14, it is said, "There was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

These passages in Dnl form undoubtedly the proximate source of the phrase; yet the idea which it represents mounts far higher. From the first the Jewish state was governed by laws believed to be derived directly from heaven; and, when the people demanded a king, that they might be like other nations, they were reproached for desiring any king but God Himself. With this sublime conception the actual monarchy was only a compromise, the reigning monarch passing for Jeh's representative on earth. In David, the man after God's own heart, the compromise was not unsatisfactory; in Solomon it was still tolerable; but in the majority of the kings of both Judah and Israel it was a dismal and disastrous failure. No wonder that the pious sighed and prayed that Jeh might take to Himself His great power and reign, or that the prophets predicted the coming of a ruler who would be far nearer to God than the actual kings and of whose reign there would be no end. Even when the political kingdom perished and the people were carried away into Babylon, the intelligent and truly religious among them did not cease to cherish the old hope, and the very aspect of the world-powers then and subsequently menacing them only widened their conceptions of what that kingdom must be which could overcome them all. The return from Babylon seemed a miraculous confirmation of their faith, and it looked as if the day long prayed for were about to dawn. Alas, it proved a day of small things. The era of the Maccabees was only a transitory gleam; in the person of Herod the Great a usurper occupied the throne; and the eagles of the Romans were hovering on the horizon. Still Messianic hopes flourished, and Messianic language filled the mouths of the people.

II. Its Use by Jesus—Contrast with Jewish Conceptions.—Schürer, in his History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ

1. Current Jewish Opinions (II, 11, 126 ff), has drawn up a kind of Messianic creed, in no fewer than eleven articles, which he believes was extensively diffused at this period.

The Sadducees, indeed, had no participation in these dreams, as they would have called them, being absorbed in money-making and courtiership; but the Pharisees cherished them, and the Zealots received their name from the ardor with which they embraced them. The true custodians, however, of these conceptions were the Prosdechomenoi, as they have been called, from what is said of them in the NT, that they "waited for the kingdom of God." To this class belonged such men as Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea (Lk 23 51), but it is in the beginning of the Gospel of Lk that we are introduced to its most numerous representatives, in the groups surrounding the infant Baptist and the infant Saviour (Lk 2 25, 38); and the truest and amplest expression of their sentiments must be sought in the inspired hymns which rose from them on this occasion. The center of their aspirations, as there depicted, is a kingdom of God—not, however, of worldly splendor and force, but of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; beginning in humility, and passing to exaltation only through the dark valley of contrition.

Such was the circle in which both the Baptist and Jesus were reared, and it was out of this atmosphere that the conception of the kingdom of God came into their minds. 2. Relation of Jesus to Same It has frequently been said that, in making use of this term, Jesus accommodated Himself to the opinions and language of His fellow-countrymen; and there is truth in this, because, in order to secure a footing on the solid earth of history, He had to connect His own activity with the world in which He found Himself. Yet the idea was native to His home and His race, and therefore to Himself; and it is not improbable that He may at first have been unaware of the wide difference between His own thoughts on the subject and those of His contemporaries.

When, however, He began, in the course of His ministry, to speak of the kingdom of God, it soon became manifest that by Him and by His contemporaries it was used in different senses; and this contrast went on increasing until there was a great gulf fixed between Him and them. The difference cannot better be expressed than by saying, as is done by B. Weiss, that He

3. Growing Divergence and Contrast and they laid the accent on different halves of the phrase, they emphasizing "the kingdom" and He "of God." They were thinking of the expulsion of the Romans, of a Jewish king and court, and of a world-wide dominion going forth from Mt. Zion; He was thinking of righteousness, holiness and peace, of the doing of the will of God on earth as it is done in heaven. So earthly and fantastic were the expectations of the Jewish multitude that He had to escape from their hands when they tried to take Him by force and make Him a king. The authorities never acknowledged the pretensions of One who seemed to them a religious dreamer, and, as they clung to their own conceptions, they grew more and more bitter against One who was turning the most cherished hopes of a nation into ridicule, besides threatening to bring down on them the heavy hand of the Roman. And at last they settled the controversy between Him and them by nailing Him to a tree.

At one time Jesus had felt the glamor of the popular Messianic ideas, and at all times He must have been under temptation to accom-

4. Prophetic Character of the "Temptation" modate His own ideas to the prejudices of those on whose favor His success seemed to be dependent. The struggle of His mind and will with such solicitations is embodied in what is called the Temptation in the Wilderness (Mt 4 1-11). There He was tempted to accept the dominion of the world at the price of compromise with evil; to be a bread-king, giving panem et circenses; and to curry favor with the multitude by some display, like springing from the pinnacle of the temple. The incidents of this scene look like representative samples of a long experience; but they are placed before the commencement of His public activity in order to show that He had already overcome them; and throughout His ministry He may be said to have been continually declaring, as He did in so many words at its close, that His kingdom was not of this world.

It is very strange that, in spite of this, He should be believed, even by Christian scholars, to have held a purely futuristic and apocalyptic view of the kingdom Himself. He was all the time expecting, it is said, that the heavens would open and the kingdom descend from heaven to earth, a pure and perfect work of God. This is exactly what was expected by the Jewish multitude, as is stated in Lk 19 11; and it is precisely what the authorities believed Him to be anticipating. The controversy between Him and them was as to whether Jeh would intervene on His behalf or not; and, when no intervention took place, they believed they were justified in condemning Him. The premises being conceded, it is difficult to deny the force of their argument. If Jesus was all the time looking out for an appearance from heaven which never arrived, what better was He than a dreamer of the ghetto?

It was by Johannes Weiss that this hypothesis was started in recent times; and it has been worked out by Schweitzer as the final issue of modern speculation on the life of Christ (see his The Quest of the Historical Jesus). But in opposition to it can be quoted not a few sayings of Jesus which indicate that, in His view, the kingdom of God had already begun and was making progress during His earthly ministry, and that it was destined to make progress not by catastrophic and apocalyptic interference with the course of Providence, but, as the grain grows—first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear (Mk 4 26-29). Of such sayings the most remarkable is Lk 17 20f, "And being asked by the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God cometh, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, There! for lo, the kingdom of God is within you." "Observation," in this quotation, is an astronomical term, denoting exactly such a manifestation in the physical heavens as Jesus is assumed to have been looking for; so that He denies in so many words the expectation attributed to Him by those representatives of modern scholarship.

In the nature of the case the kingdom must have been growing from stage to stage during His earthly ministry. He Himself was there, 7. Positive embodying the kingdom in His person; Conceptions and the circle gathered around Him of Jesus partook of the blessings of the kingdom. This circle might have grown large enough to be coextensive with the country; and, therefore, Jesus retained the consciousness of being the Messiah, and offered Himself in this character to His fellow-countrymen by the triumphal entry into Jerus. But the citizens of the kingdom had to enter it one by one, not in a body, as the Jews were expecting. Strait was the gate; it was the narrow gate of repentance. Jesus began by repeating the initial word of the teaching of His forerunner; and He had too much reason to continue repeating it, as the hypocrisy and worldliness of Pharisees and Sadducees called for denunciation from His lips. To the frailties of the publicans and sinners, on the contrary, He showed a strange mildness; but this was because He knew the way of bringing such sinners to His feet to confess their sins themselves. To the penitent He granted pardon, claiming that the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins. Then followed the exposition of righteousness, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a perfect specimen. Yet it commences with another watchword—that of blessedness, the ingredients of which are set forth in all their comprehensiveness. In the same way, in other passages, He promises “rest,” “peace,” and the like; and again and again, where He might be expected to employ the term “kingdom of God,” He substitutes “life” or “eternal life.” Such were the blessings He had come into the world to bestow; and the most comprehensive designation for them all was “the kingdom of God.”

It is true, there was always imperfection attaching to the kingdom as realized in His lifetime, because He Himself was not yet made perfect. Steadily, from the commencement of the last stage of His career, He began to speak of His own dying and rising again. To those nearest Him such language was at the time a total mystery; but the day came when His apostles were able to speak of His death and ascension as the crown and glory of His whole career. When His life seemed to be plunging over the precipice, its course was so diverted by the providence of God that, by dying, He became the Redeemer of mankind and, by missing the throne of the Jews, attained to that of the universe, becoming King of kings and Lord of lords.

III. The Idea in History.—After the death of Jesus, there soon ensued the destruction of the Jewish state; and then Christianity went

1. Apostolic and Post-apostolic Age forth among the nations, where to have spoken of it as a kingdom of God would have unnecessarily provoked hostility and called forth the accusation of treason against the powers that be. Hence it made use of other names and let “the kingdom of God” drop. This had commenced even in Holy Scripture, where, in the later books, there is a growing infrequency in the use of the term. This may be alleged as proof that Jesus was being forgotten; but it may only prove that Christianity was then too much alive to be trammelled with words and phrases, even those of the Master, being able at every stage to find new language to express its new experience.

In the early Christian centuries, “the kingdom of God” was used to designate heaven itself, in which from the first the development of the kingdom was to issue; this, in fact, being not infrequently

2. Early Christian Centuries the meaning of the phrase even in the mouth of Jesus. The Alexandrian thinkers brought back the phrase to designate the rule of God in the conscience of men. St. Augustine's great work bears a title, De Civitate Dei, which is a tr of our phrase; and to him the kingdom of God was the church, while the world outside of the church was the kingdom of Satan. From the time of Charlemagne there were in the world, side by side, two powers, that of the emperor and that of the pope; and the history of the Middle Ages is the account of the conflict of these two for predominance, each pretending to struggle in the name of God. The approaching termination of this conflict may be seen in Wycliffe's great work De Dominio Divino, this title also being a tr of our phrase.

During the struggles of the Reformation the battles of the faith were fought out under other watchwords; and it was rather among such sectaries as the Baptists, that names like Fifth Monarchy and Rule of the Saints betrayed recollection of the evangetic phraseology; but how near, then and subsequently, the expression of men's thoughts about authority in church and state came to the language of the Gospels could easily be demonstrated, for example, from the Confessions and Books of Discipline of the Scottish church.

The very phrase, “the kingdom of God,” reappeared at the close of the Reformation period among the Pietists of Germany, who, as their multiplying benevolent and missionary activities overflowed the narrow boundaries of the church, as it was then understood, spoke of themselves as working for the kingdom of God, and found this more to their taste than working for the church. The vague and humanitarian aspirations of Rationalism sometimes assumed to themselves the same title; but it was by Ritschl and his followers that the phrase was brought back into the very heart of theology. In the system of Ritschl there are two poles—the love of God and the kingdom of God. The love of God enfolds within itself God's purpose for the world, to be realized in time; and this progressive realization is the kingdom of God. It fulfils itself esp. in the faithful discharge of the duties of everyone's daily vocation and in the recognition that in the course of Providence all things are working together for good to them that love God.

IV. Place in Theology.—There are those to whom it appears self-evident that what was the

1. Danger of Exaggeration leading phrase in the teaching of Jesus must always be the master-word in theology; while others think this to be a return from the spirit to the letter. Even Jesus, it may be claimed, had this phrase imposed upon Him quite as much as He chose it for Himself; and to impose it now on theology would be to entangle the movements of Christian thought with the ceremonies of the dead.

This is an interesting controversy, on both sides of which much might be said. But in the phrase “the kingdom of God” there are ele-

2. Elements of Living Power in Idea ments of living power which can never pass away. (1) It expresses the social side of Christianity. A kingdom implies multitude and variety, and though religion begins with the individual, it must aim at brotherhood, organization and expansion. (2) It expresses loyalty. However much kings and kingdoms may fail to touch the imagination in an age of the world when many countries have become or are becoming republican, the strength to conquer and to endure will always have to be derived from contact with personalities. God is the king of the kingdom of God, and the Son of God is His vicegerent; and without the love of God the Father and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ no progress can be made with the Christianization of the world. (3) It keeps alive the truth, suggested by Jesus in the Lord's Prayer, that the doing of the will of God on earth is the one thing needful. This is the true end of all authority in both church and state, and behind all efforts thus directed there is at work the potency of heaven. (4) It reminds all generations of men that their true home and destiny is heaven. In not a few of Our Lord's own sayings, as has been remarked, our phrase is obviously only a name for heaven; and, while His aim was that the kingdom should be established on earth, He always promised to those aiding in its establishment in this world that their efforts would be rewarded in the world to come. The constant recognition of a spiritual and eternal world is one of the unfailing marks of genuine Christianity.

KINGDOM OF JUDAH. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

KING'S DALE. See DALE, KING'S.

KING'S GARDEN (גַּן־הַמֶּלֶךְ, gan-ha-melekh): In Neh 3 15, mention is made of "the pool of Shelah by the king's garden"; in 2 K 25 4; Jer 52 7, "All the men of war fled by night by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden"; see also Jer 39 4. The "king's winepresses" (Zec 14 10), which must have been to the extreme S. of the city, were clearly in this neighborhood. The references all point to the one situation in Jerus where it is possible for gardens to flourish all the year round, namely, the part of the Kidron valley below the Tyropoeon which is watered by the overflow from the Pool of Siloam (see SILOAM). Here the vegetable gardens of the peasants of Siloam present an aspect of green freshness unknown elsewhere in Jerus.

KING'S MOTHER: The queen-dowager occupied a very important position at the court of the kings of Israel, e.g. Bathsheba (1 K 2 19); Maacah (15 13); Athaliah (2 Ch 22 2); and Nehushta (2 K 24 8; Jer 13 18). See QUEEN; QUEEN MOTHER.

KING'S POOL (בְּרִיקַת הַמֶּלֶךְ, berēkhath ha-melekh): This is possibly the Pool of Siloam (Neh 2 14), and may have been so named as being near to the "king's garden."

KING'S VALE (עֵמֶק־הַמֶּלֶךְ, 'emek ha-melekh; LXX in Gen reads to pedion ["the plain"] basileōs, in 2 S, hē koilās ["valley"] toū basileōs; AV King's Dale): The place where the king of Sodom met Abram (Gen 14 17), and the situation of Absalom's monument (2 S 18 18). It was identical with the Vale of Shaveh, and was evidently near Salem, the city of Melchizedek (Gen 14 17). If SALEM (q.v.) is Jerus, then Absalom's pillar was also near that city. Jos writes (Ant, VII, x, 3), "Absalom had erected for himself a marble pillar in the king's dale, two furlongs [stadia] from Jerus, which he named Absalom's Hand." In all probability this "pillar" was a rough upright stone—a maçṣēbhāh—but its site is lost. The traditional Gr-Egypt tomb of perhaps 100–200 years BC which has been hewn out of the rock on the eastern side of the Kidron valley is manifestly misnamed "Absalom's pillar," and the Kidron ravine (naḥal) cannot be the King's Vale ('emek). ### LITERATURE

I. Title.—The Heb title reads, מְלָכִים, ml'akhim, "kings," the division into books being based on the LXX where the Books of Kings are numbered 3d and 4th, the Books of Kingdoms (Basileiwn, Basileiōn), the Books of Samuel being numbered respectively 1st and 2d. The separation in the Heb into 2 Books of Kings dates to the rabbinic Bible of Daniel Bomberg (Venice, 1516–17), who adds in a footnote, "Here the non-Jews [i.e. Christians] begin the 4th Book of Kings." The Heb Canon treats the 2 Books of S as one book, and the 2 Books of K as one. Hence both AV and RV read incorrectly, "The First Book of Kings," even the use of the article being superfluous.

II. Scope.—The Books of K contain 47 chs (I, 22 chs; II, 25 chs), and cover the period from the conspiracy of Adonijah and the accession of Solomon (975 BC) to the liberation of Jehoiachin after the beginning of the Exile (561 BC). The subject-matter may be grouped under certain heads, as the last days of David (1 K 1—2 11); Solomon and his times (1 K 2 12—11 43); the Northern Kingdom to the coming of Assyria (1 K 12 16—2 K 17 41) (937–722 BC), including 9 dynastic changes; the Southern Kingdom to the coming of Babylon (1 K 12 1—2 K 25 21, the annals of the two kingdoms being given as || records until the fall of Israel) (937–586 BC), during which time but one dynasty, that of David, occupied the throne; the period of exile to 561 BC (2 K 25 22–30). A simpler outline, that of Driver, would be: (1) Solomon and his times (1 K 1–11); (2) Israel and Judah to the fall of Israel (1 K 12—2 K 17); Judah to the fall of Jerus (586 BC), and the captivity to the liberation of Jehoiachin (561 BC) (2 K 18–25).

"Above all, there are three features in the history, which, in the mind of the author, are of prime importance as shown by the prominence he gives them in his narrative. (1) The dynasty of David is invested with peculiar dignity. This had two aspects. It pointed back to the Divine election of the nation in the past, and gave the guaranty of indefinite national perpetuity in the future. The promise of 'the sure mercies of David' was a powerful untiring influence in the Exile. (2) The Temple and its service, for which the writer had such special regard, contributed greatly to the phase of national character of subsequent times. With all the drawbacks and defacements of pure worship here was the stated regular performance of sacred rites, the development and regulation of priestly order and ritual law, which stamped themselves so firmly on later Judaism. (3) Above all, this was the period of bloom of OT prophecy. Though more is said of men like Elijah and Elisha, who have left no written words, we must not forget the desires of preëxillean prophets, whose writings have come down to us—men who, against the opposition of rulers and the indifference of the people, testified to the moral foundation on which the nation was constituted, vindicated Divine righteousness, rebuked sin, and held up the ideal to which the nation was called.”—Robertson, Temple BD, 369 f.

III. Character of Books and Position in Hebrew Canon.—The Books of K contain much historical material, yet the historical is not their primary purpose. What in our Eng. Bibles pass for historical books are in the Heb Canon prophetic books, the Books of Josh, Jgs, 1 S, 2 S, 1 K and 2 K being classed as the “Earlier Prophets.”

The chief aim of these books is didactic, the imparting of great moral lessons backed up by well-known illustrations from the nation's

1. Purpose history and from the lives of its heroes and leaders. Accordingly, we have here a sort of historical archipelago, more continuous than in the Pent, yet requiring much bridging over and conjecture in the details.

The historical matter includes, in the case of the kings of Israel, the length of the reign and the death; in the case of the kings of

2. Character of Data Judah there are included also the age at the date of accession, the name of the mother, and mention of the burial.

The beginnings of the reigns in each case are dated from a point in the reign of the contemporary ruler, e.g. 1 K 15 1: “Now in the 18th year of king Jeroboam the son of Nebat began Abijam to reign over Judah.”

IV. Historical Value.—These books contain a large amount of authentic data, and, along with the

1. Treatment of Historical Data other books of this group which constitute a contemporaneous narrative, Josh, Jgs, 1 S, 2 S, must be accorded high rank among ancient documents.

To be sure the ethical and religious value is first and highest, nevertheless the historical facts must be reckoned at their true worth. Discrepancies and contradictions are to be explained by the subordination of historical details to the moral and religious purpose of the books, and to the diversity of sources whence these data are taken, that is, the compilers and editors of the Books of K as they now stand were working not for a consistent, continuous historical narrative, but for a great ethical and religious treatise. The historical material is only incidental and introduced by way of illustration and confirmation. For the oriental mind these historical examples rather than the rigor of modern logic constitute the unanswerable argument.

There cannot be as much said relative to the chronological value of the books. Thus, e.g., there is a question as to the date of the close of Ahaz' reign. According to 2 K 18 10, Samaria fell in the 6th year of Hezekiah's reign.

2. Chronology The kings who followed Hezekiah aggregate 110 years: 586+110+29 (Hezekiah, 2 K 18 2)=725. But in 2 K 18 13 we learn that Sennacherib's invasion came in the 14th year of Hezekiah's reign. Then 701+14=715. With this last agrees the account of Hezekiah's sickness (2 K 20). In explanation of 2 K 18 13, however, it is urged by some that the writer has subtracted the 15 years of 2 K 20 6 from the 29 years of Hezekiah's reign. Again, e.g. in 1 K 6 1, we learn that Solomon began to build the temple 480 years “after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt” (LXX here reads 440 years). This would make between Moses and David 12 generations of 40 years each. But counting the Exodus in the reign of Merenptah, 1225-1215 BC, and the beginning of the erection of the temple 975 BC, or after, we could not make out more than (1225-975) 250 years. Further, if the total length of reigns in Israel and Judah as recorded in the accounts of K be added for the two kingdoms, the two amounts do not agree. And, again, it is not certain whether in their annals the Hebrews predated or post-dated the reigns of their kings, i.e. whether the year of a king's death was counted his last year and the first year of his successor's reign, or whether the following year was counted the first year of the succeeding king (cf Curtis in HDB, I, 400, 1, f; Marti in EB, I, coll. 777 ff).

3. Value of Assyrian Records

The Babylonians and Assyrians were more skilled and more careful chronologists, and it is by reference to their accounts of the same or of contemporary events that a sure footing is found. Hence the value of such monuments as those of Shalmaneser IV and Sennacherib—and here mention should be made also of the Moabite Stone.

4. Plan The plan of the books is prevailingly chronological, although at times the material is arranged in groups (e.g. 2 K 2 1—8 15, the Elisha stories).

V. Composition.—The Books of K are of the nature of a compilation. The compiler has furnished a framework into which he has arranged the historical matter drawn from other sources. There are chronological data, citations of authorities, judgments on the character and deeds of the several rulers, and moral and religious teachings drawn from the attitude of the rulers in matters of religion, esp. toward heathen cults. The point of view is that of the prophets of the national party as one against foreign influence. “Both in point of view and in phraseology the compiler shows himself to be strongly influenced by Dt.” (The principal editor is styled RD, i.e. Deuteronomic Redactor.) The Deuteronomic law was the touchstone, and by his loyalty to, or apostasy from, that standard, each king stands approved or condemned. This influence also appears in passages where the editor takes liberties in the expansion and adaptation of material. There is marked recurrence of phrases occurring elsewhere chiefly or even wholly in Dt, or in books showing Deuteronomic influence (Bunney in HDB, II, 859 f). In 2 K 17 we have a test of the nation on the same standards; cf also 1 K 2 3 f; 9 1-9; 2 K 14 6; Dt 24 16.

In numerous instances the sources are indicated, as “the book of the acts of Solomon” (1 K 11 41), “the chronicles of the kings of Judah,”

2. Sources (1 K 14 29), “the chronicles of the kings of Israel” (1 K 15 31). A score or more of these sources are mentioned by title in the several books of the OT. Thus “the history of Samuel the seer,” “the history of Nathan the prophet,” “the history of Gad the seer” (1 Ch 29 29); “the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite,” “the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat” (2 Ch 9 29; cf 2 Ch 12 15; 13 22; 20 34; 32 32). Thus the “book of the kings of Israel” is mentioned 17 t (for all kings except Jehoram and Hoshea); the “book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah” is mentioned 15 t (for all except Ahaziah, Athaliah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin and Zedekiah). Whether the compiler had recourse to the archives themselves or to a work based on the archives is still a question.

Kent, Student's OT (II, chart, and pp. ix-xvi), gives the following scheme for showing the sources:

3. Kent's Scheme (1) Early stories about the Ark (c 950 BC or earlier), Saul stories and David stories (950-900 BC) were united (c 850 BC) to make early Judean Saul and David stories. With these last were combined (c 600 BC) popular Judean David stories (c 700 BC), later Ephraimite Samuel narratives (c 650 BC), and very late popular prophetic traditions (650-600 BC) in a first edition of the Books of S.

(2) Annals of Solomon (c 950 BC), early temple records (950-900 BC), were united (c 800 BC) with popular Solomon traditions (850-800 BC) in a “Book of the Acts of Solomon.” A Jeroboam history (900-850 BC), an Ahab history (c 800 BC), and a Jehu history (c 750 BC) were united with the annals of Israel (after 950 to c 700 BC) in the “Chronicles of the Kings of Israel” (700 or after). Early Ephraimite Elisha narratives (800-750 BC), influenced by a Samaria cycle of Elisha stories (750-700 BC) and a Gilgal cycle of Elisha stories (700-650 BC), were joined about 600 BC with the “Book of the Acts of Solomon” and the “Chronicles of the Kings of Israel” in a “first edition of the Books of Kings.”

(3) The first edition of S, the first edition of K and the following scheme for showing the sources:

(3) The first edition of S, the first edition of K and

Isa stories (before 550 BC) were united (c 550 BC) in a final revision of S and K.

(4) From "annals of Judah" (before 900 to 650 BC or after), temple records (before 850 to after 650 BC), and a Hezekiah history (c 650 BC), was drawn material for the "Chronicles of the kings of Judah" (c 600 BC).

(5) From this last work and the final revision of S and K was taken material for a "Midrash of the Book of the kings of Israel and Judah" (c 300 BC), and from this work, the final revision of S and K, and a possible temple history (after 400)—itself from the final revision of S and K—came the Books of Ch (c 250 BC).

The distinctions between the great documents of the Pent do not appear so clearly here. The summary, ("epitome") is the work of a Jewish redactor; the longer narratives (e.g. 1 K

4. J and E 17—2 K 8; 13 14—21) "are written in a bright and chaste Heb style, though some of them exhibit slight peculiarities of diction, due, doubtless (in part), to their North Israelitish origin" (E). The writers of these narratives are thought to have been prophets, in most cases from the Northern Kingdom.

VI. Date.—There are numerous data bearing on the date of K, and indications of different dates appear in the books. The closing verses bring down the history to the 37th year of the Captivity (2 K 25 27); yet the author, incorporating his materials, was apparently not careful to adjust the dates to his own time, as in 1 K 8 8; 12 19; 2 K 8 22; 16 6, which refer to conditions that passed away with the Exile. The work was probably composed before the fall of Jerus (586 BC), and was revised during or shortly after the Exile, and also supplemented by the addition of the account of the downfall of the Judean kingdom. There are traces of a post-exilic hand, as, e.g., the mention of "the cities of Samaria" (1 K 13 32), implying that Samaria was a province, which was not the case until after the Exile. The existence of altars over the land (1 K 19 10), and the sanctuary at Carmel, were illegal according to the Deuteronomic law, as also was the advice given to Elisha (2 K 3 19) to cut down the fruit trees in time of war (Dt 20 19).

KINGS' SEPULCHRES (2 Ch 21 20). See JERUSALEM, VIII.

KINSFOLK, kinz'fök. See KINDRED.

KINSMAN, kinz'man, KINSWOMAN, kinz'-wōm-an: Most frequently of the קִנְיָן, gō'el, the one who had a right to "redeem"; referring to the custom of avenging the blood of a slain kinsman; hence, a blood relative (Nu 5 8; Ruth 2 20; 3 9, 12; 4 1, 3, 6, 8, 14; cf "performing the part of a kinsman," Ruth 3 13); in Ruth 2 1, better rendered "acquaintance." Also קָרֹב, kārōb, one near, rendered "kinsman" (Ps 38 11); probably better, "neighbor." Once, קָרֵב, shē'ēr, "flesh kin," rendered "kinsman" (Nu 27 11; cf Lev 18 6; 25 49; 20 19; 21 2, rendered 'kin'). συγγενής, suggenēs, "of same race" (cf συγγένεια, suggéneia, "kindred"), used of blood relationship of varying degrees of nearness (Lk 14 12; Jn 18 26; Acts 10 24; Rom 9 3; 16 7, 11, 21). Rendered "kin" in Mk 6 4.

Kinswoman: שְׂרָא, shē'ēr, "kin by blood," or "by flesh" (cf above; also Lev 18 12 f; also cf 18 6, "near of kin" AV); also same root, fem. form, שְׂרָאָה, shā'ārāh (Lev 18 17), is tr'd "kinswoman." In Prov 7 4, "Call understanding thy kinswoman" might be more accurately rendered, "thy familiar friend," RVm (from מֹדְחָה, mōdha, "acquaintance"); cf similar rendering of mōdha'ath, under KINDRED. Lk 1 36 RV, "kinswoman" (συγγενίς, suggenís), AV "cousin" (suggenēs); same is rendered "kinsfolk" (1 58 RV). EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

KIR, kûr, kir (קִיר, kîr): The meaning of Kir is "inclosure" or "walled place," and it is therefore doubtful whether it is a place-name.

1. Meaning in the true sense of the word. In 2 K 16 9 it is mentioned as the place whither Tiglath-pileser IV carried the Syrian (Aramaean) captives which he deported from Damascus after he had taken that city. In Am 1 5 the prophet announces that the people of Syria (Aram) shall go into captivity unto Kir, and in 9 7 it is again referred to as the place whence the Lord had brought the Syrians (Aramacans) as Israel had been brought out of Egypt, and the Philis from Caphtor.

Except in one MS (LXX, A), where it appears as the Libyan Cyrene (2 K 16 9), it is never rendered in the LXX as a place-name.

2. How Thus the place whence the Syrians Rendered were brought (Am 9 7) is not Kir, in LXX but "the deep" or "the ditch" (LXX ἐκ βάθρου, ek bōthrou, "pit"), probably a tr of some variant rather than of the word "Kir" itself. Comparing the Assy-Bab kîru (for qîru), "wall," "inclosure," "interior," or the like, Kir might have the general meaning of a place parted off for the reception of exiled captives. Parallels would be Kîr Moab, "the inclosure of Moab," Kîr Heres or Kîr Hareseth, "the inclosure of brick" (LXX hoi lithoi tou toichou). It seems probable that there was more than one place to which the Assyrians transported captives or exiles, and if their practice was to place them as far as they could from their native land, one would expect, for Palestinian exiles, a site or sites on the eastern side of the Tigris and Euphrates.

In Isa 22 5 occurs the phrase, "a breaking down of the walls, and a crying to the mountains" (m'kar-kar kîr w'-shōa' el hā-hār—"a surrounding of the wall," etc, would be better),

3. An the mention of kîr and shōa' here Emendation of Isa 22:5 has caused Fried. Delitzsch to suggest that we have to read, instead of kîr, kōa', combined with shōa', as in Ezk 23 23. Following this, but retaining kîr, Cheyne translates "Kir undermineth, and Shoa' is at the mount," but others accept Delitzsch's emendation, Winckler conjecturing that the rendering should be "Who stirreth up Koa' and Shoa' against the mountain" (Alltest. Untersuchungen, 177). In the next verse (Isa 22 6) Kir is mentioned with Elam—a position which a city for western exiles would require.

The mention of Elam as taking the quiver, and Kir as uncovering the shield, apparently against "the valley of the vision" (in or close to Jerus), implies that soldiers from these two places, though one might expect them to be hostile to the Assyrians in general, were to be found in their armies, probably as mercenaries. See Fried. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 233; Schrader, COT, 425. T. G. PINCHES

KIR OF MOAB (קִיר מוֹאָב, kîr mō'ābh; LXX has τὸ τεῖχος, tō teichos, "the wall," "fortress"): The name, at least in this form, appears

1. Identifi- only once (Isa 15 1) as that of a city cation in Moab. It is named with Ar of Moab, with which possibly it may be identical, since 'ār or 'r is the Heb equivalent of the Moabite K̄ir. The Tg hence reads "Kerak in Moab." There can be no doubt that the Kerak here intended is represented by the modern town of that name, with which, consequently, Kir Moab is almost universally identified. It must always have been a place of importance. It is mentioned as Charakmōba (Χαρακμῶβα) in the Acts of the Council of Jerus (536 AD) and by the early geographers. It dominated the great caravan road connecting Syria with Egypt and Arabia. The Crusaders therefore directed attention to it, and held possession from 1167 till it fell again into the hands of the Moslems under Saladin, 1188. The Chroniclers speak of it as in el Belkā, and the chief city of Arabia Secunda. Under the title of Petra Deserti the Crusaders founded here a bishop's see. The Gr bishop of Petra still has his seat in Kerak.

Kerak stands upon a lofty spur projecting westward from the Moab plateau, with Wādy 'Ain Franjy on the S., and Wādy el-Kerak on the N., about 10 miles from the Dead Sea. The sides of the mountain sink sharply into these deep ravines, which unite immediately to the W., and, as Wādy el-Kerak, the great hollow runs northwestward to the sea. It is a position of great natural strength, being connected with the uplands to the E. only by a narrow neck. It is 3,370 ft. above the level of the sea. The mountains beyond the adjacent valleys are much higher. The place was surrounded by a strong wall, with five towers, which can still be traced in its whole length. The most northerly tower is well preserved. The most interesting building at Kerak is the huge castle on the southern side. It is separated from the adjoining hill on the right by a large artificial moat; and it is provided with a reservoir. A moat also skirts the northern side of the fortress, and on the E. the wall has a sloped or battered base. The castle is then separated from the town. The walls are very thick, and are well preserved. Beneath the castle is a chapel in which traces of frescoes are still visible. In days of ancient warfare the place must have been practically impregnable. It could be entered only by two roads passing through rock-cut tunnels. The main danger must always have been failure of water supply. There are springs immediately outside the city; but those alone would not be sufficient. Great cisterns were therefore constructed in the town and also in the castle. The half-nomadic inhabitants of Kerak today number some 1,140 families (Musil, Arabia Petraea, III, 97). The Gr church claims about 2,000 souls; the rest are Moslems. They are wild and fearless people, not greatly inclined to treat strangers with courtesy and kindness. In the spring of 1911 the town was the center of a rising against the government, which was not quelled until much blood had been shed.

KIRAMA, ki-rā'ma, kir'a-ma (Κίραμα, Kirama; AV Cirama): The people of K. returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esd 5 20); the "Ramah" of Ezr 2 26 (q.v.).

KIR-HARESETH, k̄ir-har'ē-seth, -ha-rē'seth (קִיר־הַרְסֶת, k̄ir-hāreseth, Isa 16 7; in 2 K 3 25 AV reads Kir-haraseth [pausal form]); KIR-HERES (קִיר־הֶרֶס, k̄ir heres, Jer 48 31.36; in Isa 16 11 AV reads Kir-harash [pausal form]): Modern scholars unanimously identify this city with Kir of Moab. In Jehoram's invasion of Moab it alone withstood his attack; and on the city wall the king of Moab sacrificed his son (2 K 3 25 ff.). It was obviously the capital, i.e. Kir Moab. The name is generally taken to mean "city of the sun." Cheyne, however, points out (EB, s.v.): (1) that this explanation was unknown to the ancients; (2) that "kir" is nowhere supposed to mean "city," except in the compound names Kir-heres, Kir-harseth, and Kir Moab; (3) that heres, "sun," nowhere has a fem. ending, and (4) that Isa 16 7 (LXX and Aq.) indicates d and not r in the second part of the name (Δέρεθ, Dēseth). He suggests, therefore, that we should possibly read קִרְיַת הַדְּהָשָׁה, kiryath hādhashāh, "new city." W. EWING

KIRIATH, kir'i-ath (קִרְיַת, kiryath, "city"; AV Kirjath): Mentioned (Josh 18 28) as a city of Benjamin; has been identified with Kuriel el 'Enab, "town of grapes," a prosperous town on the highroad between Jerus and Jaffa; it is sometimes spoken of by the inhabitants as Kuriel. It is, however, generally thought that Kiriath here stands for KIRIATH-JEARIM (q.v.). See PEF, III, 132, Sh XVII.

KIRIATHAIM, kir-i-a-thā'im (קִרְיַתַּיִם, kiryā-thayim, "two cities"; AV Kirjathaim):

(1) A city in the uplands of Moab formerly held by Sihon, and given by Moses to Reuben, who is said to have fortified it (Nu 32 37; Josh 13 19). It is named along with Elealeh and Nebo in the former passage, and with Sibmah in the latter. It was in the hands of Moab in Mesha's time, and he claims to have fortified it (MS, l. 10). For Jeremiah (48 1.23) and Ezekiel (25 9) it is a Moabite town. Onom identifies it with Coraitha, a Christian village 10 Rom miles W. of Madeba. This is the modern Karayāt, about 11 miles W. of Madeba, and 5 miles E. of Machaerus. This, however, may represent Kerieth, while the towns with which it is named would lead us to look for Kiriathaim to the N. of Wādy Zerka Ma'in. From this city was named Shaveh-kiriathaim, "the plain of Kiriathaim" (Gen 14 5).

(2) A city in the territory of Naphtali, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 76), corresponding to "Kartan" in Josh 21 32. W. EWING

KIRIATH-HUZOTH, kir-i-ath-hū'zoth, k.-hū'zōth (קִרְיַת הַצֹּת, kiryath huṣōth, "city of streets"; LXX reads πόλεις ἐπαύλεων, póleis epaúleōn, "city of villages," from which we may infer a reading ἡδέρωθ, hāḡērōth, for הַצֹּת, huṣōth; AV Kirjath-huzoth): A place to which, after their meeting, Balak and Balaam went together (Nu 22 39). They met at "the City of Moab" (ver 36), which is probably identical with KIR OF MOAB (q.v.); Kiriath-huzoth was probably therefore not far from that city. Some would identify it with Kiriathaim; some with Kerieth; as yet there is no certainty.

KIRIATH-JEARIM, kir-i-ath-jē'a-rim, k.-jē-ā'rim (קִרְיַת־יְעָרִים, kiryath-yē'ārīm, "city of thickets"; LXX ἡ πόλις Ἰαρεμ, hē pólīs Iareim; AV Kirjath-jearim): One of the four chief cities of the Gibeonites (Josh 9 17); a city of Judah (Josh 15 60), evidently an ancient Sem "high place," hence the name "Kiriath-Baal" (ib); it was one of the places on the border line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 18 14.15; 15 11 [where it is called "Baalath"]); cf 1 Ch 13 6). It is mentioned as in Judah (Josh 15 60; 18 14; Jgs 18 12), but if KIRIATH (q.v.) is identical with it, it is mentioned as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 28; in 2 S 6 2, Baale-judah).

Jgs 18 12 records that the men of Dan set forth out of Zorah and Eshtaol and encamped in Mahaneh-dan behind (W. of) Kiriath-jearim.

(In Jgs 13 25 Mahaneh-dan ["the camp of Dan"] is described as between Zorah and Eshtaol; see MAHANEH-DAN.) To this sanctuary the ark of Jeh was brought from Beth-shemesh by the people of Kiriath-jearim, and they "brought it into the house of Abinadab in the hill [m "Gibeah"], and sanctified Eleazar his son to keep the ark of Jeh" (1 S 7 1). Here it abode twenty years (ver 2; 2 S 6 2-4; cf 1 Ch 13 6; 2 Ch 1 4). Clearly it was in the hills somewhere to the E. of Beth-shemesh.

The prophet Uriah-ben-Shemaiah, killed by Jehoiakim, belonged to Kiriath-jearim (Jer 26 20 f.).

In Ezr 2 25 (cf Neh 7 29), this place occurs under the name "Kiriath-arim." In 1 Esd 5 19 the name occurs as "Kiriathiarus."

The exact position of this important Israelite sanctuary has never been satisfactorily settled.

Some of the data appear to be contradictory. For example, Jos (Ant. VI, i, 4) says it was a city in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh, while Eusebius and Jerome (Onom) speak of it ("Cariathiarceim") in their day as a village 9 or 10 miles from Jerus on the way to Lydda. But it is open to doubt whether the reputed site of their day had any serious claims. Any suggested site should fulfil the following conditions: (1) It must harmonize with the boundary line of Judah and Benjamin between two known points—the "waters of Nephtoah," very generally supposed to be Lifta, and Chesalon, certainly Keslā (Josh 15 10). (2) It should not be too far removed from the other cities of the Gibeonites—Gibeon, Chephirah and Beeroth—but those places, which are all identified, are themselves fairly widely apart. (3) Mahaneh-dan ("the camp of Dan") is described as between Zorah and Eshtaol, and was W. of Kiriath-jearim; this, and the statement of Jos that it was in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh, makes it probable that the site was near the western edge of the mountains of Judah. Zorah (now Sara'), Eshtaol (now Eshū'a) and Beth-shemesh (now Ain Shems), are all within sight of each other close to the Vale of Sorek. (4) The site should be a sanctuary (or show signs of having been such), and be at least on a height (Gibeah, 1 S 7 1 m). (5) The name may help us, but it is as well to note that the first part of the name, in the form "Kiriathiarus" (1 Esd 5 19), appears to have survived the exile rather than the second.

The first suggested identification was that of Robinson (BE, II, 11, 12), viz. Kuriat el 'Enab, the "town of grapes," a flourishing little town about 9 miles W. of Jerus on the carriage road to Jaffa. The district around is still fairly well wooded (cf ye'ārīm = "thickets"). This village is commonly known as Abu Ghōsh, from the name of a robber chieftain who, with his family, flourished there in the first half of the last century. Mediaeval ecclesiastical tradition has made this place the Anathoth of Jer, and a handsome church from the time of the Crusades, now thoroughly repaired, exists here to mark this tradition. This site suits well as regards the border line, and the name Kuriat is the exact equivalent of Kiriath; it also fits in with the distance and direction given in the Onom, but it cannot be called satisfactory in all respects. Sōba, in the neighborhood, has, on account of its commanding position, been selected, but except for this one feature it has no special claims. The late Colonel Conder has very vigorously advocated the claims of a site he discovered on the south side of the rugged Wādī Isma'īn, called Khurbet 'Erma, pointing out truly that 'Erma is the exact equivalent of 'Arim (Ezr 2 25). Unfortunately the 2d part of the name would appear from the references in 1 Esd and in Onom to be that part which was forgotten long ago, so that the argument even of the philological—the strongest—grounds cannot be of much value. The greatest objections in the minds of most students are the unsuitability of the position to the requirements of the Judah-Benjamin frontier and its distance from the other Gibeonite cities.

The present writer suggests another site which, in his opinion, meets at least some of the requirements better than the older proposals. Standing on the hill of Beth-shemesh and looking N.W., with the cities of Zorah (Sar'ah) and Eshtaol (Eshū'a) full in view, a lofty hill crowned by a considerable forest catches the eye. The village a little below the summit is called Beit Maḥṣīr, and the hilltop itself is the shrine of a local saint known as Sheikh el Ajām. So "holy" is the site, that no trees in this spot are ever cut, nor is fallen brushwood removed. There is a Wely or sanctuary of the saint, and round about are scores of very curious and apparently ancient graves. Southward from this site the eye follows the line of Judean hills—probably the Mt. Jearim of Josh 15 10—until it strikes the outstanding point of Keslā (Chesalon), some 2 miles to the S. If the ark was taken here, the people of Beth-shemesh could have followed its progress almost the whole way to its new abode. Although the name, which appears to mean "besieged" or "confined," in no degree helps, in all the other respects (see 2 above), this site suits well the conditions of Kiriath-jearim.

KIRIATH-SANNAH, kir-i-ath-san'a (קִרְיַת סַנְנַח, kir'yath šannāh; AV Kirjath Sannah): In Josh 15 49 it is called "Debir," and is identical with KIRIATH-SEPHER (q.v.). As πόλις γραμμάτων, pólis grammátōn, "city of books," is the reading in LXX, the most natural explanation is that סַנְנַח, šannāh, is a copyist's error for סֶפֶר, sēpher, but Sayce considers this an ancient Can. name meaning "city of instruction," and that it occurs in the Am Tab in the form "Bit' sani."

KIRIATH-SEPHER, kir-i-ath-sē'fēr (קִרְיַת סֶפֶר, kir'yath sēpher; tr<sup>d</sup> by many, as if it were Heb, as "house of books." LXX πόλις γραμμάτων, pólis grammátōn; AV Kirjath Sēpher; other suggestions have been made: "border-town," [Moore] or "toll-town" [G. A. Smith]): In two || passages (Josh 15 15 f.; Jgs 1 11 f.), it is mentioned as identical with DEBIR (q.v.), which has been frequently identified with edh-Dhāhertiyeh. Sayce would place

Kiriath-sepher to the W. of Gath. See PEFS, 1893, 33-35.

KISEUS, kis-ē'us (Κισεύς, Kiseús; LXX, B [Swete] reads Keisaios; AV Cisai): The great-grandfather of Mordecai (Ad Est 11 2). See KISH, (5).

KISH, kish (קִישׁ, kīsh; Kls, Kis, Kels, Keis, "bow," "power"): The name of five persons mentioned in the Bible:

(1) The son of Abiel and the father of Saul, the first king of Israel. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, of the family of the Matrites (1 S 9 1; 14 51; cf Acts 13 21; 1 S 10 21). According to 1 Ch 8 33 and 9 39, "Ner begat K" By reading "Ner begat Abner" (cf 1 S 14 51; 1 Ch 26 28), the difficulty is at least partly overcome. In 1 Ch 12 1, K. is also mentioned as the father of Saul, and again in 2 S 21 14, we are told that the sepulcher of K. was located in the country of Benjamin, in Zela. His place of residence seems to have been at Gibeah.

(2) Another K. is mentioned (1 Ch 8 29 f; 9 35 f) as the son of Jeiel and his wife Maacah. He is usually supposed to be the uncle of Saul's father.

(3) A Levite, the son of Mahli the Merarite (1 Ch 23 21 f; cf 24 29).

(4) Another Merarite Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 12).

(5) The great-grandfather of Mordecai, of the tribe of Benjamin (Est 2 5). WILLIAM BAUR

KISHI, kish'i (קִישִׁי, kīshī, "snarer," "fowler"): Father of Ethan, one of the singers David "set over the service of song" in the house of the Lord (1 Ch 6 31); the "Kushaiah" of 1 Ch 15 17 (cf 1 Ch 6 44).

KISHION, kish'i-on, kish'yon (קִישִׁיֹּן, kīshyōn): A city in the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 20), given to the Gershonite Levites (21 28; AV wrongly "Kishon"). The || passage in 1 Ch 6 72 reads "Kedesh" instead of "Kishion." The true reading is probably קִידְשֹׁן, kīdshōn. Conder suggests a likely identification with Tell Abū Kedes, not far from Taanach.

KISHON, kī'shon, kish'on (קִישׁוֹן, kīshōn; Κισιὼν, Keisōn): The "watercourse" or "torrent stream" along the banks of which the great battle was fought between Israel, led by Deborah and Barak, and the army of Sisera, in the waters of which so many perished (Jgs 4 7, etc). It is probably mentioned earlier as "the brook that is before Jokneam" (Josh 19 11; see JOKNEAM). It appears again as the scene of Elijah's slaughter of the prophets of Baal (1 K 18 40). "The torrent" par excellence in the district is the modern el-Mukalla'a, a stream which drains all the plain of Esdraelon to the W. of the watershed—a line drawn from Iksāl to Nain, and thence to el-Fulch and Zer'in. All the water E. of this line, from the Nazareth hills, Tabor and Little Hermon, flows down Wādy esh-Sheṣṣār and Nahr Jālūd into the Jordan. The Kishon collects the streams from the western slopes of Gilboa in the rainy season; and the water from the strong spring at Jen'in. Contributions also come from the copious fountains in the neighborhood of Megiddo. At Sa'adiyeh, again, some 3 miles E. of Haiḡā, its volume is largely increased by springs rising at the base of Carmel, on the edge of the plain of Acre. From Jen'in in the S.E., the deep torrent bed follows a westerly direction, with numerous windings cutting the plain in two, until it reaches the pass at the northeastern base of Carmel. Through the gorge between the mountain and the hills of Galilee it reaches the plain of Acre. From Sa'adiyeh it flows in a deep sluggish stream through the marsh-land to the sea near Haiḡā. In this part the crocodile is said to have been seen at times.

In the summer season the water from the springs is largely absorbed by irrigation, and the upper reaches of the river are soon dry. The bed runs along the bottom of a trench some 20 ft. deep through the plain. It is easily crossed at the fords by those who know how to avoid the localities of the springs. In time of heavy rains the trench is swiftly filled, and the soft soil of the plain goes to mud. Remembering this, it is easy to understand the disaster that overwhelmed the heavily armed cavalry and chariots of Sisera. The chief ford for long was to the W. of the gorge where the stream issues into the plain of Acre, on the highway from Haiḡā to Nazareth. Here it is now spanned by a substantial bridge, while the railway crosses a little higher up. At the mouth of the river it is generally easily forded on the sand bank thrown up by the waves beating against the current of the stream. The main traffic here is now carried by a wooden bridge.

The phrase naḥal k-dhūmīm in Jgs 5 21 is not easy of interpretation. EV translates, "that ancient river"; G. A. Smith, "torrent of spates"; while others think it may refer to a stream other than the Kishon. Guthe suggests that both names may be derived from those of places adjoining the river. Kishōn may possibly mean the "tortuous" stream, referring to the windings of its course.

KISLEV, kis'lef (כִּסְלֵו, kīslēw; AV Chislew, RV "Chislev"): The 9th month of the Jewish year, corresponding to December. The word is found in Neh 1 1 and Zec 7 1. The derivation is uncertain. See CALENDAR.

KISS (קִשׁ, nāshak; φιλέω, philēō, καταφιλέω, kataphilēō, φίλημα, philēma): The kiss is common in eastern lands in salutation, etc, on the cheek, the forehead, the beard, the hands, the feet, but not (in Pal) the lips (Cheyne, EB, s.v. "Salutations"). In the Bible there is no sure instance of the kiss in ordinary salutation. We have in the OT nāshak, "to kiss," used (1) of relatives (which seems the origin of the practice of kissing; cf Cant 8 1, "Oh that thou wert as my brother . . . I would kiss thee; yea, and none would despise me"); Gen 27 26, 27 (Isaac and Jacob); 29 11 (Jacob and Rachel); 33 4 (Esau and Jacob); 45 15 (Joseph and his brethren); 48 10 (Jacob and Joseph's sons); 50 1 (Joseph and his father); Ex 4 27 (Aaron and Moses); 18 7 (Moses and Jethro, united with obeisance); Ruth 1 9, 14 (Naomi and her daughters-in-law—a farewell); 2 S 14 33 (David and Absalom); 1 K 19 20 (Elisha and his parents—a farewell); see also Gen 29 13; 31 28, 55; Tob 7 6; 10 12. (2) Of friendship and affection; cf 1 S 20 41 (David and Jonathan); 2 S 15 5 (Absalom and those who came to him); 19 39 (David and Barzillai—a farewell); 20 9 (Joab and Amasa); Prov 27 6 ("the kisses [n'shikāh] of an enemy"); 1 Esd 4 47 ("the king stood up, and kissed him"). (3) Of love; cf Cant 1 2, "Let him kiss me with the kisses [n'shikāh] of his mouth"; Prov 7 13 (of the feigned love of "the strange woman"). (4) Of homage, perhaps; cf 1 S 10 1 (Samuel after anointing David king);

Gen 41 40, "Unto thy word shall all my people be ruled," RVm "order themselves," or "do homage," AVm "Heb be armed or kiss" (nāshak); Ps 2 12, "Kiss the son" (ARV), ERVm "Some versions render, 'Lay hold of [or receive] instruction'; others, 'Worship in purity'"; some ancient VSS give 'Kiss [or, do homage] purely.' (5) Of idolatrous practices; cf 1 K 19 18; Hos 13 2 (cf 8 5.6; 10 5); Job 31 27, probably, "kissing the hand to the sun or moon" (cf vs 26.27). See ADORATION. (6) A figurative use may be seen in Ps 85 10; Prov 24 26; Ezk 3 13, where "touched" is nāshak (see AVm). (7) In Ad Est 13 13 we have "I could have been content . . . to kiss the soles of his feet," and in Ecclus 29 5, "Till he hath received, he will kiss a man's hands"—marks of self-humiliation or abasement.

In the NT we have phileō, "to kiss," "to be friendly," and kataphileō, "to kiss thoroughly," "to be very friendly"—the first in Mt 26 48; Mk 14 44; Lk 22 47, of the kiss with which Judas betrayed his Master. This was probably meant to be taken as an expression of special regard, which is expressed by the kataphileō of Mt 26 49; Mk 14 45; the same word is used of the woman who kissed the feet of Christ (Lk 7 38.45); of the father's greeting of the returning prodigal (15 20); and of the farewell to Paul of the Ephesian Christians (Acts 20 37); philema, "a kiss," "a mark of friendship," is used by Our Lord as that which Simon omitted to give him (which may refer to ordinary hospitality), but which the woman had bestowed so impressively (Lk 7 45); of the kiss of Judas (Lk 22 48); and of the "holy kiss" wherewith Christians greeted each other, which, according to the general usage we have seen, would be as the members of one family in the Lord, or as specially united in holy love (Rom 16 16; 1 Cor 16 20; 2 Cor 13 12; 1 Thess 5 26; 1 Pet 5 14). There is reason to believe that, as a rule, men only thus greeted men, and women, women. In the Apos Const (3d cent.) it is so enjoined. W. L. WALKER

KITE, kit (כִּיתָא, 'ayyāh; ἰκτίνος, iktinos; Lat Milvus iclinus or regalis): A medium-sized member of the hawk tribe (see HAWK). This bird is 27 in. long, of bright reddish-brown color, has sharply pointed wings and deeply forked tail. It is supposed to have exceptionally piercing eyes. It takes moles, mice, young game birds, snakes and frogs, as well as carrion for food. Its head and facial expression are unusually eagle-like. It was common over Pal in winter, but bred in the hills of Galilee and rough mountainous places, so it was less conspicuous in summer. It is among the lists of abominations (see Lev 11 14 and Dt 14 13). It is notable that this is the real bird intended by Job to be used as that whose eye could not trace the path to the silver mine:

"That path no bird of prey knoweth, Neither hath the falcon's eye seen it" (Job 28 7).

The word used here in the original Heb is 'ayyāh, which was the name for kite. Our first translators used "vulture"; our latest efforts give "falcon," a smaller bird of different markings, not having the kite's reputation for eyesight.

KITHLISH, kith'lish (כִּיתְלִישׁ, kithlish). See CHITLISH.

KITRON, kit'ron (קִטְרֹן, kitrōn): An unidentified place in Zebulun, not possessed by the tribe (Jgs 1 30). It may be identical with Kattath of Josh 19 15. In the Talm it is identified with Sepphoris, which is represented by the modern village of Seffūriyeh.

KITTIM, kit'im (כִּיְתִים, kittim, Isa 23 12; Jer 2 10; כִּיְתִיָּם, kittiyim, apparently pl. of kittī [not found, but cf (4) below]; Κήτιοι, the word is applied to the descendants of Javan, and indicates, therefore, the Gr-Lat races, whose territory extended along the coasts of the Mediterranean, and included its islands. By the side of Kittim are mentioned Elishah, Tarshish, and Dodanim (= Rodanim of 1 Ch 1 7), generally explained respectively as Sicily with Southern Italy, Spain and Rhodes. In its narrower sense Kittim appears simply to have stood for the island of Cyprus—it is mentioned between Bashan (= Pal) and the isles of Elishah in Ezk 27 6.7, and with this Isa 23 1.12 agree, Kittim occurring in these passages between Tarshish, Tyre and Sidon.

The oldest etymology is apparently that of Jos, who connects Kittim with the well-known old

2. In Its Limited Sense Cypriote city Kition (Citium) (Ant, I, vi, 1), testifying to the settling of the Kittim on the island. This word he further connects with Chethima, from Chethimus, and states that it was on account of Cyprus being the home of those people that all islands were called Chethim by the Heb. The derivation of an ancient Chethim from Chethimus, however, would make the m to be a radical, and this, with the substitution of Ch (= Kh) for K, renders his proposed etymology somewhat doubtful.

The statement of Jos, that "all islands, and the greatest part of the sea-coast, are called Chethim [= Kittim] by the Hebrews," on the

3. In Its Extended Sense other hand, must be taken as the testimony of one well acquainted with the opinions of the learned world in his time. In Jer 2 10 and Ezk 27 6 the isles of Kittim are expressly spoken of, and this confirms the statement of Jos concerning the extended meaning of the name. This would explain its application to the Rom fleet in Dnl 11 30 (so the Vulg), and the Macedonians in 1 Macc 1 1 (Χητιεύς, Chettieim) and 8 5 (Kūians). In the latter passage the Gr writer seems to have been thinking more of the Cyprian Kition than of the Heb Kittim.

According to Herodotus (vii.90), Cyprus was colonized from Greece, Phoenicia, and Ethiopia.

Referring to the plundering of the temple of Aphrodite at Askalon by the Scythians (i.105), he states that her

4. Colonization of Cyprus temple in Cyprus was an offshoot from that ancient foundation, as reported by the Cyprians themselves, Phoenicians having founded it at Cythera, on arriving from Syria. The date of the earliest Phoen settlements in Cyprus is unknown, but it has been suggested that they were anterior to the time of Moses. Naturally they brought with them their religion, the worship of the moon-goddess Atargatis (Derceto) being introduced at Paphos, and the Phoen Baal at Kition. If Kition be, then, a Sem word (from the same root as the Heb Kittim), it has been transferred from the small band of Phoen settlers which it at first designated, to the non-Sem Japhethites of the W. Kition occurs in the Phoen inscriptions of Cyprus under the forms K(i)l(i) and K(i)l(i)i, the latter being by far the more common (CIS, I, i, 10, 11, 14, 19, etc.).

The early history of Cyprus is uncertain. According to the Assyrian copy of Sargon of Agade's omens, that king (about 3800 BC in the opinion of Nabonidus; 2800 BC in the opinion of many Assyriologists) is said to have crossed "the sea of the setting sun" (the Mediterranean), though the Bab copy makes it that of "the rising sun"—i.e. the Pers Gulf. Be this as it may, General Cesnola discovered at 5. Its Successive Masters apparently inscribed "Mār-Ištar, son of Ilu-bani, servant [worshipper] of Nārām-Sin," the last named being the deified son of Sargon. In the 16th cent.

BC, Cyprus was tributary to Thothmes III. About the year 708 BC, Sargon of Assyria received the submission of the kings of the district of Ya', in Cyprus, and set up at Citium the stele bearing his name, which is now in the Royal Museum at Berlin. Esarhaddon and his son Aššur-bani-āpli each received tribute from the 10 Cyprian princes who acknowledged Assyrian supremacy. The island was conquered by the Egypt king Amasis, and later formed part of the Pers empire, until the revolt of Evagoras in 410 BC. The Assyrians knew the island under the name of Yad(a)nanu, the "Wedan" (Vedan) of Ezk 27 19 RV (Sayce, PSBA, 1912, 26).

If the orthodox date for the composition of Gen be accepted, not only the Phoenicians, but also the

6. The Races Therein and Their Languages Greeks, or a people of Gr-Lat stock, must have been present in Cyprus before the time of Moses, in sufficient number to make them the predominant portion of the population. As far as can be judged, the Phoenicians occupied only the eastern and southern portion of the island. Paphos, where they had built a temple to Ashtoreth and set up an 'āshērāh (a pillar symbolizing the goddess), was one of their principal settlements. The rest of the island was apparently occupied by the Aryans, whose presence there caused the name of Kittim to be applied to all the Gr-Lat countries of the Mediterranean. Gr and Phoen were the languages spoken on the island, as was proved by George Smith's demonstration of the nature of the non-Phoen text of the inscription of King Melek-yathon of Citium (370 BC). The signs used in the Gr-Cyprian inscriptions are practically all syllabic.

KNEADING, nēd'ing. See BREAD, III, 2.

KNEE, nē, KNEEL, nēl ("knee," כִּנְיָה, berekh; Aram. אֲרָרְבָּה, 'ar'khubbah; גִּנּוּ, gónu; "kneel"; בָּרָךְ, bārakh; Aram. בִּרְךְ, b'rakh; γονυπετέω, gonupetēō): Most of the uses are obvious, and the figurative use of "knees" as the symbol of strength (Job 4 4; He 12 12, etc) needs no explanation. The disease of the knees mentioned in Dt 28 35 is perhaps some form of leprosy. In Job 3 12 the "knees" seem to be used for the lap, as the place where a child receives its first care. Three times in Gen the knees appear in connection with primitive adoption customs. In 30 3 a fiction is enacted that purports to represent Rachel as the actual mother of Bilhah's children. By a somewhat similar rite in 48 12, Jacob (the "knees" here are Jacob's, not Joseph's) adopts Ephraim and Manasseh, so that they are counted as two of the twelve patriarchs and not as members of a single Joseph tribe. In the same way Machir's children are adopted by Joseph in 50 23, and this is certainly connected with the counting of Machir (instead of Manasseh) as one of the tribes in Jgs 5 14. See TRIBES; and for the idea underlying this paternal adoption, cf THIGH. From among classical instances of the same customs compare Homer, Odyssey, xix. 401 ff, where Autolukos, grandfather of Ulysses, receives the newborn grandchild on his knees and gives him his name. Thus also we have to understand the numerous representations in Egypt sculpture, showing the king as an infant on the knees or the lap of a goddess.

Kneeling was less commonly an attitude of prayer among the Jews than was standing, but references to kneeling are of course abundant. For kneeling (or prostrating one's self) before a superior, see ATTITUDE, 2; SALUTATION.

KNIFE, nif: (1) מַאֲכֶלֶת, ma'akheleth, lit. an instrument for eating; but used of large knives for slaying animals, cutting up a carcass or a sacrificial victim (Gen 22 6,10; Jgs 19 29; Prov 30 14). (2) חֶרֶב, herebh, rendered generally "sword," but in Josh 5 2,3 of stone knives for circumcision (cf Ex 4 25), probably of similar knives in 1 K 18 28, used by Baal prophets in gashing themselves. In Ezk 5 12 AV, "knife," probably better RV, Egyptian Stone Knives.

Assyrian Bronze Knives.
(Brit Mus.)

"sword." (3) תַּאֲרָר, ta'ar, usually rendered "razor," in combination with חַסְפָּה, ha-sōphēr, "knife of the writer," or "penknife" (Jer 36 23). (4) מַחֲלָפִים, māhālāphīm, "slaughter-knives" (Ezr 1 9). (5) שַׁכִּין, sakkīn, Aram., "knife" (Prov 23 2). Early knives were commonly made of sharp stones, esp. of flint, later of bronze and iron. The former remained in use in religious ceremonies long after the latter were in common use. Knives were not generally used at meals, meats being cut into bits before served, and bread being broken into fragments. Herod used a knife for paring apples, and attempted suicide with the instrument (Jos, Ant, XVII, vii, 1; BJ, I, xxxiii, 7). EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

KNOCK, nok (κρούω, krouō): The oriental house was fitted with heavy doors which were bolted and locked with wooden keys too large to be carried about, so that even a member of the household could not secure entrance until in response to his knock or call the door should be opened by someone within. At night the delay would be increased by the difficulty of arousing the inmates sleeping within the inner chambers. To persons familiar with such experiences, the words of Jesus concerning a higher entrance, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you" (Mt 7 7; Lk 12 36), would have a unique force not easy for us to appreciate.

KNOP, nop: In Ex 25 31 ff; 37 17 ff (kaphtōr), part of the ornaments of the golden candlestick; in 1 K 6 18; 7 24 (ḥā'īm), gourd-like ornaments of the lining of Solomon's temple, and of the brazen sea (in 1 K 6 18, RVm "gourds"). See CANDLESTICK, GOLDEN; TEMPLE; SEA, THE MOLTEN.

KNOW, nō, KNOWLEDGE, nol'ej, nol'ij (in Heb chiefly יָדָע, yādā', noun יְדָעָה, da'ath; in Gr γινώσκω, ginōskō, οἶδα, oída; "to know fully," ἐπιγινώσκω, epiginōskō, noun γνῶσις, gnōsis, ἐπίγνωσις, epignōsis: Knowledge strictly is the apprehension by the mind of some fact or truth in accordance with its real nature; in a personal relation the intellectual act is necessarily conjoined with the element of affection and will (choice, love, favor, or, conversely, repugnance, dislike, etc.). Knowledge is distinguished from "opinion" by its greater certainty. The mind is constituted with the capacity for knowledge, and the desire to possess and increase it. The character of knowledge varies with its object. The senses give knowledge of outward appearances; the intellect connects and reasons about these appearances, and arrives at general laws or truths; moral truth is apprehended through the power inherently possessed by men of distinguishing right and wrong in the light of moral principles; spiritual qualities require for their apprehension spiritual sympathy ("They are spiritually judged," 1 Cor 2 14). The highest knowledge possible to man is the knowledge of God, and while there is that in God's infinity which transcends man's power of comprehension (Job 11 7.9), God is knowable in the measure in which He has revealed Himself in creation (Rom 1 19.20, "that which is known of God," etc), and supremely in Jesus Christ, who alone perfectly knows the Father, and reveals Him to man (Mt 11 27). This knowledge of God in Jesus Christ is "life eternal" (Jn 17 3). Knowledge is affirmed of both God and man, but with the wide contrast that God's knowledge is absolute, unerring, complete, intuitive, embracing all things, past, present, and future, and searching the inmost thoughts of the heart (Ps 139 1.23); whereas man's is partial, imperfect, relative, gradually acquired, and largely mixed with error ("Now we see in a mirror darkly . . . in part," 1 Cor 13 12). All these points about knowledge are amply brought out in the Scripture usage of the terms. A large part of the usage necessarily relates to natural knowledge (sometimes with a carnal connotation, as Gen 4 1.17), but the greatest stress also is laid on the possession of moral and spiritual knowledge (e.g. Ps 119 66; Prov 1 4.7.22.29; 8 10, etc; Lk 1 77; Rom 15 14; 2 Pet 1 5.6). The highest knowledge, as said, is the knowledge of God and Christ, and of God's will (Hos 6 6; Rom 11 33; Eph 1 17; 4 13; Phil 1 9; 3 8; Col 1 9.10, etc). The moral conditions of spiritual knowledge are continually insisted on ("If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it is of God," Jn 7 17). On the other hand, the pride of intellectual knowledge is condemned; it must be joined with love ("Knowledge puffeth up," 1 Cor 8 1). The stronger term epignōsis is used to denote the full and more perfect knowledge which is possessed in Christ, the conditions of which are humility and love. Of knowledge as connoting favor, choice, on the part of God, there are many examples (Ps 1 6, "Jeh knoweth the way of the righteous"; Gal 4 9, "know God, or rather to be known by God"; cf Rom 8 29, "whom he foreknew"). See FOREKNOWLEDGE. JAMES ORR

KOA, kō'a (קוֹא, kō'a): A people named with Pekod and Shoa as enemies of Jerus (Ezk 23 23). Their location was probably N.E. of Babylonia.

KOATH, kō'hath, KOATHITES, kō'hath-its (קוֹתִי, kō'hāth, קוֹתִיִּים, kō'hāthī; קֹאֹתִי, Kō'āth): Second son of Levi, and ancestor of Moses and Aaron (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16-20; Nu 3 17; 1 Ch 6 1, etc). The Kohathites formed one of the three divisions of the tribe of Levi; the other two being the Gershonites and the Merarites (Nu 3 17 ff). The Kohathites consisted of four families, the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites

(Nu 3 19.27, etc). Their place in the wilderness was on the southern side of the tabernacle (Nu 3 29), and their number is given (from a month old) as 8,600 (ver 28). Their special charge was "the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the screen, and all the service thereof" (ver 31; cf 7 9). After the conquest 23 cities were assigned them by lot (Josh 21 4.5 ff). In David's time and after, Heman, a Kohathite, and his family had a prominent place in the service of the music of the sanctuary (1 Ch 6 33 ff; 16 41 ff; 25 1 ff); David likewise divided the Levites into courses (the Kohathites, 23 12-20; 24 20-25). We read of the Kohathites in the reign of Jehoshaphat at Engedi (2 Ch 20 19), and in connection with the cleansing of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 12.14). JAMES ORR

- (1) A Benjamite, son of Maaseiah (Neh 11 7).
- (2) Father of Ahab, a false prophet and a lecherous man (Jer 29 21-23).

KONAE, kō'nē (Κωνά, Kōnā): Some MSS have κώμας, kōmas, from which we have in AV "the villages." The name occurs in the account of the measures taken to secure the country against Holofernes (Jth 4 4). If Kōna be correct, we may possibly identify the place with Cyamon.

KŌPH, kōf (ק, kōph): The 19th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopædia as k (intense k). It came also to be used for the number 100. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

KOR, kōr. See COR.

KORAH, kō'ra (קָרַח, kōrah, "baldness," possibly; Κόρε, Kōre):

(1) One of the 3 sons of Oholibamah, Esau's Hivite wife. The account says that the 3 were born in Canaan before Esau withdrew to the Seir mountain country. They are mentioned 3 t in the brief account from 3 points of view (Gen 36 5.14.18; 1 Ch 1 35), the 3d mention being in the list of "chiefs."

(2) One of the sons of Eliphaz, the son of Adah, Esau's Hittite wife (Gen 36 16). He is mentioned as one of the Edomite "chiefs."

If one has the habit, finding a statement anywhere, of thinking that the statement ought to be changed into something else, he will be interested in the attempts to identify these Edomite Korahs with Korah (3).

(3) A son of Hebron (1 Ch 2 43), the son of Mareshah, mentioned in the Caleb group of families in Judah.

(4) The son of Izhar the son of Kohath the son of Levi (Ex 6 16 ff; Nu 16 1; 1 Ch 6 18.31-38), a younger contemporary of Moses. There may have been generations, omitted in the record, between Izhar and K.; that is a natural way of accounting for Amminadab (1 Ch 6 22-30).

This Korah is best known as the man whom the opening earth is said to have swallowed up along with his associates when they were 1. The challenging the authority of Moses Catastrophe and Aaron in the wilderness (Nu 16, in the 17). K. is presented as the principal Wilderness in the affair. The company is spoken of as his company, and those who were swallowed up as being "all the men that apper-tained unto K." (Nu 16 11.32). It is under his name that the affair is referred to (Nu 26 9; 27 3). But Dathan and Abiram of the tribe of Reuben are not much less prominent than K. In Nu 16 and 26 they are mentioned with K., and are mentioned without him in Dt 11 6 and Ps 106 17. Another Reubenite, On, the son of Peleth, was in the conspiracy. It has been inferred that he withdrew, but there is no reason either for or against the inference. Equally baseless is the inference that Zelophead of Manasseh joined it, but withdrew (Nu 27 3). The account implies that there were other Levites in it besides K. (Nu 16 7-10), and it particularly mentions 250 "men of renown," princes, such men as would be summoned if there were a public assembly (Nu 16 2.17.35). These men, apparently, were of different tribes.

The position taken by the malcontents was that "all the congregation are holy, every one of them," and that it was therefore a usurpation for Moses and Aaron to confine the functions of an incense-burning priest to Aaron alone. Logically, their objection lay equally against the separation of Aaron and his sons from the rest of the Levites, and against the separation of the Levites from the rest of the people. On the basis of this, Moses made expostulation with the Levites. He arranged that K. and the 250, along with Aaron, should take their places at the doorway of the tent of meeting, with their censers and fire and incense, so that Jeh might indicate His will in the matter. Dathan and Abiram insolently refused his proposals.

The record says that K.'s "whole congregation," including himself and the 250 with their censers, met Moses and Aaron and "all the congregation" of Israel at the doorway of the tent of meeting. For the purposes of the transaction in hand the tent was now "the mishkān of K., Dathan and Abiram," and their followers. Jeh directed Moses to warn all other persons to leave the vicinity. Dathan and Abiram, however, were not at the mishkān. The account says that Moses, followed by the elders of Israel, went to them to their tents; that he warned all persons to leave that vicinity also; that Dathan and Abiram and the households stood near the tents; that the earth opened and swallowed them and their property and all the adherents of K. who were on the spot; that fire from Jeh devoured the 250 who offered incense. The narrative does not say whether the deaths by fire and by the opening of the earth were simultaneous. It does not say whether K.'s sons participated in the rebellion, or what became of K. himself. In the allusion in Nu 26 we are told, apparently, that K. was swallowed up, and that "the sons of K. died not." The deaths of the principal offenders, by fire and by being swallowed up, were followed by a plague in which 14,700 perished (Nu 16 49 [Heb 17 14]).

Any appreciative reader sees at once that we have here either a history of certain miraculous facts, or a wonder-story devised for teaching religious lessons. As a story it is artistically admirable—sufficiently complicated to be interesting, but clear and graphic and to the point. In the Heb there are 2 or 3 instances of incomplete grammatical construction, such as abound in the early literary products of any language, when these have been fortunate enough to escape editorial polishing. In such a case it is possibly not unwise just to take a story as it stands. Nothing will be added to either its religious or its literary value by subjecting it to doubtful alleged critical processes.

If, however, one has committed himself to certain critical traditions concerning the Hex, that brings him under obligation to lead this story into conformity with the rest of his theory. Attempts of this kind have been numerous. Some hold that the K. of this narrative is the Edomite K., and that Peleth means Phil, and that our story originally grew out of some claim made by Edomites and Philis. It is held that the story of K. was originally one story, and that of Dathan and Abiram another, and that someone manipulated the two and put them together. See the treatments of the Book of Nu in Driver, Intro; Addis, Documents of the Hex; Carpenter and Battersby, Hex; Bacon, Ex; Paterson on Nu, in the Polychrome Bible. These and other like works give source-analyses of our story. Some of the points they make are plausible. In such a case no one claims any adequate basis of fact for his work; each theory is simply a congeries of ingenious guesses, and no two of the guessers guess alike.

As in many other Bib. instances, one of the results of the alleged critical study is the resolving of a particularly fine story into two or more supposed earlier stories each of which is absolutely bald and crude and uninteresting, the earlier stories and the combining of these into their present form being alike regarded as processes of legendary accretion. The necessary inference is that the fine story we now have was not the product of some gifted mind, guided by facts and by literary and religious inspiration, but is an accidental result of mere patchwork. Such a theory does not commend itself to persons of literary appreciation.

KORAHITES, kō'ra-its (קֹרְחִי, korhī), SONS OF KORAH (בְּנֵי קֹרַח, b'nē korah; in AV appears also as Korhite, Korhathite, Kore): This phrase is used to denote Assir and Elkanah and Abiasaph, Korah's 3 individual sons (Ex 6 24; cf Nu 26 11). But its more frequent use, and that to which interest attaches, is in the titles of some of the Pss.

The genealogical details concerning K. are rather full. In 3 places we find the list of the 7 successive generations closing with the prophet Samuel and his son Joel (1 Ch 6 31-38.22-30; 1 S 1 1.20; 8 2); the two in Ch mention most of the generations between K. and Joel. The fragmentary lists in 1 Ch 9 25, 26 connect the list with the 4 generations following Joel (1 Ch 6 33; 9 19-31; 26 1 ff), and with 2 generations in the very latest Bible times (1 Ch 9 31).

The adj. "Korhite" appears also in AV as "Korathite," "Kore," and "Korahite," the last being the form preferred in ERV. It is used 4 t in the sing. Once it designates an individual (1 Ch 9 31); 3 t it denotes the successors of K. taken collectively (Ex 6 24; Nu 26 58; 1 Ch 26 19); 4 t it is used in the pl., denoting the members of this succession of men (1 Ch 9 19; 12 6; 26 1; 2 Ch 20 19). As variants of this use, "the sons of the Korahites" appears once, and "the children of the Korahites" once (1 Ch 26 19; 2 Ch 20 19).

In these various passages the K. families are counted like the other Levitical families. In 1 Ch 12 6 we have an account of 5 men who are designated as "the Korahites," who joined David when he was at Ziklag—Elkanah, Isshiah, Azazel, Joczzer, Jashobeam. They are described as expert warriors, esp. with the bow and sling, and as being "of Saul's brethren of Benjamin." Some of them may plausibly be identified with men of the same name mentioned elsewhere. These Korahites may have been cousins of the Samuel family, and they may have resided not very far apart.

In the latest OT times one Mattithiah, "the first-born of Shallum the Korahite," held "the office of trust over the things that were baked in pans" (1 Ch 9 31). Shallum was "the son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah." In this expression 15 or more generations are omitted between Ebiasaph and Kore, and perhaps as many between Kore and Shallum. The record proceeds to supply some of the omitted names between Kore and Shallum. The representative of the line in David's time was "Zechariah the son of Meshelemiah" (ver 21). In all periods the Korahites were "keepers of the thresholds of the tent." Back in the time of "Phinehas the son of Eleazar," "their fathers had been over the camp of Jch" (vs 19.20). Zechariah was, in his time, "porter of the door of the tent of meeting" (ver 21), and Shallum was still the chief of the porters (ver 17). The record for David's time supports and supplements this. It says that the doorkeepers, according to the arrangements made by David, included a K. contingent, its leading men being Meshelemiah and his son Zechariah (1 Ch 26 1.2.9.14), and that Meshelemiah was "the son of Kore, of the sons of Asaph." Adopting the common conjecture that Asaph is here a variant for Ebiasaph, we have here the same abridgment of the genealogical list as in 1 Ch 9.

More interesting, however, than the fighting Korahites of Benjamin, or the doorkeeping Korah-hites who claimed succession from Moses to Nehemiah, are the "sons of Korah" who were somehow connected with the service of song. One of the genealogies is introduced by the statement: "These are they whom David set over the service of song in the house of Jeh, after that the ark had rest. And they ministered with song before the tabernacle of the tent of meeting, until Solomon had built the house of Jeh in Jerus" (1 Ch 6 31.32). Then the writer proceeds to mention first "Heman the singer, the son of Joel, the son of Samuel," and so on, carrying the genealogy back to Korah and Levi. After thus mentioning Heman, he speaks of "his brother Asaph, who stood on his right hand," and traces Asaph's descent back to Gershom the son of Levi; and then says, "and on the left hand their brethren the sons of Merari." Of these the principal leader is Ethan (otherwise called Jeduthun), and his descent is here traced back to Levi.

In this way we are introduced to David's 3 great leaders in choral and orchestral music. Among them Heman the Korahite has at first the place of primacy, though Asaph, later, comes to the front. The events just referred to are mentioned again, more in detail, in the account of David's bringing the ark to Jerus. There it is said that at the suggestion of David "the Levites appointed Heman the son of Joel," and also Asaph and Ethan, "and with them" several others, "their brethren of the second degree" (1 Ch 15 17.18). The record proceeds to speak of the services of "the singers, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan," and their associates, in the pageantry of the bringing of the ark to Jerus. After that, it says, Asaph had charge of the services of thanksgiving and praise before the ark in Jerus, while Heman and Jeduthun served in the high place at Gibeon (1 Ch 16 4 ff. 37.39-42). Later, the record says (1 Ch 25), David made an elaborate organization, under Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun, for prophesying with song and instrumental music.

As the records of David's time, according to the Chronicler, thus attribute to him great achievements in sacred music and song, so the records of subsequent times reiterate the same thing. David's interest in sacred music is mentioned in connection with Solomon's temple, in connection with the times of Joash and Hezekiah and Josiah, in connection with the institutions and exploits of the times after the exile (e.g. 2 Ch 7 6; 23 18; 29 25 ff; 35 15; Ezr 3 10; Neh 12 24.36.45.46). Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun led the magnificent choir and orchestra at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch 5 12). One of the sons of Asaph prophesied, and the sons of the Korahites sang at the crisis in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 14.19). The sons of Asaph and the sons of Heman and the sons of Jeduthun were present, and there was instrumental music and loud singing, according to the appointment of David and his associates, at the time of Hezekiah's Passover (2 Ch 29 13 ff). Singing, and Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun and David have an important place in the record concerning Josiah. And the records of the post-exilian times make the singers and the "sons of Asaph" and the arrangements of David as conspicuous as the law of Moses itself.

Add to this that the names Asaph or Heman or Ethan or Jeduthun, or the designation "the sons of Korah" are attached to 25 or more of the Pss (e.g. Pss 42-49, 50, 62, 72-85), and we have a body of testimony that is at least abundant and intelligible. It is to the effect that there was elaborate organization, on a large scale, in connection with the musical services of the temple at Jerus; that this began in the time of David, as a part of the preparation for building the temple, under the influence of the family traditions of the prophet

Samuel; and that the movement continued in the generations following David, either surviving the exile, or being revived after the exile. In connection with this movement, the phrases "sons of Korah," "sons of Asaph," "sons of Heman," "sons of Jeduthun" denote, in some cases, merely lineal descent; but in other cases they denote each an aggregate of persons interested in sacred song and music—a guild or society or succession or group—arising out of the movement which originated in David's time. See, for example, "sons of Asaph" (1 Ch 25 1.2; 2 Ch 20 14; cf ver 19; 29 13; 35 15; Ezr 2 41; 3 10; Neh 7 44; 11 22) and "sons of Korah" in the titles of Pss 42-49 and 84, 85, 87-89. Traces of these aggregates appear in the times of Solomon, of Jehoshaphat, of Joash, of Hezekiah, of Josiah, of Zerubbabel, of Ezra and Nehemiah.

If a person holds that the mention of an event in Ch is to be regarded as proof that the event never occurred, that person will of course deny that the testimony thus cited is true to fact. He is likely to hold that the guilds of singers arose in the exile, and that, some generations after Nehemiah, they fabricated for themselves the ecclesiastical and physical pedigrees now found in the Books of Ch. If, however, we accord fair play to the Chronicler as a witness, we shall be slow to discredit the minute and interfitting testimony which he has placed before us.

KORATHITES, kō'rath-its: In AV for "Korahites," Nu 26 58. See KORAH, 4.

KORE, kō'rē (קֹרֵה, kōrē, "one who proclaims"):

(1) A Levite of David's time, descended from Kohath and Korah. See KORAH, 4. Shallum, chief doorkeeper in the latest Bible times, is described as "the son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah" (1 Ch 9 19). This expression omits the generations between Shallum and K., and those between K. and Ebiasaph, perhaps 15 generations or more in each case. The context supplies two of the omitted names, of the time of David, Meshelemiah and his son Zechariah (1 Ch 9 21.22). The record for the time of David mentions these two, with some particulars, calling Meshelemiah the son of K. (1 Ch 26 1.2.9 14). It describes them as "Korahites" "of the sons of Asaph." It is usual to regard this last clause as a variant for "the son of Ebiasaph," thus making the description identical with that in 1 Ch 9 19. With this understanding, the text claims that "the Korahites," K. and Meshelemiah and Zechariah, come midway in a line of sanctuary ministrants, extending continuously from Moses to Nehemiah.

(2) "The son of Imnah the Levite, the porter at the east gate," who "was over the freewill-offerings," in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 14). Very likely in the same line with (1) above.

(3) In 1 Ch 26 1 AV for KORAHITES (q.v.).

LAADAH, lā'a-da (לֹאדָה, la'dāh): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 21).

LAADAN, lā'a-dan. See LADAN.

LABAN, lā'ban: The person named Laban (לָבָן, lābhān; Λαβάν, Labán, possibly connected with the √ meaning "to be white," from which in Heb the adj. meaning "white" has just this form) is first introduced to the reader of Gen in the story of the wooing of Rebekah (ch 24). He belonged to that branch of the family of Terah that was derived from Abraham's brother Nahor and his niece Milcah. The genealogy of this branch is traced in Gen 22 20-24; but, true to its purpose and the place it occupies in the book, this genealogy brings the family down to Rebekah, and there stops without mentioning Laban. Accordingly, when Rebekah is introduced in the narrative of ch 24, she is referred to (vs 15.24) in a way that recalls to the reader the genealogy already given; but when her brother Laban is introduced (ver 29), he is related to his sister by the express announcement, "And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban." In this ch he takes prominent part in the reception of Abraham's servant, and in the determination of his sister's future. That brothers had an effective voice in the marriage of their sisters is evident, not only from extra-Bib. sources, but from the Bible itself; see e.g. Cant 8 8. In Gen 24, however, Laban is perhaps more prominent than even such custom can explain (cf vs 31.50.55), and we are led to see in him already the same forcefulness and egotism that are abundantly shown in the stories from his later life. The man's eager hospitality (ver 31), coming immediately after his mental inventory of the gifts bestowed by the visitor upon his sister (ver 30), has usually, and justly, been regarded as a proof of the same greed that is his most conspicuous characteristic in the subsequent chapters.

The story of that later period in Laban's life is so interwoven with the career of Jacob that little need here be added to what is said of Laban in Jacob, III, 2 (q.v.). By the time of Jacob's arrival he is already a very old man, for over 90 years had elapsed since Rebekah's departure. Yet even at the end of Jacob's 20 years' residence with him he is represented as still energetic and active (31 19 23), not only ready for an emergency like the pursuit after Jacob, but personally superintending the management of his huge flocks.

His home is in Haran, "the city of Nahor," that is, the locality where Nahor and his family remained at the time when the rest of Terah's descendants emigrated to Canaan (11 31; 12 5). Since Haran, and the region about it where his flocks fed, belonged to the district called Aram (see PADDAN-ARAM; MESOPOTAMIA), Laban is often called "the Aramaean" (EV "the Syrian," from LXX δ Σύρος, ho Sýros); see 25 20; 28 5; 31 20.24. It is uncertain how far racial affinity may be read into this term, because the origin and mutual relationships of the various groups or strata of the Sem family are not yet clear. For Laban himself it suffices that he was a Semite, living within the region early occupied by those who spoke the Sem dialect that we call Aramaic. This dialect is represented in the narrative of Gen as already differentiated from the dialect of Canaan that was Jacob's mother-tongue; for "the heap of witness," erected by uncle and nephew before they part (31 47), is called by the one Jegar-saha-dutha and by the other Galeed—phrases which are equivalent in meaning, the former

Aram., the latter Heb. (Ungnad, Hebräische Grammatik, 1912, § 6, puts the date of the differentiation of Aram. from "Amurritish" at "about 1500 BC"; Skinner, "Genesis," ICC, argues that ver 47 is a gloss, following Wellhausen, Dillmann, et al.)

The character of Laban is interesting to observe. On the one hand it shows a family likeness to the portraits of all his relations in the patriarchal group, preëminently, however, to his sister Rebekah, his daughter Rachel, and his nephew Jacob. The nearer related to Laban such figures are, the more conspicuously, as is fitting, do they exhibit Laban's mingled cunning, resourcefulness, greed and self-complacency. And, on the other hand, Laban's character is sui generis; the picture we get of him is too personal and complex to be denominated merely a "type." It is impossible to resolve this man Laban into a mythological personage—he is altogether human—or into a tribal representative (e.g. of "Syria" over against "Israel"—Jacob) with any degree of satisfaction to the world of scholarship. Whether a character of reliable family tradition, or of popular story-telling, Laban is "a character"; and his intimate connection with the chief personage in Israel's national recollections makes it highly probable that he is no more and no less historical than Jacob himself (cf JACOB, VI).

LABANA, lab'a-na (Λαβανά, Labaná, 1 Esd 5 29): Called Lebanah in Ezr 2 45.

LABOR, lā'bēr (לָבֵר, yēghī'a, עָמַל, āmāl; κόπος, kópos): The word (noun and vb.) denoting hard work or "toil" (thus in RV of Dt 26 7; Josh 7 3; Rev 2 2) represents several Heb and Gr words, chiefly those above. Occasionally, as in Hab 3 17 (ma'āsēh), it stands for "fruit of labor." Sometimes, in conjunction with "travail," it refers to childbirth (Gen 35 16.17, yālād; cf 1 Thess 2 9; 2 Thess 3 8). Examples of the word in the ordinary sense are of yēghī'a, Gen 31 42; Job 39 11. 16; Ps 128 2; of āmāl, common in Eccl 1 3.8; 2 10.11.18, etc.; of kópos, 1 Cor 15 58 ("your labor is not vain," etc.); 1 Thess 1 3 ("work of faith and labor of love"; cf He 6 10); 1 Tim 5 17 ("labor in the word and in teaching"). See WORK; SLAVERY.

LACCUNUS, lak'ū-nus (Λακκουῖνος, Lakkoĩnos; AV Lacunus): One of the sons of Addi who returned with Ezra and had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 31). The name does not, as might have been expected, occur in Ezr 10 30. See note on the passage (in Lange's Comm.) as to the reconciliation of the lists in 1 Esd and Ezr.

LACE, lās (פָּתִיל, pāthīl, variously rendered in Gen 38 18.25; Ex 39 3; Nu 15 38; 19 15; Jgs 16 9; Ezk 40 3): In modern Eng. the noun "lace" usually denotes a delicate ornamental fabric, but in the word in the sense of "that which binds" is still in perfectly good use, esp. in such combinations as "shoelace," etc. It is this latter significance that is found in Ex 28 28 ("They shall bind . . . with a lace of blue"); 28 37; 39 21. 31, and in Sir 6 30 AV, κλωσμα, klōsma (RV "rib-and").

LACEDAEMONIANS, las-ē-dē-mō'ni-anz (Σπαρτιάται, Spartiatāi; once only Λακεδαιμόνιοι, Lakedaimónioi, 2 Macc 5 9): The inhabitants of Sparta or Lacedaemon with whom the Jews claimed some kinship and formed alliances (1 Macc 12

2.5.6.20.21; 14 20.23; 15 23; 2 Macc 5 9). The alliance mentioned in 1 Macc 12 5-23 is based, among other grounds, on that of a common descent of Jews and Lacedaemonians from Abraham, for which the only probable presumption—suggested by Ewald—is the similarity of names, "Pelagii" and Peleg son of Eber (Gen 10 25; 11 16). This has been reasonably objected to, and perhaps the most that can be said on this point is that the belief in some relationship between the Jews and the Lacedaemonians seems to have prevailed when 1 Macc was written. The alliance itself is said to have been formed (1 Macc 12 20) between Areus, king of the Lacedaemonians and Onias the high priest; but it is not easy to make out a consistent chronology for the transaction. For the renewal of the alliance (c 144 BC) by Jonathan (1 Macc 12 5-18) and again by Simon (1 Macc 14 16-23), something can be said, as the Greeks had finally been deprived of independence in 146 BC, and Sparta was only obliged to lend assistance to Rome and may be supposed to have been doing so in helping the Jews against Syria. It is possible, too, that as against Syrian Hellenism the Jews were anxious to show that they had the assistance of distinguished Greeks, though the actual power of Sparta was much reduced from that of former times. The facts, at least of the alliance and the correspondence, seem to be sufficiently attested, though it is not easy to reconcile all the particulars. Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10; XIII, v, 8; XIV, xii, 2.3) gives the correspondence at greater length than the writer of the Maccabees.

LACHISH, lā'kish (לָכִישׁ, lākhīsh; LXX Λαχίς, Lachis [Josh 15 39], Μαχίς, Machés): A town in the foothills of the Shephelah on the border of the Phili plain, belonging to Judah, and, from the mention of Eglon in connection with it, evidently in the southwestern portion of Judah's territory. Onom locates it 7 miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) toward Daroma, but as the latter place is uncertain, the indication does not help in fixing the site of L. The city seems to have been abandoned about 400 BC, and this circumstance has rendered the identification of the site difficult. It was formerly fixed at Umm Lakis, from the similarity of the name and because it was in the region that the Bib. references to L. seem to indicate, but the mound called Tell el-Hesi is now generally accepted as the site. This was first suggested by Conder in 1877 (PEFS, 1878, 20), and the excavations carried on at the Tell by the Pal Exploration Fund in 1890-93 confirmed his identification. Tell el-Hesi is situated on a wady, or valley, of the same name (Wādy el-Hesi), which runs from a point about 6 miles W. of Hebron to the sea between Gaza and Askelon. It is a mound on the very edge of the wady, rising some 120 ft. above it and composed of debris to the depth of about 60 ft., in which the excavations revealed the remains of distinct cities which had been built, one upon the ruins of another. The earliest of these was evidently Amorite, and could not have been later than 1700 BC, and was perhaps two or three centuries earlier (Bliss, Mound of Many Cities). The identification rests upon the fact that the site corresponds with the Bib. and other historical notices of L., and esp. upon the discovery of a cuneiform tablet in the ruins of the same character as the Am Tab, and containing the name of Zimridi, who is known from these tablets to have been at one time Egypt governor of L. The tablets, which date from the latter part of the 15th or early part of the 14th cent. BC, give us the earliest information in regard to L., and it was then an Egypt dependency, but it seems to have revolted and joined with other towns in an attack upon Jerus, which was also an Egypt dependency. It was perhaps compelled to do so by the Khabiri who were then raiding this region. The place was, like Gaza, an important one for Egypt, being on the frontier and on the route to Jerus, and the importance is seen in the fact that it was taken and destroyed and rebuilt so many times.

We first hear of it in the history of Israel when Joshua invaded the land. It was then an Amorite city, and its king, Japhia, joined the confederacy formed by Adonizedek, king of Jerus, to resist Joshua. They were defeated in the remarkable battle at Gibeon, and the five confederate kings were captured and put to death at Makkedah (Josh 10 passim; 12 11). L. was included in the lot of Judah (15 39), and it was rebuilt, or fortified, by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 5.9). It was besieged by Sennacherib in the reign of Hezekiah and probably taken (2 K 18 13) when he invaded Judah and besieged Jerus, but the other references to the siege leave it doubtful

Layard's Monuments of Nineveh

(2 K 18 14.17; 19 8; 2 Ch 32 9; Isa 36 2; 37 8). The Assyrian monuments, however, render it certain that the place was captured. The sculptures on the walls of Sennacherib's palace picture the storming of L. and the king on his throne receiving the submission of the captives (Ball, Light from the East, 190-91). This was in 701 BC, and to this period we may assign the enigmatical reference to L. in Mic 1 13, "Bind the chariot to the swift steed, O inhabitant of Lachish: she was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion." The cause of the invasion of Sennacherib was a general revolt in Phoenicia, Pal, and Philistia, Hezekiah joining in it and all asking Egypt for aid (Rawlinson, Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World, ch ix). Isaiah had warned Judah not to trust in Egypt (Isa 20 5.6; 30 1-5; 31 1), and as L. was the place where communication was held with Egypt, being a frontier fortress, perhaps even having an Egypt garrison, it would be associated with the "sin" of the Egypt alliance (HGHL, 234).

The city was evidently rebuilt after its destruction by Sennacherib, for we find Nebuchadnezzar fighting against it during his siege of Jerus (Jer 34 7). It was doubtless destroyed by him, but we are informed by Nehemiah (11 30) that some of the returned Jews settled there after the captivity. It is very likely that they did not reoccupy the site of the ruined city, but settled as peasants in the territory, and this may account for the transference of the name to Umm Lakis, 3 or 4 miles from Tell el-Hesay, where some ruins exist, but not of a kind to suggest Lachish (Bliss, op. cit.). No remains of any importance were found on the Tell indicating its occupation as a fortress or city later than that destroyed by the king of Babylon, but it was occupied in some form during the crusades, Umm Lakis being held for a time by the Hospitallers, and King Richard is said to have made it a base of operations in his war with Saladin (HGHL). The Tell itself, if occupied, was probably only the site of his camp, and it has apparently remained since that time without inhabitants, being used for agricultural purposes only. See further, PALESTINE (RECENT EXPLORATION), III, 1.

LACK (forms of לָקַח, hāṣēr, "to lack," אָיִן, 'ayin, "nought"): This word in its various forms has the usual meaning of "want," "need," "deficiency." There is but little change in the use of the word in the different VSS. Sometimes one of the common synonyms is exchanged for the word itself, e.g. in the OT, 1 S 21 15 RV has "lack" ("Do I lack madmen?") where AV has "need of"; Prov 5 23, "for lack," instead of "without"; 6 32, "void of" for "lacketh"; 10 21, "lack" for "want"; 31 11, "lack" for "need"; Isa 59 15, "lacking" for "fail-eth." In the NT "lack" is the tr of ὑστερέω, husterēō, lit. "to be behind," and ἐνδεής, endēs, "in want." In Lk 8 6, RV reads "had no" instead of "lacked" in AV. In 2 Cor 11 9, RV gives "my want" for "which was lacking to me" in AV; in Col 1 24 "that which is lacking" for "that which is behind"; Jas 2 15 "lack" for "destitute." It will readily be seen that sometimes the slight variation helps to explain the meaning.

LACUNUS, la-kū'nus. See LACCUNUS.

LAD: In the OT this word occurs as the tr of na'ar, "young person," "child," "servant," RV properly substituting "servant" in 2 K 4 19; Jgs 16 26 is another passage where either sense of the original word may be intended. The word occurs in the NT in Jn 6 9 as the tr of παιδάριον, paidarion; in Acts 20 12, παῖς, pais (AV "young man").

LADAN, lā'dan (לָדָן, la'dān; AV Laadan):

(1) A descendant of Ephraim, and an ancestor of Joshua (1 Ch 7 26).

(2) A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Ch 23 7.8.9; 26 21), also called LIBNI (q.v.).

LADANUM, lad'a-num (לָדָן, lōf): Gen 37 25 RVm; elsewhere MYRRH (q.v.).

LADDER, lad'ēr. See SIEGE, 4, (c).

LADDER OF TYRE (Ἡ κλίμαξ ἀπὸ τῆς κλίμακος Τύρου, Hē klímax [apó tēs klímakos] Týrou): Not mentioned in the OT or the NT, but in Apoc (1 Macc 11 59), where it is said that Antiochus VI, after having confirmed Jonathan in the high-priesthood, appointed his brother Simon captain over the territory included between the Ladder of Tyre and the borders of Egypt. The Ladder has been located at different points on the coast between Tyre and Acre, such as the Ras el-'Abyadh ("Promontorium Album" of the ancient geographers), about 7 miles S. of Tyre, and Ras en-Nakūrah, about 6 miles farther S., and Ras el-Musheirifeh, a little farther on. These are capes jutting westward into the sea from the ridge which runs parallel to the general line of the coast. These capes project more than a mile into the sea, and present a very bold and precipitous front from 200 to 300 ft. in height. The ascent on either side of the promontory is very steep, and at Ras el-'Abyadh steps were cut in the white rock, which led to the identification of this point with the Ladder, but a reference to Jos (BJ, II, x, 2) leads to a different conclusion. He locates it 100 stadia N. of Acre, which corresponds fairly well with the southern limit of the whole promontory, which is about 12 miles N. of Acre, but not at all with Ras el-'Abyadh. The altitude of el-Musheirifeh is greater than that of el-'Abyadh and may have had steps cut in it similar to the latter. It is more probable that the L. was here, or at en-Nakūrah, but the term applied to the whole promontory, which offered a serious obstacle to the passage of armies, or even caravans, since the approach is precipitous on either side, and at Ras el-'Abyadh the road skirts the edge of a sheer precipice, where a misstep would hurl one into the sea some 200 ft. below. The application of the term to the whole promontory seems to be indicated by Jos, since he speaks of it as one of the mountains which encompass the plain of Ptolemais (Acre) and the highest of all. This would not be true of any one of the three capes mentioned, but would be if the hills behind, which form their base, were included. That it was designated as the Ladder of Tyre rather than of Acre was probably due to the fact that the promontory is nearer the former city (see Thomson, LB, II, ed 1882; SWP, name-lists, s.v.).

LADE, lād, LADING, lād'ing: "To lade" in the sense of "to load" is retained by RV in nearly all passages where the word occurs in AV (but cf AV and RV reading of Ps 68 19; Isa 46 1), "They laded us with such things" (Acts 28 10 AV). The ἐπιτίθημι, epitithēmi, "to put on," is rendered by RV, "They put on board such things." Lk 11 46 RV reads "ye load" instead of AV "ye lade."

Lading (φορτίον, phortion) is found in Acts 27 10 in its usual meaning, "the lading of a ship."

LADY, lā'di: This word should be taken in the sense of "mistress" in Isa 47 5.7 (Heb g'bhereth) (so ARV). In Jgs 5 29; Est 1 18 it is the tr of another Heb word (sārāh), best rendered "princess" (so RV in Est, but not in Jgs). In 2 Jn vs 1.5 it is the tr of κυρία, kuriā, which some interpreters regard as a proper name. See CYRIA; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; ELECT LADY.

LAEL, lā'el (לֵאל, lā'el, "belonging to God"): Father of Eliasaph, the prince of the father's house of the Gershonites (Nu 3 24).

LAHAD, lā'had (לָהָד, lāhadh): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 2).

LAHAI-ROI, la-hī'roi, lā-hī-rō'ī, lā'hī-roi (לָהָי רֹאִי, lahay rō'ī). See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHMAM, lā'mam (לָהֶמֶם, lahmām): A town in the Judacan Shephelah (Josh 15 40, RVm "Lah-mas"), possibly the modern el-Lahm, 2½ miles S. of Beit Jibrin.

LAHMAS, lā'mas. See LAHMAM.

LAHMI, lā'mī (לָהֶמִי, lahmī): According to 1 Ch 20 5, the brother of Goliath of Gath. See EL-HANAN.

LAISH, lā'ish (לַיִשׁ, layish):

(1) A city in the upper Jordan valley, apparently colonized by the Sidonians, which was captured by the Danites and called DAN (q.v.) (Jgs 18 7, etc; Isa 10 30 AV). In Josh 19 47 the name appears as "Leshem."

(2) A Benjamite, father of Palti or Paltiel, to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 S 25 44; 2 S 3 15).

LAISHAH, la-'sha, lā'ish-a (לַיִשָּׁה, layshāh, AV Laish): A place named in Isa 10 30 with Gallim and Anathoth. It should apparently be sought on the N. of Jerus. Some would identify Gallim with Beit Jāla, near Bethlehem. Conder suggests 'Īsāwīyeh on the eastern slope, to the N.N.E. of the Mount of Olives.

LAKE, lāk (λίμνη, līmne): The word is used (Lk 5 1,2; 8 22,23,33) of the Lake of Gennesaret or Sea of Galilee, and (Rev 19 20; 20 10,14,15; 21 8) of the "lake of fire and brimstone." Lakes are not abundant in Syria and Pal. The Dead Sea, which might be called a lake, is in most places in EV called the Salt Sea. It is called by the Arabs Bahr Lūt, Sea of Lot. It is a question whether the Waters of Merom (Josh 11 5,7) can be identified with the Hūleh, a marshy lake in the course of the Upper Jordan, N. of the Sea of Galilee. E. of Damascus on the edge of the desert there are saltish lakes in which the water of the rivers of Damascus (see 2 K 5 12) is gathered and evaporates. In the Lebanon W. of Ba'albek is the small Lake Yammūnūch, which is fed by copious springs, but whose water disappears in the latter part of the summer, being drained off by subterranean channels. The Lake of Humş on the Orontes is artificial, though ancient. On the lower Orontes is the Lake of Antioch. ALFRED ELY DAY

LAKE OF FIRE (λίμνη τοῦ πυρός, līmne tou purós): Found in Rev 19 20; 20 10,14(bis),15. Rev 21 8 has "the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." The brimstone in connection with "the lake of fire" occurs also in Rev 19 20 and 20 10, the latter being a backward reference to the former passage. In Rev 20 14 the words, "This is the second death, even the lake of fire," are either a gloss originally intended to elucidate ver 15 through a reference to 20 6, or, if part of the text, formed originally the close of ver 15, whence they became displaced on account of the identity of the words once immediately preceding them in ver 15 with the words now preceding them in ver 14. The "lake of fire" can be called "the second death" only with reference to the lost among men (ver 15), not with reference to death and Hades (ver 14). In all the above references "the lake of fire" appears as a place of punishment, of perpetual torment, not of annihilation (20 10). The beast (19 20); the pseudo-prophet (19 20; 20 10); the devil (20 10); the wicked of varying description (20 15; 21 8), are cast into it. When the same is affirmed of death and Hades (20 14), it is doubtful whether this is meant as a mere figure for the cessation of these two evils personified, or has a more realistic background in the existence of two demon-powers so named (cf Isa 25 8; 1 Cor 15 26,54 ff; 2 Esd 7 31). The Scriptural source for the conception of "the lake of fire" lies in Gen 19 24, where already the fire and the brimstone occur together, while the locality of the catastrophe described is the neighborhood of the Dead Sea. The association of the Dead Sea with this fearful judgment of God, together with the desolate appearance of the place, rendered it a striking figure for the scene of eschatological retribution. The two other OT passages which have "fire and brimstone" (Ps 11 6; Ezk 38 22) are dependent on the Gen passage, with which they have the figure of "raining" in common. In Rev 21 8, "their part" seems to allude to Ps

11 6, "the portion of their cup." In En 67 4 ff the Dead Sea appears as the place of punishment for evil spirits. Of late it has been proposed to derive "the lake of fire" from "the stream of fire" which destroys the enemies of Ahura in the Zoroastrian eschatology; so Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis, 1906, 433, 434. But the figures of a stream and a lake are different; cf 2 Esd 13 9-11, where a stream of fire proceeds from the mouth of the Messiah for the destruction of His enemies. Besides, the Pers fire is, in part, a fire of purification, and not of destruction only (Bousset, 442), and even in the apocalyptic Book of En, the fires of purification and of punishment are not confounded (cf En 67 4 with 90 20). The OT fully explains the entire conception. GERHARDUS VOS

LAKKUM, lak'um (לַקֻּם, lakḳūm; AV Lakum): An unidentified town on the border of Naphtali, named with Adami, Nekeb and Jabneel, apparently nearer the Jordan (Josh 19 33).

LAMA. See ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

LAMB, lam: (1) The most used word is לֶמֶךְ, kebshes, "a young ram"; cf Arab. كَبْش, kebsh, "ram"; often of sacrifices; (fem.) كَبْشָה, kabhsāh, or كِبْشָה, kibhsāh, "ewe lamb" (2 S 12 3); by transposition קֶשֶׁב, keshbh, and fem. קֶשֶׁבָה, kishbāh (Gen 30 40; Lev 3 7; 5 6). (2) קָר, kar, "lamb" (Dt 32 14; 1 S 15 9; 2 K 3 4). (3) שֶׁה, seh, "one" of the flock (Gen 22 7; Lev 5 7). (4) צֶאֱן, gō'n, "sheep," "goats," "flock"; cf Arab. ضَآن, dā'n, "sheep" (Ex 12 21); and בֶּן צֶאֱן, ben gō'n (Ps 114 4). (5) פֶּלֶח, falch, "young lamb"; cf Arab. طَلِي, ṭalī, "young lamb"; and טֶלְאִים, ṭlā'im (1 S 7 9; Isa 40 11; 65 25). (6) אֶמְרִין, 'imrīn (Ezr 6 9,17; 7 17). (7) ἀρνίος, arniōs, acc. pl. (Lk 10 3); dim. ἀρνίον, arnion (Jn 21 15; Rev 5 6, etc.). (8) ἀμνός, amnós (Jn 1 29,36; Acts 8 32; 1 Pet 1 19). See SHEEP.

ALFRED ELY DAY

LAMB OF GOD (ὁ ἀμνός τοῦ θεοῦ, ho amnós tou theou): This is a title specially bestowed upon Our Lord by John the Baptist (Jn 1 29-36), "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" In XII P—an apocryphal book, probably of the 2d cent.—we have the term used for the Messiah, "Honor Judah and Levi, for from them shall arise for you the Lamb of God, saving all nations by grace." But the term does not seem to have been of any general use until it received its distinctly Christian significance. It has been generally understood as referring to the prophetic language of Jer 11 19, and Isa 53 7.

It is far more probable, however, that the true source of the expression is to be found in the important place which the "lamb" occupies in the sacrifices, esp. of the PC. In the daily morning and evening sacrifice. How familiar this would be to the Baptist, being a member of a priestly family! On the Sabbath the number of the offerings was doubled, and at some of the great festivals a still larger number were laid upon the altar (see Ex 29 38; Nu 28 3,9,13). The lamb of the Passover would also occupy a large place in the mind of a devout Israelite, and, as the Passover was not far off, it is quite possible that John may have referred to this as well as to other suggested ideas connected with the lamb. The sacrificial significance of the term seems to be far more probable than the mere comparison of the character of Our Lord with meekness and gentleness, as suggested by the words of the prophets, although these contain much more than the mere reference to character (see below). That this became the clearly defined conception of apostolic teaching is clear from passages in Paul and Peter (1 Cor 5 7; 1 Pet 1 18f). In the Book of Rev the reference to the Lamb occurs 27 t. The word here used differs from that in Jn. The amnos of the Gospel has become the arion of the Apocalypse, a diminutive form suggestive of affection. This is the word used by Our Lord in His rebuke and forgiveness of Peter (Jn 21 15), and is peculiarly touched therefore with an added meaning of pathetic tenderness. Westcott, in his Comm. on Jn 1 29, refers to the conjecture that there may have been flocks of lambs passing by on their way to Jerus to be used at the feast. This is possible, but fanciful. As applied to Christ, the term certainly suggests the meekness and gentleness of Our Lord's nature and work, but could not have been used by John without containing some reference to the place which the lamb bore in the Judaic ritualism.

The significance of the Baptist's words has been variously understood. Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, among the ancients, Lucke, DeWette, Meyer, Ewald, Alford, among the moderns, refer it to Isa 53 7; Grotius, Understood Bengel, Hengstenberg, to the paschal lamb; Baumgarten-Crusius, etc., to the sin offering; Lange strongly urges the influence of the passage in Isa 53, and refers to John's description of his own mission under the influence of the second part of Isa, in which he is supported by Schaff. The importance of the Isa-thought is found in Mt 8 17; Acts 8 32; 1 Pet 2 22-25.

It is to be observed that the LXX in Isa 53 7 translates the Heb word for sheep (sch), by the Gr word for lamb. In ver 10, the prophet's "suffering one" is said to have made "his soul an offering for sin," and in ver 4 "he hath borne our griefs," where bearing involves the conception of sin offering, and as possessing justifying power, the idea of "taking away." John indeed uses not the LXX word pherein (pherein), but airein (airein), and some have maintained that this simply means "put away," or "support," or "endure." But this surely loses the suggestion of the associated term "lamb," which John could not have employed without some reference to its sacrificial and therefore expiatory force. What Lange calls a "germ perception" of atonement must certainly have been in the Baptist's mind, esp. when we recall the Isa-passages, even though there may not have been any complete dogmatic conception of the full relation of the death of Christ to the salvation of a world. Even the idea of the bearing of the curse of sin may not be excluded, for it was impossible for an Israelite like John, and esp. with his surroundings, to have forgotten the significance of the paschal lamb, both in its memorial of the judgment of Egypt, as well as of the deliverance of Israel. Notwithstanding every effort to take out of this striking phrase its deeper meanings, which involve most probably the combination of all the sources above described, it must ever remain one of the richest mines of evangelical thought. It occupies, in the doctrine of atonement, a position analogous to that brief word of the Lord, "God is a Spirit" (Jn 4 24), in relation to the doctrine of God.

The Lamb is defined as "of God," that is, of Divine providing. See Isa 53; Rev 5 6; 13 8. Its emphatic and appointed office is indicated by the definite article, and whether we refer the conception to a specific sacrifice or to the general place of a lamb in the sacrificial institution, they all, as being appointed by and specially set apart for God, suggest the close relation of Our Lord to the Divine Being, and particularly to His expiatory sacrifice.

(1) The condition of being unable or imperfectly able to walk, which unfitted any descendant of Aaron so afflicted for service in the priesthood (Lev 21 18), and rendered an animal unsuitable for sacrifice (Dt 15 21). The offering of animals so blemished was one of the sins with which Malachi charges the negligent Jews of his time (Mal 1 8-13).

(2) Those who suffered from lameness, such as Mephibosheth, whose limbs were injured by a fall in childhood (2 S 4 4; 9 3). In the prophetic description of the completeness of the victory of the returning Israelites, it is predicted that the lame shall be made whole and shall leap like a hart (Jer 31 8; Isa 35 6). The unfitness of the lame for warfare gives point to the promise that the lame shall take the prey (Isa 33 23). Job in his graphic description of his helplessness to the weak before his calamity says, "And feet was I to the lame" (Job 29 15). The inequality of the legs of the lame is used in Prov 26 7 as a similitude of the inaptness with which a fool uses a parable.

In the enigmatical and probably corrupt passage describing David's capture of Jerus, the lame and blind are mentioned twice. In 2 S 5 6 it was a taunt on the part of the Jebusites that even a garrison of cripples would suffice to keep out the Israelites. The allusion in ver 8 may be read, "Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites let him . . . slay both the lame and blind, which hate David's soul," as it is in LXX. The Vulg says, "David had offered a reward on that day to the man who should smite the Jebusite and reach the water pipes of the houses, and remove the blind and lame who hated David's soul." It is possible, however, that Budde's emendation is more correct and that it is a threat against the indiscriminate slaughter of the Jebusites: "Whoso slayeth a Jebusite shall bring his neck into peril: the lame and blind are not hated of David's soul." The proverbial saying quoted in ver 8 cannot be correct as rendered in AV, for we read in Mt 21 14 that the lame came to Our Lord in the temple and were healed.

The healing of the lame by Our Lord is recorded in Mt 11 5; 15 30,31; 21 14; Lk 7 22; 14 13. For the apostolic miracles of healing the lame, see CRIPPLE. In He 12 13 the Christians are counseled to courage under chastisement, lest their despair should cause that which is lame to be "turned out of the way."

LAMECH, lā'mek (לֶמֶךְ, lemekh; Λάμεχ, Lámech, "a strong youth"["?]):

(1) The name is first mentioned in Gen 4 18-24. Here L., the son of Methusael, is named as the last of the descendants of Cain. He was the father of Jabel, Jubal, Tubal-cain, and Naamah. As the husband of two wives, viz. Adah and Zillah, he furnishes the first recorded instance of polygamy. It is very instructive to note that this "father of polygamy" at once becomes the first blustering tyrant and a braggadocio; we are fully permitted to draw this conclusion from his so-called "sword-lay" (Gen 4 23f). He does not put his trust in God, but in the weapons and implements invented by his sons, or rather these instruments, enhancing the physical and material powers of man, are his God. He glories in them and misconstrues the Divine kindness which insured to Cain freedom from the revenge of his fellow-men.

(2) Another L. is mentioned in Gen 5 25,28 (cf 1 Ch 1 3; Lk 3 36), the son of Methuselah and the father of Noah. His words (Gen 5 29) show the great difference between this descendant of Seth and the descendant of Cain. While the one is stimulated to a song of defiance by the worldly inventions of his sons, the other, in prophetic mood, expresses his sure belief in the coming of better times, and calmly and prayerfully awaits the period of comfort and rest which he expected to be ushered in by his son Noah. LAMEDH, lā'meth (ל): The 12th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as l. It came also to be used for the number 30. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

LAMENT, la-ment'. See MUSIC.

LAMENTATION, lam-en-tā'shun. See BURIAL, III, 2; IV, 4, 5, 6.

LAMENTATIONS, lam-en-tā'shunz, BOOK OF —The Lamentations of Jeremiah: This is a collective name which tradition has given to 5 elegies found in the Heb Canon that lament the fate of destroyed Jerus.

1. Name

The rabbis call this little book 'Ekkhāh (עֵקְחָהּ, "how"), according to the word of lament with which it begins, or kīnōth (קִינוּת). On the basis of the latter term the LXX calls it θρήνοι, thrēnoi, or Lat Threni, or "Lamentations."

The little book consists of 5 lamentations, each one forming the contents of a chapter. The first 4 are marked by the acrostic use of the alphabet.

2. Form

In addition, the kīnāh ("elegy") meter is found in these hymns, in which a longer line (3 or 4 accents) is followed by a shorter (2 or 3 accents). In chs 1 and 2 the acrostic letters begin three such double lines; in ch 4, however, two double lines. In ch 3 a letter controls three pairs, but is repeated at the beginning of each line. In ch 5 the alphabet is wanting; but in this case too the number of pairs of lines agrees with the number of letters in the Heb alphabet, i.e. 22. In chs 2, 3 and 4, the letter 'ayin follows pē, as is the case in Ps 34. Ch 1, however, follows the usual order.

These 5 hymns all refer to the great national catastrophe that overtook the Jews and in particular the capital city, Jerus, through

3. Contents the Chaldaeans, 587-586 BC. The sufferings and the anxieties of the city, the destruction of the sanctuary, the cruelty and taunts of the enemies of Israel, esp. the Edomites, the disgrace that befell the king and his nobles, priests and prophets, and that, too, not without their own guilt, the devastation and ruin of the country—all this is described, and appeal is made to the mercy of God. A careful sequence of thought cannot be expected in the lyrical feeling and in the alphabetical form. Repetitions are found in large numbers, but each one of these hymns emphasizes some special feature of the calamity. Ch 3 is unique, as in it one person describes his own peculiar sufferings in connection with the general calamity, and then too in the name of the others begins a psalm of repentance. This person did not suffer so severely because he was an exceptional sinner, but because of the unrighteousness of his people. These hymns were not written during the siege, but later, at a time when the people still vividly remembered the sufferings and the anxieties of that time and when the impression made on them by the fall of Jerus was still as powerful as ever.

Who is the author of these hymns? Jewish tradition is unanimous in saying that it was Jeremiah. The hymns themselves are found anonymously in the Heb text, while the LXX has in one an additional statement, the Heb style of which would lead us to conclude that it was found in the original from which the version was made. This statement reads: "And it came to pass, after Israel had been taken away captive and Jerus had been laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and uttered this lamentation over Jerus and said." The Tg also states that Jeremiah was the author. The rabbis and the church Fathers have no doubts on the subject. Jerome (cf on Zec 12 11) thinks that 2 Ch 35 25 refers to these hymns. The same is said by Jos (Ant, X, v, 1). If this were the case, then the writer of Ch would have regarded Lam as having been written because of the death of Josiah. But this misunderstanding is not to be ascribed to him. It was easily possible that he was acquainted with lamentations of such a nature, but which afterward were lost. At all events, Jeremiah was by nature adapted to the composition of such elegies, as is proved by his book of prophecies.

4. Author

Only in modern times has the authorship of these hymns by Jeremiah been seriously called into question; and it is now denied by most critics. For this they give formal and material reasons. The language of these lamentations shows many similarities to the discourses of Jeremiah, but at the same time also many differences. The claim that the alphabetical scheme is not worthy of Jeremiah is a prejudice caused by the taste of our times. Heb poets had evidently been making use of such methods for a long time, as it helps materially in memorizing. At the time of the first acute suffering on account of the destruction of Jerus, in fact, he would probably not have made use of it. But we have in this book a collection of lamentations written some time after this great catastrophe. The claim has also been made that the views of Jeremiah and those of the composer or the composers of these poems differ materially. It is said that Jeremiah emphasizes much more strongly the guilt of the people as the cause of the calamity than is done in these hymns, which lament the fate of the people and find the cause of it in the sins of the fathers (5 7), something that Jeremiah is said not to accept (Jer 31 29 f). However, the guilt of the people and the resultant wrath of God are often brought out in these hymns; and Jeremiah does not deny (31 29 f) that there is anything like inherited guilt. He declares rather that in the blessed future things would be different in this respect. Then, too, we are not to forget that if Jeremiah is the author of these patriotic hymns, he does not speak in them as the prophet and the appointed accuser of his people, but that he is at last permitted to speak as he humanly feels, although there is no lack of prophetic reminiscences (cf Lam 4 21 f). In these hymns he speaks out of the heart that loves his Jerus and his people, and he utters the priestly prayer of intercession, which he was not allowed to do when announcing the judgment over Israel. The fact that he also evinces great reverence for the unfortunate king and his Divinely given hereditary dignity (4 20), although as a prophet he had been compelled to pronounce judgment over him, would not be unthinkable in Jeremiah, who had shown warm sympathies also for Jehoiachin (22 24.28). A radical difference of sentiment between the two authors is not to be found. On the other hand, a serious difficulty arises if we claim that Jeremiah was not the author of Lam in the denunciations of Lam over the prophets of Jerus (2 14; 4 13). How could the great prophet of the Destruction be so ignored if he himself were not the author of these sentiments? If he was himself the author, we can easily understand this omission. In his book of prophecies he has spoken exactly the same way about the prophets. To this must be added, that Lam 3 forces us to regard Jeremiah as the author, because of the personal sufferings that are here described. Compare esp. 3 14.37 f. 53 ff. 61.63. What other person was during the period of this catastrophe the cynosure of all eyes as was the prophet, esp., too, because he was guiltless? The claim that here, not an individual, but the personified nation is introduced as speaking, is altogether improbable, and in some passages absolutely impossible (vs 14.48).

This little book must accordingly be closely connected with the person of Jeremiah. If he himself is the author, he must have composed it in his old age, when he had time and opportunity to live over again all the sufferings of his people and of himself. It is, however, more probable, esp. because of the language of the poems, that his disciples put this book in the present shape of uniform sentential utterances, basing this on the manner of lamentations common to Jeremiah. In this way the origin of ch 3 can be understood, which cannot artificially be shaped as his sayings, as in this case the personal feature would be more distinctly expressed. It was probably compiled from a number of his utterances.

In the Heb Canon this book is found in the third division, called ktūbhām, or Sacred Writings, together with the Pss. However, the LXX adds this book to Jer, or rather, to the Book of Bar, found next after Jer. The Hebrews count it among the 5 meghillōth, or Rolls, which were read on prominent anniversary days. The day for the Lamentation was the 9th of Ab, the day of the burning of the temple. In the Roman Catholic church it is read on the last three days of Holy Week.

LAMP, LAMPSTAND, lamp'stand (נֵר, נֶרֶךְ, nēr, nēr, נֶרֶךְ, lappīdh, Phoen נֶרֶךְ, lampadh, whence λαμπάς, lampás; λύχνος, lúchnos, is also used): Nēr or nēr is properly "light" or "a light-giving thing," hence "lamp," and is so rendered in RV, but often "candle" in AV. Its use in connection with the tabernacle and the temple (Ex 25 37 ff; 2 Ch 4 20 f), where oil was employed for light (Ex 35 14; Lev 24 2), shows that this is its proper meaning. Lappīdh is properly "a torch" and is thus rendered generally in RV, but "lamp" in Isa 62 1, where it is used as a simile. AV renders it "lamp" usually, but "torch" in Nah 2 3 f; Zec 12 6. In Job 12 5 RV renders it "for misfortune," regarding it as composed of the noun נֶרֶךְ, pidh, and the preposition לְ, l. Lampas in Gr corresponds to it, but luchnos is also rendered in RV "lamp," while AV gives "candle," as in Mt 5 15 and corresponding passages in the other Gospels.

Lamps: Figs. 1, 2.

Lamps were in use in very remote times, though we have few allusions to them in the early history of Egypt. There are indications that

1. Forms they were used there. Niches for and History lamps are found in the tombs of Tell el-Amarna (Arch. Survey of Egypt, Am Tab, Part IV, 14). Lampstands are also represented (ib, Part III, 7). Torches were of course used before lamps, and are mentioned in Gen (15 17 RV), but clay lamps were used in Canaan by the Amorites before the Israelites took possession. The excavations in Pal have furnished thousands of specimens, and have enabled us to trace the development from about 2000 BC onward. The exploration carried out at Lachish (Tell Hesi) and Gezer (Tell Jezzer) by the Pal Exploration Fund has given ample material for the purpose, and the numerous examples from tombs all over Pal and Syria have supplied a great variety of forms.

"Lamp" is used in the sense of a guide in Ps 119 105; Prov 6 23, and for the spirit, which is called the lamp of Jeh in man (Prov 20 27), and it of course often signifies the light itself. It is used also for the son who is to succeed and represent his father (1 K 15 4), and it perhaps is employed in this sense in the phrase, "The lamp of the wicked shall be put out" (Job 21 17; Prov 13 9; and perhaps Job 18 6).

The early Can. or Amorite lamp was a shallow, saucer-like bowl with rounded bottom and vertical rim, slightly pointed or pinched on one side where the lighted end of the wick was placed (Fig. 1). This form continued into Jewish times, but was gradually changed until the spout was formed by drawing the rim of the sides together, forming a narrow open channel, the remainder of the rim being rolled outward and flattened (Fig. 2), the bottom being also flattened. This was the early Heb pattern and persisted for centuries. The open bowl was gradually closed in, first at the spout, where the rim of one side was lapped over the other, and finally the whole surface was closed with only an orifice in the center for receiving the oil, and at the same time the spout was lengthened. This transformation is seen in Fig. 3, a lamp of the Seleucid period, or from 300 BC. These lamps have usually a circular foot and sometimes a string-hole on one side. The next development was a circular bowl with a somewhat shorter spout, sometimes being only a bulge in the rim, so that the orifice for the wick falls in the rim, the orifice for filling being quite small at the bottom of a saucer-like depression in the center of the bowl. There is sometimes a loop handle affixed on the side opposite to the spout. Sometimes the handle is horizontal, but commonly vertical (Fig. 4). This form is called Roman, and the bowl is often ornamented with mythological human or animal figures (Fig. 5). Other forms are elongated, having numerous wick holes (Fig. 6). The mythological and animal forms were rejected by the Jews as contrary to their traditions, and they made lamps with various other designs on the bowl, such as vine leaves, cups, scrolls, etc (Figs. 7-11). One very marked Jewish design is the seven-branched candlestick (Ex 25 32) of the temple (Fig. 12). The lamps of the parable of the Ten Virgins were probably similar to these (Mt 25 1 ff). The latest form of the clay lamp was what is called Byzantine, the bowl of which has a large orifice in the center and tapers gradually to the spout (Fig. 13); they are ornamented commonly with a palm branch between the central orifice and the wick-hole, or with a cross. Sometimes there is an inscription on the margin (Fig. 13). The words on this read Φως κυ[ρίου] φε[ν] πασιν καλῇ? Phōs ky[riou] pheni pasin kalē, "The light of the Lord shines to all [beautifully?]." Others read, "The Lord is my light"; "beautiful light," etc. These inscriptions determine the period as being Christian. In Rom times, and earlier also, bronze was much used for the finer lamps, often with covers for the orifice and sometimes with chain and ring for hanging (Fig. 14). Very elaborate designs in this material occur.

These terra-cotta lamps are found in the tombs and burial places throughout Pal and Syria, and they were evidently deposited there in connection with the funeral rites. Very few are found in Can. tombs, but they become numerous in later times and esp. in the early Christian centuries. The symbolism in their use for funeral purposes is indicated by the inscriptions above mentioned (see PEFS, 1904, 326 ff; Explorations in Pal, by Bliss Macalister and Wunsch, 4to, published by the Pal Exploration Fund). These lamps were used by the peasants of the country down to recent times, when petroleum has superseded olive oil for lighting. The writer has seen lamps of the Jewish and Rom period with surface blackened with recent usage. Olive oil was commonly used, but terebinth oil also (Thomson, LB, III, 472). H. PORTER

The other words occur less often, and are used in the senses indicated above See COUNTRY; EARTH. ALFRED ELY DAY

LAND-CROCODILE (RV), land-crok'ō-dil (כִּמְלִיכִי, kōmēh; LXX χαμαιλέον, chamaileōn, Lev 11 30; AV Chameleon): Kōmēh is found only here, meaning an animal, the fifth in the list of unclean "creeping things." Elsewhere is it tr<sup>d</sup> "strength" or "power," and it has been thought that here is meant the desert monitor, Varanus griseus, a gigantic lizard which is common in Egypt and Pal, and which attains the length of 4 ft. "Chameleon," which AV has here, is used by RV for tinshemeth (AV "mole") the eighth in the list of unclean "creeping things" (cf nāsham, "to breathe"; tr<sup>d</sup> "swan" in ver 18 m). While it is by no means certain what animal is meant, there could be no objection to "monitor" or "desert monitor." "Land-crocodile" is objectionable because it is not a recognized name of any animal. See CHAMELEON; LIZARD.

LANDMARK, land'märk (גְּבֻלָּה, g'bhūl, lit "boundary"): The boundary may have been marked, as at present, simply by a furrow or stone. The iniquity of removing a landmark is frequently insisted on (Dt 19 14; 27 17; Prov 22 28; 23 10; Job 24 2 [g'bhūlāh]), its removal being equivalent to theft.

LANE, lān (ῥόμη, rhómē): An alley or bypath of a city. Occurs once in Lk 14 21, "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city"; elsewhere tr<sup>d</sup> "street," e.g. Mt 6 2; Acts 9 11; Ecclus 9 7 Tob 13 18.

I. The Vernacular "koinē" the Language of the NT.—The ghost of the old Purist controversy is now laid to rest for good and all. The story of that episode has interest chiefly for the historian of language and of the vagaries of the human intellect. See Winer-Thayer, Grammar

1. The Old of the Idiom of the NT, 1869, 12–19, Point of and Schmiedel's Winer, § 2, for a sketch View of this once furious strife. In the 17th cent. various scholars tried to prove that the Gr of the NT was on a par with the literary Attic of the classic period. But the Hebraists won the victory over them and sought to show that it was Hebraic Gr, a special variety, if not dialect, a Bib. Gr. The 4th ed of Cremer's Biblico-Theological Lexicon of NT Gr (tr<sup>d</sup> by W. Urwick, 1892) quotes, with approval, Rothe's remark (Dogmatik, 1863, 238):

"We may appropriately speak of a language of the Holy Ghost. For in the Bible it is evident that the Holy Spirit has been at work, moulding for itself a distinctively religious mode of expression out of the language of the country which it has chosen as its sphere, and transforming the linguistic elements which it found ready to hand, and even conceptions already existing, into a shape and form appropriate to itself and all its own." Cremer adds: "We have a very clear and striking proof of this in NT Gr."

This was only twenty years ago and fairly represented the opinion of that day. Hatch in 1889 (Essays in Bib. Gr, 34) held that with most of the NT words the key lay in the LXX. But Winer (Winer-Thayer, 20) had long ago seen that the vernacular koinē was "the special foundation of the diction of the NT," though he still admitted "a Jewish-Gr, which native Greeks did not entirely understand" (p. 27). He did not see the practical identity of NT Gr with the vernacular koinē—"common" Greek), nor did Schmiedel in the 8. Auflage of Winer (I. Theil; II. Theil, erstes Heft, 1894–97). In the second ed of his Grammar of NT Gr (ET by Thackeray, 1905, 2), Blass sees the dawn of the new day, though his book was first written before it came. Viteau (Étude sur le grec du Nouveau Testament, I, Le verbe, 1893, II, Le sujet, 1896) occupies wholly the old position of a Judaic Gr. An extreme instance of that view is seen in Guillemaud's Hebraisms in the Gr Testament (1879).

A turn toward the truth comes with H. A. A. Kennedy's Sources of the NT Gr (1895). He finds the explanation of the vocabulary 2. The of both the LXX and the NT to be Revolution the vernacular which he traces back to Aristophanes. It is a good exercise to read Westcott's discussion of the "Language of the NT" in DB, III (1888), and then turn to Moulton, "Language of the NT," in the 1-vol HDB. Westcott says: "The chief peculiarities of the syntax of the NT lie in the reproduction of Heb forms." Moulton remarks: "There is no reason to believe that any NT writer who ever lived in Pal learned Gr only as a foreign language when he went abroad." Still better is it to read Moulton, "New Testament Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery" in Cambridge Biblical Essays (1909, 461–505); Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (1911); or Angus, "The koinē, the Language of the NT," Princeton Review, January, 1910, 42–92. The revolution has come to stay. It is now clear that the Gr of the NT is not a jargon nor a patois. In all essential respects it is just the vernacular koinē of the 1st cent. AD, the lingua franca of the Gr-Rom empire, the legacy of Alexander the Great's conquest of the East. This world-speech was at bottom the late Attic vernacular with dialectical and provincial influences. It was not a decaying tongue, but a virile speech admirably adapted to the service of the many peoples of the time. The able article in vol III of HDB on the "Language of the NT" by Dr. J. H. Thayer appeared in 1900, and illustrates how quickly an encyclopaedia article may become out of date. There is a wealth of knowledge here displayed, as one would expect, but Thayer still speaks of "this species of Greek," "this peculiar idiom," "Jewish Greek," though he sees that its basis is "the common or spoken Greek." The last topic discussed by him is "Problems." He little thought that the biggest "problem" so near solution was the character of the language itself. It was Adolph Deissmann, then of Heidelberg, now of Berlin, who opened the new era in the knowledge of the language of the NT. His Bibelstudien (zumeist aus den Papyri und Inschriften zur Geschichte der Sprache, des Schrifttums und der Religion des hellenistischen Judentums und des Urchristentums) appeared in 1895. In this epoch-making volume he proved conclusively from the papyri and the inscriptions that many of the seeming Hebraisms in the LXX and the NT were common idioms in the vernacular koinē. He boldly claimed that the bulk of the Hebraisms were falsely so termed, except in the case of translating Gr from the Heb or Aram. or in "perfect" Hebraisms, genuine Gr usage made more common by reason of similarity to the Sem idiom. In 1897 he produced Neue Bibelstudien, sprachgeschichtliche Beiträge zumeist aus den Papyri und Inschriften zur Erklärung des Neuen Testaments.

In 1901 (2d ed in 1903) these two volumes were tr<sup>d</sup> as one by A. Grieve under the title Bible Studies. Deissmann's other volumes have confirmed his thesis. The most important are New Light on the NT (1907), The Philology of the Gr Bible (1908), Licht vom Osten (1908), Light from the Ancient East (tr by Strachan, 1910), St. Paul in the Light of Social and Religious History (1912). In Light from the Ancient East, Deissmann illustrates the NT language with much detail from the papyri, ostraka and inscriptions. He is now at work on a new lexicon of the NT which will make use of the fresh knowledge from these sources.

The otherwise helpful work of E. Preuschen, Vollständiges griechisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur (1908–10), fails to utilize the papyri and inscriptions while drawing on the LXX and the NT Apoc and other early Christian literature. But this has been done by Ebeling in his Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zum NT, 1913. The next step was made by A. Thumb, the great philologist, in his Griechische Sprache im Zeitalter des Hellenismus; Beiträge zur Geschichte und Beurteilung der "koinē", 1901, in which the real character of the koinē was for the first time properly set forth.

Winer and Blass had both lamented the need of a grammar of the koinē, and that demand still exists, but Thumb went a long way toward supplying it in this volume. It is to be hoped that he will yet prepare a grammar of the koinē. Thumb's interests cover the whole range of comparative philology, but he has added in this field "Die Forschungen über die hellenistische Sprache in den Jahren 1896–1901," Archiv für Papyrusforschung, II, 396 f; "Prinzipienfragen der koinē-Forschung," Neue Jahrb. für das kl. Alt., 1906; "Die sprachgeschichtliche Stellung des biblischen Griechisch," Theologische Rundschau, V, 85–99.

The other most important name to add is that of J. Hope Moulton, who has the credit of being the first to apply the new knowledge directly to the NT Gr. His Grammar of NT Gr, I, Prolegomena (1906, 2d ed, 1906, 3d ed, 1908, Ger. tr in 1911, Einführung in die Sprache des NT) is a brilliant piece of work and relates the Gr of the NT in careful detail to the vernacular koinē, and shows that in all important points it is the common Gr of the time and not a Hebraic Gr. Moulton probably pressed his point too far in certain respects in his zeal against Hebraisms, but the essential position of Deissmann and Moulton is undoubtedly sound.

Moulton had previously published the bulk of this material as "Grammatical Notes from the Papyri," The Expositor, 1901, 271–82; 1903, 104–21, 423–39;

The Classical Review, 1901, 31-37, 434-41; 1904, 106-12, 151-55; "Characteristics of NT Gr," The Expositor, 1904.

In 1909 appeared his essay, Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery (see above). Since 1908, The Expositor has had a series of papers by J. H. Moulton and George Milligan called "Lexical Notes from the Papyri," which are very useful on the lexical side of the language. Thus the study is fairly launched on its new career. In 1900, A. T. Robertson produced a Syllabus on the NT Gr Syntax from the standpoint of comparative philology, which was rewritten in 1908, with the added viewpoint of the papyri researches, as A Short Grammar of the Gr NT (2d ed, 1909, 3d ed, 1912; translations in Italian in 1910, Ger. and Fr. in 1911, Dutch in 1912). In October, 1909, S. Angus published a good article in the Harvard Theological Review on "Modern Methods in NT Philology," followed in January, 1910, by another in the Princeton Review on "The koinē, the Language of the NT." The new knowledge appears also in Jakob Wackernagel, "Die griechische Sprache" (pp. 291-318, 2d ed, of Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache, 1907). L. Radermacher has set forth very ably "die sprachlichen Vorgänge in ihrem Zusammenhang," in his Neutestamentliche Grammatik: Das Griechisch des Neuen Testaments im Zusammenhang mit der Volkssprache. It is in reality the background of the NT Gr and is a splendid preparation for the study of the Gr NT. A full discussion of the new knowledge in grammatical detail has been prepared by A. T. Robertson under the title A Grammar of the Gr NT in the Light of Historical Research (in press). Moulton and Schmiedel are planning also to complete their works.

The proof of the new position is drawn from several sources:

(1) The papyri.—These rolls have lain in the museums of the world many years and attracted

3. The Proof of the New Position

little attention. For lists of the chief collections of the papyri see Moulton, Prolegomena, 259-62; Milligan, Selections from the Gr Papyri, xi, xii; Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit; Laut- und Wortlehre, vii-x; Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 20-41; Robertson, Grammar of the Gr NT, Bibliography. New volumes of papyri as a result of recent explorations in Egypt are published each year. See PAPHYRUS, and in the other encyclopaedias s.v. Most of the papyri discovered belong to the period of the koinē (the first three centuries BC and AD in round numbers), and with great wealth of illustration they show the life of the common people of the time, whether in Egypt or Herculaneum (the two chief regions represented). There are various degrees of culture shown, as can be seen in any of the large volumes of Grenfell and Hunt, or in the handbooks of Lietzmann, Griechische Papyri (1905), and of Milligan, Greek Papyri (1910). They come from the scrap-heaps of the long ago, and are mainly receipts, contracts, letters of business or love, military documents, etc. They show all grades of culture, from the illiterate with phonetic spelling to the man of the schools. But we have here the language of life, not of the books. In a most startling way one notes the similarities of vocabulary, forms, and syntax between the language of the papyri of the 1st cent. AD and that of the NT books. As early as 1778, F. W. Sturz made use of the Charta Borgiana, "the first papyrus ever brought to Europe" (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 39), and in 1841 Thiersch likewise saw the value of the papyri for the philology of the LXX. But the matter was not pressed. Lightfoot threw out a hint about the value of letters of the people, which was not followed till Deissmann saw the point; cf Moulton, Proleg., 242. It is not necessary here to illustrate the matter at length. Deissmann takes up in detail the "Biblical" words in Thayer's Lexicon, and has no difficulty in finding most of them in the papyri (or inscriptions). Thus πληροφορέω, plērophorēō, is shown to be common in the papyri. See Deissmann, Bible Studies and Light from the Ancient East, for extensive lists. The papyri show also the same meanings for many words once thought peculiar to the Bible or the NT. An instance is seen in the official sense of πρεσβύτερος, presbūteros, in the papyri, ὁ πρεσβύτερος τῆς κώμης, ho presbūteros tēs kōmēs (Pap. Lugd. A 35 f), "without doubt an official designation" (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 155). So ἀδελφός, adelphós, for members of the community, ἀναστροφή, anastrophē, for manner of life, ἀντιλήψις, antilēpsis, "help," λεϊτουργία, leitourgia, "public service," πάροικος, pároikos, "sojourner," etc (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 107). R. Helbing (Grammatik der Septuaginta, 1908) and H. St. John Thackeray (A Grammar of the OT in Gr according to the LXX, 1909) have applied the new knowledge to the language of the LXX, and it has been discussed with much ability in the first volumes. The use of the papyri for grammatical purposes is made easier by the excellent volume of E. Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit; Laut- und Wortlehre (1906), though his "Syntax," is still a desideratum. Useful also is G. Crönert, Memoria Graeca Herculaneensis (1903).

(2) The ostraka.—The literature on this subject is still small in bulk. In 1899 Ulrich Wilcken published Griechische Ostraka aus Aegypten und Nubien, and in 1902 W. E. Crum produced his book of Christian ostraka called Coptic Ostraca from the Collections of the Egypt Exploration Fund, the Cairo Museum, and Others. This was followed in 1905 by H. R. Hall's Coptic and Gr Texts of the Christian Period from Ostraka, Stelae, etc. These broken pieces of pottery were used by the lowest classes as writing material. It was very widely used because it was so very cheap. Wilcken has done more than anyone else to collect and decipher the ostraka. Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 46) notes that Cleanthes the Stoic "wrote on ostraka or on leather" because too poor to buy papyrus. So he quotes the apology of a Christian for using potsherd for a letter: "Excuse me that I cannot find papyrus as I am in the country" (Crum, Coptic Ostraca, 55). The use of ἀπέχω, apéchō, on an ostrakon for a receipt in full, illustrates well the frequent use of this word in the NT (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 111).

(3) The inscriptions.—Here caution must be used since many of the inscriptions give, not the vernacular, but the literary language. The official (legal and military) decrees often appear in very formal style. But a number do preserve the vernacular idiom and often have the advantage of being dated. These inscriptions are chiefly on stone, but some are on metal and there are a few wax tablets. The material is vast and is constantly growing. See list of the chief collections in Deissmann's Light from the Ancient East, 10-20. Boeckh is the great name here. As early as 1779 Walch (Observationes in Matt. ex graecis inscriptionibus) made use of Gr inscriptions for NT exegesis, and R. A. Lipsius says that his father (K. H. A. Lipsius, author of Grammatische Untersuchungen über die biblische Gräcität) "contemplated a large grammar of the Gr Bible in which he would have availed himself of the discoveries in modern epigraphy" (Deissmann, Light, etc, 15). Schmiedel has made good use of the inscriptions so far in his revision of Winer; H. A. A. Kennedy (Sources of NT Gr, 1895),

H. Anz (Subsidia ad Cogn., etc, 1894), R. Helbing (Grammatik der Septuaginta, 1908), J. Psichari (Essai sur le Grec de la Septante, 1908), H. St. John Thackeray (A Grammar of the OT in Gr according to the LXX, 1909), and R. Meister (Prol. zu einer Grammatik der Septuaginta, 1907) turned to good account the inscriptions for the linguistic problems of the LXX, as indeed Hatch (Essays in Bib. Gr, 1889) had already done. W. Dittenberger added some valuable "Grammatica et orthographica" to his Orientalis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae (2 vols, 1903, 1905). See also E. L. Hicks and G. F. Hill, Gr Historical Inscriptions (1901), and Hicks's paper "On Some Political Terms Employed in the NT," Classical Review, 1887, 4 ff, 42 ff. W. M. Ramsay's Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia (2 vols, 1895, 1897) and his other works show keen insight in the use of the inscriptions. Deissmann's Bible Studies (1895, 1901) applied the knowledge of the inscriptions to the LXX and to the NT. In his Light from the Ancient East (1910) copious use is made of the inscriptions for NT study. Moulton (Prol., 1906, 258 f, for lists) is alive to the value of the inscriptions for NT grammar, as indeed was Blass (Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, 1896) before him.

Cf, further, G. Thieleme, Die Inschriften von Magnesia am Mäander und das Neue Testament (1906); T. Nägeli, Der Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus (1905); and J. Rouffiac, Recherches sur les caractères du Grec dans le NT d'après les Inscr. de Priène (1911). Special treatises or phases of the grammar of the inscriptions appear in Meisterhans-Schwyzler, Grammatik der attischen Inschriften (1900); Nachmanson, Laute und Formen der magnetischen Inschriften (1896); Schweizer, Grammatik der pergamenischen Inschriften (1898).

Moulton and Milligan have drawn freely also on the inscriptions for their "Lexical Studies" running in The Expositor (1908-). The value of the inscriptions for the Gr of the NT is shown at every turn. For instance, πατριάρχος, πρόδρομος, is no longer a "Biblical" word. It appears in a metrical inscription (undated) of Trachonitis on a tomb of a pagan "high priest" and "friend of the gods" (Deissmann, Light, etc, 88); cf Kibel, Epigrammata Graeca, etc, no. 460. Even ἀγάπη, agapē, occurs on a pagan inscription of Pisidia (Papers of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, 2, 57). See, further, W. H. P. Hatch's "Some Illustrations of NT Usage from Gr Inscriptions of Asia Minor," Journal of Bib. Lit., 1908, 134-46.

(4) Modern Greek.—As early as 1834 Heilmeyer saw that the modern Gr vernacular went back to the koinē (Moulton, Prol., 29), but it is only in recent years that it was clearly seen that the modern Gr of the schools and usually in the newspapers is artificial, and not the real vernacular of today. Mullach's work (Grammatik der griechischen Vulgar-sprache, 1856) was deficient in this respect. But Jannaris' Historical Gr Grammar (1897) carries the history of the vernacular Gr along with the literary style. Hatzidakis, Einleitung in die neugriechische Grammatik, 1892, clears the air very much and connects the modern Gr with the NT. But it is to Thumb that we are indebted for the best knowledge of the vernacular (ἡ δημοτική, hē dēmōtikē) as opposed to the literary language (ἡ καθαρὴ ὁμιλία, hē katharēiōsia) of today. Mitsotakis (Praktische Grammatik, 1891) had treated both together, though Wied (Die Kunst, die neugriechische Volkssprache) gave only the vernacular. But Wied is only elementary. Thumb alone has given an adequate treatment of the modern Gr vernacular, showing its unity and historical contact with the vernacular koinē (Handbuch der neugriechischen Volkssprache, 1895; Thumb-Angus, Handbook of Modern Greek Vernacular, 1912). Thus one can see the living stream of the NT speech as it has come on down through the ages. It is impossible to overestimate the importance of modern Gr vernacular in the knowledge of NT Gr. The disappearance of the optative, the vanishing of the infinitive before ὅτι, hina, and itacism are but instances of many others which are luminous in the light of the modern Gr vernacular. See Psichari, Essais de grammaire historique néo-grecque (1886-89).

(5) Historical and comparative grammar.—From this source the koinē gets a new dignity. It will take one too far afield to sketch here the linguistic revolution wrought since the publication of, and partly caused by, Bopp's Vergleichende Grammatik (1857), following Sir Wm. Jones's discovery of Sanskrit. The great work of Brugmann and Delbrück (Grundriss der vergleichenden Grammatik der indogermanischen Sprachen, I-V, 1892-1909) marks the climax of the present development, though many workers have won distinction in this field. The point to accent here is that by means of comparative philology the Gr language is seen in its proper relations with other languages of the Indo-Germanic family, and the right interpretation of case, preposition, mode, tense, voice, etc, is made possible. The old traditional empiricism is relegated to the scrap-heap, and a new grammatical science consonant with the facts has taken its place. See Delbrück, Intro to the Study of Language (1882); Giles, Short Manual of Comparative Philology (1901), for a résumé of the facts. Wright, Comparative Grammar of the Gr Language (1912), applies the new learning to the Gr tongue. The progress in classical scholarship is well shown by Sandys in his History of Classical Scholarship (I-III, 1906-8) and by Gudeman, Geschichte der klass. Philologie, 2. Aufl., 1909. Innumerable monographs have enriched the lit. of this subject. It is now feasible to see the Gr language as a whole, and grasp its historical unity. Seen in this light the koinē is not a dying tongue or a corrupt dialect. It is a normal and natural evolution of the Gr dialects into a world-speech when Alexander's conquests made it possible. The vernacular koinē which has developed into the modern Gr vernacular was itself the direct descendant of the Attic vernacular which had its roots in the vernacular of the earlier dialects. The dialectal developments are closely sketched by Thumb, Handbuch der griechischen Dialekte (1909), and by Buck, Intro to the Study of Gr Dialects (1910), not to mention the older works of Hoffmann, Meister, etc. Jannaris has undertaken in his Historical Gr Grammar (1897) to sketch and interpret the facts of the Gr tongue throughout its long career, both in its literary and vernacular aspects. He has succeeded remarkably well on the whole, though not quite seeing the truth about the modern Gr vernacular. Schanz is seeking to lay the foundation for still better work by his Beiträge zur historischen Syntax der griechischen Sprache (1882-). But the NT student must be open to all the new light from this region, and it is very great. See, further, Dieterich, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der griech. Sprache von der hellen. Zeit (1898).

As already indicated, the Gr of the NT is in the main just the vernacular koinē of the 1st cent. AD, though Gr as used by men of ability and varying degrees of culture. The most striking difference between the vernacular koinē and the literary Attic is seen in the vocabulary. The writers in the literary koinē show more likeness to the classic Attic, but even they reveal the changes due to the intervening centuries. There was, of course, no violent break. The changes came gradually and naturally. It is mainly at this point that Deissmann has done such

4. Characteristics of the Vernacular "koinē"

brilliant work in his Bible Studies and other books. He has taken the lists of "Biblical" and "ecclesiastical" words, as given by Cremer and Thayer, and has shown from the papyri, ostraka, inscriptions, or koinē writers that they are not peculiar to the Bible, but belong to the current speech of the time. The proof is so overwhelming and extensive that it cannot be given here. Some words have not yet been found in the non-Bib. koinē, but they may be any day. Some few words, of course, belong to the very nature of Christianity (χριστιανός, christianós, for instance), but ἀπόστολος, apóstolos, βαπτισμός, baptismós, πάροικος, pároikos, συναγωγή, synagōgē, and hundreds of others can no longer be listed as "Biblical." New meanings come to old words also. Cf δαίμονιον, daímōnion. It is interesting to note that the NT shows many of the words found in Aristophanes, who caught up the vernacular of his day. The koinē uses more words from the lower strata of society. Aristotle likewise has many words common in the koinē, since he stands at the parting of the ways between the old dialects and the new koinē of Alexander's conquests. The koinē develops a fondness for compound and even double compound (sesquipedalian) words; cf, for instance, ἀνεκδιήγητος, anekdīgētos; ἀνεκλάλητος, aneklālētos; ἀνεξερεύνητος, anexereúētos; ἀνταποκρίνομαι, antapokrínomai; οἰκοδεσπότης, oikodespótēs; ὀλιγόψυχος, oligópsuchos; προσαναπλήρωμα, prosanaplērōma; συναντιλαμβάνομαι, sanantilambánomai; ὑπερεντυγχάνω, hyperentugchánō; χρυσοδακτύλιος, chrusodaktýlios, etc. The use of diminutives is also noteworthy in the koinē as in the modern Gr: cf θυγάτριον, thugátrion; κλινάριον, klinátrion; κοράσιον, korásion; κυνάριον, kynátrion; δνάριον, ondátrion; φνάριον, opsátrion; πλοιδάριον, ploudátrion; ὦτιον, ótion, etc. The formation of words by juxtaposition is very common as in πληρο-φορέω, plērophorēō, χειρό-γραφον, cheiró-graphon. In phonetics it is to be noticed that ε, οι, η, γ, ν, ι all had the value of ē in "feet." This itacism was apparent in the early koinē. So α=ε and ο and ω were not sharply distinguished. The Attic ττ became σσ, save in a few instances, like ἐλάττω, eláttō, κρείττω, kreíttō. The tendency toward de-aspiration (cf Ionic) was manifest; cf ἐφ' ἐλπίδι, eph' helpídi, for the reverse process. Elision is less frequent than in Attic, but assimilation is carried farther. The variable final consonants ν and ς are used generally before consonants. We find -ει- for -ιει- as in πείν. Οὐθéis, oulhéis, and μηθéis, mēthéis, are common till 100 BC, when they gradually disappear before οδéis, oudéis, and μηδéis, mēdéis. In general there is less sense of rhythm and more simplicity and clearness. Some of the subtle refinements of form and syntax of the classic did not survive in the koinē vernacular. In accident only a few points may be noted. In substantives the Ionic -ρης, -rēs, is frequent. The Attic second declension vanishes. In the third declension forms like νύκταν, nýkta, show assimilation to the first. Both χάριν, chárin, and χάριτα, cháríta, occur. Contraction is sometimes absent (cf Ionic) as in ὁρέων, oréōn. Adjectives show forms like ἀσφαλῆν, asphalēn, and indeclinable πλήρης, plērēs, appears, and πᾶν, pán, for πάντα, pánia (cf μέγαν, mégan), δυοί, duoi, for δυοίν, duoín. The dual is gone. Even the dual pronouns ἐκάτερος, hekátēros, and πότερος, póteros, are rare. Τίς, tis, is occasionally used like δους, hóstis. *Ὁς ἐάν, hós edn, is more frequent than ὅς ἂν, hós an, in the 1st cent. AD. The two conjugations blend more and more into one, as the -μ-forms vanish. There is some confusion in the use of -άω and -εω-verbs, and new presents occur like ἀποκτείνω, apoktēnnō, ὀπιάνω, opíanō, στήκω, stēkō. The forms γίνομαι, gínomai, γινώσκω, gínōskō, are the rule now. There is much increase in aorists like ἔσχα, éscha, and imperfects like εἶχα, eícha. The form -σαν, -san (ἐχσαν, eíchosan, ἔχσαν, éschosan) occasionally appears. Quite frequent is a perfect like δέδωκαν, dédōkan, and the augment is often absent in the pluperfect as in δέδωκε, dēdōke. Per contra, a double augment occurs in ἀπεκατέστη, apekaléstē, and a treble augment in ἠνέχθησαν, ēnēchhēsan. The temporal augment is often absent with diphthong as in οἰκοδομήθη, oikodomēthē. The koinē has -ωσαν, -ōsan, not -των, -tōn. In syntax the tendency is toward simplicity, to short sentences, the paratactic construction, and the sparing use of particles. The vernacular koinē avoids both the bombast of Asianism and the artificiality of Atticism. There is, indeed, more freedom in violating the rules of concord as to gender, number, and case. The nominativus pendens is common. The comparative does duty often for the superlative adjective, and the superlative generally has the elative sense. The accusative is increasingly common with verbs. The line between transitive and intransitive verbs is not a hard-and-fast one. The growth in the use of prepositions both with nouns and in composition is quite noticeable, but some of the older prepositions, like ἀμφί, amphí, are vanishing. The cases used with various prepositions are changing. The instrumental use of ἐν, en, is very common. Many new adverbial and prepositional phrases have developed. The optative is nearly dead and the infinitive (apart from the use of τοῦ, toú, ἐν τῷ, en tō, εἰς τό, eis tō, with the infinitive) is decaying before ἵνα, hina. The future part. is rare. Μή, mē, begins to encroach on οὐ, ou, with infinitives and participles. The periphrastic conjugation is specially common. The direct discourse is more frequent than the indirect. The non-final use of ἵνα, hina, is quite noticeable. There are, besides, dialectal and provincial peculiarities, but these do not destroy the real unity of the vernacular koinē any more than do individual traits of separate writers.

II. Literary Elements in the NT.—Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 245) is disposed to deny any literary quality to the NT books save the Ep. to the He. "The Ep. to the He shows us Christianity preparing for a flight from its native levels into the higher region of culture, and we are conscious of the beginnings of a Christian world-literature." He speaks of it also as "a work which seems to hang in the background like an intruder among the NT company of popular books." One feels that this is an extreme position and cannot be justified by the facts. It is true that Peter and John were ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται, agrámmatoi kaí idiōtai (Acts 4 13), and not men of the schools, but this was certainly not the case with Luke and Paul who were men of literary culture in the truest sense. Luke and Paul were not Atticists, but that artificial idiom did not represent the best type of culture. Deissmann admits that the NT has become literature, but, outside of He, he denies any literary quality in its composition. Paul, for instance, wrote only "letters," not "epistles." But Rom and Eph confront us. See Milligan, Gr Papyri, xxxi, for a protest against the sweeping statement of Deissmann on this point. One need not go to the extreme of Blass, "Die rhythmische Komposition des Hebr. Briefes," Theol. Studien und Kritik, 1902, 420-61; Die Rhythmen der asiatischen und römischen Kunstprosa, 1905, to find in Hebrews and Paul's writings illustrations of the artificial rules of the Asianists. There is undoubtedly rhythm in Paul's eloquent passages (cf 1 Cor 13, 15), but it is the natural poetic quality of a soul aflame with high passions, not conformity to rules of rhetoric. To deny literary quality to Luke and Paul is to give a narrow meaning to the word "literary" and to be the victim of a theory. Christianity did make use of the vernacular koinē, the wonderful world-speech so providentially at hand. But the personal equation figured here as always. Men of culture differ in their conversation from illiterate men and more nearly approximate literary style. It is just in Luke, Paul, and the author of He that we discover the literary flavor of men of ability and of culture, though free from artificiality and pedantry. The eloquence of He is that of passion, not of the art of Asianism. Indeed, the Gospels all show literary skill in the use of material and in beauty of language. The Gospel of Jn has the rare elevation and dignity of the highest type of mind. There is no Atticistic tendency in the NT as in Jos, Ant. There is no posing for the present or for posterity. It is the language of life, the vernacular in the main, but rising at times from the very force of passion to high plateaus of emotion and imagination and poetic grace from the pens of men of real ability, and in some instances of high culture.

III. The Semitic Influence.—It is no longer possible to explain every variation in the NT from the classic Attic by the term Hebraism. That easy solution has disappeared. Sooth to say, when the true character of the vernacular koinē is understood, there is not very much left to explain. The NT Gr as a rule is just normal koinē. Milligan (Gr Papyri, xxx) admits on the part of Moulton "an overtendency to minimize" the "presence of undoubted Hebraisms, both in language and grammar." That is true, and is due to his strong reaction against the old theory of so many Hebraisms. The Semiticisms (Hebraisms and Aramaisms) are very natural results of the fact that the vernacular koinē was used by Jews who read the Heb Bible and the LXX tr, and who also spoke Aram. as their native tongue. The LXX, as tr of Gr, directly from the Heb (or Aram.), has a much greater number of these Semiticisms. See Swete, An Intro to the OT in Gr (1900), for the salient facts. Thackeray in his Grammar of the OT in Gr (1909) shows "the κοινή—the basis of Septuagint Gr" in §3, and in §4 discusses "the Sem element in Septuagint Gr." The matter varies in different parts of the LXX, but in all parts the Sem influence goes far beyond what it is in the NT. In the NT we have free composition in Gr, except in certain portions of the Gospels and Acts where Aram. originals (oral or written) lie beyond the Gr text. So in particular Lk 1, the words of Jesus in Lk 2, and the opening chapters of Acts. See Dalman, Words of Jesus (1902), and J. T. Marshall, "The Aram. Gospel," Expos. Ser. IV vols II-VIII; see also ARAMAIC supra. There is, to some extent, translation-Gr, as in the LXX. The quotations from the OT are either from the Heb original, or, as most frequently, from the LXX. In either case we have translation-Gr again. These two classes cover the more obvious Semiticisms if we add Heb names (persons and places) and other transliterations like ἀβδδών, abaddōn, ἀλληλούϊα, allelouia. The Gr of the LXX does not, of course, give a true picture of the Gr spoken by the Jews in Alexandria or in Pal. But the constant reading of the LXX was bound to leave its impress on the style of the people (cf the King James Version and the Eng. language). The surprise, in fact, is not the number of Semiticisms, but, all things considered, the fewness of them. Luke, just because he was a Gentile and so noted the Hebraisms in the LXX, shows rather more of them than the other NT writers: cf προσέθετο τρίτον πένμναι, prosthēto triton pēmpsai (Lk 20 12). Some of the points of style so common in the LXX find occasional || in the papyri or inscriptions, like βλέπων βλέπω, blēpōn blēpō, χαρὰ χαίρω, charā chairō, ὅν . . . . . αὐτόν, hōn . . . . . autōn. Others are more obviously imitations of the Heb style, as in ἀρέσκειν ἐνδρίων τινος, arēskein enōrion tinos, rather than ἀρέσκειν τινί, arēskein tini. But there is a certain dignity and elevation of style so characteristic of the Heb OT that reappears in the NT. The frequent use of καί, kaí, in parts of the NT reminds one of the LXX and the Heb waw. There is, besides, an indefinable tone in the NT that is found in the OT. Swete (Apocalypse of St. John, cxx) laments the tendency to depreciate unduly the presence of Hebraisms in the NT. The pendulum may have swung too far away from the truth. It will strike the level, but we shall never again be able to fill our grammars and comms. with explanations of so many peculiar Hebraisms in the NT. On the whole the Gr NT is standard vernacular koinē.

IV. Individual Peculiarities of NT Writers.

There is not space for an extended discussion of this topic. The fact itself calls for emphasis, for there is a wide range in style between Mark's Gospel and He, 1 Pet and Rom, Luke's Gospel and the Apocalypse. There are no Atticists found in the NT (cf 4 Macc in the LXX and Jos), but there are the less literary writings (Mt, Mk, the Johannine books, the other catholic epp.) and the more literary writings (Luke's writings, Paul's Epp., and He). But even so, no hard-and-fast line can be drawn. Moulton, Cambridge Biblical Essays, 484, thinks 2 Pet more like the Atticistic writings, "though certainly the Atticists would have scorned to own a book so full of 'solecisms.'" Moulton assumes that 2 Pet is pseudepigraphic, and does not credit the notion that the crude "Babu" Gr, to use Abbott's term, may be Peter's own uncorrected style (cf Acts 4 13), while 1 Pet may have the smoothing effect of Silvanus' hand (cf 1 Pet 5 12). A similar explanation is open concerning the grammatical lapses of the Apocalypse, since John is also called ἀγράμματος, agrammatos, in Acts 4 13, whereas the Gospel of Jn may have had the revision of the elders of Ephesus (cf Jn 21 24). But whatever the explanation, there is no doubt of the wide divergences of style between different books and groups of books in the NT list. The Lukan, Johannine, Petrine, Pauline groups stand apart, but with cleavages within each group. Harnack (Luke the Physician, 1907; The Sayings of Jesus, 1908; The Acts of the Apostles, 1909; The Date of the Acts of the Apostles, 1911) has accepted and strengthened the contention of Hawkins (Horae Synopticae, 2d ed, 1909) and of Hobart (Medical Language of Luke, 1882) that the medical terms in the Gospel of Luke and of Acts show that the books were written by the same writer and that a physician, and so Luke. The diversities in style here and there are chiefly due to the sources of information used. Even in the Pauline books, which form so well-marked a collection, striking diversities of language and style appear. But these letters cover a period of some 15 years of intense activity and mental and spiritual development, and treat a great variety of topics. They properly reflect the changing phases of Paul's preaching of the cross of Christ in different places and under varying circumstances and confronting ever fresh problems. The plays of Shakespeare offer a useful parallel. Even in Paul's old age, in the Pastoral Epistles the stamp of Paul's spirit is admitted by those who admit only Pauline fragments; cf J. Weiss, Beiträge zur Paulinischen Rhetorik (1897). The style is indeed the man, but style is also the function of the subject, and style varies with different periods of a man's life. E. A. Abbott has made an excellent discussion of the Johannine Vocabulary

(1905) and of Johannine Grammar (1906), but special grammars of each writer are hardly to be expected or desired. But Nägeli has begun a study of Paul's vocabulary in his Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus (1905). The Gospel of Mt shows very little of that Hebraism that one would expect from the general purpose and tone of the book. It is possible, of course, that the supposed original was in Aram., or, if in Gr, of a more Hebraistic type. Whether the present Gr Mt made use of Mark's Gospel and a collection of Logia (Q), we do not know. Certainly Mark's Gospel is written in colloquial koinē with little evidence of the culture of the schools. Mark is a faithful reporter and does his work with rare simplicity and vividness. He reveals clearly the Aram. background of Christ's teaching. The writings of James and Jude do not show that only Gr was spoken in the home at Nazareth, nor that they used only Aram. These two epp. are evidently free compositions in Gr with much of the freshness of imagery so manifest in the parables of Jesus Himself. This brief sketch does not do justice to the richness and variety of language in the books of the NT.

V. The "koinē" Spoken by Jesus.—See ARAMAIC LANGUAGE for proof that Jesus spoke that language as the vernacular of the people of Pal. But Christ spoke the koinē also, so that the NT is not an idiom that was unknown to the Master. Gwilliam (1-vol HDB, "Language of Christ") does still deny that Jesus spoke Gr, while Roberts takes the other extreme in his book, Gr the Language of Christ and His Apostles (1888). Per contra again, Jülicher considers it impossible to suppose that Jesus used Gr (art. "Hellenism" in EB). J. E. H. Thomson, "The Language of Pal during the Time of Our Lord" (Temple, Bible Dict.) argues convincingly that Pal was bi-lingual and that Jesus knew and spoke Gr as well as Aram. Peter evidently spoke in Gr on the Day of Pentecost and was understood by all. Paul was understood in Jerus when he spoke in Gr (Acts 21 37). Jesus taught in Decapolis, a Gr region, in the region of Tyre and Sidon (Gr again). Galilee itself was largely inhabited by Gentiles who spoke Gr. At the time of the Sermon on the Mount, we read that people were present from Decapolis and Peraea, besides the mixed multitude from Galilee, Judaea, and Jerus (Mt 4 25; Lk 6 17). Thomson proves also that in Matthew's Gospel the quotation from the OT in the words of Jesus is from the LXX, while Matthew's own quotations are from the Heb. The case seems clear. It is not possible to say always when Jesus spoke Gr and when Aramaic. That would depend on the audience. But it is practically certain that Christ Himself knew and spoke at will the vernacular koinē, and thus had this linguistic bond with the great world of that era and with lovers of the Gr Test. today.

LITERATURE.—The lit. on this subject is very extensive. The most important volumes have been mentioned in the discussion above.

LITERATURE

There were only two languages employed in the archetypes of the OT books (apart from an Egypt or Pers or Gr word here and there), namely, Heb and Bib. Aram., both of which belong to the great family of languages known as Semitic.

1. The Semitic Languages.—The languages spoken in Southwestern Asia during the historical period dealt with in the Bible have been named Shemitic, after the son of Noah from whom the majority of peoples speaking these languages—Arabs, Hebrews, Aramaeans and Assyrians (Gen 10 21 ff)—were descended. To show, however, that the description does not fit exactly the thing described—the Elamites and Lydians having probably not spoken a Shemitic language, and the Canaanites, including Phoenicians, with the colonists descended from those at Carthage and elsewhere in the Mediterranean coast lands, as well as the Abyssinians (Ethiopians), who did, being reckoned descendants of Ham (Gen 9 18; 10 6 ff)—the word is now generally written "Semitic," a term introduced by Eichhorn (1787). These languages were spoken from the Caspian Sea to the S. of Arabia, and from the Mediterranean to the valley of the Tigris.

(1) South Semitic or Arabic, in-
1. Members cluding the language of the Sabaeans of Semitic (Himyaritic) inscriptions, as well as Family Ge'ez or Ethiopic. Arab. is now spoken from the Caucasus to Zanzibar, and from the East Indies to the Atlantic.

(2) Middle Sem or Canaanitish, including Heb, old and new, Phoen, with Punic, and Moabitish (language of MS).

(3) North Sem or Aram., including (a) East Aram. or Syrian (language of Syrian Christians), language of Bab Talm, Mandaeans; (b) West or Palestinian Aram. of the Tgs, Palestinian Talm (Gemara), Bib. Aram. ("Chaldee"), Samaritan, language of Nabataean inscriptions.

(4) East Sem—language of Assyrian-Bab inscriptions.

With the exception of a few chapters and fragments mentioned below, the OT is written entirely in Heb. In the OT itself this language is called "the Jews'" (2 K 18 26.

2. The Name Hebrew Hebrew cally, what in fact it was, "the language [Heb 'lip'] of Canaan." In the appendix to the LXX of Job it is called Syriac; and in the introduction to Eccles it is for the first time—that is, in 130 BC—named Heb. The term Heb in the NT denotes the language of the OT in Rev 9 11, but in Jn 5 2; 19 13.17 this term means the vernacular Aramaic. In other passages it is doubtful which is meant. Jos uses the same name for both. From the time of the Tgs, Heb is called "the sacred tongue" in contrast to the Aram. of everyday use. The language of the OT is called Old Heb in contrast to the New Heb of the Mish, the rabbinic, the Spanish poetry, etc.

Of Old Heb the remains are contained almost entirely in the OT. A few inscriptions have been recovered, i.e., the Siloam Inscriptions, a Heb calendar, a large number of ostraka from Samaria, a score of pre-exilic seals, and coins of the Maccabees and of the time of Vespasian and Hadrian.

II. History of the Hebrew Language.—Heb as it appears to us in the OT is in a state of decadence corresponding to the present position of spoken Arabic. In the earliest period it no doubt resembled the classical Arabic of the 7th and following centuries. The variations found between the various strata of the language occurring in the OT are slight compared with the difference between modern and ancient Arabic.

Heb was no doubt originally a highly inflected language, like classical Arabic. The noun had three cases, nom., gen., and acc., ending in um, im, am, respectively, as in the Sabaeen inscriptions. Both vbs. and nouns had three numbers (sing., dual and pl.) and two genders, masc.

and fem. In the noun the dual and pl. had two cases. The dual and 2d and 3d pers. pl. and 2d pers. sing. fem. of the impf. of the vb. ended in nūn. In certain positions the m of the endings um, im, am in the noun was dropped. The vb. had three moods, indicative, subjunctive, and jussive, ending in u, a, and - respectively; as well as many forms or stems, each of which had an active and passive voice.

In the Heb of the OT most of these inflexions have disappeared. Of the three cases of the noun only the acc. am has survived in a few adverbial forms, such as 'omnām, "truly." The dual has entirely disappeared from the vb., and also from the noun, with the exception of things that occur in pairs, such as hand, eye, which have no pl. The nom. case of the dual and pl. of the noun has disappeared, and the oblique case is used for both. Except in cases of poetic archaism the final nūn of the vb. has been lost, and, as the final vowels have fallen away in vbs., as well as in nouns, the result is that the jussive forms serve for indic. and subj. also. Many of the forms or stems have fallen into desuetude, and the passive forms of two alone are used.

One of the most remarkable facts connected with the Heb of the OT is that although that lit. extends through a period of over 1,000 years, there is almost no difference between the language of the oldest parts and that of the latest. This phenomenon is susceptible of several explanations. In the first place, nearly the whole of the OT lit. is religious in character, and as such the earliest writings would become the model for the later, just as the Korān—the first prose work composed in Arab. which has survived—has become the pattern for all future compositions. The same was true for many centuries of the influence of Aristophanes and Euripides upon the language of educated Greeks, and, it is said, of the influence of Confucius upon that of the learned Chinese.

But a chief cause is probably the fact that the Sem languages do not vary with time, but with place. The Arab. vocabulary used in Morocco differs from that of Egypt, but the Arab. words used in each of these countries have remained the same for centuries—in fact, since Arab.

began to be spoken in them. Similarly, the slight differences which are found in the various parts of the OT are to be ascribed, not to a difference of date, but to the fact that some writers belonged to the Southern Kingdom, some to the Northern, some wrote in Pal, some in Babylonia (cf Neh 13 23.24; Jgs 12 6; 18 3).

The OT lit. falls into two main periods: that composed before and during the Bab exile, and that which falls after the exile. But even between these two periods the differences of language are comparatively slight, so that it is often difficult or impossible to say on linguistic grounds alone whether a particular chapter is pre- or post-exilic, and scholars of the first rank often hold the most contrary opinions on these points. For instance, Dillmann places the so-called document P before D in the regal period, whereas most critics date D about 621 and P about 444 BC.

It is needless to add that the various writers differ from one another in point of style, but these variations are infinitesimal compared with those of Gr and Lat authors, and are due, as has been said above, largely to locality and environment. Thus the style of Hosea is quite different from that of his contemporary Amos, and that of Deutero-Isa shows very distinctly the mark of its place of composition.

A much more potent factor in modifying the language was the influence of foreign languages upon

Heb, esp. in respect to vocabulary.

The earliest of these was probably Egypt, but of much greater importance was Assy, from which Heb gained a large number of loan words. It is well known that the Bab script was used for commercial purposes throughout Southwestern Asia, even before the Hebrews entered Canaan (see TEXT), but the influence of Babylon upon Pal seems to have been greatly exaggerated. The main point of contact is in the mythology, which may have been common to both peoples. In the later, esp. post-exilic stages of the language, many Aramaisms are found in respect to syntax as well as vocabulary; and in later phases still, Pers and even Gr words are found.

As in other languages, so in Heb, the vocabulary of the poetical lit. differs from that of the prose writers. In Heb, however, there is not the hard-and-fast distinction between these two which obtains in the classics. Whenever prose becomes elevated by the importation of feeling, it falls into a natural rhythm which in Heb constitutes poetry. Thus most of the so-called prophetic books are poetical in form. Another mark of poetry is a return to archaic grammatical forms, esp. the restoration of the final nūn in the vb.

The form of Sem which was indigenous in the land of Canaan is sometimes called Middle Sem.

Before the Israelites entered the country, it was the language of the Canaanites from whom the Hebrews took it over. That Heb was not the language of Abraham before his migration appears from the fact that he is called an Aramaean (Dt 26 5), and that Laban's native language was Aramaic (Gen 31 47). A further point is that the word "Sea" is used for the West and "Negeb" for the South, indicating Pal as the home of the language (so Isa 19 18).

As the aboriginal inhabitants of the land of Canaan were not Semites, we cannot infer the existence of the Heb language any earlier

10. Its Antiquity than the first immigrations of Semites into Pal, that is, during the third millennium BC. It would thus be a much younger member of the Sem family than Assy-Bab, which exhibits all the marks of great antiquity long before the Heb language is met with.

The Bab exile sounded the death-knell of the Heb language. The educated classes were deported to 11. When Hebrew Became a Dead Language Babylon or fled to Egypt, and those who remained were not slow to adopt the language used by their conquerors. The old Heb became a literary and sacred tongue, the language of everyday life being probably Aramaic.

Whatever may be the exact meaning of Neh 8 8, it proves that the people of that time had extreme difficulty in understanding classical Heb when it was read to them. Yet for the purpose of religion, the old language continued to be employed for several centuries. For patriotic reasons it was used by the Maccabees, and by Bar Cochba (135 AD).

LITERATURE.—Gesenius, Geschichte der hebr. Sprache und Schrift; Berthéau, "Hebr. Sprache" in RE, 2d ed; see also "Literature" in the following section.

III. Chief Characteristics of Hebrew.—The special marks which particularly distinguish a language may be found in its alphabet, in its mode of inflexion, or in its syntax.

The Heb alphabet is characterized by the large number of guttural sounds which it contains, and these are not mere palatals like the

1. Characteristic Sounds Scotch or Ger. ch, but true throat sounds, such as are not found in the Aryan languages. Hence when the Phoen alphabet passed over into Greece, these unpronounceable sounds, פ, ח, ע, א, were changed into vowels, A, E, H, O. In Heb the guttural letters predominate. "In the Heb dictionaries the four gutturals occupy considerably more than a fourth part of the volume; the remaining eighteen letters occupying considerably less than three-fourths." Besides the guttural, there are three strong consonants כ, פ and צ, which are sounded with compression of the larynx, and are quite different from our t, k and s. In Gr the first was softened into θ, the other two were dropped as letters but retained as numerals.

Though the Heb alphabet comprises no more than 22 letters, these represent some 30 different sounds, for the 6 letters ב, ג, ד, כ, פ and ת, when they fall immediately after

2. Letters Representing Two Sounds a vowel, are pronounced bh(v), gh, dh, kh, ph (f) and th. Moreover, the gutturals ח and ע each represent two distinct sounds, which are still in use in Arabic. The letter ה is sometimes sounded at the end of a word as at the beginning.

A peculiarity of the Heb alphabet is that the letters are all consonants. Four of these, however, were very early used to represent

3. Consonants Representing Vowels vowel and diphthong sounds, namely, א, ה, ו and י. So long as Heb was a spoken language no other symbols than these 22 letters were used. It was not until the 7th cent. AD at the earliest that the well-known elaborate system of signs to represent the vowels and other sounds was invented (see TEXT).

A feature of the Heb language is that no word or syllable may begin with a vowel: every syllable begins with a consonant. This is also true of the other Sem languages, except Assy-Bab. When in the course of word-formation a syllable would begin with a vowel, the slight consonant

4. The Syllable א is prefixed. Moreover, more than two consonants may not stand without vowels intervening, as in the Eng. word "strength." At most, two consonants may begin a syllable, and even so a slight vowel is sounded between them, as k'rō'. A word may end in two consonants without vowels, as āmari, but no word or syllable ends in more than two.

The outstanding feature of the Sem family of languages is the root, consisting of three consonants. Practically, the trilateral root

5. Three-Letter Roots is universal. There are a few roots with more than three letters, but many of the quadrilateral roots are formed by reduplication, as kakkab in Arabic. Many attempts have been made to reduce three-letter stems to two-letter by taking the factors common to several roots of identical meaning. Thus דָּם, דָּמָה, דָּמָה, "to be still," seem all to come from a root דָּם. It is more probable, however, that the root is always trilateral, but may appear in various forms.

From these trilateral roots all parts of the vbs. are formed. The root, which, it ought to be stated, is not the infinitive, but the 3d sing.

6. Conjugations or Derived Stems masc. perf. active, expresses the simple idea without qualification, as shūbhar, "he broke." The idea of intensity is obtained by doubling the middle stem letter, as shibbēr, "he broke in fragments"; the passive is expressed by the u-vowel in the first place and the a-vowel in the last, as shubbar, "it was broken in fragments." The reflexive sense prefixes an n to the simple root, or a t (ת) to the intensive, but the former of these is often used as a passive, as nishbar, "it was broken," hithkaddēsh, "he sanctified himself." The causative meaning is given by prefixing the letter ה, as mālahk, "he was king," himitkh, "he caused [one] to be king." A somewhat similar method of vb. building is found outside the Sem language, for example, in Turkish. In some of these Sem languages the number of formations is very numerous. In Heb also there are traces of stems other than those generally in use.

There are no tenses in Heb, in our sense of the word. There are two states, usually called tenses, the perfect and the imperfect. In the 7. Absence of Tenses first the action is regarded as accomplished, whether in the past or future, as shūbhar, "he broke," "he has broken," "he will have broken," or (in prophetic narrative) "he will break"; in the second, the action is regarded as uncompleted, "he will break," "he was breaking," "he is breaking," etc. The present is often expressed by the participle.

The different persons, sing. and pl., are expressed by affixing to the perfect, and by prefixing to the imperfect, fragments of the personal

8. The Pronouns pronouns, as shābharti, "I broke," shābharnū, "we broke," nishbōr, "we will break," and so on. The fragments which are added to the perfect to express the nominative of the pronouns are, with some modification, esp. the change of t into k, added to the vb. to express the accusative, and to the noun to express the genitive; for example, shābhartiā, "you broke," shbhar'khā, "he broke you," beth'khā, "your house," šapharnū, "we counted," šphārānū, "he counted us," šiphrenū, "our book."

The same principles are followed in regard to the noun as to the vb. Many nouns consist solely of the three stem-letters articulated with one or with two vowels, except that monosyllables generally become dissyllabic, owing to the difficulty of pronouncing two vowelless consonants together:

- thus, melekh, "king," sēpher, "book," 9. Formation of Nouns gōren, "threshing-floor" (instead of malk, sāphr, gorn), dābhār, "a word or thing," kārōbh, "near." Nouns denoting place, instrument, etc. are often formed by prefixing the letter m to the root, as mishpāt, "justice," from shāphat, "he judged," mazlēgh, "a fork." Intensity is given to the root idea, as in the vb., by doubling the middle consonant: thus, hōrēsh, "working," hārāsh (for harrāsh), "work-man"; gōnēbh, "stealing," gannābh, "a thief." Similarly, nouns denoting incurable physical defects, "illēm", "dumb," "iwūr", "blind," hērēsh (for hīrēsh), "deaf and dumb." The fem. of nouns, as of the 3d pers. of vbs., is formed by adding the letter t, which when final is softened to h, g'bhīrāh, "queen-mother," "mistress," but g'bhīrēkh, "your mistress."

The inflexion of both vbs. and nouns is accompanied by a constant lengthening or shortening of the vowels of the word, and this

10. Internal Inflexion according to two opposite lines. In vbs. with vowel-affixes the penultimate vowel disappears, as hālakh, "he went," hālkhū, "they went"; in the noun the ante-penultimate vowel disappears, as dābhār, "a word," pl. d'bhārim. As the vowel system, as stated above, is very late, the vocalization cannot be accepted as that of the living tongue. It represents rather the cantillation of the synagogue; and for this purpose, accents, which had a musical as well as an interpunctional value, have been added.

Heb syntax is remarkable for its simplicity. Simple sentences predominate and are usually connected by the conjunction "and." Subordi-

11. Syntax of the Verb nate sentences are comparatively rare, but descriptive and temporal clauses are not uncommon. In the main narrative, the predicates are placed at the beginning of the sentence, first simply in the root form (3d sing. masc.), and then only when the subject has been mentioned does the predicate agree with it. Descriptive and temporal clauses may be recognized by their having the subject at the beginning (e.g. Gen 1 2). A curious turn is given to the narrative by the fact that in the main sentences, if the first vb. is perfect, those which follow are imperfect, and vice versa, the conjunction which coördinates them receiving a peculiar vocalization—that of the definite article. In the Eng. Bible, descriptive and temporal clauses are often rendered as if they were parts of the main sentence, for example, in the first verses of Gen of which the literal tr is somewhat as follows: "At the beginning of God's creating heaven and earth, when the earth was without form and void, and God's spirit [or, a great wind] moved upon the face of the water, God said, Let there be light." It will thus be seen that the structure of Heb narrative is not so simple as it appears.

In the Sem languages, compound words do not occur, but this deficiency is made up by what is called the construct state. The old

12. Syntax of the Noun rule, that the second of two nouns which depend on one another is put in the genitive, becomes, in Heb, the first of two such nouns is put in the construct state. The noun in the construct state loses the definite article, and all its vowels are made as short as possible, just as if it were the beginning of a long word: for example, ha-bayith, "the house," but bēth ha-melekh, "the house of the king," "the palace"; dābhār, "a word," but dibhārē rūāh, "words of wind," "windy words."

The Heb language is very poor in adjectives, but this is made up for by a special use of the construct state just mentioned. Thus to express magnitude the word "God" is added in the gen. case, as in the example above (Gen 1 2), "a mighty wind" = a wind of God; Ps 36 6, "the lofty mountains" = the mountains of God (so 68 15); 80 10, "goodly cedars" = cedars of God; so "a holy man" = a man of God; "the sacred box" = the ark of God, and so on; cf in the NT, Mt 27 54, "the son of God" = Lk 23 47, "a righteous [man]." Matthew was thinking in Aram., Luke in Gr. A similar use is made of other words, e.g. "stubborn" = hard of neck; "impudent" = hard of face; "extensive" = broad of hands; "miserable" = bitter of soul.

IV. Biblical Aramaic.—The Aram. portions of the OT are the following: Ezr 4 8—6 18; 7 11—26; Dnl 2 4—7 28; Gen 31 47 (two

1. Aramaic Portions of the OT words); Jer 10 11. The language in which they are written used to be called Chaldee, but is now generally known simply as Bib. Aram. It represents a further declension from classical Sem as compared with the Heb. The following are the principal points in which Bib. Aram. differs from Heb.

The accent is placed on the last syllable, the first vowel disappearing, e.g. ābhadh for Heb ābhadh. It is curious that the same feature is

2. Phonology found in Algerene and Moroccan Arab.: thus kaṣr becomes ḡṣar. Dentals take the place of sibilants: d'habh for zāhābh; tlāth for shālōsh. The strong Heb z frequently becomes ṣ, and Heb ṣ becomes n: thus, 'ar'ā' for 'ereq; 'uḡ for ḡuḡ.

In Heb the definite article is the prefix hal (ha-); in Aram. the affix ā'; the latter, however, has almost lost its force. The dual is even more

3. Grammar sparingly used than in Heb. The passive forms of vbs. and those beginning with nūn are practically wanting; the passive or reflexive forms are made by prefixing the letter t to the corresponding active forms, and that much more regularly than in Heb, there being three active and three passive forms.

In regard to syntax there is to be noted the frequent use of the part. instead of a finite vb., as in Heb; the disuse of the conjunction

4. Syntax "and" with the vocalization of the article; and the disuse of the construct state in nouns, instead of which a circumlocution with the relative dī is employed, e.g. ḡlēm dī dh'habh, "an image of gold." The same periphrasis is found also in West African Arabic.

It will thus be seen that if Heb represents a decadent form of an original classical language which was very similar to classical Arabic,

5. Aramaic More Decadent than Hebrew Bib. Arab. stands on a still lower level. It is not to be supposed that Heb passed into Aram., though on the analogy of Arab. that view is not untenable. Rather, the different Sem languages became fixed at different epochs. Arab. as a literary language crystallized almost at the source; Heb and the spoken Arab. of the East far down the stream; and Aram. and Moroccan Arab. farthest down of all.

V. Literary Characteristics of the Semites.—The thinking of the Hebrews, like that of other Semites, was done, not in the abstract, but in the concrete.

Thus we find the material put for the immaterial, the expression for the thought, the instrument for the action, the action for the feeling. This mode of expression frequently gives rise to striking anthropomorphisms. Thus we have the eye for watchfulness or care (Ps 33 18); the long hand for far-reaching powers (Isa 59 1); broken teeth for defeated malice (Ps 3 7); the sword for slaughter (78 62); haughty eyes for superciliousness (Prov 6 17); to say in the heart for to think (Ps 10 6). It would be an interesting study to examine to what extent these expressions have been taken over from Heb into English.

The Heb does not know the distinction between animate and inanimate Nature. All Nature is animate (Ps 104 29). The little hills rejoice (65 12); the mountains skip (114 4); the trees clap their hands (Isa 55 12); even the stones may cry out (Lk 19 40). Such expressions are not to be taken as mere poetical figures of speech; they are meant quite literally. All Nature is one: man is merely a part of Nature (Ps 104 23), even if he be the highest part (8 5). Hence, perhaps, it arises that there is no neuter gender in the Sem languages.

The highly imaginative nature of the Heb comes into play when he is recounting past events or writing history. To his mind's eye all past events are present. He sees Imagination history taking place before his eyes as in a picture. Thus the perfect may generally be trd by the Eng. past tense with "have," the imperfect by the Eng. present tense with "is," or "is going to." In livelier style the participle is used: "They are entering the city, and behold Samuel is coming out to meet them" (1 S 9 14). Hence the oratio recta is always used in preference to the oratio obliqua. Moreover, the historian writes exactly as the professional story-teller narrates. Hence he is always repeating himself and returning upon his own words (1 S 5 1.2).

A result of the above facts is that there is no hard-and-fast distinction in Heb between prose and poetry. Neither is there in Heb, or

3. Pictorial all past events are present. He sees Imagination history taking place before his eyes as in a picture. Thus the perfect may generally be trd by the Eng. past tense with "have," the imperfect by the Eng. present tense with "is," or "is going to." In livelier style the participle is used: "They are entering the city, and behold Samuel is coming out to meet them" (1 S 9 14). Hence the oratio recta is always used in preference to the oratio obliqua. Moreover, the historian writes exactly as the professional story-teller narrates. Hence he is always repeating himself and returning upon his own words (1 S 5 1.2).

A result of the above facts is that there is no hard-and-fast distinction in Heb between prose and poetry. Neither is there in Heb, or 4. Prose in the Sem language generally, epic and Poetry or dramatic poetry, because their prose possesses these qualities in a greater degree than does the poetry of other races. All Heb poetry is lyric or didactic. In it there is no rhyme nor meter. The nearest approach to meter is what is called the ḵināh strophe, in which each verse consists of two parallel members, each member having five words divided into three and then two. The best example of this is to be found in Ps 19 7-9, and also in the Book of LAMENTATIONS (q.v.), from which the verse has received its name.

From the above description it may be inferred that the language of the OT is one extremely easy of translation into foreign tongues 5. Hebrew without loss of meaning or rhythm, Easy of though it would be extremely difficult Translation to render any modern language into classical Heb. Hence the Pss, for example, are as fine in their Ger. or Eng. versions as they are in the original. Where the OT has been trd into the language of the country, it has become a classic. The Eng. Bible is as important for the study of the Eng. language as are the plays of Shakespeare.

LANTERN, lan'tern (φάρος, phanós, fr. φαίω, phainō, "to give light"): Lanterns were carried by the mob which arrested Jesus in Gethsemane (Jn 18 3, probably better "torches"). The word "lantern" in the time of early versions had a much wider significance than now. The Romans, however, had lanterns in the times of Christ, made by use of translucent skins, bladders, or thin plates of horn.

LAODICEA, lā-od-i-sē'a (Λαοδικία, Laodikia): A city of Asia Minor situated in the Lycos valley in the province of Phrygia, and the home of one of the Seven Churches of Rev (1 11). Distinguished from several other cities of that name by the appellation Ad Lycum, it was founded by Antiochus II (261-246 BC) of Syria, who named it for his wife Laodike, and who populated it with Syrians and with Jews who were transplanted from Babylonia to the cities of Phrygia and Lydia. Though Laodicea stood on the great highway at the junction of several important routes, it was a place of little consequence until the Rom province of Asia was formed in 190 BC. It then suddenly became a great and wealthy center of industry, famous specially for the fine black wool of its sheep and for the Phrygian powder for the eyes, which was manufactured there (cf Rev 3 18). In the vicinity was the temple of Men Karou and a renowned school of medicine. In the year 60 AD, the city was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, but so wealthy were its citizens that they rejected the proffered aid of Rome, and quickly rebuilt it at their own expense (cf Rev 3 17). It was a city of great wealth, with extensive banking operations (cf Rev 3 18). Little is known of the early history of Christianity there; Timothy, Mark and Epaphras (Col 1 7) seem to have been the first to introduce it. However, Laodicea was early the chief bishopric of Phrygia, and about 166 AD Sagaris, its bishop, was martyred. In 1071 the city was taken by the Seljuks; in 1119 it was recovered to the Christians by John Comnenus, and in the 13th cent. it fell finally into the hands of the Turks.

The ruins, now called Eski Hissar, or old castle, lie near the modern Gonjelli on the railroad, and they have long served as a quarry to the builders of the neighboring town of Denizli. Among them nothing from before the Rom period has appeared. One of the two Rom theaters is remarkably well preserved, and there may still be seen the stadium, a colonnade, the aqueduct which brought the water across the valley to the city by an inverted siphon of stone pipes, a large necropolis, and the ruins of three early Christian churches. ## IV. REASON FOR SUCH AN EPISTLE

Paul here writes to the Colossians, "And when this epistle hath been read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye also read the epistle from Laodicea." What was or what is this epistle?

I. Explanations of Paul's Statement.—The words used by the apostle may mean: (1) a letter written by the Laodiceans; (2) an ep. written by Paul from Laodicea; (3) an ep. written to the Laodiceans, and to be procured from them by the Colossians.

The words may mean a letter written by the Laodiceans. But here it is sufficient to refer to the fact that Paul enjoins the Colossians to procure

1. Written by the Laodiceans? How could a command of this kind be given in reference to an ep. written by third parties? How could Paul know that a copy of it had been made by the Laodiceans before sending it off? How could he tell that the Laodiceans would be willing to give away a copy of it? The suppositions involved by this hypothesis are incredible. Besides, the context regards the Ep. to the Col. and "that from Laodicea," as companion epp., of which the two churches are to make an interchange, so that each church is directed to read both.

Or, the words may refer to an ep. written by Paul from Laodicea. And it has been suggested that the ep. of which we are in search may be 1 Tim. 1

2. Written by Paul from Laodicea? Thess. 2 Thess. or Gal. But in the case of these epp., the probability is that every one of them was written elsewhere than from Laodicea. At the time when Paul wrote to Colossae, he was a prisoner in Rome, and for this reason alone, it was impossible that he could, at any recent date, have written any ep. from Laodicea. But his own statement (Col 2 1) is that those in Laodicea had not seen his face in the flesh. As he had never been in Laodicea, he could not have written any ep. from that city.

A third possibility is a letter written: (1) not by Paul, but by some other person. But the whole tone of the passage does not favor this suggestion in the least; (2) by Paul, but that the epistle is lost; this is the ordinary interpretation; (3) the apocryphal Lat ep. "To the Laodiceans."

3. An Epistle Addressed to the Laodiceans but that the epistle is lost; this is the ordinary interpretation; (3) the apocryphal Lat ep. "To the Laodiceans."

This spurious ep. is a mere compilation clumsily put together; it has no marks of authenticity. Lightfoot (Col. 282) gives its general character thus: it "is a cento of Pauline phrases strung together without any definite connection or any clear object. They are taken chiefly from the Ep. to the Phil. but here and there one is borrowed elsewhere, e.g. from the Ep. to the Gal. Of course, it closes with an injunction to the Laodiceans to exchange epp. with the Colossians. The apostle's injunction in Col 4 16 suggested the forgery, and such currency as it ever attained was due to the support which that passage was supposed to give to it. Unlike most forgeries, it had no ulterior aim. It has no doctrinal peculiarities. It is quite harmless, so far as falsity and stupidity combined can ever be regarded as harmless" (Lightfoot, op. cit., 282). See APOCRYPHAL EPISTLES.

(4) The only other alternative is that "the epistle from Laodicea" is an ep. to the Laodiceans from Paul himself, which he directs the Colossians to procure from Laodicea. There seems to be not only a high degree of probability, but proof, that the ep. from Laodicea is the ep. known as the Ep. to the Eph. Paul therefore had written an ep. to Laodicea, a city which he had twice already mentioned in the Ep. to the Col. "For I would have you know how greatly I strive for you, and for them at Laodicea" (Col 2 1): "Salute the brethren that are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church that is in their house" (4 15). Accepting Col 4 16 to mean that he wrote to Laodicea at the same time as he wrote to Colossae, what has become of the former ep.? Do we know nothing more of it now than is contained in this reference to it in Col? The fact that it was, by Paul's express command, to be communicated to at least the two churches in Colossae and Laodicea, would make its disappearance and loss very strange.

II. Evidence Favoring Epistle to Ephesians.—But is there any warrant for concluding that it is lost at all? A statement of the facts of the case seems to show that the ep. which Paul wrote to the Laodiceans is extant, but only under another title. The lines of evidence which seem to show that the so-called Ep. to the Eph is in reality the ep. written by Paul to the Laodiceans are these:

It is well known that the words "at Ephesus" (Eph 1 1) in the inscription of the ep. are very doubtful. RV reads in the margin, "Some very ancient authorities omit 'at Ephesus.'" Among the authorities which omit "at Ephesus" are the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS, the best and most ancient authorities existing.

Tertullian asserts that the heretics, i.e. Marcion, had altered the title, "the Epistle to the Ephesians," to "the Epistle to the Laodiceans."

1. Marcion's Opinion But this accusation does not carry with it any doctrinal or heretical charge against Marcion in this respect. "It is not likely," says Moule (Eph, 25),

"that Marcion was guilty here, where the change would have served no dogmatic purpose." And the fact that at that very early period, the first half of the 2d cent., it was openly suggested that the destination of the ep. was Laodicea, is certainly entitled to weight, esp. in view of the other fact already mentioned, which is of no less importance, that "at Ephesus" is omitted in the two great MSS, the Vatican and the Sinaitic.

The "Ep. to the Eph" could not be, primarily at least, addressed to Ephesus, because Paul speaks

2. References in Ephesians and Other Epistles of his readers as persons in regard to whose conversion from heathenism to the faith of Christ he had just recently heard: "For this cause I also, having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you, and the love which ye show toward all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers" (Eph 1 15 f). These words could not well be used in regard to the church at Ephesus, which Paul himself had founded, and in reference to persons among whom he had lived for three years, and where he even knew personally "every one" of the Christians (Acts 20 31).

And in Eph 3 1 f AV, he writes: "For this cause I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward." But how could he ever doubt that the elders of the church in Ephesus (Acts 20 17), as well as the members of that important church, were ignorant of the fact that a dispensation of the grace of God had been given to him? The inquiry, whether his readers had heard of the one great fact on which his ministry was based, could not apply in any degree to the Christians in Ephesus. The apostle and the Ephesians had a clear and intimate mutual knowledge. They knew him and valued him and loved him well. When he bade the elders of the church farewell, they all fell on his neck and kissed him (Acts 20 37).

Clearly therefore the statement that he had just recently heard of their conversion, and his inquiry whether they had heard that a dispensation of the grace of God had been intrusted to him, do not and cannot describe the members of the church in Ephesus. "It is plain," writes Moule (Eph, 26),

"that the ep. does not bear an Ephesian destination on the face of it."

In the Ep. to the Cor there are many local references, as well as allusions to the apostle's work in Corinth. In the Ep. to the Gal there are also many references to his work among the people of the churches in Galatia. The same is the case in the Ep. to the Phil, several names being mentioned of persons known to the apostle. In the two Epp. to the Thess, references also occur to his work among them.

Turning to the Ep. to the Col, and to that to the Rom—Colossae and Rome being cities which he had not visited previous to his writing to the churches there—he knows several persons in Colossae; and in the case of the Ep. to the Rom, he mentions by name no fewer than twenty-six persons in that city.

How is it then that in "the Ep. to the Eph" there are no references at all to the three years which he spent in Ephesus? And how also is there no mention of any one of the members of the church or of the elders whom he knew so intimately and so affectionately? "Ephesians" is inexplicable on the ordinary assumption that Ephesus was the city to which the ep. was addressed.

The other theory, that the ep. was a circular one, sent in the first instance to Laodicea, involves no such difficulty.

Another indication in regard to the primary destination of the ep. is in the words, "ye, the

3. Ephesian Church Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Circumcision, in the flesh, made by hands; that ye were at that time separate from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of the promise, having no hope and without God in the world" (Eph 2 11.12).

Do these words describe the church in Ephesus? Was the church there gentile in its origin? Very far from this, for as a matter of fact it began by Paul preaching the gospel to the Jews, as is narrated at length by Luke in Acts 18. Then in Acts 19, Paul comes again to Ephesus, where he went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months, but when divers were hardened and believed not, but spake evil of the Way before the multitude, he separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus.

Here, therefore, is definite proof that the church in Ephesus was not gentile in its origin. It was distinctly Jewish, but a gentile element had also been received into it. Now the church to which Paul writes "the Ep. to the Eph" was not Jewish at all. He does not speak to his readers in any other way than "you Gentiles."

But an important consideration is that the "Ep. to the Eph" was written by Paul at the same sitting almost as that to the Col. These two

4. Eph and Col Sister Epistles are sister epistles, and these along with the Ep. to Philem were written and sent off at the same time, Onesimus and Tychicus carrying the Ep. to the Col (Col 4 7.8.9), Onesimus being the bearer of that to Philem, while Tychicus in addition to carrying the Colossian ep. was also the messenger who carried "the Ep. to the Eph" (Eph 6 21).

A close scrutiny of Col and "Eph" shows, to an extent without a parallel elsewhere in the epp. of the NT, a remarkable similarity of phraseology. There are only two verses in the whole of Col to which there is no parallel in "Eph." The same words are used, while the thought is so varied and so rich, that the one ep. is in no sense a copy or repetition of the other (see list of parallelisms, etc., in St. Paul's Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea, T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh). Both epp. come warm and instinct with life from the full heart of the great apostle who had not, up to that time, visited either city, but on whom, none the less, there came daily the care of all the churches.

To recapitulate: (1) The words "at Ephesus" in the inscription of the ep. are wanting in the two oldest and best MSS. (2) Paul speaks of his readers as persons of whose conversion to Christ he knew only by report. Similarly he speaks of them as knowing only by hearsay of his commission as an apostle of Christ. Also, though he had lived in Ephesus for three years, this ep. does not contain a single salutation. (3) He speaks of his readers as forming a church exclusively of the Gentiles. But the church in Ephesus, so far from being exclusively gentile, was actually Jewish in origin. (4) "Eph" was written at the same sitting as Col, and the same messenger, Tychicus, carried them both. Therefore as the ep. was not, and could not be, addressed to Ephesus, the conclusion is that it was addressed to some church, and that it was not a treatise sent to the Christian church generally. The words of the first verse of the ep., "to the saints that are," proves that the name of the place to which it was addressed is all that is lost from the MSS, but that the name of the city was there originally, as the ep. came from Paul's hand.

Now Paul wrote an ep. to Laodicea at the same time as he wrote to Colossae. He dispatched both epp. by Tychicus. The thought and feeling and even the diction of the two epp. are such that no other explanation is possible but that they came warm from the heart of the same writer at the same time. On all these grounds the conclusion seems inevitable that the Ep. to Laodicea is not lost at all, but that it is identical with the so-called "Ep. to the Eph."

III. Laodicea Displaced by Ephesus.—How then did Ephesus displace Laodicea? It is explained at once if the theory is adopted that the epistle was a "circular" one addressed not to Laodicea only, but to other cities. We know e.g. that the apostle orders it to be taken to the church in Colossae and read there. So also it might have been sent to other cities, such as Hierapolis (Col 4 13) and Ephesus. Hence if the church in Laodicea were not careful to see that the ep. was returned to them, by those churches to whom they had sent it, it can easily be understood how a copyist in any of those cities might leave out the words "in Laodicea," as not agreeing with the name of the city where the MS actually was at the time. As copies were multiplied, the words "in Ephesus" would be suggested, as the name of the chief city of Asia, from which province the ep. had come to the knowledge of the whole Christian church, and to which, in point of fact, Paul had sent it. The feeling would be natural, that it was in keeping with the fitness of things, that Paul, who had founded the church in Ephesus, should have written an ep. to the church there.

1. A Circular Epistle orders it to be taken to the church in Colossae and read there. So also it might have been sent to other cities, such as Hierapolis (Col 4 13) and Ephesus. Hence if the church in Laodicea were not careful to see that the ep. was returned to them, by those churches to whom they had sent it, it can easily be understood how a copyist in any of those cities might leave out the words "in Laodicea," as not agreeing with the name of the city where the MS actually was at the time. 2. Proof from Biblical Prologues In an article upon "Marcion and the Canon" by Professor J. Rendel Harris, LL.D., in the Expos T. June, 1907, there is reference to the Revue Biblique dictum for January of that year, which contained a remarkable article by de Bruyne, entitled "Biblical Prologues of Marcionite Origin." In which the writer succeeded in showing that a very widely spread series of prefaces to the Pauline Epp., which occur in certain Lat. Bibles, must have been taken from a Marcionite Bible. Professor Rendel Harris adds that the prefaces in question may go back to Marcion himself, for in any case the Marcionite hand, from which they come, antedates the Lat. tradition in which the prologues are imbedded. "It is clear from Tertullian's polemic against Marcion, that the Pauline Epp. stood in the following order in the Marcionite Canon: Gal. 1 and 2 Cor. Rom. 1 and 2 Thess, then Eph (which Marcion calls by the name of the Ep. to the Laodiceans), Col. Phil. and Philem. . . . Let us turn to the prologues that are current in Vulg and other MSS for Eph and Col: the Ephesian prologue runs as follows: 'Ephesi sunt Asiani. Hi accepto verbo veritatis perstiterunt in fide. Hos conlaudat apostolus, scribens eis a Roma de carcere!' When, however, we turn to the Colossian prologue, we find that it opens as follows: 'Colossenses et hi sicut Laodicensis sunt Asiani. Et ipsi praeventerant a pseudapostolis, nec ad hos accessit apostolus sed et hos per epistolam reccorrigit.' etc.

"From this it is clear that originally the prologue to the Laodiceans preceded the prologue to Col, and that the Ephesian prologue is a substitute for the Laodicean prologue, which can be partly reconstructed from the references to it in the Colossian prologue. We can see that it had a statement that the Laodiceans belonged to Asia Minor, that they had been under the influence of false apostles, and had never been visited by St. Paul, who corrects their error by an epistle.

"We have now shown that the original Canon had 'Laodiceans, Colossians.' It is interesting to observe how some Lat MSS naively admit this: 'You must know that the ep. which we have as that written to the Eph. the heretics, and esp. the Marcionites, entitle the Ep. to the Laodiceans.'"

IV. Reason for Such an Epistle.—Assuming therefore that the "Ep. to the Eph" is the ep. which Paul wrote to the Laodiceans, various questions arise, such as, Why did he write to the church there? What was there in the state of the church in Laodicea to call for an ep. from him? Was there any heresy there, like the false teaching which existed in the neighboring church in Colossae?

The answer to such questions is that though we do not possess much information, yet these churches in the province of Asia had many things in common. They had originated at the same time, during the two whole years of Paul's residence in Ephesus. They were composed of men of the same races, and speaking the same languages. They were subject to the same influences of doctrinal error. The errors into which any one church fell could not fail to affect the others also. These churches were permeated to a large extent by the same ideas, derived both from the current philosophy and from their ancestral heathen religions. They would, therefore, one and all, require the same apostolic instruction and exhortation. This ep., accordingly, bears a close resemblance to the Ep. to the Col, just for the reason that the circumstances of the church in Laodicea were similar to those of the church in Colossae; and also, that the thoughts which filled Paul's heart as he wrote to Colossae were adapted, in the first place, to counteract the false teaching in Colossae, but they are also the foundation of all Christian experience, and the very life of all Christian truth and doctrine. These are the great thoughts of Christ the Creator of all things, Christ the Upholder of all things, Christ the Reconciler of all things. Such thoughts filling Paul's heart would naturally find expression in language bearing a close resemblance to that in which he had just written to Colossae.

It is no more astonishing that Paul should have written to Laodicea, than that he also wrote to Colossae, which was probably the least important of all the cities and churches mentioned in the apostle's work and career. Neither is it any more to be wondered at that he should have written so profound an ep. as that to "the Eph," than that he should also have given directions that it be sent on to Colossae and read there; for this reason, that the exposition of Christ's great love to the church and of His giving Himself for it—the doctrine of the grace of God—is the very corrective required by the errors of the false teachers at Colossae, and is also the groundwork of Christian truth and experience for all ages.

NOTE.—A very remarkable circumstance in regard to the apocryphal Ep. to the Laodiceans is mentioned by Nestle in the preface to his edition of the Lat NT, published in Stuttgart in 1906. He writes that "the Ep. to the Laodiceans was for a thousand years part of very many Lat Bibles, and obtained a place in pre-Lutheran Ger. Bibles, together with Jerome's Ep. to Damasus."

JOHN RUTHERFURD

LAP: The word is the tr of three different Heb expressions: לֶקֶן, hēk (Prov 16 33), בֶּגֶד, beghedh (2 K 4 39), and הֹסֶן, hōsen (Neh 5 13, besides הֶסֶן, hēsen, Ps 129 7). In all these passages the meaning is that of a part of oriental clothing, probably the folds of the garment covering the bosom or lap of a person. The flowing garments of Orientals invite the use of the same, on the part of speakers, in driving home certain truths enunciated by impressive gesticulation. Every reader of Rom history recalls the impressive incident of Quintus Fabius Maximus (Cunctator), who, in 219 BC, was ambassador of Rome to Carthage, and who, before the city council, holding the folds of his toga in the shape of a closed pouch, declared that he held enclosed in the same both peace and war, whichever the Carthaginians should desire to choose. When the Carthaginians clamored for war, he opened the folds of his garment and said: "Then you shall have war!" Very much like it, Nehemiah, when pleading for united efforts for the improvement of social order, addressed the priests of Jerus to get a pledge of their coöperation: "Also I shook out my lap [hōsen], and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labor, that perfolmeth not this promise; even thus be he shaken out, and emptied" (Neh 5 13).

In EV the vb. "to lap" is found, which has no etymological connection with the above-mentioned nouns. It is in Heb לָקַק, lākak, and refers to the loud licking up of water by dogs (1 K 21 19; 22 38 AV), and in the story of Gideon's battle against the Midianites, of his 300 warriors (Jgs 7 5 ff).

LAPPIDOTH, lap'i-doth, -dōth (לַפִּידוֹת, lap-pidhōth, "flames," "torches"; AV Lapidoth): Deborah's husband (Jgs 4 4). The Heb name is a fem. pl. like Jeremoth (1 Ch 7 8), Naboth (1 K 21 1). The pl. is probably intensive. Jewish interpreters have identified Lapidoth ("flames") with Barak ("lightning"). Some have taken the words rendered "wife of Lapidoth" (ēsheth lap-pidhōth) as a description of Deborah, and have tr<sup>d</sup> them, "woman of lights," i.e. maker of wicks for the sanctuary; or "woman of flames," referring to her prophetic zeal. These explanations are more interesting than probable.

JOHN A. LEES

LAPWING, lap'wing (דֹּקֵקִיפָּת, dūkhīphath; ἑποψ, ēpops): A tr used in early VSS, now universally admitted to be incorrect. The lapwing had a crest, and resembled in size and color the hoopoe (Upupa epops). It appears in the lists of abominations only (Lev 11 19 AV and Dt 14 18 AV, RV HOPOE, q.v.). The lapwing is a plover, and its flesh and eggs are delicious food.

LASCIVIOUSNESS, la-siv'i-us-nes (ἀσέλγεια, aselgeia, "licentiousness," "wantonness," "unbridled lust," "shamelessness," "outrageousness"):

Etymologists assign three probable sources of aselgeia, viz.: (1) from a compound of a priv. and σελγη, Sēlgē, a Pisidian city whose inhabitants according to Thayer (NT Lexicon) "excelled in strictness of morals," but according to

1. Sources Trench a place whose people "were infamous for their vices"; (2) from a compound of a intensive, and σαλγαιν, salagin, "to raise a disturbance or noise"; (3) from a compound of a priv. and σελγω, sēlgō, or θάλγω, thēlgō, "exciting disgust or displeasure." It evidently means conduct and character that is unbecoming, indecent, unrestrainedly shameless.

Mk uses it in 7 22 with uncertainty as to the vice meant. Paul (2 Cor 12 21) classes it with uncleanness and fornication as sins to be

2. As Used repented of; also (Gal 5 19; cf Wisd in the NT 14 26, "wantonness") puts it in the same catalogue with other works of the flesh; and (Eph 4 19) he refers to some aged ones so covetous that they made trade of themselves by giving "themselves up to lasciviousness." The same word is tr<sup>d</sup> "wantonness" in Rom 13 13, meaning wanton manner, filthy words, unchaste movements of the body. Peter (1 Pet 4 3) mentions those who "walked in lasciviousness, lusts, winebibbings, revellings, carousings, and abominable idolatries." He speaks (2 Pet 2 2) of "lascivious doings" (AV "pernicious ways"); (2 7) "lascivious life" (AV "filthy conversation"); and (2 18) of "lasciviousness" (AV "wantonness"), as a means "to entice in the lusts of the flesh." Jude ver 4 probably does not refer to any form of sensuality in using the word descriptive of "ungodly men" who perverted the faith of some and denied our only Master. WILLIAM EDWARD RAFFETY

LASEA, la-sē'a (Λάσεια, Lásaia): A town on the S. coast of Crete, 5 miles E. of Fair Havens (Acts 27 8). The ruins were examined in 1856 by Rev. G. Brown (see CH [St. P], ch xxiii, 640). If St. Paul's ship was detained long at this anchorage, it would be necessary to purchase stores from Lasea; and this in addition to the inconvenience of the roadstead (see FAIR HAVENS) would probably explain the captain's reluctance to winter there.

LASHA, lā'sha (לָשָׁה, lāsha'): A place named on the southern boundary of the Canaanites along with Gomorrah, Adnah and Zeboiim (Gen 10 19). Onom identifies it with the hot springs at Callirhoë in Wādy Zerḳā Ma'in, on the E. of the Dead Sea; in this agreeing with Tg Jerus. This position, however, seems too far to the N., and possibly the site should be sought on the W. of the Arabah. The absence of the article (cf Josh 15 2) prevents identification with the promontory el-Lisān, which runs into the sea from the eastern shore. Wellhausen (Comp. des Hez., 15) thinks we should read לָשָׁה, lēshām, as the letters ל (m) and ש (') are like each other in their Palmyrene form. We should then have indicated the boundary from Gaza to the Dead Sea, and then from the Dead Sea to Leshem, i.e. Dan. This is very precarious. No identification is possible. W. EWING

LASSHARON, la-shā'ron, la-shār'on (לָשָׁרֹן, lashshārōn or la-shārōn, AV Sharon): A royal city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua, named with Aphek (Josh 12 18). Possibly we should here follow the reading of LXX (B), "the king of Aphek in Sharon." Onom (s.v. "Saron") mentions a region between Mt. Tabor and the Lake of Tiberias called Sarona. This is probably represented by the ancient site Sarona, on the plateau 6½ miles S.W. of Tiberias. If MT is correct, this may be the place intended.

LAST DAY. See DAY, LAST.

LAST DAYS. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT.

LAST TIME, TIMES (καὶρὸς ἔσχατος, kairós eschatos, χρόνος ἔσχατος, chrónos eschatos [also pl.], ἔσχατον τοῦ χρόνου, eschaton tou chrónou, ὥρα ἔσχατη, hōra eschátē): In AV this phrase occurs in 1 Pet 1 5; 1 20 (pl.); 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18. RV has, in 1 Pet 1 20, "at the end of the times," and in 1 Jn 2 18, "the last hour," in closer adherence to the Gr. The conception is closely allied to that of "the last day," and, like this, has its root in the OT conception of "the end of days." In the OT this designates the entire eschatological period as that which the present course of the world is to issue into, and not, as might be assumed, the closing section of history. It is equivalent to what was later called "the coming aeon" (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT). In the NT, on the other hand, the phrase "the last time" does mark the concluding section of the present world-period, of the present aeon. In three of the NT passages the consciousness expresses itself that these "last times" have arrived, and that the period extending from the appearance or the resurrection of Christ until His Second Coming is the closing part of the present age, that the writer and readers are living in "the last times." In one passage (1 Pet 1 5) "the last time" is projected farther forward into the future, so that it comes to mean the time immediately preceding the reappearance of Christ. Both usages can be readily explained. The days of the Messiah were to the OT writers part of the future world, although to the later Jewish chiliasm they appeared as lying this side of it, because differing from the world to come in their earthly and temporal character. To the early Christians the days of the Messiah appeared more closely assimilated in character to the future world, so that no reason existed on this score for not including them in the latter. Still it was also realized that the Messiah in His first appearance had not brought the full realization of the coming world, and that only His return from heaven would consummate the kingdom of God. Accordingly, the days in which they lived assumed to them the character of an intermediate period, marked off on the one hand from the previous development by the appearance of the Messiah, but equally marked off from the coming aeon by His reappearance in glory. From a formal point of view the representation resembles the Jewish chiliastic scheme, but with a twofold substantial difference: (a) the chiliastic scheme restricts the Messiah and His work to the last days, and does not carry Him over into the coming world, whereas to the Christian the coming world, no less than the last days, is thoroughly Messianic; (b) to the Jewish point of view both the days of the Messiah and the coming world lie in the future, whereas to the Christian the former have already arrived. It remained possible, however, from the Christian point of view to distinguish within the last times themselves between the immediate present and the future conclusion of this period, and this is done in 1 Pet 1 5. Also in 1 Jn 2 18 the inference that "the last hour" has come is not drawn from the presence of the Messiah, but from the appearance of the anti-Christian power, so that here also a more contracted conception of the last stage of history reveals itself, only not as future (1 Pet 1 5), but as present (hence "hour" not "time").

For literature see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

GEERHARDUS VOS

LASTHENES, las'the-nēz (Λασθένης, Lasthénēs): A highly placed official under King Demetrius II, Nicator. He is called the king's "kinsman" (AV "cousin") and "father" (1 Macc 11 31.32; Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 9), but these are to be taken as court titles rather than as denoting blood-relationship. According to Jos (Ant, XIII, iv, 3) he was a native of Crete, and raised an army for the king when he made his first descent upon the coast, and rendered him ultimately successful in wresting the throne of Syria from Alexander Balas (1 Macc 10 67; Ant, XIII, iv, 3). The letter addressed to L. indicates that he was probably prime minister or grand vizier of the kingdom. J. HUTCHISON

LATCHET, lach'et (לָחֶט, s'rōkh; ἡμάς, himás): Leather thong used for tying on sandals (see Gen 14 23; Mk 1 7 ||). The stooping to untie the dusty shoe-latchet was esteemed by Orientals a service that was at once petty and defiling, and was usually assigned to menials.

LATIN, lat'in: Was the official language of the Rom Empire as Gr was that of commerce. In Pal Aram. was the vernacular in the rural districts and remoter towns, while in the leading towns both Gr and Aram. were spoken. These facts furnish the explanation of the use of all three tongues in the inscription on the cross of Christ (Mt 27 37; Mk 15 26; Lk 23 38; Jn 19 19). Thus the charge was written in the legal language, and was technically regular as well as recognizable by all classes of the people. The term "Latin" occurs in the NT only in Jn 19 20, Πρωμαῖστὶ, Rhōmaistī, and in Lk 23

38, 'Ρωμαϊκοῖς (γράμμασιν), Rhōmaïkoîs (grámmasin), according to § ADN. It is probable that Tertullus made his plea against Paul before Felix (Acts 24) in Lat, though Gr was allowed in such provincial courts by grace of the judge. It is probable also that Paul knew and spoke Lat; cf W. M. Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 1906, 65, and A. Souter, "Did Paul Speak Lat?" Expos, April, 1911. The vernacular Lat had its own history and development with great influence on the ecclesiastical terminology of the West. See W. Bury, "The Holy Latin Tongue," Dublin Review, April, 1906, and Rönisch, Italia und Vulgata, 1874, 480 f. There is no doubt of the mutual influence of Gr and Lat on each other in the later centuries. See W. Schulze, Graeca Latina, 1891; Viereck, Sermo Graecus, 1888.

It is doubtful if the Lat syntax is clearly perceptible in the koinē (see LANGUAGE OF THE NT).

Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 117 f) finds ἱγνασιαὶ δίδωμι, ergastian didōmi (operam dare) in an Oxyrhynchus papyrus letter of the vulgar type from 2d cent. BC (cf Lk 12 58). A lead tablet in Amorgus has κρινω τὴ δικαιο, krinō tē dikaiosin (cf Lk 12 57). The papyrus (2d cent. AD) gives συναγωγὴ λόγων συναγῶ, lōgon (cf Mt 18 23 f). Moulton (Expos, February, 1903, 115) shows that τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν, τὸ ἡκανόη ποιεῖν (satisfacere), is as old as Polybius. Even συμβουλίων λαμβάνειν, συμβουλίον λαμβάνειν (concilium capere), may go with the rest like σὺ ὅψῃ, sū ὅψῃ (Mt 27 4), for videtur (Thayer). Moulton (Prolog., 21) and Thumb (Griechische Sprache, 121) consider the whole matter of syntactical Latinisms in the NT inconclusive. But see also C. Wessely, "Die lateinischen Elemente in der Gräcität d. ägypt. Papyrusurkunden," Wien. Stud., 24; Lafortade, Influence du Latin sur le Grec, 83-158.

There are Lat words in the NT: In particular Lat proper names like Aquila, Cornelius, Claudia, Clemens, Crescens, Crispus, Fortunatus, Julia, Junia, etc, even among the Christians in the NT besides Agrippa, Augustus, Caesar, Claudius, Felix, Festus, Gallio, Julius, etc.

Besides we find in the NT current Lat commercial, financial, and official terms like ἀσάριον, assáριον (as), δηνάριον, dēnárion (denarius), κεντυρίων, ken-turiōn (centurio), κῆσος, kēsos (census), κοδράντης, kodrántēs (quadrans), κολωνία, kolōnía (colonia), κοινοσώδια, kōinosōdía (custodia), λεγών, legēōn (legio), λέντιον, lēntion (linteum), λιβερίνος, liberlinos (libertinus), λίτρα, litra (litra), μάκελλον, mákelon (macellum), μεμβράνα, membrána (membrana), μίλιον, milion (mile), μόδιος, módios (modius), ξέστης, xéstēs (sextarius), πραιτώριον, praidōrion (praetorium), σικάριος, sikários (sicarius), σικμικίνθιον, síkmikínthion (semicinctium), σουδάριον, soudáριον (sudarium), σπεκουλάτωρ, spekoulátōr (speculator), ταβέρνα, tabérna (taberna), τίτλος, títlos (titulus), φελδνης, phelónēs (paenula), φόρον, phóron (forum), φραγέλλιον, phragéllion (flagellum), φραγελλώα, phragellōá (flagello), χάρτης, chártēs (charta?), χώρος, chōros (chorus).

Then we meet such adjectives as Ἡρωδιανοί, Hērōdianoí, Φιλιππηῖοι, Philippēsiōi, Χριστιανοί, Christianoí, which are made after the Lat model. Mark's Gospel shows more of these Lat words outside of proper names (cf Rom 16), as is natural if his Gospel were indeed written in Rome. See also LATIN VERSION, THE OLD.

LITERATURE

The claim of Christianity to be the one true religion has carried with it from the beginning the obligation to make its Holy Scriptures, containing the Divine message of salvation and life eternal, known to all mankind. Accordingly, wherever the first Christian evangelists carried the gospel beyond the limits of the Gr-speaking world, one of the first requirements of their work was to give the newly evangelized peoples the record of God's revelation of Himself in their mother tongue. It was through the LXX tr of the OT that the great truths of revelation first became known to the Gr and Rom world. It is generally agreed that, as Christianity spread, the Syr and the Lat VSS were the first to be produced; and tr<sup>s</sup> of the Gospels, and of other books of the Old and NT in Gr, were in all probability to be found in these languages before the close of the 2d cent.

Of the earliest translators of the Bible into Lat no record has survived. Notwithstanding the careful investigations of scholars in recent years, there are still many questions relating to the origin of the Lat Bible to which only tentative and provisional answers can be given. It is therefore more convenient to begin a study of its history with Jerome toward the close of the 4th cent. and the commission intrusted to him by Pope Damasus to produce a standard Lat version, the execution of which gave to Christendom the Vulg (see VULGATE). The need for such a version was clamant. There existed by this time a multiplicity of tr<sup>s</sup> differing from one another, and there was none possessed of commanding authority to which appeal might be made in case of necessity. It was the consideration of the chaotic condition of the existing tr<sup>s</sup>, with their divergences and variations, which moved Damasus to commission Jerome to his task and Jerome to undertake it. We learn particulars from the letter of Jerome in 383 transmitting to his patron the first instalment of his revision, the Gospels. "Thou compellest me," he writes, "to make a new work out of an old so that after so many copies of the Scriptures have been dispersed throughout the whole world I am as it were to occupy the post of arbiter, and seeing they differ from one another am to determine which of them are in agreement with the original Gr." Anticipating attacks from critics, he says, further: "If they maintain that confidence is to be reposed in the Lat exemplars, let them answer which, for there are almost as many copies of tr<sup>s</sup> as MSS. But if the truth is to be sought from the majority, why not rather go back to the Gr original, and correct the blunders which have been made by incompetent translators, made worse rather than better by the presumption of unskilful correctors, and added to or altered by careless scribes?" Accordingly, he hands to the Pontiff the four Gospels to begin with after a careful comparison of old Gr MSS.

From Jerome's contemporary, Augustine, we obtain a similar picture. "Translators from Heb into Gr," he says (De Doctrina Christiana, ii.11), "can be numbered, but Lat translators by no means. For whenever, in the first ages of the faith, a Gr MS came into the hands of anyone who had also a little skill in both languages, he made bold to translate it forthwith." In the same context he mentions "an innumerable variety of Lat translators," "a crowd of translators." His advice to readers is to give a preference to the Itala, "which is more faithful in its renderings and more intelligible in its sense." What the Itala is, has been greatly discussed. Formerly it was taken to be a summary designation of all the VSS before Jerome's time. But Professor Burkitt (Texts and Studies, IV) strongly urges the view that by this term Augustine designates Jerome's Vulg, which he might quite well have known and preferred to any of the earlier tr<sup>s</sup>. However this may be, whereas before Jerome there were those numerous tr<sup>s</sup>, of which he and Augustine complain, after Jerome there is the one preëminent and commanding work, produced by him, which in course of time drove all others out of the field, the great Vulg edition, as it came to be called, of the complete Lat Bible.

We are here concerned with the subject of the Lat Bible before the time of Jerome. The MSS which have survived from the earlier period are known by the general designation of Old Latin. When we ask where these first tr<sup>s</sup> came into existence, we discover a somewhat surprising fact. It was not at Rome, as we might have expected, that they were first required. The language of Christian Rome was mainly Gr, down to the 3d cent. St. Paul wrote the Ep. to the Rom in Gr. When Clement of Rome in the last decade of the 1st cent. wrote an ep. in the name of the Roman church to the Corinthians, he wrote in Gr. Justin Martyr, and the heretic Marcion, alike wrote from Rome in Gr. Out of 15 bishops who presided over the Rom see down to the close of the 2d cent., only four have Lat names. Even the pagan emperor Marcus Aurelius wrote his Meditations in Gr. If there were Christians in Rome at that period whose only language was Lat, they were not sufficiently numerous to be provided with Christian literature; at least none has survived.

It is from North Africa that the earliest Lat literature of the church has come down to us. The church of North Africa early received a baptism of blood, and could point to an illustrious roll of martyrs. It had also a distinguished list of Lat authors, whose Lat might sometimes be rude and mixed with foreign idioms, but had a power and a fire derived from the truths which it set forth.

One of the most eminent of these Africans was Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, who won the martyr's crown in 257. His genuine works consist of a number of short treatises, or tracts, and numerous letters, all teeming with Scripture quotations. It is certain that he employed a version then and there in use, and it is agreed that "his quotations are carefully made and thus afford trustworthy standards of African Old Latin in a very early though still not the earliest stage" (Hort, Intro to the NT in Gr, 78).

Critical investigation has made it clear that the version used by Cyprian survives in a fragmentary copy of St. Mark and St. Matthew,

5. Cyprian's Bible now at Turin in North Italy, called Codex Bobbiensis (k), and in the fragments of the Apocalypse and Acts contained in a palimpsest at Paris called Codex Floriacensis (h). It has been found that another MS, Codex Palatinus (e) at Vienna, has a text closely akin to that exhibited in Cyprian, although there are traces of mixture in it. The text of these MSS, together with the quotations of the so-called Speculum Augustini (m), is known among scholars as African Old Latin. Another MS with an interesting history, Codex Colbertinus (c) contains also a valuable African element, but in many parts of the Gospels it sides also with what is called the European Old Latin more than with k or e. Codex Bobbiensis (k) has been edited with a learned introduction in the late Bishop John Wordsworth's Old Latin Bib. Texts, the relation of k to Cyprian as well as to other Old Latin texts being the subject of an elaborate investigation by Professor Sanday. That Cyprian, who was not acquainted with Greek, had a written version before him which is here identified is certain, and thus the illustrious bishop and martyr gives us a fixed point in the history of the Lat Bible a century and a half earlier than Jerome.

We proceed half a century nearer to the fountain-head of the African Bible when we take up the testimony of Tertullian who flourished

6. Tertulian's Bible toward the close of the 2d cent. He differed from Cyprian in being a competent Gr scholar. He was thus able to translate for himself as he made his quotations from the LXX or the Gr NT, and is thus for us by no means so safe a witness to the character or existence of a standard version. Professor Zahn (GK, I, 60) maintains with considerable plausibility that before 210-240 AD there was no Lat Bible, and that Tertullian with his knowledge of Gr just tr<sup>d</sup> as he went along. In this contention, Zahn is not supported by many scholars, and the view generally is that while Tertullian's knowledge of Gr is a disturbing element, his writings, with the copious quotations from both OT and NT, do testify to the existence of a version which had already been for some time in circulation and use. Who the African Wycliffe or Tindale was who produced that version has not been recorded, and it may in fact have been the work of several hands, the result, as Bishop Westcott puts it, of the spontaneous efforts of African Christians (Canon of the NT, 263).

Although the evidence has, up to the present time, been regarded as favoring the African origin of the 7. Possible Eastern Origin of Old Latin first Lat tr of the Bible, recent investigation into what is called the Western text of the NT has yielded results pointing elsewhere. It is clear from a comparison that the Western type of text has close affinity with the Syr witnesses originating in the eastern provinces of the empire. The close textual relation disclosed between the Lat and the Syr VSS has led some authorities to believe that, after all, the earliest Lat version may have been made in the East, and possibly at Antioch. But this is one of the problems awaiting the discovery of fresh material and fuller investigation for its solution.

We have already noticed the African group, so designated from its connection with the great

8. Classification of Old Latin MSS African Fathers, Tertullian and esp. Cyprian, and comprising k, e, and to some extent h and m. The antiquity of the text here represented is attested by these African Fathers.

When we come down to the 4th cent. we find in Western Europe, and esp. in North Italy, a second type of text, which is designated European, the precise relation of which to the African has not been clearly ascertained. Is this an independent text which has arisen on the soil of Italy, or is it a text derived by alteration and revision of the African as it traveled northward and westward? This group consists of the Codex Vercellensis (a) and Codex Veronensis (b) of the 4th or 5th cent. at Vercelli and Verona respectively, and there may be included also the Codex Vindobonensis (i) of the 7th cent. at Vienna. These give the Gospels, and a gives for St. John the text as it was read by the 4th-cent. Father, Lucifer of Cagliari in Sardinia. The Lat of the Gr-Lat MS D (Codex Bezae) known as d, and the Lat of the translator of Irenaeus are classed with this group.

Still later, Professor Hort says from the middle of the 4th cent., a third type, called Italic from its more restricted range, is found. It is represented by Codex Brixianus (f) of the 6th cent., now at Brescia, and Codex Monacensis (g) of the 7th cent., at Munich. This text is probably a modified form of the European, produced by revision which has brought it more into accord with the Gr, and has given it a smoother Lat aspect. The group has received this name because the text found in many of Augustine's writings is the same, and as he expressed a preference for the Itala, the group was designated accordingly. Recent investigation tends to show that we must be careful how we use Augustine as an Old Latin authority, and that the Itala may be, not a pre-Vulg text, but rather Jerome's Vulg. This, however, is still uncertain; the fact remains that as far as the Gospels are concerned, f and g represent the type of text most used by Jerome.

That all these groups, comprising in all 38 codices, go back to one original is not impossible. Still there may have been at first local VSS, and then an official version formed out of them. When

9. Individual Character-istics

Jerome's revision took hold of the church, the Old Latin representatives for the most part dropped out of notice. Some of them, however, held their ground and continued to be copied down to the 12th and even the 13th cent. Codex c is an example of this; it is a MS of the 12th cent., but as Professor Burkitt has pointed out (Texts and Studies, IV, "Old Latin," 11) "it came from Languedoc, the country of the Albigenses. Only among heretics isolated from the rest of Western Christianity could an Old Latin text have been written at so late a period." An instance of an Old Latin text copied in the 13th cent. is the Gigas Holmiensis, quoted as Gig, now at Stockholm, and so called from its great size. It contains the Acts and the Apocalypse of the Old Latin and the rest of the NT according to the Vulg. It has to be borne in mind that in the early centuries complete Bibles were unknown. Each group of books, Gospels, Acts and Catholic Epp., Pauline Epp., and Rev for the NT, and Pent, Historical Books, Pss and Prophets for the OT, has to be regarded separately. It is interesting, also, to note that when Jerome revised, or even retranslated from the LXX, Tob and Jth of the Apoc, the greater number of these books, the Wisd, Eccles, 1 and 2 Macc, and Bar were left unrevised, and were simply added to the Vulg from the Old Latin version.

These Old Latin tr<sup>s</sup> going back in their earliest forms to nearly the middle of the 2d cent. are very early witnesses to the Gr text from

10. Value which they were made. They are of Old Latin the more valuable inasmuch as they for Textual are manifestly very literal tr<sup>s</sup>. Our Criticism great uncial MSS reach no farther back than the 4th cent., whereas in the Old Latin we have evidence—indirect indeed and requiring to be cautiously used—reaching back to the 2d cent. The text of these MSS is neither dated nor localized, whereas the evidence of these VSS, coming from a particular province of the church, and being used by Fathers whose period is definitely known, enables us to judge of the type of Gr text then and there in use. In this connection, too, it is noteworthy that while the variations of which Jerome and Augustine complained were largely due to the blunders, or natural mistakes, of copyists, they did sometimes represent various readings in the Gr originals.

LATTICE, lat'is. See HOUSE, II, 1, (9).

LAUD, lōd: A vb. meaning "to praise," used in Rom 15 11 AV, and Ps 117 1; 145 4. RV either should have avoided the word altogether or else should have used it much more extensively—preferably the latter, as the word is not obsolete in liturgical Eng.

LAUGHING-STOCK, lāf'ing-stok: Something set up to be laughed at; thrice in RV the tr of לִצְחָק, s'hōk, "laughter," etc (Job 12 4 bis; Jer 20 7; cf Jer 48 26.27.39; Lam 3 14). See MOCK, MOCKING.

LAUGHTER, lāf'tēr (צַחֲקִים, ṣāḥak, צִיחָק, sāḥak, "to laugh," צִיחָק, s'hōk, "laughter"; גִּלְאוֹ, gelāō, καταγέλαω, katagelāō): (1) Laughter as the expression of gladness, pleasurable surprise, is the tr of ṣāḥak (Gen 17 17; 18 12.13.15; 21 6), which, however, should perhaps be "laugh at me," not "with me," as AV and RV (so Delitzsch and others; see also Hastings in HDB), not in the sense of derision, but of surprise and pleasure. In the same ver for "God hath made me to laugh," RV gives in m, "hath prepared laughter for me," and this gave his name to the son, the promise of whose birth evoked the laughter (Yiṣḥāk, Isaac); gelāō (Lk 6 21.25) has the same meaning of gladness and rejoicing; s'hōk, "laughter," has also this sense (Job 8 21; Ps 126 2). It is, however, "laughed to scorn" in Job 12 4; RV "laughing-stock"; so Jer 20 7; cf 48 26.27.39; Lam 3 14, "derision." (2) Sāḥak is used (except Job 29 24; Eccl 3 4) in the sense of the laughter of defiance, or derision (Job 5 22; 41 29); in Piel it is often tr<sup>d</sup> "play," "playing," "merry." (3) Lā'agh is "to scorn," "to laugh to scorn" (2 K 19 21; Neh 2 19); sāḥak has also this sense (2 Ch 30 10); ṣ'hok (Ezk 23 32); s'hok (Job 12 4); katagelāō (Mt 9 24; Mk 5 40; Lk 8 53); the simple gelāō occurs only in Lk 6 21.25; see above. Katagelāō is found in Jth 12 12, "laugh to scorn" (Eccles 7 11; 20 17; 1 Macc 10 70, RV "derision").

For "laugh" (Job 9 23) RV has "mock"; for "mocked of his neighbor" and "laughed to scorn" (Job 12 4) "laughing-stock"; for "shall rejoice in time to come" (Prov 31 25), "laugheth at the time to come"; "laughter" for "laughing" (Job 8 21).

LAVER, lā'vēr (כִּיּוֹר, kīyōr): Every priest in attendance on the altar of Jeh was required to wash his hands and his feet before entering upon his official duties (Ex 30 19 ff). 1. In the Tabernacle To this end a laver was ordered to be made as part of the tabernacle equipment (30 17–21; 38 8). Its composition was of brass (bronze), and it consisted of two parts, the bowl and its pedestal or foot (30 18, etc). This first laver was a small one, and was made of the hand mirrors of the women in attendance upon the altar (38 8). Its place was between the altar and the tabernacle (40 30). See TABERNACLE.

The difficulty as to the washing of parts of the sacrificial carcasses was overcome, in the temple of

Solomon, by the construction of "10 lavers" and a "molten sea" (1 K 7 23-37; 2 Ch 4 2-6; see TEMPLE; SEA, MOLTEN). We learn

2. In the Temple from 2 Ch 4 6 that the "sea" was for the priests to wash in—therefore took the place of the laver in the tabernacle—and the lavers were used as baths for portions of the burnt offerings. The lavers themselves were artistic works of unusual merit for that age. Like that in the tabernacle, each had its own stand or base, which was cast in a separate piece from the laver. These bases rested on wheels which allowed of the laver being moved from one part of the court to another without being turned about. Five stood on the north and five on the south side of the temple. They were ornamented with "lions, oxen, and cherubim," and on a lower level, with a series of wreaths or festoons of flowers (1 K 7 27-37). In modern speech, the lavers may be described as so many circular open tanks for the storage of water. Each laver contained 40 baths (about 320 gals.) of water. Its height was 5 cubits, the locomotive machinery being 3 cubits in height, and the depth of the bowl or tank, judging from its capacity, about 2 cubits. The last we hear of the lavers, apart from their bases, is that the idolatrous king Ahaz cut off the border of the bases, and removed the bases from them (2 K 16 17). During the reign of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah foretold that the molten sea and the bases (there being then no lavers) should be carried to Babylon (Jer 27 19). A few years later it is recorded that the bases were broken up, and the brass of which they were made was carried away (Jer 52 17).

The Gr word (λουτήριον, loutérion) occurs twice in the NT. In Eph 5 26, Paul says that Christ gave Himself for the church "that he might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing [Gr "laver"] of water with the word"; and in Tit 3 5 he says that we are saved "through the washing [Gr "laver"] of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit." In these passages the reference is to the constant physical purity demanded of the Jewish priests when in attendance upon the temple. Christians are "a holy priesthood," and are cleansed not by water only, but, in the former passage, "with the word" (cf Jn 15 3); in the latter, by the "renewing of the Holy Spirit" (cf Ezk 36 25; Jn 3 5). The feet-washing mentioned by Jesus is emblematic of the same thing (Jn 13 10).

LITERATURE

The Gr word for "law" is νόμος, nómos, derived from νέμω, némō, "to divide," "distribute," "apportion," and generally meant anything established, anything received by usage, a custom, usage, law; in the NT a command, law.

It may not be amiss to note the definition of law given by a celebrated authority in jurisprudence, the late Mr. John Austin: "A law, in the most general and comprehensive acceptance in which the term, in its literal meaning, is employed, may be said to be a rule laid down for the guidance of an intelligent being, by an intelligent being having power over him."

Under this comprehensive statement, he classifies "laws set by God to His human creatures, and laws set by men to men." After analyzing the three ideas, command as the expression of a particular desire; duty or obligation, signifying that one is bound or obliged by the command to pursue a certain course of conduct, and sanction, indicating the evil likely to be incurred by disobedience, he thus summarizes: "The ideas or notions comprehended by the term command are the following: (1) a wish or desire conceived by a rational being that another rational being shall do or forbear; (2) an evil to proceed from the former and to be incurred by the latter in case the latter comply not with the wish; (3) an expression or intimation of the wish by words or other signs." This definition makes it clear that the term "laws of nature" can be used only in a metaphorical sense, the metaphorical application being suggested as Austin shows by the fact that uniformity or stability of conduct is one of the ordinary consequences of a law proper, consequently, "Wherever we observe a uniform order of events, or a uniform order of coexisting phenomena, we are prone to impute that order to a law set by its author, though the case presents us with nothing that can be likened to a sanction or a duty." As used in the NT it will be found generally that the term "law" bears the sense indicated by Austin, and includes "command," "duty" and "sanction."

I. Law in the Gospels.—Naturally we first turn to the Gospels, where the word "law" always refers to the Mosaic law, although it has different applications. That law was really threefold: the Moral Law, as summed up in the Decalogue, the Ceremonial Law, prescribing the ritual and all the typical enactments, and what might be called the Civil or Political Law, that relating to the people in their national, political life. The distinction is not closely observed, though sometimes the reference emphasizes one aspect, sometimes another, but generally the whole Law without any discrimination is contemplated. Sometimes the Law means the whole OT Scriptures, as in Jn 10 34; 12 34; 15 25. At other times the Law means the Pent, as in Lk 24 44.

The Law frequently appears in the teaching of Christ. In the Sermon on the Mount He refers most specifically and fully to it. It is frequently asserted that He there exposes the imperfection of the Law and sets His own authority against its authority. But this seems to be a superficial and an untenable view. Christ indeed affirms very definitely the authority of the Law: "Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets" (Mt 5 17). Here the term would seem to mean the whole of the Pent. "I came not to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all things be accomplished" (Mt 5 17, 18). A similar utterance is recorded in Lk 16 17: "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than for one tittle of the law to fall."

(1) Authority of the Law upheld in the Sermon on the Mount.—The perfection and permanence of the Law as well as its authority are thus indicated.

and the following verse in Mt still further emphasizes the authority, while showing that now the Lord is speaking specifically of the moral law of the Decalogue: "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven" (5 19). These impressive sentences should be borne in mind in considering the utterances that follow, in which there seems a contrast between the Law and His own teaching, and from which has been drawn the inference that He condemns and practically abrogates the Law. What Jesus really does is to bring out the fullness of meaning that is in the Law, and to show its spirituality and the wideness of its reach. He declares that the righteousness of His disciples must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees (ver 20). Their righteousness consisted largely in a punctilious observance of the external requirements of the Law; the disciples must yield heart obedience to the inner spirit of the Law, its external and internal requirements.

(a) Christ and tradition: Jesus then proceeds to point out the contrast, not so much between His own teaching and that of the Law, as between His interpretation of the Law and the interpretation of other teachers: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time" (AV), "to them of old time" RV (ver 21). Either rendering is grammatically allowable, but in either case it is evidently not the original utterance of Moses, but the traditional interpretation, which He had in view. "Ye have heard that it was said"; Christ's usual way of quoting the OT is, "It is written" or some other formula pointing to the written Word; and as He has just referred to the written Law as a whole, it would be strange if He should now use the formula "It was said" in reference to the particular precepts. Evidently He means what was said by the Jewish teachers.

(b) Sin of murder: This is further confirmed by the citations: "Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment." The second clause is not found in the Pent as a distinct statement, but it is clearly the generalization of the teachers. Christ does not set Himself in opposition to Moses; rather does He enjoin obedience to the precepts of the scribes when, sitting in Moses' seat, they truly expound the Law (Mt 23 1-8). But these teachers had so expounded the command as if it only referred to the act of murder; so Christ shows the full and true spiritual meaning of it: "But I say unto you, that every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment" (ver 22). See MURDER.

(c) Adultery and divorce: Again, "Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt not commit adultery" (ver 27). The traditional teaching confined this mainly to the outward act, "But I say unto you," says Christ, "that adultery pertains even to the lustful thought" (ver 28). In dealing with this matter He passes to the law of divorce which was one of the civil enactments, and did not stand on the same level with the moral precept against committing adultery, nay, the very carrying out of the civil provision might lead to a real breach of the moral precept, and in the interests of the precept itself, in the very desire to uphold the authority of the moral law, Christ pronounces against divorce on any ground, save that of fornication. Later on, as recorded in Mt 19 3-9, He was questioned about this same law of divorce, and again He condemns the light way in which divorce was treated by the Jews, and affirms strongly the sanctity of the marriage institution, showing that it was antecedent to the Mosaic code—was from the beginning, and derived its binding force from the Divine pronouncement in Gen 2 24, founded upon the nature of things; while as to the Mosaic law of divorce, He declares that it was permitted on account of the hardness of their hearts, but that no other cause than fornication was sufficient to dissolve the marriage tie. This civil enactment, justified originally on account of the inability of the people to rise to the true moral ideal of the Decalogue, Christ claims authority to transcend, and in doing so He vindicates and upholds the law which said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." See DIVORCE.

(d) Oaths: The next precept Jesus cites is one partly civil and partly ritual, concerning the taking of oaths. The words are not found in the Pent as a definite enactment; they are rather a gathering up of several utterances (Lev 19 12; Nu 30 2; Dt 23 21), and again the form of the citation suggests that it is the rabbinical interpretation that is in question. But the kind of swearing allowed by the law was the very opposite of ordinary profane swearing. It was intended, indeed, to guard the 3d commandment against taking the name of Jeh in vain. Christ in condemning the flippant oaths allowed by the rabbis was really asserting the authority of that 3d command; He was enforcing its spirituality and claiming the reverence due to the Divine name. Into the question how far the words of Christ bear upon oath-taking in a court of law we need not enter. His own response to the adjuration of the high priest when practically put upon His oath (Mt 26 63,64) and other NT instances (Rom 1 9; 2 Cor 1 23; Gal 1 20; Phil 1 8; 1 Thess 2 5; He 6 16,17; Rev 10 5,6) would tend to show that such solemn appeals to God are not embraced in Christ's prohibition: "Swear not at all"; but undoubtedly the ideal speech is that of the simple asseveration, the "Yes" or "No" of the man, who, conscious that he speaks in the presence of God, reckons his word inviolable, needing no strengthening epithet, though as between man and man an oath may be necessary for confirmation and an end of strife. See OATH.

(e) Retaliation: He next touches upon the "law of retaliation": "an eye for an eye" (ver 38), and consistently with our understanding of the other sayings, we think that here Christ is dealing with the traditional interpretation which admitted of personal revenge, of men taking the law into their own hands and revenging themselves. Such a practice Christ utterly condemns, and inculcates instead gentleness and forbearance, the outcome of love even toward enemies. This law, indeed, finds place among the Mosaic provisions, but it appears there, not as allowing personal spite to gratify itself in its own way, but as a political enactment to be carried out by the magistrates and so to discountenance private revenge. Christ shows that the spirit of His Gospel received by His people would supersede the necessity for these requirements of the civil code; although His words are not to be interpreted quite literally, for He Himself when smitten on the one cheek did not turn the other to the smiter (Jn 18 22,23), and the principle of the law of retaliation still holds good in the legislative procedure of all civilized nations, and according to the NT teaching, will find place even in the Divine procedure in the day of judgment. See also PUNISHMENT.

(f) Love to neighbors; love of enemies: The last saying mentioned in the Sermon clearly reveals its rabbinical character: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy" (Mt 5 43). The first part is indeed the injunction of the Law, the second part is an unwarrantable addition to it. It is only this part that Christ virtually condemns when He says: "But I say unto you, Love your enemies" (ver 44). That the interpretation of these teachers was unwarrantable may be seen from many passages in the Pent, the Prophets and the Ps, which set forth the more spiritual aspect of the Law's requirement; and as to this particular precept, we need only refer to Prov 25 21,22: "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat." Christ while condemning the addition unfolds the spiritual import of the command itself, for the love of neighbor rightly interpreted involves love of enemies; and so on another occasion (Lk 10 25-37) He answers the lawyer's question, "Who is my neighbor?" by the parable of the Good Samaritan, showing that everyone in need is our neighbor. See also FORGIVENESS; WRATH.

The last reference in the Sermon on the Mount to the Law fully bears out the idea that Christ really upheld the authority while elucidating the spirituality of the Law, for He declares that the principle embodied in the "Golden Rule" is a deduction from, is, indeed, the essence of, "the law and the prophets" (Mt 7 12).

(2) Other references to the Law in the teaching of Christ.—We can only glance at the other references to the Law in the teaching of Christ. In Mt 11 13, "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John," the Law in its teaching capacity is in view, and perhaps the whole of the Pent is meant. In Mt 12 1-8, in rebutting the charge brought against His disciples of breaking the Sabbath, He cites the case of David and his men eating the showbread, which it was not lawful for any but the priests to partake of; and of the priests doing work on the Sabbath day which in other men would be a breach of the Law; from which He deduces the conclusion that the ritual laws may be set aside under stress of necessity and for a higher good. In that same chapter (vs 10-13) He indicates the lawfulness of healing—doing good—on the Sabbath day.

(a) Traditions of the elders and the 5th commandment: In Mt 15 1-6 we have the account of the Pharisees complaining that the disciples transgressed the traditions of the elders by eating with unwashed hands. Jesus retorts upon them with the question: "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your tradition?" citing the specific case of the 5th commandment which was evaded and virtually broken by their ingenious distinction of korban. This is a very instructive incident in its bearing upon the point which we have sought to enforce—that it was the traditional interpretation and not the Law itself which Jesus condemned or corrected.

(b) Christ's answer to the young ruler: To the young ruler (Mt 19 16-42) He presents the commandments as the rule of life, obedience to which is the door to eternal life, especially emphasizing the manward aspect of the Law's claims. The young man, professing to have kept them all, shows that he has not grasped the spirituality of their requirements, and it is further to test him that Christ calls upon him to make the "great renunciation" which, after all, is not in itself an additional command so much as the unfolding of the spiritual and far-reaching character of the command, "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

(c) Christ's answer to the lawyer: To the lawyer who asks Him which is the great commandment in the Law, He answers by giving him the sum of the whole moral law. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment. And a second like unto it is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Mt 22 35-39). In Mark's report (Mk 12 31), He adds, "There is none other commandment greater than these," and in that of Matthew He says, "On these two commandments the whole law hangeth, and the prophets" (ver 40); both utterances showing the high estimation in which He held the Law.

(d) References in the Fourth Gospel: In His discussion with the Jews, recorded in Jn 7, He charges them with failure to keep the Law: "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you doeth the law?" (ver 19). And referring to the healing of the impotent man on the Sabbath day, a deed which had roused their ire, He shows how one law may conflict with another. Moses had enjoined circumcision, and sometimes the time for circumcising would fall on the Sabbath day. Yet with all their reverence for the Sabbath day, they would, in order to keep the law of circumcision, perform the rite on the Sabbath day, and so, He argues, it is unreasonable to complain of Him because on the Sabbath day He had fulfilled the higher law of doing good, healing a poor sufferer. In none of all Christ's utterances is there any slight thrown upon the Law itself; it is always held up as the standard of right and its authority vindicated.

The passages we have considered show the place of the Law in the teaching of Christ, but we also find that He had to sustain a practical relation to that Law. Born under the Law, becoming part of a nation which honored and venerated the Law, every part of whose life was externally regulated by it, the life of Jesus Christ could not fail to be affected by that

Law. We note its operation:

(1) In His infancy.—On the eighth day He was circumcised (Lk 2 21), thus being recognized as a member of the covenant nation, partaking of its privileges, assuming its responsibilities. Then, according to the ritual law of purification, He is presented in the temple to the Lord (Lk 2 22-24), while His mother offers the sacrifice enjoined in the "law of the Lord," the sacrifice she brings pathetically witnessing to her poverty, "a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons" being the alternative allowed to those who were not able to provide a lamb (Lev 12). The Divine approval is set upon this consecrating act, for it is while it is being done concerning Him after "the custom of the law" (ver 27), that the Spirit of God comes upon Simeon and prompts the great prophecy which links all the Messianic hopes with the Babe of Bethlehem.

Again, according to the Law His parents go up to the Passover feast when the wondrous child has reached His 12th year, the age when a youthful Jew assumed legal responsibility, becoming "a son of the Law," and so Jesus participates in the festal observances, and His deep interest in all that concerns the temple-worship and the teaching of the Law is shown by His absorption in the conversation of the doctors, whose questions He answers so intelligently, while questioning them in turn, and filling them with astonishment at His understanding (Lk 2 42-47).

(2) In His ministry.—In His ministry He ever honors the Law. He reads it in the synagogue. He heals the leper by His sovereign touch and word, but He bids him go and show himself to the priest and offer the gift that Moses commanded (Mt 8 4). And again, when the lepers appeal to Him, His response which implies the healing is, "Go and show yourselves unto the priests" (Lk 17 14). He drives out of the temple those that defile it (Mt 21 12-13; Jn 2 15-17), because of His zeal for the honor of His Father's house, and so, while showing His authority, emphasizes the sanctity of the temple and its services. So, while claiming to be the Son in the Father's house, and therefore above the injunctions laid upon the servants and strangers, He nevertheless pays the temple-tax exacted from every son of Israel (Mt 17 24-27). He attends the various feasts during His ministry, and when the shadows of death are gathering round Him, He takes special pains to observe the Passover with His disciples. Thus to the ceremonial law He renders continuous obedience, the motto of His life practically being His great utterance to the Baptist: "Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness" (Mt 3 15). If He obeyed the ceremonial law, unquestionably He obeyed the moral law. His keenest-eyed enemies could find no fault in Him in regard to His moral conduct. His absolute sinlessness attests the translation of the moral law into actual life.

We enter not upon the theological question as to the relation of the death of Christ to the penal inflictions of the Law Divinely enforced on behalf of sinners—that touches the doctrine of the Atonement—we only note the fact that His death was brought about in professed accordance with the Law. The chief priests, in hatred, sent officers to take Him, but overawed by His matchless eloquence, these officers returned empty-handed. In their chagrin, the chief priests can only say that the people who follow Him know not the Law and are cursed (Jn 7 49). Nicodemus, on this occasion, ventures to remonstrate: "Doth our law judge a man, except it first hear from himself?" (ver 51). This sound legal principle these men are bent on disregarding; their one desire is to put an end to the life of this man, who has aroused their jealousy and hatred, and at last when they get Him into their hands, they strain the forms of the Law to accomplish their purpose. There is no real charge that can be brought against Him. They dare not bring up the plea that He broke the Sabbath, for again and again He has answered their cavils on that score. He has broken no law; all they can do is to bribe false witnesses to testify something to His discredit. The trumpety charge, founded upon a distorted reminiscence of His utterance about destroying the temple, threatens to break down.

(1) Christ charged with blasphemy in relation to the Jewish law.—Then the high priest adjures Him to say upon oath whether or not He claims to be the Christ, the Son of the Living God. Such a claim would assuredly, if unfounded, be blasphemy, and according to the Law, be punishable by death. On a previous occasion the Jews threatened to stone Him for this—to them—blasphemous claim. Now when Jesus calmly avows that He is the Son of God, the high priest, rending his clothes, declares that no further proof is needed. He has confessed to the blasphemy, and unanimously the council votes Him worthy of death (Mt 26; Mk 14; Lk 22). If Jesus Christ were not what He claimed to be, then the priests were right in holding Him guilty of blasphemy; it never occurred to them to consider whether the claim after all might not be true.

(2) Christ charged with treason under the Roman law.—Not only is the Jewish law invoked to accomplish His death, but also the Rom law. On one other occasion Christ had come into touch with the law of Rome, viz. when asked the ensnaring question by the Herodians as to the lawfulness of giving tribute to Caesar (Mt 22 17; Mk 12 14; Lk 20 22). Now the Jews need the Rom governor's authorization for the death penalty, and Jesus must be tried before him. The charge cannot now be blasphemy—the Rom law will have nothing to say to that—and so they trump up a charge of treason against Caesar.

In preferring it, they practically renounce their Messianic hopes. The charge, however, breaks down before the Rom tribunal, and only by playing on the weakness of Pilate do they gain their end, and the Rom law decrees His death, while leaving the Jews to see to the carrying out of the sentence. In this the evangelist sees the fulfilment of Christ's words concerning the manner of His death, for stoning would have been the Jewish form of the death penalty, not crucifixion. See JESUS CHRIST, III, E), ii, 3, 4.

Looking at the whole testimony of the Gospels, we can see how it was that Christ fulfilled the Law.

4. How Christ Fulfilled the Law in All Its Parts

He fulfilled the moral law by obeying, by bringing out its fulness of meaning, by showing its intense spirituality, and He established it on a surer basis than ever as the eternal law of righteousness. He fulfilled the ceremonial and typical law, not only by conforming to its requirements, but by realizing its spiritual significance. He filled up the shadowy outlines of the types, and, thus fulfilled, they pass away, and it is no longer necessary for us to observe the Passover or slay the daily lamb: we have the substance in Christ. He also cleared the Law from the traditional exercises which had gathered round it under the hands of the rabbis. He showed that the ceremonial distinction between meats clean and unclean was no longer necessary, but showed the importance of true spiritual purity (Mt 15 11; Mk 7 18-23). He taught His disciples those great principles when, after His resurrection, "beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself" (Lk 24 27). And as He opened their mind that they might understand the Scriptures, He declared, "These are my words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, concerning me" (Lk 24 44). John sums this up in his pregnant phrase, "The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ" (Jn 1 17). The grace was in contrast to the condemnation of the moral law, the truth was the antithesis to the shadowy outline of the types and ceremonies.

II. Law in the Acts of the Apostles.—Without considering questions of authenticity and historicity in relation to this book which professes to be the earliest church history, we briefly note the place of the Law therein indicated. In the book we have an account of the transition from Judaism to fully developed Christianity, and the Law comes into view in various ways. The disciples, like other Jews, observe the feast of Pentecost, and even after the descent of the Spirit, they frequent the temple and observe the hours of prayer.

The full-orbed gospel proclaimed by Stephen arouses the suspicion and enmity of the stricter sects of the Jews, who accuse him before the council of speaking blasphemous words against the holy place and the Law. But this was the testimony of suborned witnesses, having 1. Stephen's doubtless its foundation in the fact Witness that Stephen's teaching emphasized the grace of the gospel. Stephen's own defence honors the Law as given by Moses, "who received living oracles" (Acts 7 38), shows how disloyal the people had been, and closes by charging them not only with rejecting and slaying the Righteous One, but of failing to keep the Law "as it was ordained by angels" (7 53).

Peter's strict observance of the ceremonial law is shown in connection with his vision which teaches him that the grace of God may pass beyond the Jewish pale (Acts 10). 2. Practice of Peter and Paul Paul's preaching emphasizes the fulfilling the Scriptures, Law and Prophecy, by Jesus Christ. The gist of his message, as given in his first reported sermon, is, "By him everyone that believeth is justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (13 38f). The conversion of the Gentiles brings up the question of their relation to the ceremonial law, specifically to circumcision. The decision of the council at Jerus treats circumcision as unnecessary for the Gentiles, and only enjoins, in relation to the Mosaic ritual, abstinence from things strangled and from blood (ch 15). The after-course of events would show that this provision was for the time of transition. Paul, though strongly opposed to the idea of imposing circumcision on the Gentiles, nevertheless without inconsistency and as a concession to Jewish feeling, circumcises Timothy (16 3), and himself fulfils the ceremonial enactments in connection with the taking of a vow (18 18). He also, following the advice of James, who wished him to conciliate the myriads of believing Jews who were zealous for the Law, and to show them the falseness of the charge that he taught the Jews among the Gentiles "to forsake Moses" (apostasy from Moses), took upon him the ceremonial duty of purifying the "four men that have a vow on them" (21 20-26). This involved the offering of sacrifices, and the fact that Paul could do so shows that for the Jews the sacrificial system still remained in force. The sequel to the transaction might raise the question whether, after all, the procedure was a wise one; it certainly did not fulfil the expectations of James. Later on, in his defence before Felix, Paul claims to be loyal to the Jewish faith, worshipping in the temple, and "believing all things which are according to the law, and which are written in the prophets" (24 11-14); and in his address to the Jewish leaders in Rome, he declares that he has "done nothing against the people, or the customs of our fathers" (28 17), and he seeks to persuade them concerning Jesus, "both from the law of Moses and from the prophets" (28 23).

In the Acts we find several allusions to law other than Jewish. In ch 16 Paul comes into collision with the Rom law. Beaten and imprisoned by the magistrates of Philippi, to the he is afterward offered the opportunity of quietly slipping away, but standing on his dignity as a Rom citizen, he demands that the magistrates themselves, who had violated the law by publicly beating uncondemned Romans, should come and set them free. This same right as a Rom citizen Paul again asserts when about to be scourged by the command of the centurion (22 25), and his protest is successful in averting the indignity. His trial before Felix and Festus well illustrates the procedure under the Rom law, and his appeal, as a Rom citizen, to Caesar had important results in his life.

3. Allusions to Roman Law to the he is afterward offered the opportunity of quietly slipping away, but standing on his dignity as a Rom citizen, he demands that the magistrates themselves, who had violated the law by publicly beating uncondemned Romans, should come and set them free. This same right as a Rom citizen Paul again asserts when about to be scourged by the command of the centurion (22 25), and his protest is successful in averting the indignity. His trial before Felix and Festus well illustrates the procedure under the Rom law, and his appeal, as a Rom citizen, to Caesar had important results in his life.

III. Law in the Epistles.—The word is used both with and without the article, but though in some cases the substantive without the article refers to law in general, yet in many other places it undoubtedly refers to the Law of Moses. Perhaps, as has been suggested, it is that, where it does refer to the Mosaic Law, the word without the article points to that law, not so much as Mosaic, but in its quality as law. But speaking generally, the word with and without the article is used in reference to the Law of Moses.

(1) Law as a standard.—In Rom Paul has much to say about law, and in the main it is the moral law that he has in view. In this great ep., written to people at the center of the famous legal system of Rome, many of them Jews versed in the law of Moses and others Gentiles familiar with the idea of law, its nature, its scope and its sway, he first speaks of the Law as a standard, want of conformity to which brings condemnation. He shows that the Gentiles who had not the standard of the revealed Law nevertheless had a law, the law of Nature, a law written upon their heart and conscience. Rom jurisprudence was familiar with the conception of a law of Nature, which became a law of nations (jus gentium), so that certain principles could be assumed as obtaining among those who had not the knowledge of the Rom code; and in accordance with these principles, the dealings between Romans and barbarians could be regulated. Paul's conception is somewhat similar, but is applied to the spiritual relations of man and God.

(2) Gentiles condemned by the law of Nature.—But the Gentiles, not having lived up to the light of that law, are condemned. They have violated the dictates of their own conscience. And the Jews, with the fuller light of their revealed law, have equally failed. In this connection Paul incidentally lays down the great principle that "Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified" (Rom 2 13). His great aim, in the ep., is to show that justification is by faith, but he here asserts that if anyone would have justification through law, then he must keep that law in all its details. The Law will pronounce the doer of it justified, but the mere hearing of the Law without doing it will only increase the condemnation. "As many as have sinned without the law shall also perish without the law: and as many as have sinned under the law shall be judged by the law" (2 12). Paul does not pronounce upon the question whether a Gentile may be saved by following the light of Nature; he rather emphasizes the negative side that those who have failed shall perish; they have light enough to condemn, is his point.

(3) All men under condemnation.—Having proved that both Jews and Gentiles are under sin, he closes his great indictment with the statement: "Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it speaketh to them that are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be brought under the judgment of God" (3 19). Thus the Law shuts up into condemnation. It is impossible for any sinner to be justified "by the works of the law"; the Law not only condemns but "through the law cometh the knowledge of sin" (3 20). It shows how far short men have come of God's requirements. It is a mirror in which the sinner sees his defilement, but the mirror cannot cleanse, though it shows the need of cleansing.

(4) The redeeming work of Christ providing righteousness apart from the Law.—Then setting forth the great redemption of Jesus Christ, the apostle shows that it provides what the Law had failed to provide, a righteousness which can satisfy the requirements of the Law; a righteousness that is indeed "apart from the law," apart from all men's attempts to keep the Law, but is nevertheless in deepest harmony with the principles of the Law, and has been witnessed "by the law and the prophets" (3 21). (In this passage the "law" seems to mean the Pent, and in ver 19, in view of the preceding citations from the Pss, it appears to mean the whole OT Scriptures.) Since the righteousness secured by Christ comes upon the sinner through faith, manifestly the works of the Law can have nothing to do with our obtaining of it. But so far is faith-righteousness from undermining the Law, that Paul claims that through faith the Law is established (3 31).

(5) Abraham's blessings came not through the Law.—Proceeding to show that his idea of justification by faith was no new thing, that the OT saint had enjoyed it, he particularly shows that Abraham, even in his uncircumcised state, received the blessing through faith; and the great promise to him and his seed did not come through the Law, but on the principle of faith.

(6) Law worketh wrath and intensifieth the evil of sin.—Indeed, so far from blessing coming to sinners by way of the Law, the "law worketh wrath" (4 15); not wrath in men against the Law's restrictions as some have argued, but the holy wrath of God so frequently mentioned by the apostle in this ep. The Law worketh wrath, inasmuch as when disobeyed it brings on the sinner the Divine disapproval, condemnation; it enhances the guilt of sin, and so intensifies the Divine wrath against it; and it, in a sense, provokes to sin: the sinful nature rebels against the restrictions imposed by the Law, and the very fact of a thing being forbidden arouses the desire for it. This seems what he means in a subsequent passage (5 20), "And the law came in besides, that the trespass might abound"; as if the very multiplying of restrictions intensified the tendency to sin, brought out the evil in human nature, showed the utter vileness of the sinful heart and the terrible nature of sin, and thus made the need for salvation appear the greater, the very desperateness of the disease showing the need for the remedy and creating the desire for it; the abounding of sin preparing the way for the superabounding of grace. That the presence of Law enhances the evil of sin is further shown by the statement, "But where there is no law, neither is there transgression" (4 15); transgression—parábasis—the crossing of the boundary, is, in the strict sense, only possible under law. But there may be sin apart from a revealed law, as he has already proved in the 2d chapter.

(7) Law in the light of the parallel between Adam and Christ.—In the 5th chapter, dealing with the parallel between Adam and Christ he says: "For until the law sin was in the world; but sin is not imputed when there is no law" (5 13). He cannot mean that men were not held responsible for their sin, or that sin was not in any sense reckoned to their account, for he has in that 2d chapter proved the opposite; but sin was not so imputed to them as to bring upon them the punishment of death, which they nevertheless did suffer, and that is traced by him to the sin of Adam. These, he says, had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression (ver 14); they had not transgressed a positive command as he did, although they had undoubtedly violated the law of conscience, and knew that they were sinners. In drawing out the parallel between Adam and Christ, he plainly indicates that as Adam's transgression of law brought condemnation on the race, so Christ's obedience to the Law brings justification.

(8) Law and righteousness.—So far he may be said to have spoken of the Law in regard to the sinner; and it is mainly the Law in its judicial aspect, the Law in relation to righteousness. The Law reveals righteousness, the Law demands righteousness, the Law condemns for unrighteousness. Redemption is a working out of righteousness. The Law witnesses to the perfect righteousness of Christ. The righteousness secured by Christ meets all the requirements of the Law, while gloriously transcending it. The righteous penalty of the Law has been borne by Christ; the righteous requirements of the Law have been fulfilled by Christ. That perfect righteousness secured apart from the Law, but satisfying to the Law, comes to men not through their relation to the Law, but through faith. Now he proceeds to consider the Law in relation to the saint.

(9) The saint and the Law.—The believer justified through Christ has died with Christ. The "old man"—the sinful nature—has been crucified with Christ; the condemning power of the Law has terminated in the death of Christ, and through the death of the believer with Christ he has freedom from the condemnation of the Law. "He that hath died is justified from sin" (6 7). But though in one aspect the believer is dead, in another he is alive. He dies with Christ, but he rises spiritually with Him, and thus spiritually alive he is "to yield," "to present" his "members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (ver 13), and for his comfort he is assured that in this new sphere of life sin shall not have power to bring him under the condemnation of the Law—"Sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under law, but under grace" (6 14). His relationship to the Law has been altered through his union with Christ, and this fact the apostle proceeds to illustrate. He enounces the principle that "the law hath dominion over a man for so long a time as he liveth" (7 1). Death dissolves all legal objections. The believer, spiritually dead, is not under the dominion of the Law.

(10) Illustrated by the law of the husband.—The specific case is then given of a married woman bound by law to her husband, but freed from that law through his death, and in the application, he says, "Wherefore, my brethren, ye also were made dead to the law through the body of Christ" (7 4). If the Law in this metaphorical description is the husband while the soul is the wife, as has been most generally understood by commentators, then the application is based on the general thought of death dissolving the legal obligation, the death of the husband involves the death of the woman as a wife, and so he can speak of the death of the believer rather than of the death of the Law. Another explanation of the metaphor is that the old sinful state is the husband to which the ego, the personality, was bound by the Law, but that the sinful state being brought to death through Christ, the personality is free to enter into union with Christ. Whatever view is adopted, the leading thought of the apostle is clear, that through the death of Christ the believer is free from the Law: "But now we have been discharged from the law, having died to that wherein we were held" (7 6).

(11) The purity and perfection of the Law in its own sphere.—The question is then raised, "Is the law sin?" (ver 7). The thought is repudiated as unthinkable, but he goes on to show how the law was related to sin, giving from his own experience the exemplification of what he had stated in the 3d chapter, that by the Law is the knowledge of sin. The Law revealed his sin; the Law aroused the opposition of his nature, and through the working of sin under the prohibition of the Law, he found the tendency to be death. Nevertheless, there is no doubt in his mind that the Law is not responsible for the sin, the Law is not in any manner to be blamed, "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and righteous, and good" (ver 12). Sin in the light of the holy Law is shown to be exceeding sinful, and the Law itself is known to be spiritual.

We need not deal with the difficult passage that follows concerning the inner conflict. There has always been much discussion as to whether this is a conflict in the soul of the unregenerate man or of the regenerate—we believe it is in the regenerate, setting forth the experience of the believer—but whatever view is taken, it is clear that the law cannot bring deliverance; the higher part of man's nature, or the regenerate nature according to the interpretation one adopts, may "consent unto the law that it is good" (ver 16), may even "delight in the law of God" (ver 22); but there is another law at work, the law of sin in the members, and the working of this law means captivity and wretchedness from which deliverance can only come through Jesus Christ (vs 23–25). The word "law" in these verses is used in the sense of principle, "the law of my mind," "the law of sin," "the law in my members"; but over against all is the law of God.

(12) Freedom from the penal claims of the Law.—

The description of the Law as holy, righteous and good, as spiritual, as the object of delight to a true heart, is enough to show that the deliverance which the Christian enjoys is freedom from the penal claims and condemning power of the Law. This is borne out by the exulting conclusion: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus" (8 1). The Law's claims, satisfied by Christ, no longer press upon those who are in Him. When the apostle adds, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death" (8 2), he is using "law" in the general sense as a principle or power of producing ordered action, and "the law of the Spirit of life" may be taken to mean the method of the Spirit's working, and indeed may well be a way of describing the gospel itself—the new law, through which the Spirit operates. The other phrase, "law of sin and death," is not to be taken as meaning the Law of Moses, but the law, the principle of sin producing death mentioned in the previous chapter, unless we think of it as the holy Law which gives the knowledge of sin and brings the condemnation of death. The failure of the Law to produce a satisfactory result is definitely attributed to the weakness of the flesh, which is in effect reflecting the statement of the previous chapter, but all that the Law could not accomplish is accomplished through the work of Christ. In Christ sin is condemned, and in those who are brought into union with Him the righteousness of the Law is fulfilled.

(13) The Law remains as a rule of life for the believer.—Thus the Law is not abrogated. It remains as the standard of righteousness, the "rule of life" for believers. The utmost holiness to which they can attain under the influence of the Holy Spirit, is still the "righteousness" which the Law requires. That the apostle's teaching is far removed from Antinomianism is shown, not only by all that he says in these chapters about the believer's new life of absolute spiritual service, but by the specific statement in Rom 13 8–10, which at once prescribes the commandments as rules of life (in Eph 6 2 he cites and enforces the 5th commandment) and shows how true obedience is possible. "Owe no man anything, save to love one another: for he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." Then, after specifying several of the commands, he declares that these and all other commands are "summed up in this word, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The man in Christ has found the true principle of obedience. He has entered into the true spirit of the holy law. That is all summed up in love, and he having received the love of Christ, living in His love, sees the Law not as a stern taskmaster condemning, but as a bright vision alluring. He indeed sees the Law embodied in Christ, and the imitation of Christ involves obedience to the Law, but he fulfils the Law not simply as a standard outside, but as a living principle within. Acting according to the dictates of the love begotten at the cross, his life is conformed to the image of Christ, and in so far is conformed to the Law—"Love therefore is the fulfilment of the law." In 13 1-7, though the word "law" does not occur, Paul indicates the relation of the Christian to the Rom law, to the sovereignty of Rome in general, showing that "the powers that be are ordained of God" and that in the ideal they are reflections of Divine authority, and as such are to be obeyed.

In the Ep. to the Gal, Paul has also a great deal to say about the Law, but as we have dealt so fully with the conception given in Rom, we

2. In the Epistle to the Galatians can only briefly note the teaching of the Galatian Ep.

(1) Law in relation to grace and spiritual liberty.—In general, we may say that as the Law in relation to righteousness was the prominent feature in Rom, in Gal it is the Law in relation to grace and spiritual liberty, and while it was almost exclusively the moral law that Paul had in view in Rom, in Gal it is rather the Law of Moses in its entirety, with special emphasis upon the ceremonial. He introduces the subject by referring to the episode at Antioch, when he had to rebuke Peter for his "dissimulation" (2 13). He shows the inconsistency of those who knew that they had been "justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law" (ver 16), compelling the gentle Christians to live according to the Law, and sums up with the striking statement, "For I through the law died unto the law, that I might live unto God" (ver 19). The Law in revealing his sin and pronouncing condemnation, drove him to Christ for justification. Crucified with Christ he has entered into such vital union with Christ that his whole self-life is dominated by the Christ-life: "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me" (ver 20). Here we have the same line of thought as in Rom; then Paul goes on to show that all the blessings of grace which these Christians enjoy have come to them not by way of the Law, but "by the hearing of faith" (3 2-5). Again, citing the case of Abraham as an instance of justification by faith, he shows how utterly opposed the Law is to the grace that brings salvation, "For as many as are of the works of the law are under a curse" (ver 10), but in gracious contrast, "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law" (ver 13), having Himself borne the curse, and so the blessing of Abraham can come upon the Gentiles through faith (ver 18).

(2) The function of the Law not to give life, but to guide life.—As in Rom, he shows that the promise of the inheritance was apart from the Law, was given 430 years before the Law was promulgated, and answers the question as to the purpose of the Law, by saying, "It was added because of transgressions" (3 19), the thought already noted in Rom. Yet the Law was not in its nature opposed to the promise. If any law could have given life, "could make alive," then so perfect was the Law of Moses that it would have served the purpose; "Verily, righteousness would have been of the law" (ver 21). The Law was never meant to give life to those who had it not. "He that doeth them shall live in them" (ver 12), but the doing implies the possession of life, and the Law only guarantees the continuance of life while it is perfectly obeyed. Law controls life, but cannot confer life. It regulates life, but cannot restore life. It may impel to righteousness, but it cannot impart righteousness.

(3) The Law our schoolmaster.—The Law, he shows, was our schoolmaster, our pedagogue, "to bring us unto Christ" (ver 24). The Grecian youth was under the charge of a pedagogue during his minority, one part of the pedagogue's duty being to take the boy, unwilling enough sometimes, to school. In the sense already shown in Rom, the moral law by showing us our sinfulness leads us to Christ; but here we may take the Law as a whole, including all the ceremonial and typical observances which were designed to lead the people to Christ.

(4) The bondage of the Law.—But while there was undoubtedly much of privilege for the people under the Mosaic dispensation, there was also something of bondage. And so Paul says, "We were kept in ward under the law" (ver 23), and in the next chapter, he speaks of the child, though heir to a great estate, being "under guardians and stewards until the day appointed of the father" (4 2), which seems to be the same thought as under the pedagogue, and this he calls a state of "bondage" (ver 3). The Law guarded and tutored and restrained; the great typical observances, though foreshadowing the grace of the gospel, were yet, in their details, irksome and burdensome, and the mass of rules as to every part of the Jew's conduct proved to be, speaking after the present-day manner, a system of red tape. Little was left to the free, spontaneous action of the spirit; the whole course of the Jew from the cradle to the grave was carefully marked out.

(5) Sonship and its freedom from the Law's restrictions.—But in the fulness of time "God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (4 4 f). The gospel of the grace of God embodied in Christ shows its gracious character in that it not only answers the requirements of the moral law and removes its condemnation; fulfils, and by fulfilling abrogates the typical observer of the ceremonial law, but also abolishes all the directions and restrictions given to the Jews as a separate people, and brings its subjects into a condition of liberty where the renewed spirit under the mighty love of Christ can act spontaneously, the great principles of the moral law remaining as its guide, while the minute rules needed for the infancy of the race are no longer appropriate for the "sons of God, through faith, in Christ Jesus" (3 26). And so Paul warns these Christians against turning back to the "weak and beggarly rudiments" and observing "months, and seasons, and years" (4 9.10).

In the remaining Epp. of Paul, little is said of the Law, and we need only indicate the connections in which the word occurs. In 1 Cor 7

3. In the Epistles 39 there is a reference to the wife being "bound by the law as long as her husband liveth" (AV). The word "law," however, is omitted from the critical texts and from RV. In the same ep. (9 8.9; 14 21.34) the word is used of the Pent or the Scriptures as a whole. In 9 20 Paul refers to his practice of seeking to win men to Christ by accommodating himself to their standpoint, "to them that are under the law, as under the law"; and in 15 56 occurs the pregnant statement, an echo of Rom, "The power of sin is the law." In 2 Cor the word does not occur, though the legal system is referred to as the ministration of death, in contrast to the gospel ministration of the Spirit (ch 3). The word "law" is once used in Eph (2 15), in reference to the work of Christ not only producing harmony between God and man, but between Jew and Gentile: "abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances," also spoken of as "the middle wall of partition," and referring esp. to the ceremonial enactments.

In Phil 3 5.6.9 we have the fine autobiographical passage wherein we see the self-righteous Pharisee reckoning himself "blameless" in the eye of the Law, until convinced of his sin, and led to find in Christ the righteousness "which is through faith," instead of his own righteousness "which is of the law" (ver 9). The word does not occur in Col, but the thought is found of the spiritual circumcision in contrast to the physical, the blotting out through the work of the cross, of the bond written in ordinances and the consequent deliverance of the believer from the bondage of ceremonial observances (2 11-17), those being affirmed to be "a shadow of the things to come," Christ being the glorious substance. In 1 Tim 1 8,9, we have the two pregnant statements that "the law is good, if a man use it lawfully," and that "law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless."

The word "law" occurs 14 t in this ep., and a great deal of attention is given to the subject, but it is generally the law in its ceremonial and typical aspect that is in question. It is not necessary to look at the matter in detail, but simply to indicate the line of teaching.

4. In the Epistle to the Hebrews

(1) Harmony with the Pauline teaching.—The ancient doubt as to the authorship of the ep. seems today to have crystallized into certainty, albeit the grounds for a conclusion are no stronger than formerly, but in the desire to prove the non-Pauline authorship, too much emphasis is perhaps laid upon the supposed un-Pauline character of the teaching. There is, after all, profound harmony between the teaching of the Pauline Epp. and the teaching of He, and the harmony applies to this matter of the Law. While Paul, as we have seen, gives prominence in Rom to the moral law, in Gal and elsewhere he deals with the ceremonial law, in much the same way, though not so fully, as the writer to the Hebrews. Such utterances as, "Our Passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ" (1 Cor 5 7); "The rock was Christ"; "Now these things were our examples" (types of us) (1 Cor 10 4-6); "Which are a shadow of the things to come; but the body is Christ's" (Col 2 17) are exactly in line with the teaching of Hebrews.

(2) The Law transcended by the gospel.—The author shows how the Law, which was a word spoken through angels, is transcended by the gospel, which has been spoken by the Lord of the angels, and so demands greater reverence (He 2 2-4), and all through the ep. it is the transcendent glory of the gospel dispensation introduced by Christ and ascribed to Him, which is made to shine before us.

(3) Law of priesthood.—The author deals specifically in chs 7 and 8 with the law of priesthood, showing that Christ's Priesthood, "after the order of Melchisedek," surpasses in glory that of the Aaronic priesthood under the law; not only surpasses but supersedes it; the imperfect gives place to the perfect; the shadowy to the real; the earthly to the heavenly; the temporal to the eternal. And as Paul justifies his doctrine of justification apart from the deeds of the Law by reference to the OT teaching, so here the writer finds in the OT prediction of the New Covenant, the basis for all his reasoning, and in his reference to the description of the New Covenant, he is at one with Paul in regard to the moral law, seeing it as now written on the heart, and becoming an internal power, rather than an external precept. See NEW COVENANT.

(4) The law of the sanctuary and the sacrifices.—He next deals with the law of the sanctuary, and in connection therewith considers the law of the sacrifices (chs 9-10), and in the same way shows that Christ makes good all that the tabernacle and its services typified, that His one, all-perfect eternal sacrifice takes the place of the many imperfect temporary sacrifices offered under the Law. At the best the Law had "a shadow of the good things to come" (10 1). The shadow was useful for the time being, the people were greatly privileged in having it, it directed them to the great Figure who cast the shadow. The whole ceremonial system was really a system of grace at the heart of it; in spite of its external rubrics which might well be abused, it made provision for satisfying for the time the breaches of the law; the sacrifices themselves could not take away sin, but periodical forgiveness was conveyed through them, by virtue of their relation to the Coming One. Now the great sacrifice having been offered, eternal redemption is secured, perfect forgiveness obtained, free access into the heavenly Holy Place assured, and the eternal inheritance provided. The Substance of all the shadows has appeared, the shadows pass away, and the great truth indicated by Christ Himself is now fully made known through His Spirit-taught servants. Christ, who "is the end of the law [the moral law] unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom 10 4), is also the end of the ceremonial law, the full realization of all its types and shadows.

James mentions the "law" 10 t in his ep., and in each case it is the moral law. The influence of the Sermon on the Mount is seen throughout the ep., and some distinct echoes of it are heard, as e.g. the injunction, "Swear not [at all]" (5 12). James has nothing but good to say of the Law, and that fact in the light of the influence of the Sermon on the Mount is enough to show that Christ, in that wonderful discourse, did not disparage the Law, far less abrogate it, but rather exalted and reinforced it. James taught by Christ exalts the Law, glorifies it, in fact seems almost to identify it with the gospel, for in ch 1, when speaking of the Word and the importance of hearing and doing it, he in the same breath speaks of looking into "the perfect law, the law of liberty" (ver 25). And indeed, it is just possible, as some think, that he means the gospel by the epithet, although it seems better to take it as the Law tr<sup>d</sup> in the gospel, the Law looked at in its spirituality, as the guide of the Christian man who has entered into the spirit of it.

Even in the OT, as Pss 19 and 119 specifically show, it was possible for spiritually-minded men to see the beauty of the Law and find delight in its precepts. In 2 8 he speaks of the "royal law," and that here he does mean the Mosaic Law is beyond doubt, since he cites the particular requirement, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" in this agreeing with his Master and with Paul, finding in love of neighbor the sum of the Law and its true fulfilment. Respect of persons, he affirms, is a breach of this "royal law," and leads to those indulging in it being "convicted" by the law of transgression (ver 9). He then affirms the solidarity of the Law, so that a breach of it in one particular is a breach of the whole, and makes a man "guilty of all" (ver 10), a far-reaching principle which Paul had also indicated when quoting in Gal the words, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law, to do them" (Gal 3 10), and when in Rom 7 he showed that the conviction that he had broken the 10th commandment made him realize that he had broken the whole Law. James then exhorts his readers to speak and act as those who are to be judged by "a law of liberty" (2 12), so that he sets no limit to the range of that law. Finally, in 4 11, he warns them by implication against speaking against the Law or judging the Law, that is, to assume the place of judge instead of "doer of the law." James could not have used such language unless he had a profound conviction of the perfection of the Law. And it is the perfection of the Law as a rule of life for spiritual men redeemed from its condemnation that James considers it, and so we can call it the perfect law, the law of liberty, the Royal Law.

In the Epp. of Peter and John, the word "law" does not occur, but Peter shows that the holiness of God remains as in the Pent the standard of life, and the example of Christ shows the way (1 Pet 2 21), while in the church is found the spiritual realization of the sanctuary, priesthood and sacrifices of the old economy (1 Pet 2 5-9). Peter has one reference to the Rom law, enjoining upon his readers obedience to it in the political sphere. John enjoins the keeping of the commandments, these being apparently the commandments of Christ (1 Jn 2 3,4; 5 2), and the test of keeping the commandments is love of the brethren, while hatred of a brother is, as in the Sermon on the Mount, murder. All sin is "lawlessness" (3 4), and the sum of all law-keeping is love of God and love of the brethren, and so the summary of the old Law is echoed and endorsed.

LITERATURE
Law, at least as custom, certainly existed among the Hebrews in the times before Moses, as appears from numerous allusions to it, both in matters civil and ceremonial, in the earlier Scriptures. But we have no distinct account of such law, either as to its full contents or its enactment. Law in the OT practically means the Law promulgated by Moses (having its roots no doubt in this earlier law or custom), with sundry later modifications or additions, rules as to which have been inserted in the record of the Mosaic law.

The following are matters of pre-Mosaic law or custom to which allusion is made in Gen and Ex: the offering of sacrifice and the use of altars (Gen passim); the religious use of pillars (Gen 28 18); purification for sacrifice (35 2); tithes (14 20; 28 22); circumcision (17 10; Ex 4 25 f); inquiry at a sanctuary (Gen 25 22); sacred feasts (Ex 5 1, etc.); priests (Ex 19 22); sacred oaths (Gen 14 22); marriage customs (16; 24; 25 6; 29 16-30); birthright (25 31-34); elders (24 2; 50 7; Ex 3 16); homicide (Gen 9 6), etc. We proceed at once to the Law of Moses.

I. Terms Used.—The Heb word rendered "law" in our Bibles is תּוֹרָה, tōrah. Other synonymous words either denote (as indeed does tōrah itself) aspects under which the Law may be regarded, or different classes of law.

Tōrah is from hōrah, the Hiphil of yārāh. The root meaning is "to throw"; hence in Hiphil the word means "to point out" (as by throwing out the hand), and so "to direct"; and tōrah is "direction."

Tōrah may be simply "human direction," as the "law of thy mother" in Prov 1 8; but most often in the OT it is the Divine law. In the sing. it often means a law, the pl. being used in the same sense; but more frequently tōrah in the sing. is the general body of Divinely given law. The word tells nothing as to the way in which the Law, or any part of it, was first given; it simply points out the general purpose of the Law, viz. that it was for the guidance of God's people in the various matters to which it relates. This shows that the end of the Law lay beyond the mere obedience to such and such rules, that end being instruction in the knowledge of God and of men's relation to Him, and guidance in living as the children of such a God as He revealed Himself to be. This is dwelt upon in the later Scriptures, notably in Pss 19 and 119.

In the completed Canon of the OT, tōrah technically denotes the Pent (Lk 24 44) as being that division of the OT Scriptures which contains the text of the Law, and its history down to the death of Moses, the great lawgiver.

(1) Micwāh, "command" (or, in pl., "commands"), is a term applied to the Law as indicating that it is a charge laid upon men as the expression of God's will, and therefore that it must be obeyed.

(2) ʿĒdāh, "witness" or "testimony" (in pl. "testimonies"), is a designation of God's law as testifying the principles of His dealings with His people. So the ark of the covenant is called the "ark of the testimony" (Ex 25 22), as containing "the testimony" (ver 16), i.e. the tables of the Law upon which the covenant was based. The above terms are general, applying to the tōrah at large; the two next following are of more restricted application.

(3) Mishpāṭim, "judgments": Mishpāṭ in the sing. sometimes means judgment in an abstract sense, as in Gen 18 19; Dt 32 4; sometimes the act of judging, as in Dt 16 18,19; 17 9; 24 17. But "judgments" (in the pl.) is a term constantly used in connection with, and distinction from, statutes, to indicate laws of a particular kind, viz. laws which, though forming part of the tōrah by virtue of Divine sanction, originated in decisions of judges upon cases brought before them for judgment. See further below.

(4) Hukkim, "statutes" (lit. "laws engraven"), are laws immediately enacted by a lawgiver. "Judgments and statutes" together comprise the whole law (Lev 18 4; Dt 4 1,8 AV). So also we now distinguish between customary and statute law.

(5) Pikkādīm, "precepts": This term is found only in the Pss. It seems to mean rules or counsels provided to suit the various circumstances in which men may be placed. The term may perhaps be meant to apply both to the rules of the actual tōrah, and to others found, e.g. in the writings of prophets and "wise men."

II. The Written Record of the Law.—The enactment of the Law and its committal to writing must be distinguished. With regard to the former, it is distinctly stated (Jn 1 17) that "the law was given through Moses"; and though this does not necessarily imply that every regulation found in the Pent is his, a large number of the laws are expressly ascribed to him. As regards the latter, we are distinctly told that Moses wrote certain laws or collections of laws (Ex 17 14; 24 4.7; Dt 31 9). These, however, form only a portion of the whole legislation; and therefore, whether the remaining portions were written by Moses, or—if not by him—when and by whom, is a legitimate matter of inquiry.

It is not necessary here to discuss the large question of the literary history of the Pent, but it must briefly be touched upon. The Pent certainly appears to have reached its present form by the gradual piecing together of diverse materials. Dt being a separate composition, a distinction would seem to have been clearly established by critical examination between a number of paragraphs in the remaining books which apparently must once have formed a narrative by themselves, and other paragraphs, partly narrative but chiefly legislative and statistical, which appear to have been subsequently added. Without endorsing any of the critical theories as to the relation of these, one to the other, or as to the dates of their composition, we may, in a general way, accept the analysis, and adopt the well-known symbol JE to distinguish the former, and P the latter. Confining ourselves to their legislative contents, we find in JE a short but very important body of law, the Law of the Covenant, stated in full in Ex 20-23, and repeated as to a portion of it in Ex 34 10-28. All the rest of the legislation is contained in P and Dt.

We are distinctly told in Ex that the law contained in Ex 20-23 was given through Moses. Rejecting this statement, critics of the school of Wellhausen affirm that its true date must be placed considerably later than the time of Joshua. They maintain that previous to their conquest of Canaan the Israelites were mere nomads, ignorant of agriculture, the practice of which, as well as their culture in general, they first learned from the conquered Canaanites. Therefore (so they argue), as the law of Ex 20-23 presupposes the practice of agriculture, it cannot have been promulgated until some time in the period of the Judges at the earliest; they place it indeed in the early period of the monarchy. All this, however, is mere assumption, support for which is claimed in some passages in which a shepherd life is spoken of, but with utter disregard of others which show that both in the patriarchal period and in Egypt the Israelites also cultivated land. See B. D. Erdmans, "Have the Hebrews Been Nomads?" Expos, August and October, 1908. It can indeed be shown that this law was throughout in harmony with what must have been the customs and conceptions of the Israelites at the age of the exodus (Rule, OT Institutions). Professor Erdmans in his Alttestamentliche Studien, Part III (1910), vigorously defends the Mosaic origin of the Book of the Covenant.

The same critics bring down the date of the legislation of Dt to the time of Josiah, or at most a few years earlier. They affirm (wrongly) that the chief object of Josiah's reformation narrated in 2 K 23 was the centralization of worship at the temple in Jerus. They rightly attribute the zeal which carried the reform through to the discovery of the "Book of the Law" (22 8). Then arguing that the frequent previous practice of worship at high places implied the non-existence of any law to the contrary, they conclude that the rule of Dt 12 was a rule recently laid down by the temple priesthood, and written in a book in Moses' name, this new book being what was "found in the house of Jeh." But this argument is altogether unsound: its grave difficulties are well set out in Möller's Are the Critics Right? And here again careful study vindicates the Mosaic character of the law of Dt as a whole and of Dt 12 in particular. M. Édouard Naville in La découverte de la loi sous le roi Josias propounds a theory which he supports by a most interesting argument: that the book found was a foundation deposit, which must therefore have been built over by masonry at the erection of the temple by Solomon.

Equally unsound, however plausible, are the arguments which would make the framing of the Levitical ritual the work of the age of Ezra. The difficulties created by this theory are far greater than those which it is intended to remove. On this also see Möller, Are the Critics Right?

Rejecting these theories, it will be assumed in the present art. that the various laws are of the dates ascribed to them in the Pent; that whatever may be said as to the date of some "of the laws," all which are therein ascribed to Moses are truly so ascribed.

The laws in P are arranged for the most part in groups, with which narrative is sometimes intermingled. These e.g. are some of the groups: Ex 25-31; Lev 1-7; 11-15; of Laws Nu 1-4, etc. The structure and in P probable history of these groups are very interesting. That many of them must have undergone interpolation appears certain from the following considerations. Each of the groups, and often one or more paragraphs within a group, is headed by a recurring formula, "Jeh spake unto Moses [or unto Aaron, or unto Moses and Aaron], saying." We might at first expect that the contents of each group or paragraph so headed would consist solely of what Jeh had said unto Moses or Aaron, but this is not always so. Not infrequently some direction is found within such a paragraph which cannot have been spoken to Moses, but must have come into force at some later date. Unless then we reject the statement of the formula, unless we are prepared to say that Jeh did not speak unto Moses, we can only conclude that these later directions were at some time inserted by an editor into paragraphs which originally contained Mosaic laws only. That this should have been done would be perfectly natural, when we consider that the purpose of such an editor would be not only to preserve (as has been done) the record of the original Law, but to present a manual of law complete for the use of his age, a manual (to use a modern phrase) made complete to date.

That the passages in question were indeed interpolations appears not only from the fact that their removal rids the text of what otherwise would be grave discrepancies, but because the passages in question sometimes disturb the sequence of the context. Moreover, by thus distinguishing between laws promulgated (as stated) by Moses, and laws to which the formula of statement was not intended to apply, we arrive at the following important result. It is that the former laws can all be shown to be in harmony one with another and with the historical data of the Mosaic age; while the introduction of the later rules is also seen to be what would naturally follow by way of adaptation to the circumstances of later times, and the gradual unfolding of Divine purpose.

It would be much too long a task here to work this out in detail: It has been attempted by the writer of this article in OT Institutions, Their Origin and Development. Two instances, however, may be mentioned.

Instances of interpolation.—In Ex 12 43 ff (ERV) we read, "This is the ordinance of the passover: there shall no alien eat thereof; but every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A sojourner and a hired servant shall not eat thereof." This was the original Mosaic rule introduced by the formula in ver 43. But in vs 48.49 it is said that sojourners (when circumcised) may eat of the passover. This was plainly a relaxation of later date, made in accordance with the principle which is enlarged upon in Isa 56 3-8.

According to Lev 23 34,39,40-42, the Feast of Tabernacles was a feast of seven days only. This was the Mosaic rule as appears from the formula in ver 33, and in certain other passages. But as a development in the feast's observance, an eighth day was subsequently added, and therefore insertions to that effect were made here at vs 36 and 39b. The introduction of this additional day would be in keeping with that elaboration in the observance of the "set feasts" which we find in Nu 28 and 29, as compared with the simpler observance of the same days ordered in Lev 23. Here again the formula in Nu 28 1 plainly covered a few verses immediately following, but not the whole content of the two chapters.

Premising then the existence in writing from an early age of numerous groups of Mosaic laws and their subsequent interpolation, the ultimate compilation of these groups together with other matter and their arrangement in the order in which we now find them must have been the work, perhaps indeed of the interpolator, but in any case of some late editor. These numerous groups do not, however, make up the whole legislative contents of the Pent; for a very large portion of these contents consists of three distinct books of law, which we must now examine. These were the "Book of the Covenant," the "Book of the Law" of Dt 31 26, and the so-called "Law of Holiness."

This book, expressly so named (Ex 24 7), is stated to have been written by Moses (24 3,4). It must have comprised the contents of

3. The Ex 20-23. The making of the covenant at Sinai, led up to by the revelation words of Ex 3 12-17; 6 2-8; 19 3-6, was a transaction of the very first importance in the religious history of Israel. God's revelation of Himself to Israel being very largely, indeed chiefly, a revelation of His moral attributes (Ex 34 6,7), could only be effectively apprehended by a people who were morally fitted to receive it. Hence it was that Israel as a nation was now placed by God in a stated relation to Himself by means of a covenant, the condition upon which the covenant was based being, on His people's part, their obedience to a given law. This was the law contained in the "Book of the Covenant."

It consisted of "words of Jeh" and "judgments" (Ex 24 3 AV). The latter are contained in Ex 21 1-22 17; the former in ch 20, in the remaining portion of ch 22, and ch 23. The "judgments" (ARV "ordinances") relate entirely to matters of right between man and man; the "words of Jeh" relate partly to these and partly to duties distinctively religious.

(1) The judgments compared with Code of Hammurabi.—The "judgments" appear to be taken from older consuetudinary law; not necessarily comprising the whole of that law, but so much of it as it pleased God now to stamp with His express sanction and to embody in this Covenant Law. They may well be compared with those contained in the so-called Code of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, who is thought to have been the Amraphel of Gen 14. These are called "the judgments of righteousness which Hammurabi the mighty king confirmed." The resemblances in form and in subject between the two sets of "judgments" are very striking. All alike have the same structure, beginning with a hypothetical clause, "If so and so," and then giving the rule applicable in the third person. All alike relate entirely to civil as distinguished from religious, matters, to rights and duties between man and man. All seem to have had a similar origin in judgments passed in the first place on causes brought before judges for decision: both sets therefore represent consuetudinary law.

(2) Basis of the law of the covenant on earlier custom and conception.—It is remarkable that, alike in matters of right between man and man, and in matters relating directly to the service of God, the Law of the Covenant did little (if anything) more than give a new and Divinely attested sanction to requirements which, being already familiar, appealed to the general conscience of the community. If, indeed, in the "words of Jeh" there was any tightening of accustomed moral or (more particularly) religious requirements, e.g. in the first and second commandments of the Decalogue, it would seem to have been by way of enforcing convictions which must have been already gaining hold upon the minds of at least the more thoughtful of the people, and that in large measure through the lessons impressed upon them by the events of their recent history. In no other way could the Law of the Covenant have appealed to their conscience, and so formed a foundation on which the covenant could be securely based.

As in the "judgments" we have a ratification of old consuetudinary law; as again in the second table of the Decalogue we have moral rules in accordance with a standard of moral right—no doubt already acknowledged—very similar indeed to that of the "negative confession" in the Egypt Book of the Dead; so in the more especially religious rules of the Law of the Covenant we find, not new rules or an establishment of new institutions, but a new sanction of what was already old. These "words of Jeh" assume the rendering of service to Jeh: they do not enjoin it as if it were a new thing, but they enjoin that the Israelites shall not add to His service also the service of other gods (Ex 20 3; 23 24). They assume the observance of the three "feasts," they enjoin that these shall be kept to Jeh—"unto me," i.e. "unto me only" (vs 14,17). They assume the making of certain offerings to Jeh, they enjoin that these shall be made liberally—"of the first," i.e. of the best—and without delay (22 29f). They assume the rendering of worship by sacrifice, and the existence of an accustomed ritual, and therefore they do not lay down any scheme of ritual, but they give a few directions designed to guard against idolatry, or any practices tending either to irreverence or to low and false conceptions of God (Ex 20 4-6,23-26; 22 31; 23 18f). While insisting upon the observance of the three "feasts," spoken of as already accustomed, it is remarkable that they contain no command to keep the Passover, which as an annual observance was not yet an accustomed thing.

This absence of ritual directions is indeed very noticeable. It was in the counsel of God that He would in the near future establish a reconstituted ritual, based upon what was already traditional, but containing certain new elements, and so framed as more and more to foster spiritual conceptions of God and a higher ideal of holiness. This however was as yet a thing of the future. No mention therefore was made of it in the Law of the Covenant; that law was so restricted as that it should at once appeal to the general conscience of the people, and so be a true test of their desire to do what was right. This would be the firm basis on which to build yet higher things. It is impossible to estimate the true character of the subsequent legislation, i.e. of what in bulk is by far the larger part of the tôrâh—except by first grasping the true character and motive of the Covenant, and the Covenant Law. See also COVENANT, BOOK OF; PENTATEUCH.

Immediately after the making of the Covenant, Moses was called up into the mount, and there received instructions for the erection of the tabernacle, these being followed in due course by the rules of the reconstituted ceremonial of which the tabernacle was to be the home. All these for the present we must pass over.

Having arrived on the E. of the Jordan, Moses, now at the close of his career, addressed discourses to the people, in which he earnestly exhorted them to live up to the high calling with which God had called them, in the land of which they were about to take possession. To this end he embodied in his discourse a statement of the Law by which they were to live. And then, as almost his last public act, he wrote "the words of this law in a book," and directed that the book should be placed "by the side of the ark of the covenant" (Dt 31 24-26). What now was this book? Was it Dt, in whole or in part? The most reasonable answer to this question is that the book actually written by Moses comprised at least the contents of Dt 5-26 and 28. Whether the whole or any parts of the remaining contents of Dt also formed part of this book, or were subsequently added to it, the whole being brought by a process of editing to our present Dt, is again a legitimate matter of inquiry.

Characteristics of Deuteronomy.—Regarding Dt 5-26 and 28 (with or without parts of other chapters) as the "book" of Dt 31 24-26, we find that it is a manual of instruction for the people at large—it is not a priest's manual. It deals with matters of morals, and of religion in its general principles, but only subordinately with matters of ritual: it warns against perils of idolatry and superstitious corruptions, common in the service of other gods, but which might by no means be mixed up with Jeh's service: it insists upon righteous conduct between man and man, and very strongly inculcates humanity toward the poor and the dependent: it enjoins upon those in authority the impartial maintenance of right, as also fairness, moderation and mercy, in the administration of law and the infliction of punishment: it sets forth the fear of God as the guide of His people's actions, and the love of God in response to His mercy toward them. It does not lay down any scheme of ritual, though it gives rules (14 3-21) as to things which might not be eaten as unclean; it also gives directions as to the disposal of tithes (14 22-29; 26 12); it enlarges upon the direction in the Law of the Covenant for the observance of the three "feasts," adding to this the observance of the Passover (ch 16); it lays down a law (expressed conditionally) restricting to one sanctuary the offering of at least the more solemn sacrifices (ch 12); and it frequently inculcates liberality toward the Levites, both on account of the sacred services rendered by them, their dispersal among the tribes, and the precarious character of their livelihood. Like the Law of the Covenant it assumes the existence of an accustomed ceremonial, and it is remarkable that when there is occasion to do so it makes use of phraseology (ch 12) similar to that of the ritual laws of Moses in Lev and Nu.

It is quite possible that some interpolations may have been made in the text of chs 5-26, but not on any sufficient scale to affect the general character of the original book. This "Book of the Law" then was an expansion of the Law of the Covenant, enforcing its principles, giving directions in greater detail for carrying them out, and setting them in a framework of exhortation, warning and encouragement. Thus its relation to the covenant is indicated by Dt 26 16-19; 29 1. This is that "book of the Law of Moses" of which frequent mention is made in the books of K, Ch, Ezr and Neh.

In marked contrast to the numerous rules, sometimes intermingled with narrative, which we find in Ex 25-40; Lev 1-16, and through-

5. The Law out Nu, we have in Lev 17-26 a col- of Holiness lection of laws which evidently was once a book by itself. This, from its constant insistence upon holiness as a motive of conduct, has been called "the Law of Holiness." Though it contains many laws stated to have been spoken by Jeh to Moses, we are not told by whom it was written, and therefore its authorship and date are a fair subject of inquiry. In its general design it bears much resemblance to the Law of the Covenant, and the Book of the Law contained in Dt. As in them, and esp. in the latter, the laws are set up in a parenthetic framework, the whole closing with promise of reward for obedience and a threat of punishment for disobedience (cf Ex 23 20-33; Lev 26; Dt 28). Like them it deals much with moral duties: chs 19 and 20 are practically an expansion of the Decalogue; but it deals also more than they do with ceremonial. With regard to both it sets forth as the motive of obedience the rule, "Be ye holy, for I am holy."

A clue as to date.—A clue to its date is to be found in its conception of cleanness. The idea found in the Prophets and the NT that moral wrongdoing renders unclean must be based upon some earlier conception, viz. upon the OT conception of ritual uncleanness. Now ritual uncleanness was originally physical uncleanness only; the idea of moral right or wrong did not enter into it at all: this is perfectly clear from the whole contents of Lev 11-15. On the other hand we find the idea of moral cleanness and uncleanness fully formed in the Pss, Prov. and in the Prophets, including the earlier prophets, Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. In H we find an intermediate conception. We find that whereas in Lev 11-15 sexual acts which were lawful rendered unclean equally with those which were unlawful, in H adultery and incest are denounced as rendering specially unclean, the idea being that their technical uncleanness became more intensely unclean through their immorality (Lev 18 24-30). Similarly, converse with familiar spirits and wizards, which probably involved physical defilement (perhaps through the ingredients used in charms), is mentioned as specially causing defilement, probably as such technical defilement would be intensified by the unlawfulness of dealing with familiar spirits and wizards at all (Lev 19 31). Sins, however, which did not in themselves entail physical uncleanness, such e.g. as injustice, are not mentioned in H as rendering unclean, though they are so regarded in the Prophets. First, then, we have ritual uncleanness, which is physical only in the rules of Lev 11-15 (Mosaic rules undoubtedly embodying a pre-Mosaic conception); lastly, we have moral wrong in itself rendering unclean, in the Pss and the Prophets; intermediately we have the transitional conception in H. The date therefore of the Law of Holiness may be Mosaic, but must be considerably earlier than the earliest of the writing prophets.

The remaining groups of Mosaic laws would appear to have been extant in their original form (i.e. without interpolation), no doubt in the custody of the priesthood for 6. The Final Com- probably a very considerable time, it pilation may have been for centuries, before their final compilation in their present form. The arrangement of these groups as they now stand, before and after H and with narrative intermingled, is by no means haphazard, as it might at first appear.

(1) Exodus.—As the directions for the erection of the tabernacle with the purpose of its several parts were given to Moses immediately after the making of the covenant, they follow the account of it immediately. Thus Ex contains the history of the covenant-making, of what led up to it, and of what immediately followed it, viz. the provision of the home for the covenant-worship.

(2) Leviticus.—This book follows with the rules of that worship; not indeed with all its details, but with an account of all that was essential to it. First (in Lev 1-7) we have the law of sacrifice, including what was so esp. peculiar to the covenant-worship, the law of the sin offering. Then in chs 8-10 we have the consecration of the tabernacle and its contents, the consecration of its priests and the inauguration of the newly prescribed system of worship. Then in chs 11-15 we have the rules for purification from ritual uncleanness, without which it would have been impossible for this system of covenant-worship to be carried on. Then there follows in Lev 16 the account of the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement, the crown and completion of the whole. Thus in these 16 chapters we have an account of the essentials of the newly instituted covenant-worship. And then immediately we have in the Law of Holiness the great motive that underlay both this ceremonial law and the preceding moral and religious law of the Book of the Covenant, viz. the principle that God's people must be holy, because He is holy. The emphasizing of this principle in H thus closes this whole statement of law, as its first enunciation had introduced it in Ex 19 6.

(3) Numbers.—The purpose of Nu is supplementary. Nu 1-6, containing the numbering and ordering of the tribes and rules as to the representative Levitical ministry, sets forth the corporate character of Israel's service of God. The Israelites were not to be a mere aggregation of tribes, but a single nation, the bond of their union being the covenant with God. The camp itself, ordered and carefully guarded against pollution, was to be a symbol of this holy unity. Chs 7-10 narrate the remaining occurrences at Sinai, including (9 1-14) the important account of the first commemorative Passover. The remaining chapters contain, alternately, a narrative of events following the departure from Sinai and groups of laws usually in some way connected with the events narrated, but all of them supplementary to the more essential laws already recorded.

(4) Deuteronomy.—As a separate work and based upon sayings and doings at the very close of the 40 years, Dt naturally follows last.

III. The General Character and Design of the Law.—Both in civil matters and in ceremonial the Law had to deal with men who lived in a comparatively early age of human history. Its rules were necessarily adapted in both departments to the standards of the age. At the same time they inculcated principles, the working out of which would by degrees bring about a great advance in men's conceptions both of what is true and of what is right.

As J. B. Mozley says (Lectures on the OT), "The morality of a progressive revelation is not the morality with which it starts but that with which it concludes"; yet the excellence of the OT Law is evident, not only in its great underlying principles, but in the suitability of its individual rules to promote moral advance.

(1) Servants and the poor.—We have already noted the similarity between the "judgments" of Ex 20 and 21 and the "judgments" of Hammurabi, in respect to form and subject. Notwithstanding the practical wisdom found in many of the latter, there is in one matter a marked contrast in spirit between them and the former, for while both the Law of the Covenant and its enlargement in Dt guarded the interest of and secured justice, and mercy too, to slaves and the poor, the laws of Hammurabi were framed rather in the interests of the well-to-do. Cf (e.g.) with the rule as to a runaway slave in Dt 23 15f, the following (CH. § 16): "If a man has harbored in his house a manservant or a maidservant fugitive from the palace, or a poor man, and has not produced them at the demand of the commandant, the owner of that house shall be put to death." The Law indeed permitted slavery, an institution universal in the ancient world, but it made provisions which must very greatly have mitigated its hardship. It was enjoined, both in Ex and in Dt, that after six years' service a Heb manservant should "go out free for nothing," unless he himself preferred to remain in servitude (Ex 21 2-6; Dt 15 12-18). The rule in Ex 21 7-11 as to women servants was not exactly the same, but it nevertheless guarded their interests, while Heb women servants were afterward included in the rule of Dt 15 12. A still greater amelioration was brought in by a later rule connected with the law of the Jubilee as set out in Lev 25 39-55. Again, though servitude was permitted on account of debt, or as a rescue from poverty (Ex 21 2, 7; Dt 15 12), manstealing was a capital offence (Ex 21 16).

(2) Punishments.—The rule of Ex 21 22-25 ("eye for eye," etc; cf Lev 24 19, 20; Dt 19 16-19) sounds harsh to us, but while the justice it sanctioned was rough and ready according to the age, it put a restraint on vindictiveness. The punishment might be so much, but no more: and the same spirit of restraint in punishment is seen in the rule as to flogging (Dt 25 2f). Similarly the rule that murder was to be avenged by "the avenger of blood," a rule under the circumstances of the age both necessary and salutary, was protected from abuse by the appointment of places of refuge, the rule with respect to which was designed to prepare the way for a better system (see Ex 21 12-14; Nu 35 9-24; Dt 19 1-13).

(3) Marriage.—The marriage customs of the Mosaic age permitted polygamy and concubinage, marriage by purchase or by capture in war, slave-marriage, and divorce. The Law allowed the continuance of these customs, but did not originate them; on the contrary, its provisions were designed to restrict the old license, giving protection to the weaker party, the woman, limiting as far as possible the evils of the traditional system, a system which could not suddenly be changed, and preparing the way for a better. Consider the effect of the following rules: as to slave-wives (Ex 21 7-11); captives of war (Dt 21 10-14); plurality of wives (Dt 21 15-17); adultery (Ex 20 14, 17; Dt 22 22); fornication (Dt 22 23-29; 23 17, 18; Lev 21 9); divorce (Dt 24 1-4); Levirate marriage (Dt 25 5-10); incest (Lev 18 6-18); marriage of priests (Lev 21 7, 10-15); royal polygamy (Dt 17 17).

(4) Sabbaths and feasts.—The law as to these, though partly ceremonial, yet served social ends. The Sabbath day gave to all, and particularly to servants and the poor, and domestic cattle too, a needful respite from daily toil; it also served men's spiritual welfare, and did honor to God (Ex 23 12; Dt 5 14, 15; Ex 31 12-17). The seventh year's rest to the land—it also "a sabbath of solemn rest, a sabbath unto Jeh"—was for the land's recuperation, but it served also to safeguard common rights at perhaps a time of transition as to customs of land tenure: connected with it also there were rules as to release of slaves and relief of debtors (Ex 23 9-11; Lev 25 2-7; Dt 15 1-18). The observance of the Sabbath year as a rest to the land seems to have fallen into disuse, perhaps as early as some 500 years before the Bab captivity (2 Ch 36 21), and it is probable that the Jubilee (the design of which seems to have been to adjust conflicting rights under new customs of land tenure and in the relation of employer to employed) was instituted to take its place (Lev 25). The law as to the annual feasts insured both the social advantages of festive gatherings of the people, and their sanctification by the worship of God, and the public recognition of His hand in matters agricultural and political, which were either the occasion of, or connected with, these gatherings. Considerate liberality to the poor and dependent was, on these occasions, esp. enjoined (Ex 23 14-17; Dt 16 1-17; 12 12, 18, 19).

We have already noted that the conception of sin as uncleanness, rendering the sinner therefore unfit for the presence of God, must have been an outgrowth from the earlier ceremonial conception of purely ritual (physical) Law uncleanness. This development, and an accompanying sense of the heinousness of sin and of its need of atonement by sacrifice, were undoubtedly brought about by the gradual working of the law of the sin offering (Lev 4 1-5 13; 12-15; 16). Similarly the rules as to guilt offerings (Lev 5 14-6 7) must by degrees have led to a true conception of repentance, as including both the seeking of atonement through sacrifice and restitution for wrong committed. The sin offering was, however, a peculiarly Mosaic institution, marking a development in the sacrificial system. The only sacrifices of which we have any trace in pre-Mosaic times were meal and drink offerings, whole burnt offerings and sacrifices (or, to use the Levitical term, peace offerings).

(1) Origin of sacrifice.—We read of the offering of sacrifice all through the patriarchal history, and farther back even than Noah in the story of Cain and Abel; and there can be no doubt that the Levitical scheme of sacrifice was based upon, and a development (under Divine ordering) of, the sacrificial system already traditional among the Hebrews. Sacrifice was undoubtedly of Divine origin; yet we have no account, or even hint, of any formal institution of sacrifice. The sacrifices of Cain and Abel are spoken of in a way that leaves the impression that they were offered spontaneously, and the most probable assumption would seem to be that the very first offering of sacrifice was the outcome of a spontaneous desire (Divinely implanted, we may be sure) in early men to render service to the higher Being of whose relation to themselves they were, if ever so dimly, conscious.

Prehistoric research has not yet been able to present to us a distinct picture of primitive men; and even if the results of anthropology were more certain than they can yet claim to be, what in this connection we are concerned in is the conceptions, not of early men everywhere, but of the early ancestors of the Heb race. However infantile their ideas may have been and probably were, there may well have been far more of elementary truth in them—in simple ideas Divinely implanted—than students of anthropology have any knowledge of. Sooner or later early men did make offerings to God; and as the Mosaic sacrificial system was certainly based upon the patriarchal, so we may fairly assume that the ideas underlying the latter were an outgrowth from those which underlay the sacrifice of the patriarch's own still earlier ancestors.

It is well observed by Dr. A. B. Davidson (OT Theology, p. 315) that the sacrifices of Cain and Abel are called a minhah or present; and this idea of sacrifice as a gift to God most easily accounts for the facts with which we have to deal in the history of OT sacrifice. When early men first made offerings to God, they probably did so in the spirit of young children who give gifts to older persons without knowing whether, or in what way, the gifts will be of any use to them. They simply give in affection what is of value in their own eyes. The one only thing of prime value to the earliest men must have been food; hence offerings to God were everywhere in the first place offerings of food. But here a difficulty must soon have arisen, for men must have become convinced very soon that the Divine Being did not feed upon the food offered, at least in men's way of feeding. Ultimately, among the Israelites, the idea of His actual feeding became eliminated altogether (Ps 50 13.14), but in the meantime the difficulty seems to have been met by the assumption that the Divine Being consumed an inner essence of food; and this being supposed to be set free by fire, food offered in sacrifice came to be burnt in order to fit it to become the food of God. This certainly appears from Lev 3 11.16 (cf Lev 21 6.8.17.21).

Coming, however, to animal as distinguished from vegetable sacrifice, we do not find that its origin can be accounted for as at the first being an offering of food. We learn from Lev 17 10-14 that the essential part of animal sacrifice was the offering of the blood, and that blood was offered because blood was life. The idea that life can be given by giving blood lay at the root of a custom which must have been well-nigh universal in primitive times, that of blood covenanting (see H. Clay Trumbull, Blood Covenant). In this, two persons would give each to the other of his own blood, drawn from the living vein. Persons united in blood covenant were supposed, by the commingling of their blood, to become actual sharers of one life. To give to another of one's own blood was to give one's own life, i.e. one's own self, with all the dedication of love and service which that would imply. Now a similar idea would seem to have lain at the root of the primitive offering of blood to God: it was the offering of the life of the offerer.

In the very first blood offerings it is probable that the blood offered was the blood of the offerer, and that there was no infliction of death—only in this way the dedication of life. The dedicatory rite of circumcision may have been a survival of sacrifice in this its earliest form; so also what is narrated in 1 K 18 28. When, however, the blood offered had come to be the blood of a substitute, and that a substitute animal, the sacrifice would come (no doubt soon) to include the slaughter of the animal and further the consumption, in whole or in part, of its carcase by fire as an offering of food.

(2) The Levitical ritual.—Whether the above theory be accepted or not, in so far as animal sacrifice became an offering of food, it would stand in line with vegetable sacrifice; but in both the excellence of the Levitical ritual stood in this, that while it was framed for a people whose conceptions were in a stage of transition, it was yet adaptable to higher conceptions, and fitted to become at length symbolical of purely spiritual truth. It was through the teaching, not only of prophets but of the Levitical ritual itself, and while it was still in full force, that the words of Ps 50 13.14 were uttered: "Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Offer unto God the sacrifice of thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High." The Levitical ritual, as respects animal sacrifice in particular, was so framed as, on the one hand, to keep alive the idea of sacrifice as the offering of life, not of death, of life's dedication, not its destruction, and therefore to make it a true type of Christ's living sacrifice. On the other hand, the rules of sacrifice guarded against abuses which, as a matter of fact, sprang up widely among the heathen. The rule, e.g. in Lev 1 2 and elsewhere, that "ye shall offer your oblation of the cattle, even of the herd and of the flock," excluded human sacrifice. The rule that the first act in every sacrifice must be to slay the creature offered excluded the infliction of unnecessary suffering. The detailed rules as to the offering and disposal of the blood, and the varying modes of disposal of the carcase, kept alive the essential idea of all such sacrifice, and saved it from degenerating into a mere heaping up, as in Egypt, of altars with mere loads of food. The rules of the peace offering, clothing it always with a spiritual motive (see Lev 7 12.16), raised it to a level far above the sacrifice of that class among the surrounding heathen, guarding it against their licentious festivity (cf Hos 2 11-13; 4 13.14; Am 2 8; 5 21-23) and gross ideas as to the part of God in the feasting.

(3) The Law truly a tōrah.—In every one of its departments the Law proved itself to be indeed a tōrah directing God's people in the upward way; leading them on from the state of advancement, such as it was, to which they had already attained by Moses' time, to higher and higher standards, both of faith and of duty, till they were prepared for the gospel of Christ, who Himself said of the old Law, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled" (Mt 5 18 AV). Meanwhile we have, in the teaching of the prophets, not a counter influence, not a system rivaling the Law, but its unfolding, both inspired of God, both instruments in His progressive revelation. "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" were the words of Samuel, a faithful servant of the Law, and himself a frequent offerer of sacrifice. What the Law was to the heart of devout Israelites in the prophetic age is seen in the fervent words of Ps 119.

IV. The Passing Away of the Law.—The great general principles of the Law were not transitory but abiding, and reappear under the gospel dispensation. Otherwise, however, i.e. in those particulars, whether ceremonial or civil, in which it was adapted to merely passing needs, the Law passed away when Christ came. It is not always realized that already before Christ came it had begun to pass away. The following are illustrations:

(1) The whole rationale of the Levitical worship consisted in its being based upon the covenant made at Sinai, and the symbol of the Covenant was the ark containing the tables of the Law and surmounted by the mercy-seat. Therefore one of its most significant acts was the sprinkling of the blood of sin offering within the veil upon the mercy-seat, or without the veil, but yet before the mercy-seat. But this most significant act could no longer be performed when, after the Bab captivity, there was no longer either ark or mercy-seat.

(2) The law that tithe should be paid to the Levites, a tithe only of it being paid by them to "Aaron the priest" (Nu 18), was practicable so long as the priests were a small portion only of the whole Levitical body, as they appear in the history down to the middle period of the monarchy. But by the time of the exile they disappeared from history except as actual temple ministrants, and, after the return from the exile, even these were in number a mere handful compared with the priests (Ezr 2 36-42; 8 15-20.24-30; Neh 11 10-19). The attempt to revive the old law (Neh 10 38.39) was well-intentioned but impracticable: it was evidently soon abandoned (Neh 13 10-13; Mal 3 8-10). We learn from Jos that tithes were regarded later as due to the priests, not to the Levites (Jos, Ant, XX, viii, 8; ix, 2).

(3) That the Mosaic law as to divorce was to give place to one more stringent appears not only from Our Lord's words in Mt 19 7-9, but from Mal 2 16.

(4) It is probable that some of the supplementary rules in Nu may have been designed for temporary use only, and may have passed away before the close of the OT. It may have been so, e.g., with the law of Nu 5 11-31, a law probably most useful in the circumstances of the Mosaic age, and perhaps itself an endorsement of a pre-Mosaic custom.

ULRIC Z. RULE

LAW, JUDICIAL, jōo-dish'al: This was the form of Divine law which, under the dominion of God, as the Supreme Magistrate, directed the policy of the Jewish nation, and hence was binding only on them, not on other peoples. The position of Jeh, as the Supreme Ruler, was made legally binding by a formal election on the part of the national assembly (Ex 19 3-8); and that there might be no question about the matter, after the death of Moses, Joshua, in accordance with instructions received by his great predecessor in the office of federal judge, in the public assembly caused the contract to be renewed in connection with most solemn exercises (Josh 8 30-35). No legal contract was ever entered into with more formality and with a clearer understanding of the terms by the several parties than was the contract which made it binding on the Hebrews permanently to recognize Jeh as the Supreme Ruler (Ex 24 3-8). He was to be acknowledged as the Founder of the nation (Ex 20 2); Sovereign, Ruler, and Judge (Ex 20 2-6); and in these capacities was to be the object of love, reverential fear and worship, service, and absolute obedience. Flagrant disregard of their obligations to Him manifested in idolatry or blasphemy was regarded as high treason, and like high treason in all nations and history was punishable by death (Ex 20 3-5.7; 22 20; Lev 24 16; Dt 17 2-5). The will of Jeh in critical cases was to be ascertained through special means (Nu 9 8; Jgs 1 1.2; 20 18. 23.28; 1 S 10 22).

The ruling official recognized by the Hebrews as a nation was the chief magistrate, but he stood as Jeh's vicegerent, and therefore combined various authorities in his person. We must distinguish the functions of the chief magistrate (1) under the republic, (2) under the constitutional monarchy, and (3) under the senatorial oligarchy after the Bab captivity. Moses was the first chief magistrate under the republic; after him, Joshua, and the other judges. Under the constitutional monarchy, it was the king whose government was limited, for he was to be elected by the people; must be a native Hebrew; must not keep a large cavalry; must not support a harem; must not multiply riches; must be a defender of the national religion; must be guided by law, not whim; must be gracious and condescending to the people (Dt 17 15-20). After the Bab captivity, the senatorial oligarchy combined ecclesiastical and state authority, later sharing it with the Rom government. See also SANHEDRIN.

LAW, ROMAN. See ROMAN LAW.

LAWFUL, lō'fōol (usually מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt, "relating to judgment," or "a pronounced judgment"; צַדִּיק, ṣaddīk, "relating to that which is righteous" or "just"; ἔσθλ, ēsthi, εὐνομος, eünomos, "that which is authorized according to law," or "a privilege according to legitimate custom" [cf Ezk 18 5.19. 21.27; Isa 49 24; Mt 12 10; Acts 16 21; 19 39]): Used of persons: of God, as being righteous both in the punishment of the wicked and the rewarding of the righteous (Ps 145 17 Heb); of man, as being just and equitable in all his dealings with his fellow-man (Ezk 33 19). It is used of things when the same are in accord with a pronounced judgment or a declared will of God, and thus pleasing in His sight (Mk 3 4). When the course of individual conduct is according to God's law of righteousness, it is declared to be "lawful" (Ezk 33 19). The word is used in a forensic sense as declaring the legal status of a person conforming to law. The idea of straightness, rigid adherence to God's law, whether religious, civil or ceremonial, cannot be excluded from the definition of the word "lawful."

Neither AV nor ARV is consistent in its tr of the Heb and Gr words tr<sup>d</sup> "lawful." Ofttimes the words "just" and "righteous" are used. To arrive at the full and proper meaning of "lawful," therefore, it is necessary that we study the passages containing these synonymous terms. The written Law of God is the recognized standard by which things, actions and persons are to be judged as being lawful or unlawful. WILLIAM EVANS

LAWGIVER, lō'giv-ēr (לֹמְדָה, mōhōkēk; νομοθέτης, nomothētēs): There are two words, one Heb and one Gr, which are tr<sup>d</sup> "lawgiver." The former occurs 7 t in the OT, and in AV in every case except Jgs 5 14 is thus tr<sup>d</sup>. In RV it bears the tr "lawgiver" but twice (Dt 33 21; Isa 33 22), though in the other passages (Gen 49 10; Nu 21 18; Jgs 5 14; Ps 60 7; 108 8) this meaning is retained in the margin. The Gr word occurs in the NT but once (Jas 4 12), where it has a meaning that is almost the exact equivalent of the Heb word in Isa 33 22. In both passages God is declared to be the "lawgiver," and in the NT passage is so called because He has the power to rule and judge, to save and destroy. Man is denied the authority to judge because he is not the lawgiver. God is the lawgiver, and therefore possesses the right to pronounce judgment (cf Isa, supra). The word, however, implies more than mere legislative function; it also connotes the idea of ruling. Isaiah makes this very plain, since he adds to the statement that God is our judge and lawgiver the further declaration that He is also king. This meaning adheres in the very history of the word. It is based upon the monarchical conception in which the legislative, judicial and administrative functions are all vested in one person. In Jas the two terms "lawgiver and judge" express the idea of God's absolute sovereignty. The vb. nomothetein occurs in He 7 11; 8 6, but it does not extend beyond the meaning "to enact laws."

The Heb word is restricted to poetic passages, and except in Isa 33 22 is applied to a tribal or kingly ruler. Moses is preëminently the lawgiver in Jewish and Christian circles, but it should be noted that in the Scriptures of neither is he given this title. The primary meaning of the vb. from which mōhōkēk is derived is "to cut," "to carve," and a derived meaning is "to ordain." The meaning of the part. mōhōkēk is based upon this last. It means (1) the symbol which expresses the law-maker's authority, that is, the commander's staff; and (2) the person who possesses the authority (Dt 33 21). It has the first of these meanings in Nu 21 18; Ps 60 7; 108 8, and probably in Gen 49 10, though here it may have the second meaning. The parallelism, however, seems to require an impersonal object to correspond to scepter, and so the reading of the text (RV) is to be preferred to that of the margin (Skinner, ad loc.). In Dt 33 21; Jgs 5 14; Isa 33 22, it means the person who wielded the symbol of authority, that is the prescriber of laws. In a primitive community this would be a military commander. In Gen 49 10 the "ruler's staff" is the symbol of kingly authority (Driver), and this verse consequently implies the supremacy of Judah which came in with the Davidic kingdom. This word contains no reference to the Messiah. In Nu 21 18 there is an allusion to the custom of formally and symbolically opening fountains under the superintendence and at the instruction of the leader of the tribe. Such a custom seems to have been in vogue till comparatively modern times. Gray cites Budde in the New World for March, 1895, and Muir's Mohamet and Islam, 343 f. In Jgs 5 14 the word means "military commander," as the context shows. This is the meaning also in Dt 33 21, where it is affirmed that Gad obtained a position worthy of its warlike character. Tg, Vulg, Pesh, and some moderns have seen here a reference to the grave of Moses, but Nebo was in Reuben and not in Gad.

W. C. MORRO

LAWLESS, lō'les (ἄνομος, ánomos): While occurring but once in AV (1 Tim 1 9), is tr<sup>d</sup> in various ways, e.g. "without law" (1 Cor 9 21); "unlawful" (2 Pet 2 8 AV); "lawless" (1 Tim 1 9); "transgressor" (Mk 15 28; Lk 22 37); "wicked" (Acts 2 23 AV; 2 Thess 2 8 AV). When Paul claims to be "without law," he has reference to those things in the ceremonial law which might well be passed over, and not to the moral law. Paul was by no means an antinomian. Those are "lawless" who break the law of the Decalogue; hence those who disobey the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," are lawless (1 Tim 1 9). The civil law is also the law of God. Those breaking it are lawless, hence called "transgressors." Those who are unjust in their dealings are also "lawless"; for this reason the hands of Pilate and those who with him unjustly condemned Jesus are called "wicked [unlawful] hands" (Acts 2 23 AV). The most notable example of lawlessness is the Antichrist, that "wicked [lawless] one" (2 Thess 2 8).

LAWYER, lō'yēr (νομικός, nomikós, "according or pertaining to law," i.e. legal; as noun, "an expert in law," "about the law," "lawyer" [Mt 22 35; Lk 7 30; 10 25; 11 45.46.52; 14 3; Tit 3 13]): The work of the "lawyers," frequently spoken of as "scribes," also known as "doctors" of the law (Lk 2 46 m), was first of all that of jurists. Their business was threefold: (1) to study and interpret the law; (2) to instruct the Heb youth in the law; (3) to decide questions of the law. The first two they did as scholars and teachers, the last as advisers in some court. By virtue of the first-named function, they gradually developed a large amount of common law, for no code can go into such detail as to eliminate the necessity of subsequent legislation, and this usually, to a great extent, takes the form of judicial decisions founded on the code rather than of separate enactment. And so it was among the Hebrews. The provisions of their code were for the most part quite general, thus affording much scope for casuistic interpretation. As a result of the industry with which this line of legal development had been pursued during the centuries immediately preceding our era, the Heb law had become a very complicated science; and since it was forbidden to record these judicial decisions, a protracted study was necessary in order to commit them to memory.

But since the law must have universal application, the views of the individual scribe could not be taken as a standard; hence the several disciples of the law must frequently meet for discussion, and the opinion of the majority then prevailed. To these meetings the youth interested in the study would be invited, that they might memorize the formulas agreed upon and might clear up the points upon which they were uncertain by asking questions of the recognized doctors (Lk 2 46).

Such centers of legal lore, of course, would seldom be found in rural communities; the authorities would naturally gather in large centers of population, esp.—until 70 AD—in Jerus. While the deliverances of these law schools were purely theoretical, yet they stood in close relation to the practical. Whenever doubt arose regarding the application of the law to a particular case, the question was referred to the nearest lawyer; by him to the nearest company of lawyers, perhaps to the Sanhedrin; and the resultant decision was henceforth authority. Thus the lawyers became law makers, and after the destruction of Jerus, which brought an end to the existence of the Sanhedrin, the rabbinical doctors were recognized as the absolute authority in such matters. Frequently a single lawyer of great rank, as for instance Hillel or Gamaliel I, might pronounce dicta of unquestioned recognition with as much authority as a supreme court in our day, though sometimes his opinions were received and corrected by the legal tribunal, especially the Sanhedrin. Of course, frequently, these tribunals were under the sway of such a man's influence, so that what he said upon his own authority would be ratified in the assembly of the doctors.

The second function of the lawyers was that of teachers. The renowned rabbis always sought to gather a company of pupils about them whose business it was to repeat the teachers' law formulas until they had "passed into their flesh and blood." For the purposes of such instruction as well as for the discussion of the teachers and the students, there were special schoolhouses, which are often mentioned in connection with the synagogues as places of special merit and privilege. In Jerus, these law schools were conducted in the temple—probably in the hall dedicated to this special purpose (Mt 21 23; 26 55; Mk 14 49; Lk 2 46; 20 1; 21 37; Jn 18 20). The students during the lectures sat on the floor, the teacher on a raised platform, hence the expression "sitting at the feet of" (Acts 22 3; Lk 2 46). Finally, the lawyers were called upon to decide cases in court or to act as advisers of the court. Before the destruction of Jerus, technical knowledge of the law was not a condition of eligibility to the office of judge. Anyone who could command the confidence of his fellow-citizens might be elected to the position, and many of the rural courts undoubtedly were conducted, as among us, by men of sterling quality but of limited knowledge. Naturally such men would avail themselves of the legal advice of any "doctor" who might be within reach, esp. inasmuch as the latter was obliged to give his services gratuitously. And in the more dignified courts of large municipalities, it was a standing custom to have a company of scholars present to discuss and decide any new law points that might arise. Of course, frequently, these men were elected to the office of judge, so that practically the entire system of jurisprudence was in their hands.

LĀY, lā, LAYING, lā'ing: (1) לָּ, sīm, "to put," and the Gr equivalent, τίθημι, tithēmi, are very frequently tr<sup>d</sup> by "to lay." RV very often changes the AV rendering of sīm, but never that of tithēmi: 1 S 15 2, "how he set himself against him in the way" (AV "he laid wait for him"); 2 K 11 16, "So they made way for her" (AV "And they laid hands on her"); cf 2 Ch 23 15; Job 24 12, "God regardeth not the folly" (AV "God layeth not folly"); Job 34 23, "For he needeth not further to consider a man" (AV "For he will not lay upon man more"); Isa 28 17, "And I will make justice the line" (AV "Judgment also will I lay to the line"); Job 17 3, "Give now a pledge" (AV "Lay down now"). (2) נָּ, nāthan, lit. "to give," is very commonly tr<sup>d</sup> by "to lay." RV changes the tr of AV in Ezk 4 5, "I have appointed"; Ezk 33 28 f, "I will make the land a desolation" (AV "I will lay the land most desolate"). (3) "To lay" of AV is frequently rendered differently in RV; Isa 54 11, "I will set thy stones" (AV "lay thy stones"); Dt 29 22, "the sicknesses wherewith Jeh hath made it sick" (AV "sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon"). For other differences of RV and AV cf Dt 21 8; 2 K 9 25 m; 2 K 12 11; Ezr 8 31; Ps 104 5 m; Isa 53 6; Jer 5 26; Mk 7 8; Lk 19 44; Jas 1 21; 1 Pet 2 1. In most of these passages the change of RV is due to the peculiar use of the word "to lay" in AV. The following expressions are found very frequently: "to lay hands on," "to lay wait," "to lay up," "to lay aside," "to lay upon," "to lay down," etc.

"Laying of wait," AV, is rendered "lying in wait" in Nu 35 20 ff; Acts 9 24 reads: "But their plot became known" (AV "But their laying await was known"). The "laying on of hands" is a very general expression. See HANDS, LAYING ON OF.

LAZARUS, laz'a-rus (Λάζαρος, Lázaros, an abridged form of the Heb name Eleazar, with a Gr termination): Means "God has helped." In LXX and Jos are found the forms 'Ελεάζαρ, Eleazár, and 'Ελεάζαρος, Eleázaros. The name was common among the Jews, and is given to two men in the NT who have nothing to do with each other.

The home of the Lazarus mentioned in Jn 11 1 was Bethany. He was the brother of Martha and Mary (Jn 11 1,2; see also Lk 10 38-41). All three were esp. beloved by of Bethany Jesus (Jn 11 5), and at their home He more than once, and probably often, was entertained (Lk 10 38-41; Jn 11). As intimated by the number of condoling friends from the city, and perhaps from the costly ointment used by Mary, the family was probably well-to-do. In the absence of Jesus, L. was taken sick, died, and was buried, but, after having lain in the grave four days, was brought back to life by the Saviour (Jn 11 3,14,17,43,44). As a result many Jews believed on Jesus, but others went and told the Pharisees, and a council was therefore called to hasten the decree of the Master's death (Jn 11 45-53). Later, six days before the Passover, at a feast in some home in Bethany where Martha served, L. sat at table as one of the guests, when his sister Mary anointed the feet of Jesus (Jn 12 1-3). Many of the common people came thither, not only to see Jesus, but also the risen L., believed in Jesus, and were enthusiastic in witnessing for Him during the triumphal entry, and attracted others from the city to meet Him (Jn 12 9,11,17,18). For that reason the priests plotted to murder L. (Jn 12 10). This is all that we really know about the man, for whether the Jews accomplished his death we are not informed, but it seems probable that, satiated with the death of Jesus, they left L. unmolested. Nothing is told of his experiences between death and resurrection (cf Tennyson, "In Memoriam," xxxi), of his emotions upon coming out of the tomb, of his subsequent life (cf Browning, "A Letter to Karshish"), and not a word of revelation does he give as to the other world. His resurrection has been a favorite subject for various forms of Christian art, and according to an old tradition of Epiphanius he was 30 years old when he was raised from the dead, and lived 30 years thereafter.

As might be expected this miracle has been vigorously assailed by all schools of hostile critics. Ingenuity has been exhausted in inventing objections to it. But all told, they really amount only to three.

(1) The silence of the other Gospels.—There is here, no doubt, some difficulty. But the desire of the early Christians, as many scholars think, to screen the family from danger may have kept the story from becoming current in the oral tradition whence the Synoptics drew their materials, though Matthew was probably an eyewitness. But, in any case, the Synoptics do not pretend to give all the deeds of Jesus, and in the report by them we have few save those which were wrought in Galilee. Each of them has omitted elements of highest interest which others have preserved. Thus Lk alone gives us the raising of the widow's son at Nain. John, knowing that the others had omitted this, tells us what he had himself witnessed, since all danger to the family had long ago passed away, as it was of especial interest to his story, and he had recorded no other case of resurrection. At any rate, the Gospel writers do not seem to regard a resurrection from the dead by the power of Jesus as so much more stupendous than other miracles, as they seem to modern scholars and to the Jews, and, moreover, the Synoptics do unconsciously attest this miracle by describing a sudden outburst of popular excitement in favor of Jesus which can be accounted for only by some extraordinary event.

(2) The stupendous character of the miracle.—But to a philosophical believer in miracles this is no obstacle at all, for to omnipotence there are no such things as big miracles or little ones. Of course, Martha's statement as to the decomposition of the body was only her opinion of the probability in the case, and He, who sees the end from the beginning and who had intended to raise L., might well in His providence have watched over the body that it should not see corruption. When all is said, "He who has created the organic cell within inorganic matter is not incapable of reestablishing life within the inanimate substance."

(3) Its non-use as an accusation against Jesus.—The objection that Jn 11 47-53 is inconsistent with the fact that in accusing Jesus before Pilate no mention is made of this miracle by the enemies of Jesus has little weight. Who would expect them to make such a self-convicting acknowledgment? The dismay of the priests at the miracle and their silence about it are perfectly compatible and natural.

No one of the attempted explanations which deny the reality of the miracle can offer even a show of probability. That L. was just recovering from a trance when Jesus arrived; that it was an imposture arranged by the family and sanctioned by Jesus in order to overwhelm His enemies; that it was a fiction or parable turned into a fact and made up largely of synoptic materials, an allegorical illustration of the words, "I am the resurrection, and the life," a myth—such explanations require more faith than to believe the fables of the Talm. They well illustrate the credulity of unbelief. The narrative holds together with perfect consistency, is distinguished by vivacity and dramatic movement, the people who take part in it are intensely real and natural, and the picture of the sisters perfectly agrees with the sketch of them in Lk. No morbid curiosity of the reader is satisfied. Invented stories are not like this. Even a Renan declares that it is a necessary link in the story of the final catastrophe.

The purpose of the miracle seems to have been: (1) to show Himself as Lord of life and death just before He should be Himself condemned to die; (2) to strengthen the faith of His disciples; (3) to convert many Jews; (4) to cause the priests to hasten their movements so as to be ready when His hour had come (Plummer, HDB, III, 87).

In the parable in Lk 16 19-31, L. is pictured as in abject poverty in this world, but highly rewarded and honored in the next. It is the only instance of a proper name used in a parable by Jesus. Some think that he was a well-known mendicant in Jerus, and have even attempted to define his disease. But this is no doubt simple invention, and, since "in Christ's kingdom of truth names indicate realities," this was probably given because of its significance, suggesting the beggar's faith in God and patient dependence upon Him. It was this faith and not his poverty which at last brought him into Abraham's bosom. Not one word does L. speak in the parable, and this may also be suggestive of patient submission. He does not murmur at his hard lot, nor rail at the rich man, nor after death triumph over him. The parable is related to that of the Rich Fool (Lk 12 16-21). This latter draws the veil over the worldling at death; the other lifts it. It is also a counterpart of that of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16 1-13), which shows how wealth may wisely be used to our advantage, while this parable shows what calamities result from failing to make such wise use of riches. The great lesson is that our condition in Hades depends upon our conduct here, and that this may produce a complete reversal of fortune and of popular judgments. Thus L. represents the pious indigent who stood at the opposite extreme from the proud, covetous, and luxury-loving Pharisee. The parable made a deep impression on the mind of the church, so that the term "lazar," no longer a proper name, has passed into many languages, as in lazaretto, lazaretto, also lazzarone, applied to the mendicants of Italian towns. There was even an order, half-military, half-monastic, called the Knights of St. Lazarus, whose special duty it was to minister to lepers.

2. The

The rich man is often styled Dives, which is not strictly a proper name, but a Lat adj. meaning "rich," which occurs in this passage in the Vulg. But in Eng. lit., as early as Chaucer, as seen in the "Somnoure's Tale" and in "Piers Plowman," it appears in popular use as the name of the Rich Man in this parable. In later theological lit. it has become almost universally current. The name Nineus given him by Euthymius never came into general use, though the Sahidic version has the addition, "whose name was Ninue." His sin was not in being rich, for Abraham was among the wealthiest of his day, but in his worldly unbelief in the spiritual and eternal, revealing itself in ostentatious luxury and hard-hearted contempt of the poor. Says Augustine, "Seems he [Jesus] not to have been reading from that book where he found the name of the poor man written, but found not the name of the rich, for that book is the book of life?"

LEACH, lēch. See HORSELEACH.

LEAD, led (עֹפֶרֶת, 'ōphereth): Lead was one of the first metals to be used in the free state, probably because it was so easily obtained from its ores. Lead was found anciently in Egypt and the Sinaitic peninsula. There is no lead found in Pal proper, but in Northern Syria and Asia Minor it occurs in considerable quantities, usually associated with silver. These sources no doubt furnished an important supply in Bible times. It was also brought by the Phoenicians from Spain (Tarshish) (Ezk 27 12) and the British Isles.

Lead was used, as it still is, all along the Mediterranean shores for sinkers. Pieces of Egv fish-nets probably dating from 1200 BC are now preserved in the British Museum, with their lead sinkers still attached. Since lead was the heaviest metal known to the ancients, gold excepted, it was generally used for fish-lines and sounding lines (cf Acts 27 28), esp. in the dense waters of the Mediterranean. Moses mentioned the sinking qualities of lead in the sea in his simile of the sinking of Pharaoh's hosts "as lead in the mighty waters" (Ex 15 10).

Lead was used by the ancients for binding stones together. In most of the ancient ruins of Syria the Arabs have dug holes at the seams between stones in walls and columns in order to remove the iron, bronze, or lead thus used. In the museum of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirūt, there are several specimens of cast-lead sarcophagi dating from the time of Christ.

In Job 19 23,24, lead is mentioned as used in the engraving of permanent records. Two inferences might be drawn from this passage: either that the letters were cut with a chisel (pen) and then the cutting was filled with lead, or that sheets of lead were used as tablets on which to grave the record with an iron tool. Lead is frequently referred to along with iron, brass, silver and tin (Nu 31 22; Ezk 22 18,20; 27 12). The use of lead for plumbines is implied in Am 7 7,8; Zec 4 10; as a weight in Zec 5 7,8. That OT writers understood the use of lead for purifying gold is shown by Jer 6 29 and Ezk 22 18-22 (cf Mal 3 2,3). See METALS; REFINER.

LEAF, lēf, LEAVES, lēvz: Used in three different senses, with reference: (1) To trees (עֵץ, 'ēṣ, "a coming up"), Gen 3 7; 8 11; Lev 26 36 (עֵץ, tēphē); Ezk 17 9; φάλλον, phallon. Figuratively (a) of spiritual blessings (Ezk 47 12; cf Rev 22 2) and prosperity (Ps 1 3); (b) of moral decay (Isa 64 6), and (c) of a formal, empty profession (Mt 21 19). (2) To a book (דֵּלֶת, dēleth), Jer 36 23 (m "columns"; see ver 2); as the parchment was gradually unfolded the successive columns could be read. (3) To doors (צֶלַע, ṣēlā, "side," קֶלַע, kēlā, "a screen," "hanging"), 1 K 6 34. The door of the Holy Place consisted of two halves, but each half had two leaves (cf Ezk 41 24). M. O. EVANS

LEAGUE, lēg. See CONFEDERACY.

LEAH, lē'a (לֵאָה, lē'āh; Λεία, Leia, "weary," "dull" [?], "wild cow"): Rachel's sister, and the elder daughter of Laban (Gen 29 16). We are told that her eyes were "tender" (רַקִּי, rakkōth). Gesenius renders it "weak," LXX ἀσθενής, astheneis; accordingly, she was weak-eyed, but by no means "blear-eyed" (cf Vulg). Her eyes were lacking that luster which always and everywhere is looked upon as a conspicuous part of female beauty. Jos (Ant, I, xix, 7) says of her, τὴν ὄψιν οὐκ εὐπρεπῆ, tēn ōpsin ouk euprepē, which may safely be rendered, "she was of no comely countenance."

L. became the wife of Jacob by a ruse on the part of her father, taking advantage of the oriental custom of heavily veiling the prospective bride. When taken to task by his irate son-in-law, Laban excused himself by stating it was against the rule of the place "to give the younger before the first-born" (Gen 29 21-26). Although Rachel was plainly preferred by Jacob to L., still the latter bore him six sons: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (Gen 29 31 ff), Issachar, Zebulun, and a daughter, Dinah (Gen 30 17-21). Up to this time Rachel had not been blessed with children of her own. Thus the lesson is brought home to us that Jeh has a special and kindly regard for the lowly and despised, provided they learn, through their troubles and afflictions, to look to Him for help and success. It seems that homely L. was a person of deep-rooted piety and therefore better suited to become instrumental in carrying out the plans of Jeh than her handsome, but worldly-minded, sister Rachel.

When Jacob decided to return to the "land of his fathers," both of his wives were ready to accompany him (Gen 31 4,14). Before they reached the end of their journey their courage was sorely tried at the time of the meeting between Jacob and his brother Esau. Although L. was placed between the handmaids in the front, and Rachel with her son Joseph in the rear, she still cannot have derived much comfort from her position. We may well imagine her feeling of relief when she saw Esau and his 400 men returning to Seir (Gen 33 2.16).

According to Gen 49 31, L. was buried at Machpelah. We cannot know for a certainty that she died before Jacob's going down to Egypt, though it is very likely. If she went down with her husband and died in Egypt, he had her body sent to the family burying-place. Ruth 4 11 discloses the fact that her memory was not forgotten by future generations. When Boaz took Ruth for a wife the witnesses exclaimed, "Jeh make the woman that is come into thy house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel."

LEAPING, lēp'ing. See GAMES.

LEASING, lēz'ing (לָצַב, kāzabh, "to devise," "to fabricate," hence "to lie"; occurs but twice in AV [Ps 4 2, RV "falsehood"; 5 6, RV "lies"]; the Heb word is tr<sup>d</sup> "liars" [Ps 116 11]; "lie" or deceive [Job 6 28]): The idea of treachery, lying, and deceit, lies at the root of this word. Joab's conduct is a good illustration of the meaning (2 S 3 27; 20 8-10). In Ps 5 6 David is referring to the cunning, treachery, and falsehood of his adversaries; cf 2 S 13 28; 15 7-9. Doubtless David had a special person in mind as being guilty of "leasing," probably Ahithophel.

LEATHER, leth'ēr. See SKIN; GIRDLE; TANNER.

LEAVEN, lev'n (לֶחֶם, se'or, חֲמֵץ, hāmeç; זֶמֶת, zūmē; Lat fermentum): The nomadic ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Bedouin of today, probably made their bread without leaven; but leaven came to play a great part in their bread-making, their law and ritual, and their religious teaching (see Ex 12 15.19; 13 7; Lev 2 11; Dt 16 4; Mt 13 33; 16 6-12; Mk 8 15f; Lk 12 1; 13 21).

(1) In bread-making.—The form of leaven used in bread-making and the method of using it were simple and definite. The "leaven" consisted always, so far as the evidence goes, of a piece of fermented dough kept over from a former baking. There is no trace of the use of other sorts of leaven, such as the lees of wine or those mentioned by Pliny (NH, xviii.26). The lump of dough thus preserved was either dissolved in water in the kneading-trough before the flour was added, or was "hid" in the flour (AV "meal") and kneaded along with it, as was the case mentioned in the parable (Mt 13 33). The bread thus made was known as "leavened" as distinguished from "unleavened" bread (Ex 12 15, etc). See BREAD.

(2) In law and ritual.—The ritual prohibition of leaven during "the feast of unleavened bread" including the Passover (Ex 23 15, etc) is a matter inviting restudy. For the historical explanation given in the Scriptures, see esp. Ex 12 34-39; 13 3ff; Dt 16 3. The antiquity of the prohibition is witnessed by its occurrence in the earliest legislation (Ex 23 18; 34 25). A natural reason for the prohibition, like that of the similar exclusion of honey, is sought on the ground that fermentation implied a process of corruption. Plutarch voices this ancient view of the matter when he speaks of it as "itself the offspring of corruption, and corrupting the mass of dough with which it is mixed."

Fermentatum is used in Persius (Sat., i.24) for "corruption." For this reason doubtless it was excluded also from the offerings placed upon the altar of Jeh, cakes made from flour without leaven, and these only, being allowed. The regulation name for these "unleavened cakes" was maççōth (Lev 10 12). Two exceptions to this rule should be noted (Lev 7 13; cf Am 4 5): "leavened bread" was an accompaniment of the thank offering as leavened loaves were used also in the wave offering of Lev 23 17. Rabbinical writers regularly use leaven as a symbol of evil (Lightfoot).

(3) In teaching.—The figurative uses of leaven in the NT, no less than with the rabbins, reflect the ancient view of it as "corrupt and corrupting," in parts at least, e.g. Mt 16 6 ||, and esp. the proverbial saying twice quoted by Paul, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (1 Cor 5 6f; Gal 5 9). But as Jesus used it in Mt 13 33, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven," it is clearly the hidden, silent, mysterious, but all-pervading and transforming action of the leaven in the measures of flour that is the point of the comparison.

LEBANA, lē-bā'na, leb'a-na (לְבָנָא, l'bhānā'), or LEBANAH (לְבָנָה, l'bhānāh, "white"): Head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2 45; Neh 7 48; cf 1 Esd 5 29).

LEBANON, leb'a-non (לְבָנוֹן, l'bhānōn; LXX Αἱβανος, Libanos; Vulg. Libanus): Derived from the root לָבַן, lābhēn, "to be white,"

1. Name probably from the snow which covers its summits the greater part of the year. "White mountains" are found in almost every country. The light color of the upper limestone may, however, form a sufficient reason for the name. In prose the article is usually connected with the name. In poetry it is more often without the article. In the LXX, however, the article is generally present both in prose and poetry.

The Lebanon range proper borders the east coast of the Mediterranean, for a distance of 100 miles, running N.N.E and S.S.W.

2. General Description the classic Leontes (which enters the sea a little N. of Tyre), to the mouth of the Eleuthurus (Nahr el-Kebir), a few miles N. of Tripolis. This river comes through a depression between Lebanon and the Nuseiriyyeh mountains, known as "the entrance to Hamath," and connects with a caravan route to the Euphrates through Palmyra. For a considerable distance N. of the Litāny, the mountain summits average from 4,000 to 6,000 ft. in height, and the range is more or less dissected by short streams which enter the Mediterranean. Most prominent of these is the Nahr ez-Zaherâny, which, after running 25 or 30 miles in a southerly direction through the center of the range, like the Litâny, turns abruptly W. opposite Mt. Hermon, reaching the sea between Tyre and Sidon. In roughly parallel courses Nahr el-'Awleh and Nahr Damur descend to the sea between Sidon and Beyrout, and Nahr Beyrout just N. of the city. Throughout this district the mountain recesses are more or less wooded. Opposite Beyrout the range rises in Jebel Sannin to an elevation of 8,560 ft. Thirty miles farther N.E. the summit is reached in Jebel Mukhmal, at an elevation of 10,225 ft., with several others of nearly the same height. An amphitheater here opens to the W., in which is sheltered the most frequented cedar grove, and from which emerges the Nahr Kadisha ("sacred stream") which enters the Mediterranean at Tripolis. Snow is found upon these summits throughout the year (Jer 18 14), while formerly the level area between them furnished the snow fields from which a glacier descended several miles into the headwaters of the Kadisha, reaching a level of about 5,000 ft. The glacier deposited in this amphitheater a terminal moraine covering several sq. miles, which at its front, near Bsherreh, is 1,000 ft. in thickness. It is on this that the grove of cedars referred to is growing.

The view from this summit reveals the geographical features of the region in a most satisfactory manner. Toward the E. lies Coele-Syria (the modern Buka), 7,000 ft. below the summit, bordered on the eastern side by the mountain wall of Anti-Lebanon, corresponding to the cliffs of Moab E. of the Jordan valley, opposite Judaea. This depression in fact is but a continuation of the great geological fault so conspicuous in the Jordan valley (see ARABIA). As one looks down into this valley, Ba'albek appears at the base of Anti-Lebanon, only 20 miles away. The valley is here about 10 miles wide, and forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Litâny. To the N.E. the valley of the Orontes is soon obscured by intervening peaks, but to the S.W. the valley of the Litâny closes up only where the glistening peak of Mt. Hermon pierces the sky, as the river turns abruptly toward the sea 40 miles distant. Toward the W., the blue waters of the Mediterranean, only 25 miles distant as the crow flies, show themselves at intervals through the gorges cut by the rapid streams which have furrowed the western flanks of the mountain (Cant 4 15); 3,500 ft. beneath is the amphitheater many sq. miles in area, filled with the terminal moraine from which the Kadisha river emerges, and on which the grove of cedars (cf 1 K 4 33; Ps 92 12; Hos 14 5) appears as a green spot in the center. Onward to the W. the river gorge winds its way amid numerous picturesque village sites and terraced fields, every foot of which is cultivated by a frugal and industrious people. To the traveler who has made the diagonal journey from Beyrout to the cedars, memory fills in innumerable details which are concealed from vision at any one time. He has crossed Nahr el-Kelb ("Dog River"), near its mouth, where he has seen Egypt and Assyrian inscriptions dating from the time of Sennacherib's invasion. Ascending this river, after passing numerous villages surrounded by mulberry and olive groves, vineyards, and fields of wheat, and pausing to study the ruins of a temple dating from Roman times, and having crossed a natural bridge at Jisr el-Hagar with a span of 120 ft., rising 75 ft. above the stream, he arrives, at the end of the second day, at the ruins of the famous temple of Venus destroyed by the order of Constantine on account of the impurity of the rites celebrated in it. Here, too, is a famous spring, typical of many others which gush forth on either side of the Lebanon range from beneath the thick deposits of limestone which everywhere crown its summit. The flow of water is enormous, and at certain seasons of the year is colored red with a mineral matter which the ancients regarded with mysterious reverence (see LB, III, 244). The lower part of the amphitheater is covered with verdure and a scanty growth of pine and walnut trees, but the upper part merges in the barren cliffs which lie above the snow line. Onward, alternately through upturned limestone strata, left by erosion in fantastic forms, and through barren areas of red sandstone, where the cedars of Lebanon would flourish if protected from the depredations of man and his domestic animals, he crosses by turns at higher and higher levels the headwaters of the Ibrahim, Fedar, Jozeh, Byblus and the Botrys rivers, and at length reaches, on the fourth day, the Kadisha, 5 miles below the cedars of Lebanon. Viewed from the Mediterranean the Lebanon range presents a continuous undulating outline of light-colored limestone peaks, the whole rising so abruptly from the sea that through most of the distance there is barely room for a road along the shore, while in places even that is prevented by rocky promontories projecting boldly into the sea. The only harbors of importance are at Beyrout and Tripolis, and these are only partially protected, being open to the N.W. The eastern face of the range falling down into Coele-Syria is very abrupt, with no foothills and but one or two important valleys.

Geologically considered, the Lebanon consists of three conformable strata of rock thrown up in an anticline with its steepest face to the

3. Geology E. The lowest of these are several thousand ft. thick, consisting of hard limestone containing few fossils, the most characteristic of which is Cidaris glandaria, from which the formation has been named Glandarian limestone. In its foldings this has been elevated in places to a height of 5,000 ft. Through erosion it is exposed in numerous places, where it presents picturesque castellated columns, whose bluish-gray sides are beautifully fluted by atmospheric agencies. The second formation consists of several hundred feet of red-colored sandstone alternating with soft limestone and clay deposits, occasionally containing a poor quality of bituminous coal, with pyrites and efflorescent salts. It is this that occasionally colors the water of the spring at Adonis. The characteristic fossil is Trigonia syriaca. Altogether this formation attains a thickness of 1,000 ft., and it is on its exposed surfaces that the most of the Lebanon pines are found. It contains also many signs of volcanic action. The third formation consists of hippurite limestone, a cretaceous formation, in some places almost wholly composed of fragments of the fossils from which it derives its name. This formation appears on all the highest summits, where in most cases it is nearly horizontal, and in places attains a thickness of 5,000 ft. Between the summits of the range and the foothills this formation has been almost wholly carried away by erosion, thus exposing the underlying formations. Cretaceous strata of still later age are found at low levels near the sea, which in places are covered by small deposits of Tertiary limestone, and by a porous sandstone of the Pleistocene age.

The scenery of the western slopes of Lebanon is most varied, magnificent, and beautiful, and well calculated, as indeed it did, to impress the imagination of the Hebrew poets.

4. Scenery Originally it was heavily covered with forests of pine, oak and cedar; but these have for the most part long since disappeared, except in the valley of Nahr Ibrahim, which is still thickly wooded with pine, oak and plane trees. Of the cedars there remain, besides the grove at the head of the Qadisha, only two or three, and they are of less importance. Every available spot on the western flanks of the Lebanon is cultivated, being sown with wheat or planted with the vine, the olive, the mulberry and the walnut. Irrigation is extensively practised. When we let the eye range from the snowy summits of the mountain over all that lies between them and the orange groves of Sidon on the seashore, we understand why the Arabs say that "Lebanon bears winter on its head, spring on its shoulders, autumn in its lap, while summer lies at its feet."

In the more desolate places jackals, hyenas, wolves, and panthers are still found (cf 2 K 14 9).

The original inhabitants of Lebanon were Hivites and Gebalites (Jgs 3 3; Josh 13 5.6). The whole mountain range was assigned to the

5. History Israelites, but was never conquered by them. It seemed generally to have been subject to the Phoenicians. At present it is occupied by various sects of Christians and Mohammedans, of whom the Maronites, Druzes and Orthodox Greeks are most active and prominent. Since 1860 the region has been under the protection of European powers with a Christian governor. No exact figures are available, but the population at present numbers probably about 275,000.

Ruins of ancient temples are numerous throughout Lebanon. Bacon estimates that within a radius of 20 miles of Ba'albek there are 15 ruined sun-temples, the grandeur and beauty of which would have made them famous but for the surpassing splendor of Ba'albek.

Anti-Libanus (Jth 1 7; Josh 13 5; Cant 7 4) is an extension northward of the great mountain system facing on the E. the great

6. Anti-Lebanon geological fault most conspicuous in the valley of the Jordan (see JORDAN, VALLEY OF), extending from the Gulf of Akabah to Antioch on the Orontes River. The system begins at the Barada River just N. of Mt. Hermon, and, running parallel to Mt. Lebanon for 65 miles, terminates at Hums, the "entering in of Hamath." The highest points of the range reach an elevation of over 8,000 ft. Eastward the range merges into the plateau of the great Syrian desert. South of Ba'albek the Yahfusah, a stream of considerable importance, empties into the Litâny, while the Barada (the "Abana" of Scripture), rising in the same plateau, flows eastward to Damascus, its volume being greatly increased by fountains coming in from the base of the dissected plateau.

LITERATURE.—The geographical and geological descriptions are largely obtained by the writer from an extended excursion through the region in the company of Professor Day of the Protestant College at Beyrout, whose knowledge of the region is most intimate and comprehensive. LEBAOTH, lê-bā'oth, -ōth (לְבָאוֹת, lêbhā'ōth): An unidentified city in the S. of the territory of Judah (Josh 15 32). It is the same as Beth-lebaoth of Josh 19 6, which, by a clerical error appears in 1 Ch 4 31 as "Beth-biri."

LEBBAEUS, le-bē'us (Λεββαῖος, Lebbatos): Mentioned in Mt 10 3 AV as "Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus" (RV omits); one of the twelve apostles. See THADDAEUS.

LEBONAH, lê-bō'na (לְבוֹנָה, lêbhōnāh): A place on the great north road between Shiloh and Shechem (Jgs 21 19). It is represented by the modern Khān el-Lubbān, about 3 miles W.N.W. of Seilūn ("Shiloh"), on the way to Nablūs. It is a wretched village lying on the slope of a hill, with many rock tombs in the vicinity.

LECAH, lê'ka (לֶכָּה, lêkhāh): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 21).

LEDGE, lej (לֶבֶט, shālābh): The word in the sense of side-projection is used in 1 K 7 28.29 in connection with the bases of Solomon's MOLTEN SEA (q.v.); in vs 35.36, where AV uses the same word, RV has "stay" (yādh, lit. "hand"). RV likewise has "ledge" (round) for AV "compass" (karkōbh) in the description of the altar in Ex 27 5; 38 4 (see ALTAR), and ARV substitutes "ledge" for "settle" (āzārāh) in Ezk 43 14.17.20; 45 19. See TEMPLE.

LEES, lēks (לֵעֵס, hācīr; τὰ πρῶτα, tá prása): This word, elsewhere trd "grass," is in Nu 11 5 rendered "leeks" in all the ancient VSS, on account of its association with garlic and onions; such a use of the word occurs in the Talm. The leek (Allium porrum) is much grown today in Pal, while in ancient Egypt this vegetable was renowned.

LEES, lēz. See WINE.

LEFTHANDED, left-hand-ed (אֲשֶׁר בְּיָמִין, ’iṣṣēr yadh-yāmin; LXX ἀμφοτεροδέξις, amphoterodéxios, i.e. “ambidextrous”): The Heb presents a combination of words signifying lit. a man whose right hand is impeded or lame, who therefore uses the left hand instead, or one who by habit prefers the use of the left hand, where others use the right. It is interesting to note that in both instances, where the expression occurs in the Scripture, it refers to individuals belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (which name itself signifies “a son of the right hand”!). The first is Ehud, son of Gera, who killed Eglon, king of Moab, and thereby delivered Israel from paying tribute to the Moabites (Jgs 3 15). The other instance is that of the 700 selected Benjamites, who, though lefthanded, “could sling stones at a hair-breadth, and not miss” (Jgs 20 16; cf 1 Ch 12 2).

LEG ([1] שׁוֹק, shōk, Aram. שֹׁק, shōk; [2] כָּרַע, kāra, dual כְּרָעִים, k’rā’ayim; [3] רֵגֶל, reghel; σκέλος, skēlos; AV tr also שֹׁבֵל, shōbhel, and צִקְחָה, ṣ’ādhāh, with “leg,” but mistakenly): (1) The first Heb word (shōk) denotes the upper leg, and is therefore synonymous with THIGH (q.v.). It expresses metaphorically the muscular strength, and the pride of the runner. “He taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man” (Ps 147 10). “His legs are as pillars of marble, set upon sockets of fine gold” (Cant 5 15). If the legs have lost their strength as in the lame or the Beri-beri patient, they become a metaphor for anything useless, inefficient or disappointing: “The legs of the lame hang loose; so is a parable in the mouth of fools” (Prov 26 7). The Aram. form is found in the description of the image of Nebuchadnezzar, “its legs of iron” (Dnl 2 33). (2) Kāra, dual k’rā’ayim, the “leg,” “respecting the legs,” mentioned as a portion of the paschal lamb (Ex 12 9), or, usually, in connection with the head and the inwards, as a sacrificial portion (Ex 29 17; Lev 1 9.13; Am 3 12). The word designates also the legs of leaping insects of the orthopterous family, locusts, etc., which were permitted as food to the Israelites (Lev 11 21). (3) Reghel, lit. “foot” (q.v.), found in this sense only once: “He [Goliath] had greaves of brass upon his legs” (1 S 17 6).

Two passages of wrong tr in AV have been corrected by RV. The virgin daughter of Babylon is addressed: “Make bare the leg, uncover the thigh” (Isa 47 2), RV renders: “Strip off the train [shōbhel], uncover the leg,” the idea being that the gentle maid, who has been brought up in affluence and luxury, will have to don the attire of a slave girl and do menial work, for which her former garments are unsuited. The other passage is in Isa 3 20, where AV reads: “the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs,” RV corrects: “the head-tires [ṣ’ādhāh], and the ankle chains.”

In the NT the word “leg” is found only in connection with the breaking of the legs of the persons crucified with the Saviour (Jn 19 31.32.33). We know from Rom and Gr authors that this was done as a coup de grâce to shorten the miseries of criminals condemned to die on the cross. The practice bore the technical name of σκελοκοπία, skelokopia, Lat crurifragium. The vb. σκελοκοπεῖν, skelokopeîn

(“to break the legs”), is found in the apocryphal Gospel of St. Peter (4 14), where it is distinctly stated that the legs of Jesus were not broken, that His sufferings on the cross might be extended, while the two malefactors crucified with Him were mercifully dispatched in this way. The crurifragium consisted of some strokes with a heavy club or mallet, which always materially hastened the death of the sufferer, and often caused it almost immediately.

Edersheim, in LTTM, II, 613, suggests that the breaking of legs was an additional punishment, and that it was always followed by a coup de grâce, the perforatio or percussio sub alas, a stroke with sword or lance into the side. This, however, is not borne out by any classical information which is known to me, and is contradicted by the statement of the evangelist that Jesus received the percussio, while the malefactors endured the crurifragium. Cf on this subject, esp. for parallels from classical authors, Sepp, Das Leben Jesu, VII, 441, and Keim, Jesus von Nazara (ET), VI, 253, note 3.

LEGISLATION, lej-is-lā’shun, OF SANCTITY. See ASTRONOMY, 1, 5.

LEHABIM, le-hā’bim (לְהָבִים, l’habhīm): Named in Gen 10 13; 1 Ch 1 11 as descendants of Mizraim. They are probably to be identified with the LUBIM (q.v.), and the one word may be a corruption of the other.

LEHI, le’hi. See RAMATH-LEHI.

LEMUEL, lem’ū-el (לֵמֻאֵל, lēmū’ēl, or לְמוֹאֵל, lēmō’ēl): A king whose words, an “oracle [taught him by his mother],” are given in Prov 31 1-9; and possibly the succeeding acrostic poem (vs 10-31) is from the same source. Instead of translating the word after this name as “oracle,” some propose to leave it as a proper name, translating “king of Massa,” and referring for his kingdom to Massa (Gen 25 14), one of the sons of Ishmael, supposedly head of a tribe or sheikh of a country. It is to be noted, however, that the words of Agur in the previous chapter are similarly called massā, “oracle,” with not so clear a reason for referring it to a country. See for a suggested reason for retaining the meaning “oracle” in both places, PROVERBS, Book of, II, 6.

LEND, LOAN, lōn: The tr of 7 Heb and 2 Gr vbs.:

In the OT: לָוָה, lāwāh, “to join,” “cause to join,” “lend” (Ex 22 25; Dt 28 12.44; Ps 37 26; Prov 19 17); נָשָׂה, nāshāh, “to bite,” “lend” (Dt Usages root as last, though different vb. stem, Hiphil), “to cause to bite,” “lend on usury” (Dt 15 2; 24 10); נָשָׂה, nāshakh, “to bite,”

“lend” “[cause to lend] on usury” (Dt 23 19.20); נָתַן, nāthan, “to give” (Lev 25 37, RV “to give”);

עָבַח, ’ābhaf (Hiphil), “to cause to borrow,” “to lend” (Dt 15 6.8); שָׁאַל, shā’al (Hiphil), “to cause to ask,” “to lend”

(Ex 12 36, RV “ask”; 1 S 1 27). In LXX δανείζω, daneizō, δανίζω, dantizō, “to lend,”

עָבַח, ’ābhaf, in above passages and in Neh 5 4; Prov 22 7, and Isa 24 2; κίχραω, kichráō, also tr לָוָה and שָׁאַל

(Ps 112 5; Prov 13 11); δανείων (-ιον), daneion(-ion), “loan,” occurs in Dt 15 8.10; 24 11; 4 Macc 2 8.

In the NT “lend” tr two Gr vbs., daneizō, “to lend money” (Lk 6 34.35, usually in commercial sense); κίχρημι, kichrēmi, “to lend [as a friendly act]” (Lk 11 5). The subst. “loan,” שְׁעָלָה, she’ēlāh, occurs only once in the OT (1 S 2 20 AV and ERV), not at all in the NT.

(1) Lending on interest to the poor is prohibited in the code in Ex 22 25. (2) In the code in Dt 15 1-6; 23 19.20; 24 10.11; 28 12.44, borrowing and lending are taken for granted as existing in Israel, but the creditor

2. History of Lending in the Bible and Apocrypha

is required to release his Heb brother as debtor in the 7th year (either the cancellation of the loan [so in Jewish lit. and early Christian scholars] or suspension of payment that year [so most modern scholars]), though he may exact payment from a foreigner. Israel may lend, and will be able to lend, because of Jeh's blessing, to other nations, but must not borrow from them. A pledge, or security, must not be taken in person by the creditor from the house of the debtor, nor kept over night, if the debtor be poor. (3) The code in Lev 25 35-38 requires that the Israelite receive no interest from his poor brother, because of the goodness of Jeh to Israel. (4) Notwithstanding the prohibition of the early laws against lending on interest or usury, the same seems to have become common in Israel before the exile (Isa 24 2; Jer 15 10), was practised on the return, and was an evil to be corrected by Nehemiah (Neh 5 7.10). (5) According to Ps 37 26; 112 5; Prov 19 17, lending to the needy was regarded as a mark of the pious Hebrew, but no interest is to be charged. (6) According to Apoc (Wisd 15 16; Sir 8 12; 18 33; 20 15.29; 4 Macc 2 8), borrowing is discouraged, and lending is exalted as a mark of the merciful man. (7) Jesus teaches that His followers should lend, even to enemies, to men from whom they have no reasonable hope of expecting anything in return, because thus to do is to be like the Most High (Lk 6 34.35). He did not discuss lending for commercial purposes, and so does not necessarily forbid it.

LENTILS, len'tilz (לְעִטִּים, ādāshīm; φακός, phakós; Gen 25 34; 2 S 17 28; 23 11; Ezk 4 9; AV Lentiles): These are undoubtedly identical with the Arab. 'adas, a small, reddish bean, the product of Ervum lens, a dwarf leguminous plant, half a foot high, which is extensively cultivated in Pal as a summer crop. The flour is highly nutritious, and the well-known food, Revalenta arabica, is simply one form, specially prepared; 'adas are highly esteemed in Pal, and are used in soup and as a "pottage" known as mujedderah. This last is of a reddish-brown color and is without doubt the

"pottage" of Gen 25 34. Lentils were part of the provisions brought to David when fleeing from Absalom (2 S 17 28) and were used in the making of the bread for the prophet Ezekiel (4 9). In a "plot of ground full of lentils," Shammah, one of David's "mighty men," stood and defended it and slew the marauding Philis (2 S 23 11.12).

LEOPARD, lep'ərd ([1] נִמְרָה, nāmēr [Cant 4 8; Isa 11 6; Jer 5 6; 13 23; Hos 13 7; Hab 1 8]; cf Arab. نمر, nimr, "leopard." [2] Chald נִמְרָה, n'mar [Dnl 7 6]. [3] πάρδαλις, párdalis [Rev 13 2; Eccus 28 23]; cf נִמְרִים, nimrīm, Nimrim [Isa 15 6; Jer 48 34]; נִמְרָה, nimrāh, Nimrah [Nu 32 3], and בֵּית נִמְרָה, beth-nimrāh, Beth-nimrah [Nu 32 36; Josh 13 27]): The leopard is found throughout Africa and ranges through Southern Asia from Asia Minor to Japan, being absent from Siberia and Central Asia. Its range is much the same as that of the lion, which latter, however, does not extend so far to the E. Like other animals of wide range, it has local varieties, but these shade into each other imperceptibly, and the one specific name, Felis pardus, includes all. Leopards live in some of the valleys E. and S. of the Dead Sea, and in the mountains of Sinai and Northwestern Arabia. They have but rarely been seen of recent years in Lebanon or the more settled portions of Pal. So far as can be judged from skins which are available for comparison, the leopard of Pal is rather light in color, and is not as large as some found in Africa or India. It is not certain that the place-names, NIMRIM, NIMRAH, and BETH-NIMRAH (q.v.), have to do with nāmēr, "leopard," but their location is in Moab, where leopards are well known, even at the present day. One of the valleys entering the Dead Sea from the E., S. of the Arnon, is called Wādī-en-Numeir ("valley of the little leopard"; numeir, dim. of nimr).

In the Bible "leopard" occurs mainly in figurative expressions, as a large and fierce beast. The leopard is mentioned with the lion and bear in Dnl 7 6; Hos 13 7; Rev 13 2; with the lion, wolf and bear in Isa 11 6; with the lion and wolf in Jer 5 6; with the lion alone in Eccus 28 23; with the wolf alone in Hab 1 8. The leopard is smaller than the lion and the tiger, but is more active than either. Its swiftness is referred to in Hab 1 8: "Their horses also [of the Chaldeans] are swifter than leopards." The spots of the leopard are referred to in Jer 13 23: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?"

The Gr πάρδαλις, párdalis, and πάνθηρ, pánthēr, were both applied to the leopard. "Panther" is sometimes used of large leopards, while in America, with its corrupt form "painter," it is one of the names applied to the cougar or puma, Felis concolor, which, as the specific name implies, is not spotted like the leopard, or striped like the tiger.

ALFRED ELY DAY

LEPER, lep'ér, LEPROSY, lep'ro-si (צָרַעַת, ṣāra'ath; λέπρα, lépra): A slowly progressing and intractable disease characterized by subcutaneous nodules (Heb se'ēth; LXX oulē; AV "rising"), scabs or cuticular crusts (Heb sappahath; LXX sēmasia) and white shining spots appearing to be deeper than the skin (Heb bahereth; LXX tēlaūgēma). Other signs are (1) that the hairs of the affected part turn white and (2) that later there is a growth of "quick raw flesh." This disease in an especial manner rendered its victims unclean; even contact with a leper defiled whoever touched him, so while the cure of other diseases is called healing, that of leprosy is called cleansing (except in the case of Miriam [Nu 12 13] and that of the Samaritan [Lk 17 15] where the word "heal" is used in reference to leprosy). The disease is described in the Papyrus Ebers as ukhedu (the Coptic name for leprosy is çeht). It is also mentioned in ancient Indian and Japanese history. Hippocrates calls it "the Phoen disease," and Galen names it "elephantiasis." In Europe it was little known until imported by the returning soldiers of Pompey's army after his Syrian campaign in 61 BC; but after that date it is described by Soranus, Aretaeus and other classic authors.

The first OT mention of this disease is as a sign given by God to Moses (Ex 4 6 [J]), which may be the basis of the story in CAp, I,

1. OT 31, that Moses was expelled from Instances Heliopolis on account of his being a leper (see also I, 26 and Ant, III, xi, 4).

The second case is that of Miriam (Nu 12 10), where the disease is graphically described (EP<sub>2</sub>). In Dt 24 8 there is a reference to the oral tradition concerning the treatment of lepers, without any details, but in Lev 13, 14 (PC) the rules for the recognition of the disease, the preliminary quarantine periods and the ceremonial methods of cleansing are given at length. It is worthy of note that neither here nor elsewhere is there any mention of treatment or remedy; and Jehoram's ejaculation implies the belief that its cure could be accomplished only by miracle (2 K 5 7).

Group of Lepers Begging.

The case of Naaman (2 K 5 1) shows that lepers were not isolated and excluded from society among the Syrians. The leprosy of Gehazi (2 K 5 27) is said to have been the transference of that of Naaman, but, as the incubation period is long, it must have been miraculously inflicted on him. The four lepers of Samaria of 2 K 7 3 had been excluded from the city and were outside the gate.

The leprosy stroke inflicted on Uzziah (2 K 15 5; 2 Ch 26 23) for his unwarrantable assumption of the priestly office began in his forehead, a form of the disease peculiarly unclean (Lev 13 43-46) and requiring the banishment and isolation of the leper. It is remarkable that there is no reference to this disease in the prophetic writings, or in the Hagiographa.

In the NT, cleansing of the lepers is mentioned as a specific portion of Our Lord's work of healing, and was included in the commission

2. Leprosy given to the apostles. There are few in the NT individual cases specially described, only the ten of Lk 17 12, and the leper whom Our Lord touched (Mt 8 2; Mk 1 40; Lk 5 12), but it is probable that these are only a few out of many such incidents. Simon the leper (Mt 26 6; Mk 14 3) may have been one of those cured by the Lord.

The disease is a zymotic affection produced by a microbe discovered by Hansen in 1871. It is con-

3. Nature tagious, although not very readily and Locality communicated by casual contact; in one form it is attended with anaesthesia of the parts affected, and this, Disease which is the commonest variety now met with in the East, is slower in its course than those forms in which nodular growths are the most prominent features, in which parts of the limbs often drop off. At present there are many lepers to be seen at the gates of the cities in Pal. It is likewise prevalent in other eastern lands, India, China, and Japan. Cases are also to be seen in most of the Mediterranean lands and in Norway, as well as in parts of Africa and the West Indies and in South America. In former times it was occasionally met with in Britain, and in most of the older English cities there were leper houses, often called "lazarets" from the mistaken notion that the eczematous or varicose ulcers of Lazarus were leprosy (Lk 16 20). Between 1096 and 1472, 112 such leper houses were founded in England. Of this disease King Robert Bruce of Scotland died. There was special mediaeval legislation excluding lepers from churches and forbidding them to wander from district to district. Leprosy has been sometimes confounded with other diseases; indeed the Gr physicians used the name lepra for the scaly skin disease now called psoriasis. In the priestly legislation there was one form of disease (Lev 13 13) in which the whiteness covers all the body, and in this condition the patient was pronounced to be clean. This was probably psoriasis, for leprosy does not, until a very late stage, cover all the body, and when it does so, it is not white. It has been surmised that Naaman's disease was of this kind. Freckled spots (Heb bōhak), which were to be distinguished from true leprosy (Lev 13 39), were either spots of herpes or of some other non-contagious skin disease. The modern Arab. word of the same sound is the name of a form of eczema. RV reads for freckled spot "tetter," an old Eng. word from a root implying itchiness (see Hamlet, I, v, 71).

The homiletic use of leprosy as a type of sin is not Bib. The only Scriptural reference which might approach this is Ps 51 7, but this refers to Nu 19 18 rather than to the cleansing of the leper. The Fathers regarded leprosy as typical of heresy rather than of moral offences. (See Rabanus Maurus, Allegoria, s.v. "Lepra.")

(1) Leprosy in garments.—The occurrence of certain greenish or reddish stains in the substance of woollen or linen fabrics or in articles made of leather is described in Lev 13 47 ff, and when these stains spread, or, after washing, do not change their color, they are pronounced to be due to a fretting leprosy (ṣāra'ath mam'ereṭh), and such garments are to be burnt. As among the fellahin articles of clothing are worn for years and are often hereditary, it is little wonder that they become affected by vegetable as well as animal parasites, and that which is here referred to is probably some form of mildew, such as Penicillium or mold-fungus. The destruction of such garments is a useful sanitary precaution. Possibly this sort of decaying garment was in Job's mind when he compares himself to a "rotten thing that consumeth, like a garment that is moth-eaten" (13 28); see also Jude ver 23, "the garment spotted [espūlōmēnon] by the flesh."

(2) Leprosy in the house (Lev 14 34 ff).—The occurrence of "hollow streaks, greenish or reddish," in the plaster of a house is regarded as evidence that the wall is affected with leprosy, and when such is observed the occupant first clears his house of furniture, for if the discoloration be pronounced leprosy, all in the home would become unclean and must be destroyed. Then he asks the priest to inspect it. The test is first, that the stain is in the substance of the wall, and, second, that it is spreading. In case these conditions are fulfilled, it is pronounced to be leprosy and the affected part of the wall is taken down, its stones cast outside the city, its plaster scraped off and also cast outside the city; new stones are then built in and the house is newly plastered. Should the stain recur in the new wall, then the whole house is condemned and must be destroyed and its materials cast outside the city. The description is that of infection by some fungus attacking whatever organic material is in the mud plaster by which the wall is covered. If in wood-work, it might be the dry rot (Merulius lacrimans), but this is not likely to spread except where there is wood or other organic matter. It might be the efflorescence of mural salt (calcium nitrate), which forms flocculent masses when decomposing nitrogenous material is in contact with lime; but that is generally white, not green or reddish. Considering the uncleanly condition of the houses of the ordinary fellah, it is little wonder that such fungus growths may develop in their walls, and in such cases destruction of the house and its materials is a sanitary necessity.

It should be observed here that the attitude of the Law toward the person, garment or house suspected of leprosy is that if the disease

4. The Legal Attitude be really present they are to be declared unclean and there is no means provided for cure, and in the case of the garment or house, they are to be destroyed. If, on the other hand, the disease proved to be absent, this freedom from the disease has to be declared by a ceremonial purification. This is in reality not the ritual for cleansing the leper, for the Torah provides none such, but the ritual for declaring him ceremonially free from the suspicion of having the disease. This gives a peculiar and added force to the words, "The lepers are cleansed," as a testimony to Our Lord's Divine mission.

ALEX. MACALISTER

LESHEM, le'shem. See LAISH.

LESSAU, les'ō (Λεσσαύ, Lessaui; AV Dessau): A place mentioned only in 2 Macc 14 16 as the scene of a battle between Nicanor and the Jews. "Dessau" of AV arises from confusion of Λ with Δ in the Gr. The place may be identical with ADASA (q.v.).

LET (κατέχω, katéchō): Usually in the sense of "permit" (AS latan), but also in Old Eng. with meaning of "hinder" (AS lettan). This latter sense is found in 2 Thess 2 7 AV, "Only he who now letteth will let," where RV has, "Only there is one that restraineth now."

LETHECH, le'thek (לֶתֶחַ, lethech): A liquid measure equivalent to half a homer (Hos 3 2 m) and containing about 5½ bushels. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

LETTER, let'ér. See EPISTLE.

LETTERS, let'érz. See ALPHABET; WRITING.

LETUSHIM, le-tōō'shim, le-tū'shim (לְטוּשִׁים, l'tūshīm): A Dedanite tribe in North Arabia (Gen 25 3). With it are connected the ASSHURIM and LEUMMIM (q.v.).

LEUMMIM, le-um'im (לְאֻמִּים, l'ummīm): A Dedanite tribe of North Arabia, connected with the LETUSHIM (q.v.).

LEVI, le'vī (לֵוִי, lēwī; אֶלֶל, Leui; WH אֶלֶל, Leui):

(1) The 3d son of Jacob by Leah. See separate article.

(2) (3) Two ancestors of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3 24.29).

(4) The apostle Matthew. See MATTHEW.

LEVI (לֵוִי, lēwī; אֶלֶל, Leui): The third of Leah's sons born to Jacob in Paddan-aram (Gen 29 34). In this passage the name is connected with the vb. lāwāh, "to adhere," or "be joined to," Leah expressing assurance that with the birth of this third son, her husband might be drawn closer to her in the bonds of conjugal affection. There is a play upon the name in Nu 18 2.4, where direction is given that the tribe of Levi be "joined unto" Aaron in the ministries of the sanctuary. The etymology here suggested is simple and reasonable. The grounds on which some modern scholars reject it are purely conjectural. It is asserted, e.g., that the name is adjectival, not nominal, describing one who attaches himself; and this is used to support the theory that the Levites were those who joined the Sem people when they left Egypt to return to Pal, who therefore were probably Egyptians. Others think it may be a gentilic form le'āh, "wild cow" (Wellhausen, Proleg., 146; Stade, GVI, 152); and this is held to be the more probable, as pointing to early totem worship!

Levi shared with Simeon the infamy incurred at Shechem by the treacherous slaughter of the Shechemites (Gen 34). Jacob's displeasure was expressed at the time (ver 3), and the memory was still bitter to him in his last days (49 5 f). The fate predicted for the descendants of Simeon and Levi (ver 7), in the case of the latter on account of the tribe's steadfast loyalty in a period of stern testing, was changed to a blessing (Ex 32 26 ff). In later lit. the action condemned by Jacob is mentioned with approval (Jth 9 2 ff). Levi was involved in his brothers' guilt with regard to Joseph (Gen 37), and shared their experiences in Egypt before Joseph made himself known (chs 42-45). Three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, were born to him in Canaan, and went down with the caravan to Egypt (46 11). Nothing further is known of the personal history of this patriarch. He died and found sepulture in Egypt. For the tribal history and possessions, see PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

LEVIATHAN, le-vī'a-than (לִּיְיָתָן, liyyāṭhān [Job 41 1-34], from לָוַה, lāwāh, "to fold"; cf Arab.

name of the wry neck, Iynx torquilla, أَبْوَلَوِي, abū-luwā, from kindred وَلَوِي, lawā, "to bend"):

(1) The word "leviathan" also occurs in Isa 27 1, where it is characterized as "the swift serpent . . . the crooked serpent"; in Ps 104 26, where a marine monster is indicated; also in Ps 74 14 and Job 3 8. The description in Job 41 has been thought by some to refer to the whale, but while the whale suits better the expressions denoting great strength, the words apply best on the whole to the crocodile. Moreover, the whale is very seldom found in the Mediterranean, while the crocodile is abundant in the Nile, and has been known to occur in at least one river of Pal, the Zarḳa, N. of Jaffa. For a discussion of the behemoth and leviathan as mythical creatures, see EB, s.v. "Behemoth" and "Leviathan." The points in the description which may well apply to the crocodile are the great invulnerability, the strong and close scales, the limbs and the teeth. It must be admitted that there are many expressions which a modern scientist would not use with reference to the crocodile, but the Book of Job is neither modern nor scientific, but poetical and ancient.

LITERATURE

1. Legal Provisions.—Nu 35 1-8 provides that 48 cities should be given to the Levites, each surrounded by a pasturage. The exact

1. Numbers details are not quite clear, for in the Heb, ver 4 would naturally be read as meaning that the pasturage was a radius of 1,000 cubits from the city walls, while ver 5 makes each city the center of a square, each side of which was 2,000 cubits long. Extant variants in the VSS suggest, however, that the text has suffered slightly in transmission. Originally there seems to have been no discrepancy between the two verses, and it may be doubted whether the intent was that the city was always to be in the mathematical center of the patch. The Levites were to have the right of redeeming the houses at any time, and in default of redemption they were to go out in the Jubilee. The field was not to be sold (Lev 25 32 f).

Dt 18 8 undoubtedly recognizes patrimonial possessions of the Levites outside the religious capital, and sees no inconsistency with

2. Deuteronomy its earlier statement that Levi had no portion or inheritance with Israel (ver 1). The explanation lies in the fact that these cities were not a tribal portion like the territories of the secular tribes. The area occupied by the whole 48 jointly would only have amounted to less than 16 miles.

II. Wellhausen's View.—Josh 21 relates that this command was fulfilled by the allocation of 48 cities, but it is clear that some of those cities were not in fact reduced into possession; see e.g. Josh 16 10; Jgs 1 29 as to Gezer, and Jgs 1 27 as to Taanach. Wellhausen treats the whole arrangement as fictitious. His main reasons are: (1) that the arrangement is physically impracticable in a mountainous country, and (2) that "there is not a historical trace of the existence of the Levitical cities." Many remained in the hands of the Canaanites till a late period, while others were "important but by no means ecclesiastical towns" (Prolegomena, 160). Two pages later he says that "four of them were demonstrably famous old seats of worship," and conjectures that most, if not all, were ancient sanctuaries. He also regards Ezekiel's scheme of a heave offering of land (ch 45) as the origin of the idea. Yet "Jerus and the temple, which, properly speaking, occasioned the whole arrangement, are buried in silence with a diligence which is in the highest degree surprising" (p. 164).

III. Alternative View and Evidence.—In point of fact, there are traces of some of the Levitical cities in the later history. Such are

1. Traces Anathoth (1 K 2 26; Jer 1 1; 32), of the Jattir (2 S 20 26, where, as shown in the art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES [q.v.], Jattirite should be read for the Massoretic Jairite), Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 13-15; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES as to the text). (From Am 7 17 it appears that Amaziah of Bethel had land, but we do not know that he was of Levitical descent or where the land was.) Further, the fact that many other Levitical cities

2. Wellhausen's Arguments appear to have been centers of worship points to the presence of priests. Was the great high place of Gibeon (1 K 3 4) unserved by priests? It is surely natural to suppose that during the period between the capture of the Ark and its transport to Jerus there was a tendency for high places to spring up in cities where there were priests rather than elsewhere; indeed there would probably be a disposition on the part of unemployed priests to go astray in a direction that would prove lucrative.

With regard to the other objection, Van Hoonacker's answer is convincing: "As to the way in which the measurements were to be carried out in the mountainous country of Pal, the legislator doubtless knew what method was usually employed. Besides, we are free to believe that he only gives these figures as approximate indications" (Sacerdoce lévitique, 433).

The same writer's reply to the theory that the idea originated with Ezekiel is wholly admirable.

"Strictly we could ask . . . whether 4. Ezekiel's Vision Ezekiel did not found himself on the description of the camp of the Israelites in the desert. It is only too manifest that the division and appointment of the territory as presented in ch 48 of the prophet are scarcely inspired by practical necessities, that they have a very pronounced character of ideal vision; and 'as no fancy is pure fancy,' we ought also to find the elements which are at the basis of Ezekiel's vision. The tents of the tribe of Levi ranged around the tabernacle explain themselves in the PC; we may doubt whether the Levites, deprived of territory (Ezk 44 28) and nevertheless grouped on a common territory, in the conditions described in Ezk 48, explain themselves with equal facility. A camp is readily conceived on the pattern of a chessboard, but not the country of Canaan. We need not stop there. It is in fact certain that Ezekiel here has in view the protection of the holiness of the temple from all profanation; and in the realm of the ideal, the means are appropriate to the end" (op. cit., 425 f).

Lastly there runs through Wellhausen's discussion the confusion between a city where priests may be dwelling and a priestly city. There were priests in Jerus, as there are today in London or Chicago; but none of these three places can be regarded as a priestly city in the same sense as the Levitical cities. Not one of them has ever been a patrimonial city of priests, or could be the origin of such an arrangement.

While therefore the whole of the cities mentioned in Josh 21 were certainly not reduced into possession at the time of the conquest, the Wellhausen theory on this matter cannot be sustained.

LITERATURE

I. General Data.—The third book of the Pent is generally named by the Jews according to the first word, וַיִּקְרָא, wayyikrá' (Origen

1. Name Οὐκρά, Oukrá, by the LXX called according to its contents Λευιτικόν, Leuitikón, or Λευιτικόν, Leuitikón, by the Vulg, accordingly, "Leviticus" [i.e. Liber], sometimes "Leviticum"). The Jews have also another name taken from its contents, viz. תּוֹרַת כֹּהֲנִים, tōrah kohānīm, "Law of the Priests."

As a matter of fact ordinances pertaining to the priesthood, to the Levitical system, and to the cultus constitute a most important

2. Character of Book part of this book; but specifically religious and ethical commands, as we find them, e.g. in chs 18–20, are not wanting; and there are also some historical sections, which, however, are again connected with the matter referring to the cultus, namely the consecration of the priests in chs 8 and 9, the sin and the punishment of two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu (10 1 ff), and the account of the stoning of a blasphemer (24 10 ff). Of the Levites, on the other hand, the book does not treat at all. They are mentioned only once and that incidentally in 25 32 ff. The laws are stated to have been given b'har sīnay (7 38; 25 1; 26 46; 27 34), which expression, on account of ch 11, in which Jeh is described as speaking to Moses out of the tent of meeting, is not to be tr<sup>d</sup> "upon" but "at" Mt. Sinai. The connection of this book with the preceding and following books, i.e. Ex and Nu, which is commonly acknowledged as being the case, at least in some sense, leaves for the contents of Lev exactly the period of a single month, since the last chronological statement of Ex 40 17 as the time of the erection of the tabernacle mentions the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year of the Exodus, and Nu 1 1 takes us to the 1st day of the 2d month of the same year. Within this time of one month the consecration of the priests fills out 8 days (Lev 8 33; 9 1). A sequence in time is indicated only by 16 1, which directly connects with what is reported in ch 10 concerning Nadab and Abihu. In the same way the ordinances given in 10 6 ff are connected with the events described in 8 1–10 5. The laws are described as being revelations of Jeh, generally given to Moses (cf 1 1; 4 1; 5 14; 6 19.24 [Heb 12.17]; 7 22.28, etc); sometimes to Moses and Aaron (cf 11 1; 13 1; 14 33; 15 1, etc), and, rarely, to Aaron alone (10 8). In 10 12 ff, Moses gives some directions to the priests, which are based on a former revelation (cf 6 16 [Heb 9] ff; 7 37 ff). In 10 16 ff, we have a difference of opinion between Moses and Aaron, or rather his sons, which was decided on the basis of an independent application of principles given in Lev. Most of these commands are to be announced to Israel (1 2; 4 2; 7 23.29; 9 3 ff; 11 2; 12 2; 15 2; 18 2, etc); others to the priests (6 9.25 [Heb 2 18]; 21 2; 22 2, etc); or to the priests and the Israelites (17 2; 22 18), while the directions in reference to the Day of Atonement, with which Aaron was primarily concerned (16 2), beginning with ver 29, without a special superscription, are undeniably changed into injunctions addressed to all Israel; cf also 21 24 and 21 2. As the Book of Ex treats of the communion which God offers on His part to Israel and which culminates at last in His dwelling in the tent of meeting (40 34 ff; cf under Exodus, I, 2), the Book of Lev contains the ordinances which were to be carried out by the Israelites in religious, ethical and cultural matters, in order to restore and maintain this communion with God, notwithstanding the imperfections and the guilt of the Israelites. And as this book thus with good reason occupies its well-established place in the story of the founding and in the earliest history of the theocracy, so too even a casual survey and intelligent glance at the contents of the book will show that we have here a well-arranged and organic unity, a conviction which is only confirmed and strengthened by the presentation of the structure of the book in detail (see under II, below).

As a rule, critics are accustomed first of all to regard chs 17–25 or 26 as an independent section, and find in these chapters a legal code that is considered to have existed at one time as a group by itself, before it was united with the other parts.

It is indeed true that a series of peculiarities have been found in these chapters. To these peculiarities belongs the frequent repetition of the formula: "I am Jeh your God" (18 2.4; 19 2.4, etc); or "I am Jeh" (18 5.6.21; 19 14.16, etc), or "I am Jeh . . . who hath separated you" (20 24), or "who sanctifieth you" (20 8; 21 8.15.23, etc). To these peculiarities belong the references in words, or, in fact, to the land of Canaan, into which Israel is to be led (18 3.24 ff; 19 23 ff.29; 20 22 ff; 23; 25), and also to Egypt, out of which He has led the people (13 3; 13 34; 22 33; 23 13.45, etc); as, further, the demand for sanctification (19 2), or the warning against desecration (19 12; 21 23, etc), both based on the holiness of Jeh. In addition, a number of peculiar expressions are repeatedly found in these chapters. Because of their contents these chapters have, since Klostermann, generally been designated by the letter H (i.e. Law of Holiness); or, according to the suggestion of Dillmann, by the letter S (i.e. Sinaitic Law), because, according to 25 1; 23 46, they are said to have been given at Mt. Sinai, and because in certain critical circles it was at one time claimed that these chapters contain old laws from the Mosaic period, although these had been changed in form. These earlier views have apparently now been discarded by the critics entirely.

Examination of critical theory.—We, however, do not believe that it is at all justifiable to separate these laws as a special legal code from the other chapters. In the first place, these peculiarities, even if such are found here more frequently than elsewhere, are not restricted to these chapters exclusively. The Decalogue (Ex 20 2) begins with the words, "I am Jeh thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Ex 22 31 contains the demand, "Ye shall be holy men unto me." Ex 29 44.45 contains a promise that God will dwell in the midst of the Israelites, so that they shall learn that He is Jeh, their God, who has brought them out of Egypt in order to dwell in their midst as Jeh, their God (cf. further, Ex 6 6-8; 31 13 f; Lev 10 10 11; 11 44; Nu 15 37-41; 33 52 f.55 f; Dt 14 2.21). It is a more than risky undertaking to find in these and in other sections scattered remnants of H, esp. if these are seen to be indispensable in the connection in which they are found, and when no reason can be given why they should be separated from this collection of laws. Then, too, the differences of opinion on the part of the critics in assigning these different parts to H, do not make us favorably inclined to the whole hypothesis. Hoffmann, esp. (Die wichtigsten Instanzen gegen die Graf-Wellhausensche Hypothese, 16 ff), has shown how impossible it is to separate H from the other ordinances of the PC in so radical a manner. In saying this we do not at all wish to deny the peculiar character of these chapters, only we do not believe that ch 17 can be added or ch 26 can be taken away from this section; for in ch 17 all the characteristic peculiarities of the Holiness Law are lacking; and, on the other hand, in ch 26 the expression "I am Jeh your God," or a similar one in vs 12.13 44 f, is found. The subscription in ver 46 connects ch 26 with the preceding; and, further, the reference to the Sabbatical year as described in ch 25, found in 26 34 f. 43, is not to be overlooked. Finally, also, other legal codes, such as that in the first Book of the Covenant (Ex 23 20-33) and that of Dt (27 11-28 68) close with the offer of a blessing or a curse.

The chapters under consideration (Lev 18-26) are most closely connected with each other solely through their contents, which have found expression in a particular form, without these facts being sufficient to justify the claim of their being a separate legal code. For since in chs 1-17 all those things which separate the Israelites from their God have been considered and bridged over (cf chs 1-7, the laws concerning sacrifices; chs 8-10, the mediatorship of the priests; chs 11-15, the unclean things; ch 16, the Day of Atonement; ch 17, the use made of blood), we find in chs 18-26 an account of the God-pleasing conduct, which admits of nothing that desecrates; namely, chs 18-20 contain laws dealing with marriage and chastity and other matters of a religious, ethical or cultural kind, together with the punishments that follow their transgression; chs 21 f determine the true character of the priests and of the sacred oblations; chs 23 f, the consecration of the seasons, of life and death, etc; ch 25, the Sabbath and the Jubilee year; ch 26 contains the offer of a blessing or a curse. Chs 1-17 have, as it were, a negative character; chs 18-26 a positive character. In chs 1-17 the consciousness of what is unclean, imperfect and guilty is awakened and the possibility of their removal demonstrated; while in chs 18-26 the norm of a holy life is set forth. Even if these two parts at certain places show so great a likeness that the occurrence of an interchange of ordinances could be regarded as possible, nevertheless the peculiar character of each part is plainly recognized; and this is also a very essential argument for the view that both parts have one and the same author, who intentionally brought the two parts into closer connection and yet separated the one from the other. On this supposition the peculiarities of chs 18-26 are sufficiently explained, and also the positive contents of these chapters and the fact that just these chapters are referred to in pre-exilic lit. oftener than is the case with chs 1-17, and particularly the close connection between Ezk and H is to be regarded as a consequence of the common tendency of both authors and not as the result of their having used a common source (see EZEKIEL, II, 2). In 26 46 we have what is clearly a conclusion, which corresponds to 25 1; 7 37 f; 1 1, and accordingly regards chs 1-26 as a unity; while ch 27, which treats of vows and of tithes, with its separate subscription in ver 34, shows that it is an appendix or a supplement, which is, however, in many ways connected with the rest of the book, so that this addition cannot, without further grounds, be regarded as pointing to another author.

II. Structure.—Modern criticism ascribes the entire Book of Lev, being a special legal code, to the PC. The questions which arise

1. Modern in connection with this claim will Analyses be discussed under III, below. At this point we must first try to awaken a consciousness of the fact, that in this special particular, too, the documentary theory has entered upon the stage of total disintegration; that the reasons assigned for the separation of the sources are constantly becoming more arbitrary and subjective; and that the absurd consequences to which they consistently lead from the very outset arouse distrust as to the correctness of the process. Just as in the historical parts the critics have for long been no longer content with J (Jahwist) and E (Elohist), but have added a J<sup>1</sup> and J<sup>2</sup>, an E<sup>1</sup> and E<sup>2</sup>, and as Sievers and Gunkel have gone farther, and in detail have completely shattered both J and E into entirely separate fragments (see GENESIS), so P, too, is beginning to experience the same fate. It is high time that, for both the historical and the legal sections, the opposite course be taken, and that we turn from the dismemberment to the combination of these documents; that we seek out and emphasize those features which, in form and content, unite the text into a clear unity. For this reason we lay the greatest stress on these in this section, which deals with the structure of the book, and which treats of the matter (1) negatively and (2) positively (see also Exodus, II).

(1) Theories of disintegration.—We have already seen in the art. DAY OF ATONEMENT (I, 2, [2]) in connection with Lev 16 an example of these attempts at dissection, and here still add several examples in order to strengthen the impression on this subject.

(a) General considerations: If we for the present disregard the details, then, according to Bertholet (Kurzer Hand-Kommentar zum Alten Testament), not only chs 17-23 (see above, under I) at one time existed as a separate legal corpus, but also the sacrificial legislation in chs 1-7, and also the laws concerning the clean and the unclean in chs 11-15. Concerning ch 16 see above. Then, too, ch 27 is regarded as a supplement and is ascribed to a different author. Finally, the so-called "fundamental document" of P (marked Pg) contained only parts from chs 9 f (also a few matters from ch 8), as also one of the three threads of ch 16, for Lev 8-10, it is said, described the consecration of the priests demanded in Ex 25 f, which also are regarded as a part of Pg, and ch 16 1 is claimed to connect again with Lev 10 (cf on this point DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 2). All these separate parts of Lev (i.e. chs 1-7, 8-10, 11-15, 16, 17-23, 27) are further divided into a number of more or less independent subparts; thus, e.g., chs 1-7, containing the sacrificial laws, are made to consist of two parts, viz. chs 1-5 and chs 6-7; or the laws concerning the clean and the unclean in chs 11-15 are divided into the separate pieces, chs 11, 12; 13 1-46; and these are regarded as having existed at one time and in a certain manner independently and separated from each other. But how complicated in detail the composition is considered to be, we can see from chs 17-26.

(b) Chs 17-26 considered in detail: While Baentsch (Hand-Kommentar zum Alten Testament) accepts, to begin with, three fundamental strata (H<sup>1</sup>=chs 18-20 and certain portions from chs 23-25; H<sup>2</sup>=chs 21 f; H<sup>3</sup>=ch 17); Bertholet, too (op. cit., x), regards the development of these chapters as follows: "In detail we feel justified in separating the following pieces: (i) 17 3.4 (5.7a).8.9.10-14; (ii) 18 7-10.12-20.22 f; and this united with (iii) 19 3 1.11 f.27 f.30.31.35.36, which was probably done by the author of (iii). The following were inserted by the person who united these parts, viz. 18 6.27.25.26.28.30; (iv) 19 9.10.13-18.19.29.32; (v) 19 5-8.23-26; (vi) 20 2(3).6(27); (vii) 20 9.10-21; 19 20; (viii) 21 1b-5.7.9-15.17b-24; 22 3.8.10-14.18b-25.27-30; (ix) 23 10-20.39-43; (x) 24 15-22, except vs 16a8b; (xi) 25 2-7 (4).18-22.35-38.39.40a.42 f.47.53.55; (xii) 26 8a.9b.10a.13.14-16.17.24 f. In uniting these pieces Rh (the Redactor of the Law of Holiness) seems to have added de suo the following: 17 5 (beginning); 18 2b-5.21.24.26a.8.29; 19 33f.37; 20 4f.7f.22-26; 21 6.8; 22 2.9.15f.31-33; 23 22; 25 11 f; 26 1 f. At the same time he united with these an older paraneitic section, 26 3-45, which, by inserting vs 10.34 f.39-43, he changed into a concluding address of this small legal code. All the rest that is found in chs 17-26 seems to be the result of a revision in the spirit of P, not, however, as though originally it all came from the hand of Rp (Redactor P). That he rather added and worked together older pieces from P (which did not belong to Pg) is seen from an analysis of ch 23. . . . As far as the time when these parts were worked together is concerned, we have a reliable terminus ad quem in a comparison of Neh 8 14-18 with Lev 23 36 (P). 39 ff (H). Only we must from the outset remember, that still, after the uniting of these different parts, the marks of the editorial pen are to be noticed in the following chs, 17-26, i.e. that after this union a number of additions were yet made to the text. This is sure as far as 23 26-32 is concerned, and is probable as to 24 1-9. 10-14.23; 25 32-34; and that this editorial work even went so far as to put sections from P in the place of parts of H can possibly be concluded from 24 1-9."

(c) Extravagance of critical treatment: This is also true of all the other sections, as can be seen by a reference to the books of Bertholet and Baentsch. What should surprise us most, the complicated and external manner in which our Bib. text, which has such a wonderful history back of it, is declared by the critics to have originated, or the keenness of the critics, who, with the ease of child's play, are able to detect and trace out this growth and development of the text, and can do more than hear the grass grow? But this amazement is thrust into the background when we contemplate what becomes of the Bible text under the manipulations of the critics. The compass of this article makes it impossible to give even as much as a general survey of the often totally divergent and contradictory schemes of Baentsch and Bertholet and others on the distribution of this book among different sources; and still less possible is it to give a criticism of these in detail. But this critical method really condemns itself more thoroughly than any examination of its claims would. All who are not yet entirely hypnotized by the spell of the documentary hypothesis will feel that by this method all genuine scientific research is brought to an end. If the way in which this book originated had been so complicated, it certainly could never have been again reconstructed.

(2) Reasons for dismemberment.—We must at this place confine ourselves to mentioning and discussing several typical reasons which are urged in favor of a distribution among different authors.

(a) Alleged repetitions: We find in the parts belonging to P a number of so-called repetitions. In chs 1-7 we find a twofold discussion of the five kinds of sacrifices (1-5; 6 1 ff); in ch 20 punitive measures are enacted for deeds which had been described already in ch 18; in 19 3.30; 23 3; 26 2 the Sabbath command is intensified; in 19 5 ff; 22 29 f, we find commands which had been touched upon already in 7 15 ff; 19 9 f we find almost verbally repeated in 23 22; 24 2 ff repeats ordinances concerning the golden candlestick from Ex 27 20 ff, etc. The existence of these repetitions cannot be denied; but is the conclusion drawn from this fact correct? It certainly is possible that one and the same author could have handled the same materials at different places and from different viewpoints, as is the case in chs 1-7 in regard to the sacrifices. Chs 18 and 20 (misdeeds and punishments) are even necessarily and mutually supplementary. Specially important laws can have been repeated, in order to emphasize and impress them all the more; or they are placed in peculiar relations or in a unique light (cf, e.g., 24 1 ff, the command in reference to the golden candlestick in the pericope chs 23-24; see below). Accordingly, as soon as we can furnish a reason for the repetition, it becomes unobjectionable; and often, when this is not the case, the objections are unremoved if we ascribe the repetitions to a new author, who made the repetition by way of an explanation (see Exodus, II, 2, [5]).

(b) Separation of materials: Other reasons will probably be found in uniting or separating materials that are related. That ch 16 is connected with chs 8-10, and these connect with Ex 25 ff, is said to prove that this had been the original order in these sections. But why should materials that are clearly connected be without any reason torn asunder by the insertion of foreign data? Or has the interpolator perhaps had reasons of his own for doing this? Why are not these breaks ascribed to the original author? The sacrificial laws in chs 1-7 are properly placed before Lev 8-10, because in these latter chapters the sacrifices are described as already being made (9 7.15, the sin offering; 9 7.12.16, the burnt offering; 9 17; 10 12, the meal offering; 9 18, the peace offering; 9 3 f, all kinds). In the same way chs 11-15, through 15 31, are inwardly connected with Lev 16, since these chapters speak of the defiling of the dwelling-place of Jeh, from which the Day of Atonement delivers (16 16 f 33). As a matter of course, the original writer as well as a later redactor could have at times also connected parts in a looser or more external manner. In this way, in 7 22 ff, the command not to eat of the fats or of the blood has been joined to the ordinances with reference to the use of the peace offerings in 7 19 ff. This again is the case when, in ch 2, vs 11-13 have been inserted in the list of the different kinds of meal offering; when after the general scheme of sin offerings, according to the hierarchical order and rank in ch 4, a number of special cases are mentioned in 5 1 ff; and when in 5 7 ff commands are given to prevent too great poverty; or when in 6 19 ff the priestly meal offerings are found connected with other ordinances with references to the meat offerings in general (6 14 ff); or when the share that belongs to the priest (7 8 ff) is found connected with his claim to the guilt offering (7 1 ff); or the touching of the meat offering by something unclean (7 19 ff) is found connected with the ordinances concerning the peace offerings; or when in ch 11 the ordinances dealing with the unclean animals gradually pass over into ordinances concerning the touching of these animals, as is already indicated by the subscription 11 4.6 f (cf with ver 2). Still more would it be natural to unite different parts in other ways also. In this way the ordinances dealing with the character of the sacrifices in 22 17-30 could, regarded by themselves, be placed also in chs 1-7. But in ch 22 they are also well placed. On the other hand, the character of chs 1-7 would have become too complicated if they were inserted here. In such matters the author must have freedom of action.

(c) Change of singular and plural: Further, the frequent change between the sing. and the pl. in the addresses found in the laws which are given to a body of persons is without further thought used by the critics as a proof of a diversity of authors in the section under consideration (cf 10 12ff; 19 9.11ff.15ff, etc). But how easily this change in numbers can be explained! In case the pl. is used, the body of the people are regarded as having been distributed into individuals; and in the case of a more stringent application the pl. can at once be converted into the sing., since the author is thinking now only of separate individuals. Naturally, too, the sing. is used as soon as the author thinks again rather of the people as a whole. Sometimes the change is made suddenly within one and the same verse or run of thought; and this in itself ought to have banished the thought of a difference of authors in such cases. In the case of an interpolator or redactor, it is from the outset all the more probable that he would have paid more attention to the person used in the addresses than that this would have been done by the original writer, who was completely absorbed by the subject-matter. Besides, such a change in number is frequently found in other connections also; cf in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 22 20-25 29f; 23 9ff; cf Dt 12 2 ff.13ff). In regard to these passages, also, the modern critics are accustomed to draw the same conclusion; and in these cases, too, this is hasty. In the same way the change in the laws from the 3d to the 2d person can best be explained as the work of the lawgiver himself, before whose mind the persons addressed are more vividly present and who, when speaking in the 2d person, becomes personal (cf Lev 2 4 ff with 2 1-3, and also 1 2; 3 17; 6 18.21.25ff).

(d) Proofs of religious development: A greater importance seemingly must be attributed to the reasons based on a difference in the terminology or on contradictions in the laws, as these appear to lead to a religio-historical development. But the following examples are intended to show how all-important it is to be slow in the acceptance of the materials which the critics offer in this connection.

(3) Insufficiency of these reasons.—(a) In 5 1-7, in the section treating of the sin offering (4 1-5 13), we find the word ashām, which also signifies "guilt offering" (cf vs 14ff; 7 1ff). Accordingly, it is claimed, the author of 5 1-7 was not yet acquainted with the difference between the two kinds of offerings, and that this part is older than that in 4 1ff; 5 14ff. However, in 5 1ff the word ashām is evidently used in the sense of "repentance," and does not signify "sin offering" at all; at any rate, already in vs 6f we find the characteristic term hattāth to designate the latter, and thus this section appears as entirely in harmony with the connection.

(b) Critics find a contradiction in 6 26; 7 33.7, and in 6 29; 7 31.6, since in the first case the officiating priest and in the other case the entire college of priests is described as participating in the sacrifice. In reply it is to be said that the first set of passages treat of the individual concrete cases, while the second set speak of the general principle. In 7 8f, however, where the individual officiating priest is actually put in express contrast with all the sons of Aaron, the matter under consideration is a difference in the meal offerings, which, beginning with ch 2, could be regarded as known. Why this difference is made in the use of this sacrifice is no longer intelligible to us, as we no longer retain these sacrifices, nor are we in possession of the oral instruction which possibly accompanied the written formulation of these laws; but this is a matter entirely independent of the question as to the author.

(c) According to Ex 29 7; Lev 4 3.5.16; 6 20.22; 8 12; 16 32; 21 10.12, the high priest is the only one who is anointed; while, on the other hand, in Ex 28 41; 29 21; 30 30; 40 15; Lev 7 36; 10 7, all the priests are anointed. But the text as it reads does not make it impossible that there was a double anointing. According to the first set of passages, Aaron is anointed in such a manner that the anointing oil is poured out upon his head (cf esp. Ex 29 7 and Lev 8 12). Then, too, he and all his sons are anointed in such a way that a mixture of the oil and of the blood is sprinkled upon them and on their garments (cf esp. Ex 29 21 and Lev 8 30). Were we here dealing with a difference in reference to the theory and the ranks of the priesthood, as these discussions were current at the time of the exile (see III, below), then surely the victorious party would have seen to it that their views alone would have been reproduced in these laws, and the opposing views would have been suppressed. But now both anointings are found side by side, and even in one and the same chapter!

(d) The different punishments prescribed for carnal intercourse with a woman during her periods in 15 24 and 20 18 are easily explained by the fact that, in the first passage, the periods are spoken of which only set in during the act, and in the second passage, those which had already set in before.

(e) As far as the difference in terminology is concerned, it must be remembered that in their claims the critics either overlook that intentional differences may decide the preference for certain words or expressions; or else they ignore the fact that it is possible in almost every section of a writer's work to find some expressions which are always, or at least often, peculiar to him; or finally, they in an inexcusable way ignore the freedom of selection which a writer has between different synonyms or his choice in using these.

All in all, it must be said that however much we acknowledge the keenness and the industry of the modern critics in clearing up many difficulties, and the fact that they bring up many questions that demand answers, it nevertheless is the fact that they take the matter of solving these problems entirely too easily, by arbitrarily claiming different authors, without taking note of the fact that by doing this the real difficulty is not removed, but is only transferred to another place. What could possibly be accepted as satisfactory in one single instance, namely that through the thoughtlessness of an editor discrepancies in form or matter had found their way into the text, is at once claimed to be the regular mode of solving these difficulties—a procedure that is itself thoughtlessness. On the other hand, the critics overlook the fact that it makes little difference for the religious and the ethical value of these commands, whether logical, systematic, linguistic or aesthetic correctness in all their parts has been attained or not; to which must yet be added, that a failure in the one particular may at the same time be an advantage in the other. In this respect we need recall only the anacoluths of the apostle Paul.

(1) Structure in general.—The most effective antidote against the craze to split up the text in the manner described above will be

2. Structure found in the exposition of all those of the features which unite this text into Biblical one inseparable whole. What we have Text tried to demonstrate in the arts.

GENESIS; EXODUS, II; DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 2 (cf also EZEKIEL, I, 2, [2]) can be repeated at this point. The Book of Lev shows all the marks of being a well-constructed and organic literary product, which in its fundamental characteristics has already been outlined under I above. And as this was done in the several articles just cited, we can here add further, as a confirmatory factor in favor of the acceptance of an inner literary unity of the book, that the division of the book into its logical parts, even down to minute details, is here, as is so often the case elsewhere, not only virtually self-evident in many particulars, but that the use made of typical numbers in many passages in this adjustment of the parts almost forces itself upon our recognition. In other places the same is at least suggested, and can be traced throughout the book without the least violence to the text. The system need not be forced upon the materials. We often find sections but loosely connected with the preceding parts (cf under 1 above) and not united in a strictly logical manner, but which are nevertheless related in thought and association of ideas. In harmony with the division of the Book of Gen we find at once that the general contents, as mentioned under I above, easily fall into 10 pericopes, and it is seen that these consist of 2 sets each of 5 pericopes together with an appendix.

(a) Ten pericopes in two parts: Part I, the separation from God and the removal of this separation: (i) chs 1-7; (ii) chs 8-10; (iii) chs 11-15; (iv) ch 16; (v) ch 17.

Part II, the normal conduct of the people of God: (i) chs 18-20; (ii) chs 21-22; (iii) chs 23-24; (iv) ch 25; (v) ch 26.

Appendix, ch 27; cf for the number 10 the division of Ex 1 8-7 7; 7 8-13 16; 13 17-18 27; also the Decalogue, 20 1ff; 21 1-23 19; 32 1-35 1; and see EXODUS, II, 2; and in Lev probably 18 6-18; 19 9-18, and with considerable certainty 19 1-37 (see below).

(b) Correspondence and connections: I leave out of consideration in this case the question whether an intentional correspondence among the different parts be traced or not, even in their details. Thus, e.g., when the 2d pericope (chs 8-10 and 21f) treats particularly of the order of the priests, or when the 4th pericope of the 2d set (ch 25) states that the beginning of the Year of Jubilee fell on the 10th day of the 7th month, i.e. on the Day of Atonement as described in Lev 16, in the 4th pericope of the 1st set (cf 25 9 with 16 29); or when both sets close with two shorter pericopes, which evidently express high stages of development (chs 16 and 17, respectively, chs 25 and 26 treating of the Day of Atonement, of the use made of blood and the purposes of blood for the altar or the Jubilee Year, of the blessing and the curse).

And, as far as the order in other respects is concerned, it is throughout to be regarded as founded in the subject-matter itself that chs 1-17 must precede chs 18-26. First that which separates the people from God must be removed, and then only is a God-pleasing conduct possible. Just as easily, and in agreement with the context, it is possible that the consecration of the priests in chs 8-10 presupposes the sacrificial tōrah (chs 1-7; cf under 1 above) and follows the latter, and is immediately introduced by the mention made of the installation sacrifices for which otherwise there are no reasons assigned in the concluding formula in 7 37 (cf 8 22-32). The Day of Atonement (ch 16), which in vs 16 f and 33 is spoken of in connection with the purification of the sanctuary, is in turn introduced by chs 11-15, or more particularly by the remark in 15 31, where mention is made of the pollution of the dwelling-place of Jeh. And on the other hand, the ordinances dealing with the priests (chs 8-10) in 10 10, where the command is given to discriminate between what is holy and what is unholy and to teach Israel accordingly, already point to the contents of chs 11-15. The sacrifices, with which the first part in chs 1-7 begins, are taken up again by the conclusion in ch 17, in the commandment concerning the blood for the altar. The second part, too, already at the beginning (chs 18-20) in its religiously cultural and ethical ordinances, shows in the clearest possible manner what matters it proposes to discuss. In this way the systematic structure of the book is apparent in all particulars.

Close connections: comparison with Ex: And, further, the different pericopes are also so closely connected among themselves and with the corresponding pericopes in the books of Ex and Nu, that many have thought it necessary to regard them as a special body of laws. But the connection is so close and involves all the details so thoroughly, that all efforts to divide and distribute them after the examples described under 1 above must fail absolutely. We shall now give the proofs for the different pericopes in Lev, but in such a manner as to take into consideration also Ex 25-31; 35 ff, treating of the tabernacle and its utensils and the Aaronitic priesthood, which are most intimately connected with Lev. All details in this matter will be left out of consideration.

(a) Tabernacle and priesthood: That Lev 8-10 (the consecration of the priests, etc.), together with Ex 25 ff, constitutes a single whole is accepted on all hands. But the tent of meeting and its utensils, and also the priesthood, both with and without any emphasis on the Aaronitic origin, are presupposed also in almost each one of the other pericopes of Lev: cf for chs 1-7, e.g., 1 3.5; 2 8.13; 4 4.5.7.14.16.18; 6 26 (tent of meeting); 1 5.12; 3 5; 4 7.25.30; 6 12 (altar of burnt sacrifices); 4 7.18 (altar of incense sacrifices); 4 6.17 (vessels); 6 9.19 (court); 1 5.7.8.11; 2 2; 3 2.5.8.13; 6 9.14.16.20.25, etc. (Aaron and his sons as priests); for chs 11-15 see 12 4.6; 14 11.23; 15 14.29.31 (sanctuary, tent of meeting, dwelling-place); 11 1; 12 6 f; 13 1 f; 14 2 ff.33 ff; 15 1 (priesthood); for ch 16 see vs 2.7.16f.20.23.33 (sanctuary and Holy of Holies, tent of meeting); 16 2.12 (vessels); 16 2.13 ff (lid of the Ark of the Covenant); 16 12.18.20.33 (altar); 16 1 ff (Aaronitic priesthood); for ch 17 see vs 4-6.9 (tent of meeting); vs 6.11 (altar); ver 5 (priesthood); for chs 18-20 see 18 30.21 (sanctuary of Jeh, tent of meeting); 19 22

(priesthood); for ch 21 f see 21 12 (sanctuary); 21 23 (sanctuaries of Jeh); 21 23 (vessels, altar); 21 1 ff.21 (Aaronitic priesthood); for chs 23, 24 see 23 2.4.21.24.27.36 f (sanctuary); 24 1 ff (candlestick, tent of meeting); 24 5 ff (table of showbread); 23 10.20 (priesthood); 24 3.9 (Aaronitic priesthood); for ch 26 see vs 2.11.31 (sanctuary, dwelling-place of Jeh, sanctuaries); for ch 27 see vs 10.33 (sanctuary); vs 8 ff (priesthood).

(β) In the same way the sacrificial laws of chs 1-7 are mentioned in the following pericopes as matters that are well known. For chs 8-10 see 9 7.15 (sin offering); 9 7.12.16 (burnt offering); 9 17; 10 12 (meal offering); 9 18 (peace offering); 9 3 f (all together); cf also Ex 29 14.18.28. In Lev 9 21; 10 14 f (wave-breads and heave-thigh) direct reference is made to 7 30-36. In the same manner 10 16 f presupposes the ordinances dealing with the different ways of offering the sin offerings in 4 3 ff.13 ff; 6 24-30; for chs 11-15 see 12 6 f; 14 12 ff (cf esp. 14 13 with 4 24); 14 21 ff; 15 14 f; 29 f; for ch 16 see vs 3.5 f.9.11.15.24 f.27; for ch 17 see vs 5 ff.8.11; for chs 18-20 see 19 6 ff.21 f (here is therefore the ‘āshām found in H, which is claimed to be of a later date); for ch 21 f see 21 6.21 f; 22 17 ff.29 f; for chs 23, 24 see 23 12 f; 18 19.27.37; 24 9; for ch 26 see vs 30 f; for ch 27 cf vs 15.19.27.31 with 5 16; 6 5.

(γ) Laws on clean and unclean: The laws in reference to the clean and the unclean in chs 11-15 are also interwoven with the whole book. For chs 1-7 see 2 2 f; 6 27; 7 19 ff; for chs 8-10 see 10 10 f; for ch 16 see vs 16.19; for ch 17 see vs 13.15 f; for chs 18-20 cf 20 25 with 11 44, and in general with ch 11; for chs 21 f see 21 10; 13 45; 22 3 ff with chs 13-15; for ch 27 see vs 11 and 27, as also ch 11.

(δ) The laws in reference to the Day of Atonement found in Lev 16 are prepared for by those found in chs 11-15, viz. in 14 4 ff.49 ff (the ceremony with the two birds in connection with the purification from leprosy), and in 15 31 (cf 16 16.19; see above). For chs 23, 24 cf 23 26 ff with 16 29 ff, and for 25 9 with 16 29 see above; cf also Ex 30 10.

(ε) Ch 17 is repeated in chs 1-7 (7 26 f) and in chs 18-20 (19 26).

(ζ) Finally ch 25 (Year of Rest and Year of Jubilee) is presupposed in ch 26 (vs 34 f.43) and in ch 27 (vs 17 ff.23 f).

The above, however, by no means exhausts this list of references and similar thoughts, and we have here given only some leading illustrations. What literary tricks must be resorted to when, over against this overwhelming mass of evidence, critics yet insist that the different parts of the book were originally independent writings, esp., too, when the entire tabernacle and utensils of the Aaronitic priesthood, the Day of Atonement, the Year of Jubilee, the whole sacrificial scheme and the laws dealing with the great festivals, the restriction of the slaying of the sacrificial animals to the central sanctuary, are regarded as the products of imagination alone, according to the Wellhausen hypothesis (cf III, below, and see also EXODUS, III, 5; DAY OF ATONEMENT, III, 1; EZEKIEL, II, 2). And how little is gained in addition when, as is sometimes done, in a most arbitrary manner, the statements found in chs 1-3 concerning the tabernacle of revelation ("tent of meeting") and concerning Aaron's sons, or concerning Aaron and his sons together, are regarded as later additions. In Lev and Ex 25 ff, 35 ff, everything is so entirely of one and the same character and has so clearly emanated from one and the same spirit, that it is impossible to separate from this product any constituent parts and to unite these into groups that were originally independent, then to split up these still further and to trace the parts to their sources, and even to construct a scheme of religious and historical development on this reconstruction of the sources.

(2) Structure of the individual pericopes.—As the windows and the column capitals of a mediaeval cathedral are arranged according to different schemes and this divergence is regarded as an enrichment of the structure, thus, too, we find it to be in the structure of the various pericopes of the Book of Lev. These latter, too, possess a certain symphony of different tones, but all are rhythmically arranged, and only when united do they produce the entire symphony.

(a) The laws concerning the sacrifices (Lev 1-

7): In the first place, the five different kinds of sacrifices in Israel are mentioned in succession twice, in 1 1—7 21: Part I, chs 1-5, namely (i) ch 1, burnt offerings; (ii) ch 2, meal offering; (iii) ch 3, peace offerings; (iv) 4 1-5 13, sin offering; (v) 5 14-26, guilt offering; Part II, 6 1-7 21, namely (i) 6 8-13, burnt offerings; (ii) 6 14-23, meal offering; (iii) 6 24-30, sin offering; (iv) 7 1-7 with appendix, vs 8-10, dealing with that part of the sacrifices which belongs to the priest (see under 1, above), guilt offering; (v) 7 11-21, peace offerings. With this is found connected in 7 22-27 the prohibition of the use of the fat or the blood, and in 7 28-36, the laws concerning the wave-breast and the heave-thigh. We have accordingly at once twelve of these laws (cf on Ex 25 1-30 10 in art. on EXODUS, II, 2, [5] and on EZEKIEL, I, 2, [5]). But even apart from this we have no right to ascribe chs 1-5 and 6 1-7 21, on the ground that they are duplicates, to different authors.

That there is a difference between these two accounts is proved, not only by the fact that the first set of laws from chs 1-5 is addressed to all the Israelites (cf 1 2; 4 2), and the second set 6 8: 7 21 to Aaron and his sons (cf 6 9.25); but the second set has also in content a number of altogether different viewpoints as compared with the first set, so that the same author found himself induced or compelled to write both sets. On the other hand, the fact that both have the same author is evident from the very close connection between the two sections. In addition to the fact that both make mention of all five kinds of sacrifices, we can yet compare 3 5 with 6 22 (fat pieces of the peace offering over the burnt sacrifices upon the pieces of wood); and, further, the express reference of 6 17 to ch 4, while 6 30 presupposes the distinct separation of the sin offering, the blood of which is brought into the tent of meeting, from the other sacrifices, as these are given in 4 3 ff. 13 ff over against 4 22 ff. 27 ff. Ch 4, with its reference to the peace offerings (vs 10 26.31.35), is again most closely connected with ch 3. We must accordingly insist that the whole account is most intimately interwoven. Over against this, the omission within the first set, chs 1-5, in 5 14-16, of the ritual for the peace offering, is sufficiently explained only by the fact that this ritual was to be used in the second set (6 8-7 21), and here for the first time only in 7 1-15, which fact again speaks for the same author for both sets and against the supposition that they were merely mechanically united by a redactor. The fact that the second set 6 8-7 21 has a different order from that of chs 1-5, by uniting the sin offering immediately with the meal offering (6 24 ff with vs 14-23), is probably on account of the similar ordinances in 7 9 and 7 19 (manner of eating the meal offering and the sin offering). On the other hand, the position of the peace offering at the close of the second set (7 11 ff) furnished the possibility of giving to the piece of the entire pericope embraced in 7 22-27 28-36 a suitable conclusion; since 7 22 ff (prohibition of the eating of the fat and the blood), connected with 7 19 ff, contained in 7 28 ff an ordinance that pertained to the peace offering (heave-breast and wave-thigh). At any rate, these last two pieces are to be regarded separately from the rest, since they are no longer addressed to the priests, as is 6 8-7 21, but to all Israel; cf 7 23.29. On some other data less intimately connected with the matter, cf above under 1.

(b) Consecration of priests and related matters (Lev 8-10): In this pericope, as in the following, down to ch 17 inclusive, but esp. from ch 11 on, the principle of division on the basis of the number four predominates, in many cases in the details, too; so that this could scarcely be regarded as an accidental feature (cf also the history of Abraham in Gen 12-26; further, in Ex 35 4-40 38; and in Exodus, II, 2, [7]; Lev 16, under DAY OF ATONEMENT, I, 2, [1]); Dt 12-26, too, is probably to be divided on this principle, even to the minutest details (cf finally Lev 21-22 16; 22 17-30; chs 23 f and 26).

(i) Ch 8, treating of the first seven days of the consecration of the priests: The outline is found in ver 2, namely Aaron, the sacred garments, the anointing oil, the bullock of the sin offering, two rams, unleavened bread (cf vs 6.7 ff. 10 ff. 14 ff. 18 ff. 22 ff. 26 ff). (ii) Ch 9 the first sacrifices of Aaron and his sons on the 8th day (vs 2-4 contain the outline, after the manner of 8 2; cf vs 7 ff. 11 ff, the sin offering and the burnt offering of Aaron, with ver 2; also vs 15-18, treating of what the people brought for the sacrifices, with vs 3 f; but it is to be noticed that the meal offering and the peace offering [vs 17.18] are given in inverted order from that found in vs 3 f). Here too we find the number seven, if we add the burnt offering for the morning (ver 17). (iii) 10 1-7, the sin of Nadab and Abihu and their punishment by death; (iv) 10 8-20, ordinances concerning the priests, occasioned by 8 1-10 7 and provided with a new superscription in 10 8, namely (a) 10 8, dealing with the prohibition of the use of wine and intoxicants; (β) 10 9 f, distinction between the holy and the unholy; (γ) 10 12-15, the eating of the sacred oblations; (δ) 10 16-20, the treatment of the goat for the sin offering.

(c) Laws concerning the clean and unclean (Lev 11-15): (i) ch 11, treating of clean and unclean animals. The outline of the chief contents is found in 11 46 with a free transposition of one number. There are accordingly four pieces, viz. (a) vs 2-8, quadrupeds; (β) vs 9-12, water animals; (γ) vs 13-23, birds (with an appendix, treating of contact with the unclean, vs 24-28, which give a summary of the animals mentioned [a+γ]; see under 1); (δ) vs 29-45, the small animals upon the earth (again in four subdivisions, viz. [i] vs 29-38; [ii] vs 39 ff; [iii] vs 41 f; [iv] vs 44 f).

(ii) Ch 12 treats of women in confinement, also in four pieces (vs 2-4, birth of a male child; ver 5, birth of a female child; vs 6 f, purification ceremony; ver 8, ordinances in case of extreme poverty). These parts are not joined logically, but in a rather external manner.

(iii) The passage 13 1-14 53, containing the laws of leprosy, with the subscription in 14 54 ff. (Because seven points are to be enumerated, ver 55 [garments and houses], this is not as in its further exposition separated from the other laws and is placed in their midst.) The exposition contains four pieces, viz. (a) 13 1-44, leprosy on human beings (with concluding verses, 45 f), with seven subdivisions, of which the first five longer ones are constructed along fairly parallel lines, and again can be divided into four sub-subdivisions, viz. vs 1-8; 9-17; 18-23; 24-28; 29-37; 38 f; 40-44. The significance of the number seven for the structure (see [2], [b], i, above) is akin to that found, e.g., in Ex 24 18b-31 18 (see Exodus, II, 2, [5]); Lev 8, 9 (see above); Lev 23, 25, and 27; and possibly 26 3-13.14-39 (see below); finally, the whole Book of Ex is divided into seven parts (see Exodus, II, 1). (β) 13 47-59, leprosy in connection with garments, with four subdivisions, namely vs 47-50; 51 f; 53 f; 55 ff. The last subdivision can again be readily separated into four sub-subdivisions, viz. vs 55; 56; 57; 58. (γ) 14 1-32, purifications (ver 2 being a special superscription), with 4 subdivisions, viz. (i) vs 2b-3a, the leper before the priest; (ii) vs 3b-9, the purification ceremonies on the first seven days, again divided into 4 sub-subdivisions: vs 3b f; 5-7; 8; 9; (iii) vs 10-20, the ceremony of the eighth day (4 sacrifices, namely vs 12-18, guilt offering; ver 19a, sin offering; ver 19b, burnt offering; ver 20, meal offering; in the 4 sacrifices (5 12-6 7) there are again 4 different actions: vs 14; 15 f; 17; 18; (iv) vs 21-32 (in cases of poverty). (δ) 14 33-53, leprosy in houses, with four subdivisions: vs 33-35; 36-38; 39-42; 43-53.

(iv) Ch 15, sickness or natural issues, with 4 subdivisions, viz. (a) 15 1-15, checked or running issues together with their purification (vs 3-12 contain 12 laws: vs 3; 4a; 4b; 5; 6; 7; 8; 9; 10a; 10b; 11; 12); (β) vs 16-18, issue of seed; (γ) vs 19-24, periods; (δ) vs 25-30, other flows of blood and their purification.  $\alpha + \beta$  refer to men and  $\gamma + \delta$  to women; and in addition to these implied suggestions, as  $\alpha + \delta$  to dealing with abnormal issues and their purification ceremonies,  $\beta + \gamma$  with normal issues.

(d) The Day of Atonement (Lev 16): See IV, 1, (2), 2, and under ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

(e) Uses and significance of the blood of sacrifices (Lev 17): (i) Vs 3-7, only one place for killing the sacrifices and the rejection of all foreign cultures; (ii) vs 8.9, only one place for sacrificing; (iii) vs 10-14, prohibitive of eating the blood; (iv) ver 15, pertaining to carcasses of animals found dead or which have been torn by wild beasts.

Here the form and the contents of the section have been brought into perfect harmony by the author. Vs 3 ff. 8ff. 10 ff. 13 ff. begin with same words, and each contains a similar formula in reference to the punishment, while logically vs 10 ff and 13 ff are evidently only subdivisions of the third part in vs 10-14, which treats of the prohibition of eating blood. In the fourth division, again, while in substance connected with the rest, there is lacking the formal agreement with the first three divisions.

(f) (g) (Lev 18-20, 21): These naturally fall each into 2 parts. Chs 18-20 contain (i) chs 18 f, religious and ethical laws; (ii) ch 20, laws dealing with punishments.

(f.i) Religious and ethical laws (chs 18 f): (a) ch 18: Ordinances with reference to marriage and chastity. (a) 18 1-5, introductory; (b) vs 6-18, prohibition of marriage between kindred of blood; (c) vs 19-23, prohibition of other sexual sins; (d) vs 24-30, warnings.

The subdivision (b) can perhaps be divided into 10 subordinate parts, if it is permitted to combine the different degrees of relationship mentioned in vs 12-14 (viz. 7.8.9.10.11.12-14.15.16.17.18). Since (c) of itself manifestly consists of 5 ordinances (vs 19.20.21.22.23), this whole section, if we are permitted to divide (a) into 5 commandments (vs 2.3a.3b.4.5) and (b) also into 5 (vs 24 f. 26-28.29.30a.30b), would contain 5x5 words; but this is uncertain.

(b) Ch 19: various commands of the deepest significance. In order to discover the divisions of this chapter we must note the characteristic formula, "I am Jeh, your God," or a similar expression, which often appears at the beginning and at the end of certain divisions, e.g. in series (1) (9) and (10), but which in the middle series appears in each case only once, and which in all the series is found also at the conclusion.

In this way we can compute 10 tetralogues. Thus after the superscription in ver 2 containing a summary, we have (i) vs 3.4 (vs 3a.3b.4a.4b); (ii) vs 5-10 (vs 5 f. 7 f. 9.10); (iii) vs 11 f (vs 11a.11b.11b.12); (iv) vs 13 f (vs 13a.13b.14a.14b); (v) vs 15 f (vs 15a.15b.16a.16b); (vi) vs 17 f (vs 17a.17b.18a.18b); (vii) vs 19-25 (vs 19a.19b.20-22.23-25); (viii) vs 26-28 (vs 26a.26b.27.28); (ix) 29-32 (vs 29.30.31.32); (x) vs 33-36 (vs 33.34.35.36); ver 37 constitutes the conclusion of the whole. (Note that the number ten here is certain in the conviction of the present writer; but he is not quite so sure of the number of subdivisions within the main divisions; we may have to do here with pentalogues and not with tetralogues. If this is the case, then the agreements with ch 18 would under certain circumstances be even greater.)

Possibly groupings of two can yet form a closer union (cf on Ex 1-18, 21-23, Exodus, II, 2, [1-4]). At any rate (iii) and (iv) can be summarized under the general heading of defrauding one's neighbors; (v) and (vi) under that of observation of the laws; (vii) and (viii) under that of heathen abuses; while (ix) and (x) perhaps intentionally mingle together the religious and cultural and ethical elements, in order thereby already to express that all these things are most intimately connected (but cf also vs 12.14. 17, in the middle sections). In vs 5 ff. 20 ff. 23 ff, the author develops his subject somewhat more fully.

in such close relation to the contents of ch 18 and to parts of ch 19, that it is absolutely incomprehensible how the critics can assign these three chapters to different authors. Even if certain regulations of ch 18 are not found here in ch 20 (vs 7.10.17b.18), and even if another order has been followed, this variation, which doubtless also hangs together with a new grouping of the materials, is rather an advantage than a disadvantage for the whole. It is impossible to conceive that a redactor would have altered anything in two entirely parallel and similar texts, or would himself have written a parallel text differing from the other. Ch 20 can probably be divided into 4 parts, viz. (i) vs 1-8, punishments for idolatry and witchcraft with a concluding formula, vs 7 f; (ii) vs 9-18, punishment of death for ten crimes, all of which, with the exception of the first, are of a sexual nature (vs 9-18). It is a question whether the first in the second group (ver 14), i.e. the sixth in the whole series, was intended to be made prominent by the peculiar character of the punishment (burning to death); (iii) vs 19-21, other sexual sins, with lighter punishments; (iv) vs 22-27, with 4 subdivisions (warning, vs 22 f; promise, ver 24; emphatic repetitions of two commands already given, vs 25 f; [cf with 11 44 ff, and in general with ch 11]; and ver 27 with 19 26.31; 20 6). Perfectly certain in this chapter is the fact that the different kinds of punishments are likewise decisive for their order. It is doubtless not to be regarded as accidental that both at the beginning and at the end death by stoning is mentioned.

(g) (Lev 21 1-22 33): (i) Laws concerning the quality of the priests (21 1-22.16); and (ii) concerning sacred oblations (22 17-30) with the subscription vs 31-33.

(g.i) Qualities of priests: 21 1-22 16 in four sections (21 1 ff 10 ff.16 ff; 22 1 ff; note also in 21 18-20 the 12 blemishes; in 22 4-8 the 7 cases of uncleanness).

(g.ii) Sacred oblations: 22 17-30 in four sections (22 18-20.21-25.26-28.29 f).

(h) Consecration of seasons, etc (chs 23, 24): (i) ch 23, laws for the feasts (7 sections, viz. vs 3. 4 f. 6-14.15-22.23-25.26-32.33-36, with the appendix that in every particular suits the connection, in vs 39 ff, added to the feast of the tabernacles); (ii) 24 1-4, treating of the sacred candlestick, which represents the moral conduct of the Israelites, and for this reason suits admirably in the connection; as this is true also of (iii) 24 5-9, treating of the shewbread, which represents the results of the labor of Israel; (iv) 24 10-23, containing the report of the punishment of a blasphemer of God and of one who cursed.

Probably the example was made of a person who took the name of God in vain at the time which this chapter describes. But possibly there is a still closer connection to be found with that which precedes. The shewbread and the candlestick were found in the holy place, which with its utensils pictured the relation of Israel's character to their God; while the utensils in the Holy of Holies indicated God's relation to His people (cf Hengstenberg, Beitrage, III, 644 ff). But since the holy place, in addition to the shewbread and the candlestick, contained only the incense altar, which symbolized the prayers of Israel, and as the blasphemer represents the exact opposite of prayer, it is probable that in 24 10 ff prayer is indicated by its counterpart. This section consists of 4 parts, viz. vs 10-12; 13-14; 15-22 (giving a series of punishments for certain wrongdoings which are more or less closely connected with that found in the text); ver 23.

(i) Sabbatic and Jubilee years (ch 25): Sabbatic and Jubilee years in 7 sections, viz. vs 1-7; 8-12; 13-28; 29-34; 35-38; 39-46; 47-55.

(j) Conclusion: Curse and blessing (ch 26): The grand concluding chapter, offering a curse and a blessing and containing all the prophetic utterances of later times in a nutshell, viz. (i) vs 1-2, repetition of four important demands (vs 1a.1b.2a.2b); (ii) 26 3-13, the blessing, possibly to be divided into 7 stages, one more spiritual than the other; (iii) 26 4-39, the curse, possibly to be divided into seven stages, one more intense than the other (cf also the play on words 7 times repeated, in reference to shabbāth, possibly found in vs 34 f, and certainly found in vs 18.21.24.27 f); (iv) 26 40-45, the mercy finally shown by Jeh for His covenant's sake.

(k) Appendix: Finally, the appendix in ch 27, dealing with vows and tithes, in 7 parts, viz. vs 1-8; 9-13; 14-15; 16-21; 26 f; 28-29; 30-33.

III. Origin.—As in the art. ATONEMENT, DAY OF, I, 2, (2), we took a stand against the modern attempts at splitting up the text, and in III, 1

1. Against the Wellhausen Hypothesis—of the whole pericope, we must, after trying under II to prove the unity of the Book of Lev, yet examine the modern claim that the book as a whole is the product of later times. Since the entire book is ascribed to the PC (see II, 1 above), the answer to the question as to the time when it was written will depend on the attitude which we take toward the Wellhausen hypothesis, which insists that the PC was not published until the time of the exile in 444 BC (Neh 8-10).

(1) Argument from silence.—One of the most important proofs for this claim is the "argument from silence" (argumentum e silentio). How careful one must be in making use of this argument can be seen from the fact that, e.g., the high priest with his full title is mentioned but a single time in the entire Book of Lev, namely in 21 10; and that the Levites are not mentioned save once (25 32 ff), and then incidentally. As is well known, it is the adherents of the Wellhausen hypothesis themselves who now claim that the bulk of the entire literature of the OT originated in the post-exilic period and long after the year 444 BC. Leaving out of consideration for the present the Books of Ch, Ezr and Neh, all of which describe the history of Israel from the standpoint of P, we note that this later literature is not any richer in its references to P than is the older literature; and that in those cases where such references are found in this literature assigned to a late period, it is just as difficult to decide whether these passages refer merely to a custom or to a codified set of laws.

(2) Attitude of prophets toward sacrificial system.—A further proof against the pre-exilic origin of the priestly legislation is found in what is claimed to be the hostile attitude of the prophets to the sacrificial system (cf Am 5 21 ff; 4 4 f; Hos 6 6; Mic 6 6 ff; Isa 1 11 ff; Jer 6 20; 7 21 ff; Ps 40 6; 50 8.9; 51 16 f). But this cannot possibly be an absolute antithesis; for in this case, it would be directed also against the Books of the Covenant and, in part, too, against Dt, which books in Ex 20 24; 22 19; 23 18; 34 25; Dt 12 5 f.11.13.17.26; 15 19-23; 16 2.5 f; 17 1; 18 1.3 also give directions for sacrifices, and which, at least in part, are yet regarded as older writings. Further, these passages under discussion are also, in part, assigned to a later and even a very late period (cf even such cases as Ps 40 6; 50 8 f; 51 16 f; Mic 6 6 ff, and in addition also Mal 1 10), i.e. they are assigned to a time in which, according to the views of the critics, the priestly laws are said to have had their origin or were already regarded as authoritative. As a rule, the prophets make sacrifices, Sabbaths, sacred places and persons a part of their pictures of the future; cf, as far as sacrifices are concerned, e.g. Jer 17 26; 31 14; 33 14 ff. Finally, Lev 26 31 shows how, under certain circumstances, even P can declare sacrifices to be useless.

(3) The people's disobedience.—Further, the transgressions of the Levitical laws in the course of Israel's history cannot be regarded as a proof of the non-existence of the priestly legislation in pre-exilic times. This is clear from an analogous case. Idolatry was forbidden by the Books of the Covenant (Ex 20-24; 34), which are recognized as ancient documents; but according to 2 K 22 the pious king Josiah down to the year 622 BC takes no offence at idolatry. Even after the reformation, which had been inaugurated in consequence of the finding of the Book of the Law in the temple during the reign of Josiah (2 K 22 f), idolatry was again practised in Israel, as is proved by Ezk 8 and Jer 44, notwithstanding that the Books of the Covenant and Dt already were extant at that time, even according to the views of the critics.

But let us pass on to P itself, and not forget that the directions given for the Jubilee Year (Lev 25), according to Jewish tradition, were never actually observed. According to the reasoning of the critics, this law could not be in existence even in the present day. According to all reports the transgressions of the Divine ordinances began even as early as the Mosaic period; cf Ex 32 (J, E, golden calf); Am 5 25; Ezk 20; Dt 12 8 and also Lev 17 7 (sacrifice to the Satyrs in PC). This condition of affairs can readily be understood because the religion of Jeh does not claim to be an emanation from the spirit of the people, but the result of a revelation from on high. In the light of these facts can we be surprised, that in the times of the Judges, when a great prophetic leader was so often not to be found in Israel, the apostasy was so great and so widespread? But all of these cases of disobedience, that have been demonstrated as actual facts in Israel's history, are not able to eliminate the fact that there are many data to prove the existence of a central sanctuary already in the earliest history of the people, which fact presupposes as a matter of course that there were also laws for the cultus in existence (see Exodus, III, 5). We must further not forget how the sacrifices of the sons of Samuel (1 S 2 11 ff), notwithstanding all their arbitrary conduct, presupposes such passages as Lev 7 30-32; 10 15; Ex 29 31 f; Lev 6 31; Nu 6 19 f; Lev 7 23-32; or that the high priest, as described in PC, is already before the year 444 BC as well-known a character as he is after the exile (cf EZEKIEL, II, 2); or that the question of Hag 2 11 f takes into consideration a code of cultus-laws, and that the answer is given on the basis of Lev 6 27; Nu 19 22.

(4) Indiscriminate sacrificing.—To this must be added that the transgressions, to which the critics appeal in proof of their claims, and which they abuse for their own purposes, must in part be interpreted differently from what they are. In the case of sacrificing indiscriminately at any place whatever, and by any person whatever, we have in many cases to deal with extraordinary instances of theophanies (cf Jgs 2 1 f; 6 11 f; 13 1 f), as these had been foreseen in Ex 20 24. Even the Book of Dt does not insist throughout (cf 16 21) that the sacrifices must be made at one and the same place (cf also PC: Lev 24 31; Josh 22). After the rejection of Shiloh, at which the central sanctuary had been deposited, as recorded in 1 S 4, the cultural ordinances of PC, as we learn from Jer 7 11 ff; 26 6; Ps 78 59 ff, became more or less a dead letter. Even the Books of Ch, which throughout record history from the standpoint of the PC, at this period and down to the dedication of the temple take no offence at the cultural acts of a Solomon in contrast with their attitude toward the conduct of Uzziah (see 2 Ch 1 6; 6 1-4; 7 1-7, as compared with 26 16 ff). In the same way the pious people in the Northern Kingdom, after it had, by Divine consent, been separated from the Southern, could not do otherwise than erect altars for themselves, since they could not participate in the worship of the calves in Bethel and Dan. Further, modern criticism overlooks the fact that what is regular and normal is much less liable to be reported in historical narrative than that which is irregular and abnormal.

(5) Dt and PC, etc.—It is not possible at this place to enter into further details; we accordingly refer only to Exodus, III and IV; DAY OF ATONEMENT, III, and esp. EZEKIEL, II, 2, where the proof has been furnished that this prophet belongs to a later period than PC as far as Ezk 40-48 (containing his picture of the future) in general is concerned, and as far as Ezk 44 4 ff (where it is claimed that the prophet first introduces the distinction between priests and Levites) in particular is concerned. All the important problems that are connected with this matter, esp. the difficulties which result from the Wellhausen hypothesis, when the questions as to the purpose, the form, the success and the origin of the priestly legislation come under consideration, are discussed in my book, Are the Critics Right? The result of this investigation is all the more noteworthy, as I was myself formerly an adherent of the Wellhausen school, but was forced to the conclusion that this hypothesis is untenable.

We have here yet to refer to the one fact that the relation of Dt and the PC, as far as Lev in particular is concerned, justifies the scheme of P followed by D as the historical order, while Wellhausen makes D older than P. Dt 10 8 ff; 33 8 ff presuppose more detailed ordinances in reference to the priests such as those which have been given in P. The book of Dt further takes into account different kinds of sacrifices (cf 12 5 f. 11. 13. 17. 26; 15 19-23; 17 1; 18 1, 3, such as are described in Lev 1 ff). The law in Dt 14 (ordinances with reference to what is clean) agrees almost word for word with Lev 11, and is in such perfect harmony with the linguistic peculiarities of PC, that Lev 11 must be regarded as the original, and not vice versa. Dt 24 8 f refers directly to the injunctions concerning leprosy, as we find these in Lev 13 f, and the Deuteronomic passage is doubtless modeled after that of Lev. Dt 12 15. 22; 15 22 cannot be understood at all, except in the light of Lev 17 13. Dt 26 14 ff again expressly takes into account ideas that have been taken from Lev 22 3 ff. As far as the laws dealing with the great feasts in Dt 16 are concerned, it is impossible to understand ver 9 without Lev 23 15 ff. 10 f; and the designation "feast of tabernacles" in vs 13 ff cannot even be understood without a reference to such a law as we find in Lev 23 39 ff. The other passages to be discussed on this subject lead us to the following results.

Even if the Book of Dt were the product of the 7th cent. BC, the facts that have been stated above would nevertheless disprove the claim of the Wellhausen hypothesis as to an connection with exilic or post-exilic date for the PC. Mosaic Period But if Dt, even in its essential and fundamental parts, merely, is Mosaic (cf Are the Critics Right? 1-55), then the PC which is still older than Dt must also belong to the Mosaic period.

(1) PC and desert conditions.—This conclusion is in this point confirmed still further by a series of facts. As Dt permits the firstborn to be ransomed (Dt 14 22 ff), but the PC demands their consecration in natura (Lev 27 26 f; cf Nu 18 15 ff), the latter ordinances could be preferred and enforced only during the wandering in the desert, where the whole nation was in the neighborhood of the sanctuary. The fact that the ordinances dealing with the domestic celebration of the Passover in the private houses on the 14th of Nisan and the holy convocation on the 15th of Nisan at the sanctuary could be carried out only during the wanderings in the desert (cf Ex 12 3 ff. 6; Lev 23 5; Nu 28 16; Lev 27 6 ff; Nu 28 17 ff), and that this was changed in Dt 16 5 f to correspond to changed conditions, can be seen by reference to Exodus, III, 3. Still more important is a third command in Lev 17 in comparison with Dt 12. The commandment that every animal that is to be slain is to be brought to the central sanctuary can have a purpose only for the Mosaic period, and could not even have been invented at a later period. Because of the entrance of Israel into Canaan, the Book of Dt changes this ordinance in such a way that from this time on the killing of the animals is permitted at any place (12 13 ff. 20 ff). The different commands in reference to the carcasses of animals that have died and of those torn to pieces are all dependent on Lev 17. In Dt 14 21, it was possible to forbid the use of such animals absolutely for Israel, because from now on, and in contrast to Lev 17, the killing of sacrificial animals was permitted at any place (vs 13 ff). In Ex 22 30 all use of such meat could be forbidden, because Lev 17, with its command to bring all blood to the sanctuary, had not yet been given. Lev, now, on the other hand, forbids this use only to the priests (22 8), and sees in this use in the case of the other Israelites only a transitory defilement (cf Lev 17 15; 11 40); and in 7 24 forbids only the use of the fat, but not of the meat of these animals; for now, according to Lev 17 1 ff, all the killing is a sacrifice which only those who are clean were permitted to eat and which could not be secured at all times (cf Hoffmann, op. cit., 23 f).

Our exposition of Lev 17 1 ff is, however, in another respect also of the greatest significance, for in vs 4-6. 8 f the tent of meeting is presupposed as existing; in vs 5. 8 also different kinds of sacrifices, and in ver 6 the priesthood; so that at once further ordinances concerning the tent of meeting, the sacrificial code, the priesthood, such as we find in Ex 25 ff; 35 ff; Lev 1-7; Ex 29; Lev 8-10 21 ff, were possible and necessary, and these very laws must probably originate in and date from the Mosaic period. This same conclusion is sustained by the following considerations. For what other source or time could be in harmony with such statements found very often in other parts of Lev also, as "into the camp" in 4 11 ff; 6 11; 13 46; 14 3. 8 (unconscious contrast to later times); 14 33 ff. 40. 41. 45. 53; 16 26-28; 24 10-23; or "into the desert," in 16 10. 21 f. In 5 15. 18; 6 6 (cf also 27 2 ff), the words "according to thy estimation" are addressed personally to Moses. In 6 20 a calculation is based on the day on which Aaron was consecrated to the priesthood, while ver 22 is the first that has general coloring. Such hints, which, as it were, have only been accidentally scattered in the body of the laws, and which point to the situation of the lawgiver and of his times, are of especial value for the argument in favor of the Mosaic origin of these laws. Further, we everywhere find that Aaron and his sons are as yet the only incumbents of the priestly office (cf 1 5. 7. 8. 11; 2. 3; 3 13; 6 9. 14. 16, etc.). All the laws claim to have been given through Moses or Aaron or through both at Mt. Sinai (see I above). And who, in later times, if it was the purpose to magnify the priesthood of Aaron, would have thought of inventing the fact that on the Day of Atonement and on other occasions it was necessary for Aaron to bring a burnt offering and a sin offering for himself (Lev 16; 8-10; 6 19 ff), or that Moses in his view of a certain cultural act had been mistaken (cf Lev 10 16 ff)? The law concerning the Jubilee Year (Lev 25) presupposes that each tribe is confined in its own district and is not intermingled with the other tribes, a presupposition which was no longer possible after the occupation of Canaan, and is accordingly thinkable only in the Mosaic times. And now let us remember that this fact, when we recall (see II, above) that the unity of the book was proved, is a ground for claiming that the entire book dates from the Mosaic period. As far as Lev at least is concerned, there is nothing found in the book that calls for a later date. Lev 18 24 ff can be regarded as post-Mosaic only if we translate these verses thoughtlessly, as though the inhabitants of the country were here described as being expelled earlier. On the other hand, in ver 24, just as is the case with the parallel passage, 20 22 ff, the idea is, without any doubt, that Israel is not yet in the Holy Land. Accordingly the waw consecutives at this place are to be regarded not as indicating temporal but logical sequences. In the passage 18 27, we further find the archaic form hā'el for hā'ēl; cf in the Pent Gen 19 8.25; 26 3.4; Dt 4 42; 7 22; 19 11. Just as little does ch 26 take us into the exilic period. Only dogmatical prejudices can take offence at prediction of the exile. Lev 26 cannot be regarded as a "prophecy after the event," for the reason, too, that the restoration of the people by God's pardon is here promised (cf vs 40 ff). And, too, the exile is not the only punishment with which Israel is threatened; and finally as far as Israel is concerned, by the side of the statements concerning their dwelling in one single country (vs 34.38.41.44), it is also said that they are to be scattered among many nations and countries (cf vs 23.36.39).

(2) Unity and construction point to Mosaic origin.—If to this we yet add the unity of the thought and of the external construction, looking at the whole matter, we do not see anything that would lead us to accept a post-Mosaic period for this book. Then, too, it is from the outset in itself only probable that Moses gave his people a body of cultus-laws and did not leave this matter to chance. We need only think of the great rôle which among the oriental peoples was assigned to their religious cultus. It is indeed nowhere said, in so many words, that Moses wrote even the laws of the PC. But the references made by Dt to the PC; the fact that Nu 33, which also is credited to Moses, is characterized by the style of PC; further, that the author of Dt could write in the style of P (cf Dt 14 with Lev 11); and, per contra, that the author of Lev 26 had the mastery of the style peculiar to Dt (cf Dt 28)—all this makes it probable that Moses even wrote these things himself; at any rate, no reasons can be cited against this view. Very interesting in connection with the question of the unity of the Pent are the close connecting links between Lev 18 24 ff; 20 22 ff, and JE. The question whether Moses in the composition of the book made use of his own notes or of those of others, cannot be decided; but this is an irrelevant matter. What the facts may be in reference to the development of other ordinances, which have taken different forms in the Books of the Covenant and in PC, or in Dt and in PC, and whether the existence of these differences in the cases of particular laws compels us to accept later additions, cannot be discussed at this place. Yet from the outset it is to be emphasized that already in the Mosaic period there could possibly have been reasons for changing some of these laws; esp. was this so in the Book of Dt, just before the people entered the promised land (cf e.g. the laws concerning tithes, Dt 12 6f.17 ff; 14 22 ff; 26 12 ff; Lev 27 30 ff; Nu 18 20 ff, or the laws concerning contributions for sacrifices, Dt 18 3; Lev 7 29 ff).

Then, too, the decision whether this development took place as early as the time of Moses or not is not to be made dependent on the possibility of our being able to explain the reasons for such changes. We lack both the daily practice in these cultural ordinances, as also the oral instruction which makes these ordinances intelligible. The manner in which in Lev 1 ff the different kinds of sacrifices are introduced sounds as though these were already known to the people and were practised by them, except in the case of sin and guilt offerings. This is further in harmony with earlier narratives, which already report concerning sacrifices. It is possible that in this way we can also explain a certain relationship between the Jewish sacrificial ritual and that of Babylon (cf Zimmern, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der babylonischen Religion). The ordinances in reference to the clean and the unclean may also have emanated from religious and ethical ideas which are older than Moses' times. In this matter the thought was decisive, that everything that was impure, everything that suggested death or decay or sin or displeasure to God, should be kept separated and apart from the religion of Jeh. In all such cases it is not the newness of the laws but their adaptability to the character and spirit of the Jeh-religion that is to be regarded as the decisive factor.

IV. The Significance.—(1) The law contains God's will, although in transitory form. In the art.

EZEKIEL under II, 2, (3) we have referred to the fact that Leviticism is an important and necessary stage in the development of true religion, and that the entire OT did not advance beyond this stage and was not intended to go beyond it. The leading prophets (Isa 40 ff, Jer, Ezk), even in their visions of the future, cling to the temple, sacrifices, holy oblations, sacred seasons and persons. Christianity was the first to discard this external shell, after it had ripened the kernel that was concealed in this shell (cf worship in the spirit and in the truth, Jn 4 20-24). Down to this time, kernel and shell were inseparably united. This must not be forgotten, if we would appreciate the Book of Lev properly. It is true that this book to a large extent deals with laws and ordinances, to which we Christians should not and need not return (cf the voice from heaven to Peter, Acts 10 15, "What God hath cleansed, make not thou common," and Paul's opposition to all work-righteousness that was based on compliance with these external institutions, e.g. in Rom, Gal, Col, as also his independent attitude over against the Jewish law in those cases where it could not be taken into consideration as the way to salvation; cf Acts 21 17 ff; Rom 14 1 ff; 1 Cor 9 19 ff). But these laws and ordinances were something more than merely external matters, since they contained the highest religious thoughts. We surely should not forget from the outset that Lev 19 contains also the word, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (ver 18), a command which in vs 33f is even made to cover the strangers too, and which by Jesus, next to the absolute love demanded for God, is designated as the chief commandment of the law (Mt 22 39); and when in 19 17f the hatred of the brother and desire for revenge on him are forbidden, we already seem to breathe the atmosphere of Christianity. The entire ch 19 is, in addition, as it were, a sermon on almost all of the commandments of the Decalogue, the abiding authority of which the Christian, after the example and interpretation of Jesus, will at once recognize. But as the Decalogue itself is found inclosed in the specifically Jewish national shell (cf Ex 20 2, exodus out of Egypt; ver 8, Sabbath commandment; ver 12, promise of the holy land; ver 17, slaves), so, too, this is the case in Lev 19 (cf vs 3.6 ff.20-22.23-25.29.30.33 ff). But how little the specifically Levitical ordinances, in the narrower sense of the term, exclude the spiritual factor, and how closely they are interwoven with the deepest of thoughts, can be seen from ch 26, according to which all merely external sacrifices, into which formalism naturally the Levitical legal code could degenerate, do not protect from punishment, if the heart remains uncircumcised (vs 30 f.41).

Above all, there are four leading thoughts which are emphasized forcibly, particularly by the legal system of PC. In reality all times, all places, all property, all persons are sacred to God. But as it is impossible that this ideal should be realized in view of the imperfections and guilt of man, it was decided that certain particular seasons and places, gifts and persons should be separated from others, and that in these this sacredness should be realized as far as possible, and that these representatives should by their mere existence continually remind the people of God's more comprehensive claims, and at the same time arouse and maintain the consciousness that their entire life was to be saturated by the thoughts of a holy God and His demands. From this point of view, none of the particular laws are worthless; and when they are once appreciated in this their central significance, we can understand that each law has its share in the eternal authority of the law (cf Mt 5 17 f). Paul, too, who absolutely rejects the law as a way to salvation expresses no doubt that the law really contains the will of God (Rom 8 3 f); and he declares that it was the purpose of the sending of Jesus, that the demands made upon us by the law should be fulfilled; and in Rom 13 10 he tells us that love is the fulfilment of the law (cf ver 8); and according to Rom 7 12, it is certain that the law is holy and the commandment is holy, righteous and good.

(2) The law prepares for the understanding of Christianity.—But the ceremonial law, too, contains not only the demands of God's will. It prepares also for the understanding of the work, the person and the mission of Jesus. In Ex 25 8; 29 45 f; 40 34 ff the indwelling of God in the tent of meeting is declared, which prophesied the incarnation of God in Christ Jesus (Jn 1 14); and then the indwelling of God through the Holy Ghost in the Christian congregation (1 Pet 2 5; Eph 4 12) and in the individual (1 Cor 3 16; 6 19; 2 Cor 6 16; Jn 14 23). Through the sacrificial system in Lev 1-7, and the ordinances of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16), we are enabled to understand the character of sin, of grace and of the forgiveness of sin (cf ATONEMENT, DAY OF, II). Let us remember to what extent Jesus and Paul, the Ep. to the He, and the other NT writings operate with OT thoughts, particularly with those of Lev (priesthood, sacrifices, atonement, Passover, signification of blood, etc), and Paul correctly says that the righteousness of God was prophesied, not only by the prophets, but also by the law (Rom 3 21).

(3) The law as a tutor unto Christ.—Finally, the ceremonial law too has the purpose to protect Israel from the errors of the heathen, a thought that is esp. emphasized in the Law of Holiness (cf Lev 18 3.24 ff; 19 26 ff; 20 2 ff.22 ff; 26 1) and which is in harmony with the elementary stage of Israel's education in the OT, when the people still stood in need of the "tutor . . . unto Christ" (Gal 3 23 f; 4 1). This already leads us over to the negative side, which Paul particularly emphasizes.

The law is in itself holy, and the commandment is holy and righteous and good (Rom 7 12), but it has lost its power because the flesh

2. Negative of man is sinful (cf Rom 8 3); and thus it happens that the law is the occasion for sin and leads to a knowledge of sin and to an increase of sin (cf Rom 3 20; 4 15; 5 20; 7 13); and this shall be brought about according to the purposes of God in order that in upright hearts the desire for forgiveness should arise. It is true that nothing was so well adapted as were the details of the law, to bring to consciousness in the untutored mind that in which man yet came short of the Divine commands. And as far as the removal of the guilt was concerned, nothing was needed except the reference to this in order to make men feel their imperfections (cf He 7-10). God merely out of grace was for the time being contented with the blood of goats and of calves as a means for atonement; He was already counting on the forgiveness in Christ (Rom 3 25). All the sacrifices in Lev 1-7, e.g., did not make the ritual of the Day of Atonement superfluous (Lev 16); and in this case the very man who brought the sacrifice was also a sinful creature who must first secure the forgiveness of God for himself. Only Jesus, at once the perfect priest and the perfect sacrifice, has achieved the perfect redemption. It accordingly remains a fact that the righteousness which avails before God can be secured only through faith in Jesus Christ, and not through the deeds of the law (Rom and Gal).

The law with its incomplete atonement and with its arousing of the consciousness of sin drives man to Jesus; and this is its negative significance. Jesus, however, who Himself has fulfilled the demands of the law, gives us through His spirit the power, that the law with its demands (1, [1] above) may no longer stand threateningly over against us, but is now written in our hearts. In this way the OT law is fulfilled in its transitory form, and at the same time becomes superfluous, after its eternal contents have been recognized, maintained and surpassed.

LEVY, lev'i. See WAR.

LEWD, lūd, LEWDNESS, lūd'nes (זָכָר, zimmāh, זִמְמָה, m'zimmāh, נִבְלָה, nabhlāh; πορνεία, ponēros, ῥαδιουργία, rhadiourgēma):

There are three Heb words tr<sup>d</sup> "lewd," "lewdness": (1) Zimmāh, meaning a "plan," a "purpose," so tr<sup>d</sup> several times and then shading off into "evil plan"; tr<sup>d</sup> also "heinous crime," "wicked purpose or device."

It is the most frequent word for "lewdness": Ezk 16 27, "lewd way"; found in Jgs 20 6; Ezk 16 27.43.58; 22 9.11; 23 21.27.29.35.44.48.49; 24 13; Hos 6 9. (2) M'zimmāh means a "plan," generally "[evil] machination"; used only in Jer 11 15, "lewdness." (3) Nabhlāh, meaning "disgrace" in reference to females. Found only in Hos 2 10, ARV<sup>m</sup> "shame."

The word tr<sup>d</sup> "lewd," "lewdness" in AV occurs only twice in the NT, and in each instance is more correctly tr<sup>d</sup> in RV by another word:

2. In the NT (1) Ponēros, found in Acts 17 5, tr<sup>d</sup> in ARV "vile." The Gr word elsewhere is tr<sup>d</sup> "bad," "evil," "grievous," "harmful," "malicious," "wicked." AV "lewd" gives the wrong impression. The idea of unchastity is not present in the text or context. (2) Rhadiourgēma likewise occurs only once, viz. Acts 18 14, and is correctly tr<sup>d</sup> in RV and ARV "wicked villany." The thought of impurity or lewdness is foreign to the meaning in this connection.

LIBANUS, lib'a-nus. See LEBANON.

LIBATION, li-bā'shun. See SACRIFICE.

LIBERAL, lib'ēr-al, LIBERALITY, lib'ēr-al'i-ti, LIBERALLY, lib'ēr-al-i: The different forms of the word all refer to one who is generous, bountiful, willing and ready to give and to help. Both the Heb words of the OT and the Gr words of the NT tr<sup>d</sup> into the Eng. word "liberal" have a deeper and nobler meaning than is generally conveyed by the Eng. word. In Prov 11 25, the liberal soul (nephesh brākhāh) means a soul that carries a blessing. In Isa 32 5, ARV has "bountiful" where AV has "liberal," and in ver 8 "noble" takes the place of "liberal" (nādhīb). The principal Gr words are ἀπλότης, haplōtēs, lit. "simplicity," "sincerity," and χάρις, chāris, "grace," "favor." In 1 Cor 16 3, "bounty" substitutes "liberality." It is well to bear in mind that a Bib. liberality can spring only out of a noble soul, and is Godlike in its genesis and spirit. G. H. GERBERDING

LIBERTINES, lib'ēr-tinz, li-būr'tinz (Λιβερτίνοι, Libertinoi): These were among Stephen's opponents: "There arose certain of them that were of the synagogue called [the synagogue] of the Libertines, and of the Cyrenians, and of the Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and Asia, disputing with Stephen" (Acts 6 9).

How many synagogues are denoted? The answer may aid in the interpretation of "Libertines". (1) The words may be read as denoting one synagogue (Calvin). However (a) the number of worshippers would be extremely large, (b) the bond of union is not obvious, (c) rabbinic tradition speaks of 450 synagogues in Jerus. (2) The double ton ("of them") seems to denote two parties, the one consisting "of them that were of the synagogue called [the synagogue] of Libertines and Cyrenians and Alexandrians," the other "of them of Cilicia and Asia" (Winer, Wendt, Holtzmann). But the second ton is dependent on synagogue. "As Cyrenians and Alexandrians both belong to towns . . . a change of designation would be necessary when the Jews of whole provinces came to be mentioned: this being the case, the article could not but be repeated, without any reference to the ton before" (Alford). (3) There were three synagogues: (a) that of the Libertines, (b) that of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians and (c) that "of them of Cilicia and Asia" (Alford). There is no grammatical reason for this division, but it is based on an interpretation of "Libertines." There were "Libertines," Africans and Asiatics. (4) Each party had a separate synagogue (Schurer, Hausrath). The number of worshippers, their different origin and connections, and the number of synagogues in Jerus give weight to this view.

(1) They are "freedmen," liberated slaves or their descendants. Against this it is held that the Gr equivalent (apeleutheroi) would have been used in this case. However, the Rom designation would be common all over the empire. In what sense were they "freedmen"? Various answers are given: (a) they were freedmen from Jewish servitude (Lightfoot); (b) they were Italian freedmen who had become proselytes; (c) they were "the freedmen of the Romans" (Chrysostom), the descendants of Jewish freedmen at Rome who had been expelled by Tiberius. In 63 BC Pompey had taken prisoners of war to Rome. These, being liberated by those who had acquired them as slaves, formed a colony on the banks of the Tiber (Philo, Legat. ad Caium). Tacitus relates that the senate decreed (19 AD) that a number of Jewish Libertines should be transported to Sardinia, and that the rest should leave Italy, unless they renounced, before a certain day, their profane customs (Ann. ii, 85; see also Jos, Ant. XVIII, iii, 5). Many would naturally seek refuge in Jerus and build there a synagogue.

(2) They are an African community. There were two synagogues, one of which was Asiatic. In the other were men from two African towns (Cyrene and Alexandria), therefore the Libertines must have been African also, all forming an African synagogue. Various explanations are given: (a) They were inhabitants of Libertum, a town in Africa proper: an "Episcopus Ecclesiae Catholicae Libertinensis" sat in the Synod of Carthage (411 AD). (b) Some emend the text; Wetstein and Blass, following the Armenian VS, conjecture Libustinōn, "of the Libystines." Schulthess reads for "Libertines and Cyrenians" (Libertinōn kai Kūrēnatōn) "Libyans, those about Cyrene" (Lib-ūōn tōn kald Kūrēnēn) (cf Acts 2 10).

These emendations are conjectural; the MSS read "Libertines." It seems, therefore, that 2, (1) (c) above is the correct interpretation.

LIBERTY, lib'ēr-ti (לִּירוֹר, d'rōr, רַהֲבָה, rāhābh; ελευθερία, elcutheria): The opposite of servitude or bondage, hence applicable to captives or slaves set free from oppression (thus d'rōr, Lev 25 10; Isa 61 1, etc). Morally, the power which enslaves is sin (Jn 8 34), and liberty consists, not simply in external freedom, or in possession of the formal power of choice, but in deliverance from the darkening of the mind, the tyranny of sinful lusts and the enthrallment of the will, induced by a morally corrupt state. In a positive respect, it consists in the possession of holiness, with the will and ability to do what is right and good. Such liberty is possible only in a renewed condition of soul, and cannot exist apart from godliness. Even under the OT godly men could boast of a measure of such liberty (Ps 119 45, rāhābh, "room," "breadth"), but it is the gospel of Christ which bestows it in its fulness, in giving a full and clear knowledge of God, discovering the way of forgiveness, supplying the highest motives to holiness and giving the Holy Spirit to destroy the power of sin and to quicken to righteousness. In implanting a new life in the soul, the gospel lifts the believer out of the sphere of external law, and gives him a sense of freedom in his new filial relation to God. Hence the NT expressions about "the glorious liberty" of God's children (Rom 8 21 AV; cf Gal 2 4; 5 13, etc), about liberty as resulting from the possession of the Spirit (2 Cor 3 17), about "the perfect law of liberty" (Jas 1 25). The instrument through which this liberty is imparted is "the truth" (Jn 8 32). Christians are earnestly warned not to presume upon, or abuse their liberty in Christ (Gal 5 13; 1 Pet 2 16). JAMES ORR

LIBNAH, lib'na (לִּבְנָה, libhnāh, "whiteness," "transparency," "pavement" [cf Ex 24 10 where לִּבְנָה, libhnath, is tr<sup>d</sup> "paved work" or a "compact foundation"]; Δεβνά, Lebndā):

(1) A desert camp of the Israelites between Rimmon-peretz and Kissah (Nu 33 20, 21). Probably the same as Laban (Dt 1 1). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

(2) A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh 15 42). "Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, and fought against Libnah: and Jeh delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel. . . . And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and encamped against it, and fought against it" (Josh 10 29-31; 12 15). It was one of the cities given to the "children of Aaron" (Josh 21 13; 1 Ch 6 57). In the reign of Joram, Libnah joined the Edomites in a revolt against the king of Judah (2 K 8 22; 2 Ch 21 10). In the reign of Hezekiah, Libnah was besieged by Sennacherib (2 K 19 8; Isa 37 8). The wife of King Josiah was "Hamutal the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah," she was the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 K 23 31; 24 18; Jer 52 1).

The site of this important stronghold remains unknown. In the Onom it is described, under the name Lobana or Lobna, as near Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin). All the indications point to a site in the S.W. of the Shephelah, not very far from Lachish. The Palestine Exploration Fund surveys suggested (PEF, III, 259) the commanding site 'Arak el Menshiyeh, or rather the white chalky mound 250 ft. high to the N. of this village, and Stanley proposed Tell es Safi. (Both these identifications are due to the interpretation of Libnah as meaning "whiteness.") In the PEFS (1897, Sh XX) Conder suggests a ruin called el Bendawy, 10 miles S.E. of Lachish. E. W. G. LIBNI, lib'nī (לִּבְנִי, libhnī):

(1) Son of Gershon (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17.20). Families who traced their descent from Libni are called Libnites (Nu 3 21; 26 58).

(2) A son of Merari (1 Ch 6 29). See LADAN.

LITERATURE

A library is a book or books kept for use, not for sale. A one-book library is just as much a library as a one-cell animal is an animal. The earliest libraries, like the earliest plants and animals, were very simple, consisting of a few books or perhaps only a single tablet or manuscript. An archive is a library of official documents not in active use; a registry, a library of going documents.

The Bible is itself a library. During the Middle Ages it was commonly called, first, "The Divine Library," and then, "The Library"

1. The Bible a Library (Bibliotheca), in the same exclusive sense as it is now known as "The Book" (Biblia as Lat sing.). Even the word "Bible" itself is historically "Library" rather than "Book" (for it was originally the neuter pl. Biblia, "The Books"; cf Dnl 9 2). The Bible is also a library in that it is an organized collection of books rather than a single work.

This fact that the Bible is itself a library is increasingly mentioned of late, esp. in OT studies (Kent, Narratives of the Beginnings of Heb History, 1, "The Old Testament as a Library"; Delitzsch, Babel and Bible, 4, "the Old Testament, that small library of books of the most multifarious kind"). Its profound bearing on the theory of the composition and inspiration of the Bible (cf Book) has given the fact new significance and makes an understanding of the nature of a library one of the best tools for the interpretation of the Bible in the face of modern problems. While it is not possible to elaborate this within these limits, it may be said briefly that the logical end of the application of the doctrine of evolution to books and libraries is that the Bible is, like man, the result of natural selection, and is as unique among books as man among the animals. And, whatever may be true of men, in the case of books the formation of a book-library by natural selection tends toward the elimination of error. The more numerous the individuals and the longer the period, the greater the reduction of error, so that the logical inference as to the Bible is that on purely natural grounds it may be, or is, the nearest approximation to inerrancy among books, because of its history as a library. This does not quite lead to the position that the Bible is as unique among books as Jesus Christ among men, but under the doctrine of a creative Providence, it does imply what may be called real superhuman authorship and authority.

Somewhat apart from historical libraries, but closely connected with Bible study, are the alleged superhuman libraries, libraries of, or written by, the gods, libraries for the dead and apocryphal libraries. The Vedas are said to have existed as a collection even before the Creator created Himself (Manu 1 21). All religions have their book-gods—Thoth and Seshait, Apollo, Hermes, Minerva, Ida, Bridget, Soma, Brahma, Odin, Kvasir, Ygdrasil and many others. To the ancient Babylonians the whole firmament was a library of "celestial tablets." The mythological ideas often have important bearing on Bib. doctrines, e.g. the Creation, the Word, the Tree of Life, the Book of Life, the Holy Spirit. Apocryphal libraries include the library which Jeh is alleged to have formed on the 7th day of creation on a mount E. of the Garden of Eden, and other libraries ascribed to Enoch, Noah and Seth. See for this the OT pseudepigrapha.

Another class of collections of real books, written or gathered for mythological purposes, is what may be called libraries for the dead. It is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and among primitive people like the American Indians, in modern times, it has been the custom to bury with the dead the things which friends thought would be useful in the Elysian fields or happy hunting grounds, or on the way thither—the bow and horse of the warrior, the ushabti servants, children's playthings, the models of food objects, and so on. This same motive led also to the burying of books with the dead. For long periods in the history of Egypt every Egyptian of any position was buried with one or more books. These books were not his chance possessions, buried with him as, in some burials, all a man's personal belongings are, but books selected for their usefulness to him after death. For the most part these were of the nature of guidebooks to the way to the heavenly world, magic formulae for the opening of doors, instruction as to the right method of progress toward, or introduction into, paradise, etc. These books were afterward gathered together and form what is now known as "the Book of the Dead" and other such books.

In modern times the actor or professional story-teller often has in memory a collection of remembered books which is in effect a library. Among primitive peoples the medicine-man was lit. a library of tribal traditions. The priests of India and the minstrels of Greece or of the Middle Ages often had a large repertory. By the prevailing theory of the origin of the books of the OT such memory traditions, transmitted orally, were the chief source of the Hex, but in view of what is now known of the library situation of the time, this must be doubted.

In general terms it may be said that when man began not only to make but to keep records, libraries began.

Even a memorial stone contains the germ of a mnemonic library. The primitive medicine-man's collection of notched message sticks, tallies, quipus or wampum belts is a great advance in complexity on these, and the simplest collection of pictorial narratives of Hottentot or American Indian, an advance on this. A combination of pictures with signs is still another forward step, and this step is already to be found in the Pyrenean caves of the Stone Age (see WRITING). Most of these earliest libraries were kept at the sanctuary. The gathering together of books in libraries had its origin in the ideas of (1) preservation, (2) gathering together like books in order to join together their contents, and (3) circulation—the great modern expansion of the idea. The owner of flocks and herds gathers together his lists of cattle or other possessions, his receipts for purchases and record of sales, whether these are recorded on the walls of his cave or on wooden tallies or on knotted cords or on clay tablets gathered in little jars and buried under the floor of his house. Large owners and sovereigns and the temples of Egypt and Assyria gathered large stores of these archival records and with them records of tribute, oracles, etc. As early as 2700 BC we have the account of King Dedkera Isesi, his archival library and his librarian Senezemib. The annals of Thutmose III were preserved in the palace library as well as cut in selections on the walls of the temple. A few years later, and we know that the archival records were kept in a special room in the palace at Amarna—and many of the records themselves were found there. All this was before the year 1300.

Bible history through the 10th chapter of Gen covers the whole civilized world, but its main line up to about 2000 BC is almost wholly

6. Mesopotamian Period Mesopotamian. Up to the time of Abram's migration from Haran, the history of Bib. libraries and the history of Bab and Sumerian libraries are one. Most of the cities mentioned in this period are now known to have had collections of books in those days. At the time when Abram left Haran there were hundreds of collections of written documents in scores of different geographical localities and containing millions of tablets.

From Abram's emigration out of Haran to Jacob's emigration to Egypt was, on the face of Bib. data, mainly a time of wandering in Pal, but

7. Patriarchal Period this was not wholly nomad nor wholly Palestinian. Whether there were libraries in Pal at this time or not, the Patriarchs were all in close personal contact with the library lands of Babylonia and Egypt. Abram himself was familiar with both Mesopotamia and Egypt. His son Ishmael married an Egyptian, his son Isaac a Mesopotamian. His grandson Jacob married two wives from between the rivers, and had himself 20 years' residence in the region. While it does not appear that Isaac lived at any time either in Syria or in Egypt, during most of his life all the members of his nearest family, father, mother, wife, sons' wives, had had from one to three score years' life in the mother-country. Whether there were public records in this region at this time is another matter, but it would seem that the whole region during the whole period was under the influence of the Bab civilization. It was freely traversed by trading caravans, and the Hittite and Mesopotamian records extend at least a little back into this period.

The Egypt period of Bible history begins with the immigration of Jacob and his sons, but fringes back to the visit of Abram (Gen 12 10-20),

8. Egyptian Period if not to Mizraim of Gen 10 6. On the other hand, it ends properly with the exodus, but fringes forward through frequent points of contact to the flight of the Virgin and Pontecost. Whether the sojourn was 430 or 215 years, or less, it was a long residence at a time when libraries were very flourishing in Egypt. Already at the time of Abram's visit, collections of books, not only of official accounts, but of religious texts, medical texts, annals, and the like, had been common in Egypt for nearly 1,000 years, and had perhaps existed for 1,000 years or more before that.

Under the older of the modern datings of the exodus, the period of the sojourn included the times of Thothmes III (Thutmose), and in this reign there are peculiarly interesting records, not only of the existence of temple and palace libraries, but of the nature of their contents. The official recorder of Thothmes III, accompanying him on his campaign in Syria and Pal, set down each day the events of the day, while he or others also made lists of tribute, spoils, commissary matters, etc. These daily records were deposited in the palace library, as it appears, but a narrative compiled from these and written on a leather roll was deposited in the temple library, and from this roll in turn an abstract was engraved on the walls of the temple, where it remains to this day. This probably gives the library situation of the time in a nutshell: (1) the simple saving of utilitarian documents, often on papyrus or wood tablets, (2) the gathering of books written for information on more durable material, (3) preserving choice books for posterity by a local series of inscriptions.

The rolls must have been kept in chests or in small boxes, like the box containing the medical papyri of King Neferikere some 1,300 years before, or the "many boxes" at Edfu long after. Many pictures of these book-chests or bookcases are found in the monuments (Birt, Buchrolle, 12, 15 ff).

Again, the palace library of King Akhnaton (c 1360 BC) at Amarna, which contained collections of the royal foreign correspondence on clay tablets, has been excavated. Its bricks bear the inscription, "Place of the records of the palace of the king," and some hundreds of tablets from this spot have been recovered.

At the time of the exodus there were thus probably libraries in all palaces, temples and record offices, although the temple libraries were by no means confined to sacred writings or the palace to secular. There were also at least archives, or registers, in the royal treasury and in all public departments. Schools for scribes were, it would seem, held in the palace, temple and treasury libraries. There were, therefore, apparently, at this time millions of documents or books, in hundreds of organized collections, which could be called archives or libraries.

Supposing any exodus at all, Moses and Aaron and all the Heb "officers" ("scribes" or writers) under the Egypt taskmasters (Ex 5 9. The Exodus 6.10.14.15.19), brought up as they were in the scribal schools, were of course quite familiar with the Egypt ways of keeping their books. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the first and chief provision which Moses made for the Tabernacle was a book-chest for the preservation of the sacred directions given by Jeh. It makes little difference whether the account is taken in its final form, divided horizontally into Ex, Lev, Nu, Dt and Josh, or divided perpendicularly into J, E, D, P, the fact of the ark and enough of its details are given even in the very oldest sources to show that the authors understood the ark to be a glorified book-chest in or near which were kept written documents: the tables of stone, the inscribed rod, all the testimony given from the mercy-seat which formed its lid, and perhaps the Book of Dt. The ark is in fact much the size and shape of a portable bookcase, and the LXX renders the word by the ordinary technical Gr word for the book-chest (kibōtēs; cf Birt, op. cit., 248-49). It appears also to have been the later Heb word for book-chest (cf Jew Enc, II, 107 ff). At the exodus, whenever that may have been, Moses is alleged to have made the ark the official library, and in it apparently he is thought to have kept the oracles as uttered from time to time and the record of his travels from day to day (as well as the tables of stone), precisely as the scribe of Thutmose recorded his Syrian campaigns from day to day. This record (if it was a record) was in all likelihood on a leather roll, since this became the traditional form of books among the Hebrews, and this too was like the annals of Thutmose. When the tribes separated to N. and S., the books may have been either separated or copied, and doubtless they suffered much wear and tear from the harsh times until we find Dt turning up again in a temple library (2 K 22 8 ff; 2 Ch 34 14 ff).

The evidence from Egypt, Bab, Mitannian, Amorite and Hittite documents shows the existence of official chanceries and by implication of archives throughout the whole region of Syria and Pal at the time when the "Hebrew" invasion began (Winckler, Tell el-Amarna Tablets). The Am Tab and the tablets from the Hittite archives at Boghaz-keui (Winckler, DOG Mitt., 1907, no. 35) include actual letters from the princes, elders and governors of dozens of places, scattered all over this region from Egypt to the land of the Hittites and the Mitannians. These places include among others Jerus, Damascus, Tyre, Sidon, Acco, Ashkelon, Gaza, Lachish, Keilah and Aijalon.

Remains of two of such archival libraries have been dug up—one at Lachish and one at Taanach near Megiddo, both dating back to the 14th cent. BC.

Whether there were temple libraries as well does not appear so clearly from external evidence but may probably be inferred from the names, Debir and (perhaps) Nebo, as well as from the well-known fact that each of the many city-lands must have had its center of worship. When it was thought that writing did not exist to any extent in Pal before the time of David, it was the fashion to account for the name of the city of "Kirjath Sepher," the "City of Books," by curious tour de force of conjectural emendation (Sephar for Sepher, Tabor for Debir), but with the recent progress of excavation the possibility of the name has been fully established and the insight of Sayce probably justified.

That the situation at the Conquest continued also during the period of the Judges appears from sundry considerations: (1) The fact

11. Period of the Judges that all the surrounding nations, Moabites, Edomites, Amorites, Hittites, Mitannians, etc. were literate nations with public archives. (2) The high state of organization under David requires an evolutionary background. (3) Even the extreme (and quite untenable) theory that the Hebrews were illiterate wild Arab nomads and remained so for a long time would actually demonstrate the matter, for, as has been pertinently observed (Sellin, Eint. 7), many at least of the Can. cities were not destroyed or even occupied for a long time, but were surrounded by the Hebrews, and finally occupied and assimilated. It follows, therefore, that the archival system continued, and, under this theory, for a long time, until the Hebrews absorbed the culture of their neighbors—and, by inference, libraries with the rest. (4) Taking the evidence of the documents as they stand, the matter is simple enough; various works were kept in or near the ark. Joshua added to these at least the report of a boundary commission (Josh 18 9.10) which was brought to the sanctuary, and Samuel "laid up" the book that he wrote "before Jeh," i.e. at the ark. Moreover, the Books of Jasher, the Wars of Jeh, etc. imply a lit. which in turn implies libraries. Whenever or however composed, there is no good reason to distrust their historical existence. (5) Even on the extreme critical hypothesis, "Most of the stories found in the first 8 books of the OT originated before or during the age of song and story (c 1250-1050)" (Kent, Beginnings, 17). (6) To this may also be added, with all reservations, the mysterious metal ephod which appears only in this period. The ephod seems to have been either (a) a case (BDB, 66) or (b) an instrument for consulting an oracle (BDB, 65). The linen ephod had a pouch for the Urim and Thummim. The metal ephod seems to be distinguished from the image and may have contained the written oracular instructions (torah?) as well as the oracular instruments. (7) The Kenitescribes of Jabez (1 Ch 2 55); the simple fact that a chance captive from Succoth could write out a list of names and some one at least of the rudest 300 survivals of Gideon's 32,000 primitive warriors in those bloody frontier times could read it, the reference to the staff of the muster-master, marshal or scribe, and the "governors" (inscribers), in Deborah's Song, point in the same direction.

While, therefore, the times were doubtless wild, the political unity very slight, and the unity of worship even less, there is evidence that there were both political and religious libraries throughout the period.

Beginning with the monarchy, the library situation among the Israelites appears more and more clearly to correspond with that of the

12. Saul to the Maccabees surrounding nations. The first act recorded after the choice and proclamation of Saul as king was the writing of a constitution by Samuel and the depositing of this in the sacred archives (1 S 10 25). This document (LXX biblion) was perhaps one of the documents ("words") of Samuel whose words (1 Ch 29 29, history, chronicles, acts, book, etc) seem to have been possibly a register kept by him, perhaps from the time that he succeeded Eli, as later the high-priestly register (day-book) of Johannes Maccabaeus was certainly kept from the beginning of his high-priesthood (1 Macc 16 24).

Whether these "words" of Samuel were equivalent to the technical register or "book of the words of days" or not, such registers were undoubtedly kept from the time of David on, and there is nothing so illuminating as to the actual library conditions of the times as the so-called chronicles, histories or acts—the registers, journals or archives of the time. The roll-register seems to be called in full "the book of the words of days," or with explanatory fulness "book of the records of the words of days," but this appears to be an evolution from "words of days" or even "words," and these forms as well as the abbreviations "book of days" and "book" are used of the same technical work, which is the engrossing in chronological book-form of any series of individual documents—all the documents of a record-office, general or local. The name is used also of histories written up on the basis of these register-books (the Books of Ch are in Heb, "words of days") but not themselves records. These charter-books, of course, so far as they go, mirror the contents of the archives which they transcribe, and the key to the public-library history of the period, both sacred and royal, as regards contents, at least, is to be found in them, while in turn the key to the understanding of this technical book-form itself lies in the understanding of the "word" as a technical book-form.

The "word" in Heb is used of books, speeches, sayings, oracles, edicts, reports, formal opinions, agreements, indictments, judicial decisions, stories, records, regulations, sections of a discourse, lines of poetry, whole poems, etc. as well as acts, deeds, "matters," "affairs," events and words in the narrowest sense. It is thus very exactly, as well as lit., tr'd in the LXX by lógos, which as a technical book-term (Birt, Antikes Buchwesen, 28, 29) means any distinct composition, long or short, whether a law, an epigram, or a whole complex work. The best Eng. equivalent for this "work-complete-in-itself," in the case of public records, is "document," and in the case of literary matters, it is "work or writing." The "words" of Samuel or David thus are his "acts" or "deeds" in the sense, not of doings, but of the individual documentary records of those doings quite in the modern sense of the "acts and proceedings" of a convention, or the "deeds" to property.

In the pl., dibhrē and lógoi or lógia alike mean a collection of documents, works or writings, i.e. "a library." Sometimes this is used in the sense of archives or library, at other times as a book containing these collected works.

These collected documents in register-form constituted apparently a continuous series until the time when the Book of Ch was written and were extant at that time: the "words" of Samuel, "chronicles" and "last words" of David (1 Ch 23 27; 27 24), the "book of the words [acts] of Solomon" (1 K 11 41), the book of the words of days of the kings of Judah, and the book of the words of days of the kings of Israel—the kingdoms after division each having naturally its own records.

The general situation during the period as to archival matters is pretty well summarized by Moore in the EB. From the time of Solomon, and more doubtfully from the time of David, he recognizes that "records were doubtless kept in the palace," and that "the temples also doubtless had their records," while there may have been also local records of cities and towns. These records contained probably chief events, treaties, edicts, etc.—probably brief annals "never wrought into narrative memoirs." The temple records contained annals of succession, repairs, changes, etc (EB, II, 2021-28). The records were, however, probably not brief, but contained treaties, etc, verbatim in full. To this should moreover be added the significant fact that these archives contained not only business records but also various works of a more or less literary character. Those mentioned include letters, prophecies, prayers, and even poems and Wisdom literature. The "words" of the kings of Israel contained prayers, visions and other matter not usually counted archival. The "acts" (words) of Solomon also contained literary or quasi-literary material. According to Jos the archives of Tyre contained similar material and this was also true of the Amarna archives (c 1380 BC) and those at Boghaz-keui, as well as of the palace archives of Nineveh and the great temple archives of Nippur and Abu Habeh (Sippara). So, too, in Egypt the palace archives of King Neferikere contained medical works and those of Rameses III, at least, magical works, while the temple archives in the time of Thutmose III (Breasted, Ancient Records) contained military annals, and those of Denderah certainly many works of a non-registerial character. The temples of early Greece also contained literary works and secular laws as well as temple archives proper.

Plan of Pergamon.

(Showing typical relation of temple, colonnade, and library.)

In short, the palace collections of Israel were no exception to the general rule of antiquity in containing, besides palace archives proper, more or less of religious archives and literary works, while the temple collections contained more or less political records and literary works.

This record system in Israel and Judah, as appears from the OT itself, was the system of Persia in OT times. It was the system of the Jews in Maccabean times, of Egypt during this whole period and for centuries before and after, and of Northern Syria likewise at about this time (Zakar-Baal, of Gebal, c 1113 BC). The books of Ex, Lev, Nu and Dt, whenever written, reveal the same system, Ex to Nu being in the form of a register, and Dt represented as an abstract prepared for engraving on stone, a use which Joshua is said to have made of it. We have, therefore, the same system existing before and after and on all sides geographically.

All this neighboring practice points to a system of (1) archival collections, (2) contemporary book registers, (3) contemporary publication by inscription, and, in the light of these, the OT method, from the time of David at least, becomes clear, certainly as to archival collections and registers and hardly less so as to the setting-up of inscriptions in permanent material. Even if D is not earlier than 621 BC, it assumes public inscription long before that time, quite comparable in extent to the inscriptions of Thutmose III or King Mesha of Moab, and, although few long inscriptions have been recovered thus far, there is at least the Siloam inscription (cf also Isa 30 8; Job 19 23,24; Isa 8 1; Jer 17 1; also the Decalogue). Each one of these three elements (even the collection of inscriptions in the temple) was, it must be remembered, called in antiquity a "library."

The reference to "the books" in Dnl (9 2) may possibly point to or foreshadow the synagogue library.

Little weight is generally and properly given to the statement of 2 Macc 2 13, that Nehemiah founded a library and gathered into it the writings "about the kings, the prophets and David, and the letters of the kings concerning votive offerings," but it is, as a matter of fact, evident that he, as well as Judas Maccabaeus, who is linked with him in the statement, must have done just this.

From the time of the LXX tr, the idea of the library (bibliothēkē) and even the public library ("books of the people," i.e. public records) was familiar enough, the LXX itself also, according to Jos, linking the temple library of Jerus with the Alexandrian library through the furnishing of books by the former to the latter for copying.

With the Rom conquest and the rise of the Idu-macans, naturally the methods developed in accordance with Rom practice. It appears and contained genealogical records as well as official letters, decrees, etc. The triple method of record continues. It appears, further (Blau, 96; Krauss, III, 179), that there were libraries and even lending libraries in the schools and synagogues, not of Pal only, but wherever Jews were settled. Jos and Chrysostom with the Mish confirm the already very clear inference from St. Luke's account of Our Lord's teaching in the synagogue that at this time, and probably from the beginning of the synagogue, the books, the manner of their keeping and the ritual of their using were already essentially as in the modern synagogue. The first preaching-places of the Christians were the synagogues, and when churches succeeded these, the church library naturally followed, but whether in Bible times or not is a matter of conjecture; they appear at least in very early churches.

Whether the rich secular lit. to which Jos had access was in public or private libraries does not appear directly. It is well known that it was as much a part of Rom public policy in Herod's time to found public libraries in the provinces as it was to restore temples. Twenty-four such provincial libraries, chiefly temple libraries, are known.

The Rom practice of the time still mixed literary with the archival material, and it is likely therefore that the public records of the Jewish temple had in them both Gr and Lat secular books in considerable quantity, as well as the Gr Apoc and a large amount of Aram. or late Heb lit. of Talmudic character.

As to the receptacles and places in which the books were kept, we have reference even in the Heb period to most of the main forms used among the nations: the wooden box, the clay box or pot, the pouch, and on the other hand, once, the "house of books" so familiar in Egypt use and apparently referring to an individual chamber or semi-detached building of temple or palace. Most significant, however, is the statement that the books were kept in the palace and temple treasuries or store-houses.

The sacred ark ('ārōn), whatever it may have originally contained, was looked on when D was written as a sacred wooden book-chest, and the ark in which the teaching priests carried the law about for public reading was in fact likewise a chest.

Such chests were common among the Jews later, some with lids and some with side-opening (Jew Enc, II, 107-8; Blau, 178). It is tempting to find in D, where the book is to be put "by [AV "in"] the side of the ark" (Dt 31 26), a chest having both lid and openings in the side, but more likely perhaps D means a separate chest, like the coffer or pouch with the golden mice, which was also put "by the side" (miṣṣadh) of the ark (1 S 6 8).

In the NT the "cloak" which Paul left behind at Troas (2 Tim 4 13) was probably (Wattenb., 614; see also Birt and Gardthausen), if not a wooden "capsa," at least some sort of bookcase or cover.

The earthen vessel in which Jeremiah (32 14) puts the two "books" (tr<sup>d</sup> "deeds"), one sealed and one unsealed, was one of the commonest bookcases of the ancient world. This information has lately been widely reinforced and associated with Bib. history by the discovery of the Elephantine papyri, which were, for the most part, kept in such clay jars (Meyer, Papyrusfund, 15). The word Penta-teuch perhaps harks back to a five-roll jar, but more likely to a basket or wooden box with five compartments (Blau, 65; Birt, Buchrolle, 21, 22). It was the collective label of a five-roll case, whether of earthenware, wood or basket work.

The pouch or bag bookcase has perhaps its representative in the phylactery (Mt 23 5), which was a sort of miniature armarium in that each of the four little rolls of its four compartments was technically a "book" (sepher). This name is commonly explained as an amulet guarding against evil spirits, but the term actually occurs in the papyri (Bibliothēphylax) of the preservation of books.

The "house of books" (Ezr 6 1m) or "place of books" is a very close parallel to bibliothēkē, by which (in the pl.) it is tr<sup>d</sup> in the LXX. The phrase was a common term in Egypt for library, perhaps also sometimes for scriptorium or even registry, and it points to a chamber or semi-detached room or building where the book-chests, jars, etc., were kept. That at Edfu is a semi-detached room and contained many such cases.

While there is little record of libraries in Bib. times, the very formation of the Canon itself, whether by the higher critical process, or by natural processes of gathering whole literary works, implies the gathering together of books, and the temple libraries common to both Egypt and Assyria-Babylonia are almost inevitably implied wherever there was a temple or sanctuary, whatever may be the facts as to the temple libraries. According to Hilprecht there were certainly such libraries and from very ancient times. The palace library of Assurbani-pal, though itself a discovery of the last times, brings the story down to the times of the written history. For the rest of the story see lit. below, esp. Dziatzko, Bibliotheken, and the art. on "Libraries" in the Enc Brit. See also NINEVEH, LIBRARY OF.

In the earlier period at least and including for the Jews the NT times, the particular locality in palace or temple seems to have been the treasury. In the Book of Ezr, search for the decree of Cyrus was to be made in the king's treasure-house (Ezr 5 17), and was made in the "house of books where the treasures were laid up" (Ezr 6 1m). The document was finally found in the palace at Ecbatana—so too in 1 Macc 14 49 the archives are placed in the treasury.

In NT times there had already been a good deal of development in the matter of library buildings. A general type had been evolved which consisted of (1) a colonnade, (2) a lecture-room, a reading-room or assembly room, (3) small rooms for book storage. Such accounts as we have of the Alexandrian libraries, with the excavations at Pergamus, Athens and Rome, reveal the same type—the book-rooms, the colonnade where masters walked or sat and talked with their pupils, the rooms for assembly where the senate or other bodies sometimes sat. In short, as long before in Egypt, whether in palace or temple, the place of teaching was the place of books.

It is significant thus that Our Lord taught in the Treasury, which in Herod's Temple was in the court of the temple proper—probably the porticos under the women's gallery, some of the adjoining rooms being used for books. As this was within the barrier which no Gentile could pass, Herod must have had also a library of public records in the outer colonnade. See further, NINEVEH, LIBRARY OF.

LIBYA, lib'i-a, LIBYANS, lib'i-anz: In the OT the word occurs in AV in 2 Ch 12 3; 16 8; Nah 3 9 for "Lubim" (thus RV). RV, however, retains "Libyans" in Dnl 11 43. In Jer 46 9; Ezk 30 5; 38 5, the words are replaced in RV by PUT (q.v.). In the NT the word "Libya" (Λιβύη, Libúē) occurs, in close connection with CYRENE (q.v.) (Acts 2 10). Gr and Rom writers apply the term to the African continent, generally excluding Egypt. See LUBIM.

RVM suggests "fleas" or "sand-flies." The LXX rendering would favor "sand-flies" or "mosquitoes," between which two insects the OT writers would hardly be expected to discriminate. Mosquitoes belong to the order of Diptera, family Culicidae; the sandfly (Plebotomus papatasi) to the family of Simuliidae of the same order. The sandflies are much smaller than mosquitoes, and are nearly noiseless, but give a sharp sting which may leave an unpleasant irritation. They are abundant in the Levant. In Southern Europe they cause the "three-day fever" or "papataci." As stated under GNAT (q.v.), there is little ground other than the authority of the LXX for deciding between "lice," "fleas," "sand-flies," or "mosquitoes" as tr<sup>s</sup> of kinnīm. See also under GNAT the note on kēn, RVM "gnat" (Isa 51 6).

LICENCE, lī'sens: This word is not found at all in RV (except in Jth 11 14; Eccles 15 20; 1 Macc 1 13), and twice only in AV (except in 2 Macc 4 9), both times in Acts. In Acts 21 40 (as tr of ἐπιτρέπω, epitrepō) ARV has "leave" where AV has "licence." In 25 16, "opportunity to make his defence" (as tr of τόπον ἀπολογίας, tōpon apologias) takes the place of "have licence to answer for himself."

LIDEBIR, līd'ē-bēr (לִדְבִיר, līdēbhīr): For "of Debir" in FV; RVM suggests the name "Lidebir" (Josh 13 26), a city in the territory of Gad. It is probably identical with Lo-DEBAR (q.v.).

LIE, li, LYING (שָׁקַר, sheker [usually, e.g. Isa 9 15; Zec 13 3], or קָזַב, kāzabh vb. [Job 34 6; Mic 2 11]; ψεύδος, psēdos [Jn 8 44; Rev 21 27], "to speak falsely," "to fabricate," "to make a false statement"; ψεύδομαι, psēdomai, in Acts 5 34): In its very essence, a lie is something said with intent to deceive. It is not always a spoken word that is a lie, for a life lived under false pretenses, a hypocritical life, may be a lie equally with a false word (Jer 23 14). A vain thing, like an idol, may be a lie (Isa 59 4), as also a false system (Rom 3 7). Error, as opposed to truth, is a lie (1 Jn 2 21). The denial of the deity of Jesus Christ is regarded as "the" lie (1 Jn 2 22).

The origin of lies and lying is traced to Satan who is called "a liar, and the father thereof" (Jn 8 44; Acts 5 3). Satan's dealing with Eve (Gen 3) furnishes us with a splendid illustration of the first lie, so far as we have any record of it. The whole race is guilty of this sin: "The wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they are born, speaking lies" (Ps 58 3). It is a part of the old Adamic nature, "the old man" (Col 3 9), which the believer in Jesus Christ is called upon to put off. So prominent a factor is it in the experience of the race that among the condensed catalogue of sins, for the commission of which men are finally condemned, the sin of lying finds its place: "All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone" (Rev 21 8 AV).

God's attitude toward this sin is strongly marked throughout both the OT and NT. The righteous are called upon to hate lying (Prov 13 5), to avoid it (Zeph 3 13), to respect not those who lie, and utterly reject their company (Ps 40 4; 101 7), to pray to be delivered from it (Ps 119 29). The wicked are said to love lying (Ps 52 3), to delight in it (Ps 62 4), to seek after it (Ps 4 2), and to give heed to it (Prov 17 4). Lying leads to worse crimes (Hos 4 1.2).

The punishment to be meted out to liars is of the severest kind. They are positively and absolutely excluded from heaven (Rev 21 27; 4. The 22 15), and those who are guilty of this Penalty sin are cast into the lake of fire (Rev 21 8). We are reminded of the awful fate meted out to Ananias and Sapphira when they lied to God and man (Acts 5 1-11). God will "destroy them that speak lies" (Ps 5 6), and "he that uttereth lies shall not escape" (Prov 19 5), yea "a sword is upon the liars" (Jer 50 36 AV). The liar is thereby debarred from rendering any true and acceptable worship unto the Lord (Isa 24 4).

The Scriptures abound with illustrations of lying and the results and penalties therefor. A careful study of these illustrations will reveal the subtlety of falsehood. Sometimes a lie is a half-truth, as set forth in the story of Satan's temptation of Eve (Gen 3). Cain's lie (Gen 4 9) was of the nature of an evasive answer to a direct question. Jacob's deception of his father, in order that he might inherit the blessing of the firstborn, was a barefaced and deliberate lie (Gen 27 19). The answer which Joseph's brethren gave to their father when he asked them concerning the welfare of their brother Joseph is an illustration, as well as a revelation, of the depth of the wickedness of hearts that deliberately set themselves to falsify and deceive (Gen 37 31.32). Even good men are sometimes overtaken in a lie, which, of course, is no more excusable in them than in the wicked; indeed, it is more shameful because the righteous are professed followers of the truth (David in 1 S 21 2). What more striking example of the heinousness of lying in the sight of God can we have than the fate which befell Gehazi who, in order to satisfy a covetous desire for possessions, misrepresented his master Elisha to Naaman the Syrian whom the prophet had healed of his leprosy: "The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow" (2 K 5 22-27)? The story of Peter's denial of his Lord, and his persistent asseverations that he did not know Him and was not one of His followers, makes us shudder to think that it is possible for a follower of Christ so far to forget himself as not only to lie, but buttress lying with swearing (Mt 26 72).

Throughout the Scriptures we find pseudos joined to other words, e.g. "false apostles" (ψευδοἰ ἀπόστολοι, pseuda pōstolos, 2 Cor 11 13), so called probably because a true apostle delivers the message of another, namely, God, while these "false apostles" cared only for self. Such are from Satan, and, like him, they transform themselves into angels of light, and sail under false colors. We read also of "false prophets" (ψευδοπροφήται, pseudoprophētai, Mt 7 15, cf Jer 23 16f), thereby meaning those who falsely claim to bring messages from God and to speak in behalf of God. Mention is made also of "false brethren" (ψευδελφός, pseudadelphos, 2 Cor 11 26), meaning Judaizing teachers, as in Gal 2 4; "false teachers" (ψευδοδιδάσκαλος, pseudodidaskalos, 2 Pet 2 1), men whose teaching was false and who falsely claimed the teacher's office. We read further of "false witnesses" (ψευδομάρτυς, pseudomartys, Mk 28 60); by such are meant those who swear falsely, and testify to what they know is not true. So, too, we find mention of the "false Christs" (ψευδοχριστοί, pseudochristoi, Mt 24 24; Mk 13 22). This personage does not so much deny the existence of a Christ, but rather, on the contrary, builds upon the world's expectations of such a person, and falsely, arrogantly, blasphemously asserts that he is the Christ promised and foretold. It is the Antichrist who denies that there is a Christ; the false Christ affirms himself to be the Christ. Of course there is a sense in which the man of sin will be both Antichrist and a false Christ. See FALSE CHRISTS; FALSE PROPHETS; FALSE SWEARING, FALSE WITNESS.

LITERATURE

I. The Terms.—Of the Heb terms, hâyâh is the vb which means "to live," "to have life," or the vital principle, "to continue to live," or "to live prosperously." In the Piel it signifies "to give life, or preserve, or quicken and restore life." The Hiphil is much like the Piel. The noun hayyim generally used in the pl. is an abstract noun meaning "life," i.e. the possession of the vital principle with its energies and activities. Nephesh often means "living being" or "creature." Sometimes it has the force of the reflexive "self." At other times it refers to the seat of the soul, the personality, the emotions, the appetites—passions and even mental acts. Frequently it means "life," the "seat of life," and in this way it is used about 171 t in the OT, referring to the principle of vitality in both men and animals. Rûah signifies "wind," "breath," principle or source of vitality, but is never used to signify life proper.

II. The OT Teaching.—The term "life" is used in the OT in the popular sense. It meant life in the body, the existence and activity of the man in all his parts and energies. 1. Popular Use of the Term It is the person complete, conscious and active. There is no idea of the body being a fetter or prison to the soul; the body was essential to life and the writers had no desire to be separated from it. To them the physical sphere was a necessity, and a man was living when all his activities were performed in the light of God's face and favor. The secret and source of life to them was relationship with God. There was nothing good or desirable apart from this relation of fellowship. To overcome or be rid of sin was necessary to life. The real center of gravity in life was in the moral and religious part of man's nature. This must be in fellowship with God, the source of all life and activity.

The conception of life is very complex. Several meanings are clearly indicated: (1) Very frequently it refers to the vital principle itself, the body, the existence and activity of the man in all his parts and energies. 2. Complexity of the Idea It is the person complete, conscious and active. There is no idea of the body being a fetter or prison to the soul; the body was essential to life and the writers had no desire to be separated from it. To them the physical sphere was a necessity, and a man was living when all his activities were performed in the light of God's face and favor. The secret and source of life to them was relationship with God. There was nothing good or desirable apart from this relation of fellowship. To overcome or be rid of sin was necessary to life. The real center of gravity in life was in the moral and religious part of man's nature. This must be in fellowship with God, the source of all life and activity. (2) It is used to denote the period of one's actual existence, i.e. "lifetime" (Gen 23 1; 25 7; 47 9; Ex 6 16; 18 20, etc.). (3) The life is represented as a direct gift from God, and dependent absolutely upon Him for its continuance (Gen 1 11-27; 2 7; Nu 16 22). (4) In a few cases it refers to the conception of children, denoting the time when conception was possible (Gen 18 10-14 m; 2 K 4 16.17 m). (5) In many cases it refers to the totality of man's relationships and activities, all of which make up life (Dt 32 47; 1 S 25 29; Job 10 1, etc.). (6) In a few instances it is used synonymously with the means of sustaining life (Dt 24 6; Prov 27 27). (7) Many times it is used synonymously with happiness or well-being (Dt 30 15.19; Ezr 6 10; Ps 16 11; 30 5; Prov 2 19, and frequently). (8) It is always represented as a very precious gift, and offences against life were to be severely punished (Gen 9 4.5; Lev 17 14; 24 17).

Capital punishment is here specifically enjoined because of the value of the life that has been taken. The lex talionis required life for life (Ex 21 23; Dt 19 21); and this even applies to the beast (Lev 24 18). The life was represented as abiding in the blood and therefore the blood must not be eaten, or lightly shed upon the ground (Lev 17 15; Dt 12 23). The Decalogue forbids murder or the taking of human life wrongfully (Ex 20 13; Dt 5 17). Garments taken in pledge must not be kept over night, for thereby the owner's life might be endangered (Dt 24 6). That life was considered precious appears in 2 K 10 24; Est 7 7; Job 2 4; Prov 4 23; 6 26. The essence of sacrifice consisted in the fact that the life (the nephesh) resided in the blood; thus when blood was shed, life was lost (Dt 12 23; Lev 17 11). Oppression on the part of judges and rulers was severely condemned because oppression was detrimental to life.

(9) Long life was much desired and sought by the Israelites, and under certain conditions this was possible (Ps 91 16). The longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs is a problem by itself (see ANTEDILUVIANS). It was one of the greatest of calamities to be cut off in the midst of life (Isa 38 10-12; 53 8); that a good old age was longed for is shown by Ex 20 12; Ps 21 4; 34 12; 61 6, etc. This long life was possible to the obedient to parents (Ex 20 12; Dt 5 16), and to those obedient to God (Dt 4 4; Prov 3 1.2; 10 27); to the wise (Prov 3 16; 9 11); to the pure in heart (Ps 34 12-14; 91 1-10; Eccl 3 12 13); to those who feared God (Prov 10 27; Isa 65 18-21; 38 2-5, etc.). (10) The possibility of an immortal life is dimly hinted at in the earliest writing, and much more clearly taught in the later. The Tree of Life in the midst of the garden indicated a possible immortality for man upon earth (Gen 2 9; 3 22.24) (see TREE OF LIFE).

Falling to partake of this and falling into sin by partaking of the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil," they were driven forth from the garden lest they should eat of the tree of life and become immortal beings in their sinful condition. To deprive man of the possibility of making himself immortal while sinful was a blessing to the race; immortality without holiness is a curse rather than a blessing. The way to the tree of life was henceforth guarded by the cherubim and the flame of a sword, so that men could not partake of it in their condition of sin. This, however, did not exclude the possibility of a spiritual immortality in another sphere. Enoch's fellowship with God led to a bodily translation, so also Elijah, and several hundred years after their deaths, God called Himself the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, implying that they were really alive then. In Isa 26 19 there is a clear prophecy of a resurrection, and an end of death. Dnl 12 2 asserts a resurrection of many of the dead, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt. Some of the psalmists firmly believed in the continuity of the life in fellowship with God (Ps 16 10.11; 17 15; 23 6; 49 15; 73 24.25). The exact meaning of some of these statements is difficult to understand, yet this much is clear: there was a revolt against death in many pious minds, and a belief that the life of fellowship with God could not end or be broken even by death itself. See IMMORTALITY.

(11) The fundamental fact in the possession of life was vital relationship with God. Men first lived because God breathed into them the breath of life (Gen 2 7). Man's vital energies are the outflowing of the spirit or vital energies of God, and all activities are dependent upon the vitalizing power from God. When God sends forth His spirit, things are created, and live; when He withdraws that spirit they die (Ps 104 30). "In his favor is life" (Ps 30 5 AV). He is the fountain of life (Ps 36 9; 63 3). "All my fountains are in thee" (Ps 87 7). The secret of Job's success and happiness was that the Almighty was with him (Job 29 2). This fellowship brought him health, friends, prosperity and all other blessings. The consciousness of the fellowship with God led men to revolt against the idea of going to Sheol where this fellowship must cease. They felt that such a relationship could not cease, and God would take them out of Sheol.

III. In the Apocrypha.—A similar conception of life appears here as in the OT. Zōē and psuchē are used and occur most frequently in the books of Wisd and Ecclus. In 1 and 2 Esd the word is little used; 2 Esd 3 5; 16 61 are but a quotation from Gen 2 7, and refer to the vital principle; 2 Esd 14 30, Tob, Jth, Ad Est use it in the same sense also. Wisd and Ecclus use it in several senses closely resembling the use in Prov (cf Ecclus 4 12; Prov 3 18; 10 16). In general there is no additional meaning attached to the word. The Ps Sol refer to everlasting life in 3 16; 13 10; 14 2.6.

IV. In the NT.—Of the Gr terms bios is used at times as the equivalent of the Heb hayyim. It refers to life extensively, i.e. the period of one's existence, a lifetime; also to the means of sustaining life, such as wealth, etc. Psuchē is also equivalent to hayyim at times, but very frequently to nephesh and sometimes to rūah. Thus it means the vital principle, a living being, the immaterial part of man, the seat of the affections, desires and appetites, etc. The term zōē corresponds very closely to hayyim, and means the vital principle, the state of one who is animate, the fullness of activities and relationship both in the physical and spiritual realms.

The content of the word zōē is the chief theme of the NT. The life is mediated by Jesus Christ. In the OT this life was through fellowship with God, in the NT it is through Jesus Christ the Mediator. The OT idea is carried to its completion, its highest development of meaning, being enriched by the supreme teaching and revelation of Jesus Christ. In the NT as well as in the OT, the center of gravity in human life is in the moral and religious nature of man.

The teaching here regarding life naturally links itself with OT ideas and the prevailing conceptions of Judaism. The word is used in the

1. In the Synoptic Gospels sense of (1) the vital principle, that which gives actual physical existence (Mt 2 20; Mk 10 45; Lk 12 22 f; 14 26). (2) It is also the period of one's existence, i.e. lifetime (Lk 1 75; 16 25). (3) Once it may mean the totality of man's relationships and activities (Lk 12 15) which do not consist in abundance of material possessions. (4) Generally it means the real life, the vital connection with the world and God, the sum total of man's highest interests. It is called "eternal life" (Mt 19 29; 25 46). It is called "life" (Mt 18 8.9; 19 17; Mk 9 43.45.46). In these passages Jesus seems to imply that it is almost equivalent to "laying up treasures in heaven," or to "entering the kingdom of God." The entering into life and entering the kingdom are practically the same, for the kingdom is that spiritual realm where God controls, where the principles, activities and relationships of heaven prevail, and hence to enter into these is to enter into "life." (5) The lower life of earthly relationship and activities must be subordinated to the higher and spiritual (Mt 10 39; 16 25; Lk 9 24). These merely earthly interests may be very desirable and enjoyable, but whoever would cling to these and make them supreme is in danger of losing the higher. The spiritual being infinitely more valuable should be sought even if the other relationship should be lost entirely. (6) Jesus also speaks of this life as something future, and to be realized at the consummation of the age (Mt 19 29; Lk 18 30), or the world to come.

This in no wise contradicts the statement that eternal life can be entered upon in this life. As Jesus Himself was in vital relationship with the spiritual world and lived the eternal life, He sought to bring others into the same blessed state. This life was far from being perfect. The perfection could come only at the consummation when all was perfection and then they would enter into the perfect fellowship with God and connection with the spirit-world and its blessed experiences. There is no conflict in His teaching here, no real difficulty, only an illustration of Browning's statement, "Man never is but wholly hopes to be." Thus in the synoptists Jesus teaches the reality of the eternal life as a present possession as well as future fruition. The future is but the flowering out and perfection of the present. Without the present bud, there can be no future flower.

(7) The conditions which Jesus lays down for entering into this life are faith in Himself as the one Mediator of the life, and the following of Him in a life of obedience. He alone knows the Father and can reveal Him to others (Mt 11 27). He alone can give true rest and can teach men how to live (11 28 f). The sure way to this life is: "Follow me." His whole ministry was virtually a prolonged effort to win confidence in Himself as Son and Mediator, to win obedience, and hence bring men unto these spiritual relationships and activities which constitute the true life.

The fullest and richest teachings regarding life are found here. The greatest word of this Gospel

2. In the Fourth Gospel is "life." The author says he wrote the Gospel in order that "ye may have life" (20 31). Most of the teachings recorded, circle around this great word

"life." This teaching is in no way distinctive and different from that of the synoptists, but is supplementary, and completes the teaching of Jesus on the subject. The use of the word is not as varied, being concentrated on the one supreme subject. (1) In a few cases it refers only to the vital principle which gives life or produces a lifetime (10 11.15-18; 13 37; 15 13). (2) It represents Jesus the Logos as the origin and means of all life to the world. As the preincarnate Logos He was the source of life to the universe (1 4). As the incarnate Logos He said His life had been derived originally from the Father (5 26; 6 57; 10 18). He then was the means of life to men (3 15.16; 4 14; 5 21.39.40); and this was the purpose for which He came into the world (6 33.34.51; 10 10). (3) The prevailing reference, however, is to those activities which are the expression of fellowship with God and Jesus Christ. These relationships are called "eternal life" (3 15.16.36; 4 14, etc.). The nearest approach to a definition of eternal life is found in 17 3. Though not a scientific or metaphysical definition, it is nevertheless Jesus' own description of eternal life, and reveals His conception of it. It is thus more valuable than a formal definition. It is "to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent."

This knowledge is vastly more than mere intellectual perception or understanding. It is moral knowledge, it is personal acquaintance, it is fellowship, a contact, if we may so speak, of personality with personality, an inner affinity and sympathy, an experience of similar thoughts, emotions, purposes, motives, desires, an interchange of the heart's deepest feelings and experiences. It is a bringing of the whole personality of man into right relationship with the personality of God. This relation is ethical, personal, binding the two together with ties which nothing can separate. It is into this experience that Jesus came to bring men. Such a life Jesus says is satisfying to all who hunger and thirst for it (4 14; 6 35); it is the source of light to all (1 4; 8 12); it is indestructible (6 58; 11 26); it is like a well of water in the soul (4 14); it is procured by personally partaking of those qualities which belong to Jesus (6 53).

(4) This life is a present possession and has also a glorious future fruition. (a) To those who exercise faith in Jesus it is a present experience and possession (4 10; 5 24.40). Faith in Him as the Son of God is the psychological means by which persons are brought into this vital relationship with God. Those who exercised the faith immediately experienced this new power and fellowship and exercised the new activities. (b) It has a glorious fruition in the future also (4 36; 5 29; 6 39.44.54). John does not give so much prominence to the eschatological phase of Jesus' teachings as to the present reality and actual possession of this blessed life.

(5) It has been objected that in speaking of the Logos as the source of life John is pursuing a metaphysical line, whereas the life which he so much emphasizes has an ethical basis, and he makes no attempt to reconcile the two. The objection may have force to one who has imbibed the Ritschlian idea of performing the impossible task of eliminating all metaphysics from theology. It will not appeal very strongly to the average Christian. It is a purely academic objection. The ordinary mind will think that if Jesus Christ is the source of ethical and eternal life it is because He possesses something of the essence and being of God, which makes His work for men possible. The metaphysical and the ethical may exist together, may run concurrently, the one being the source and seat of the other. There is no contradiction. Both metaphysics and ethics are a legitimate and necessary exercise of the human mind.

In His intercessory prayer (Jn 17), Jesus said His mission was to give eternal life to as many as the

3. In the Acts of the Apostles the record in Acts is the carrying out of that purpose. The word "life" is used in several senses: (1) the vital principle or physical life (17 25; 20 10, 24; 27 10, 22); (2) also the sum total of man's relationships and activities upon earth (5 20; 26 4); (3) Jesus Christ is regarded as the source and principle of life, being called by Peter, "the Prince of life" (3 15). Also the life eternal or everlasting is spoken of with the same significance as in the Gospels (11 18; 13 46, 48).

Here also the words for "life" are used in various senses: (1) the vital principle which gives physical

4. In the Writings of Paul vitality and existence (Rom 8 11, 38; 11 15; 1 Cor 3 22; Phil 1 20; 2 30); (2) the sum total of man's relationships and activities (1 Cor 6 3, 4; 1 Tim 2 2; 4 8; 2 Tim 1 1; 3 10 AV); (3) those relationships with God and with Christ in the spiritual realm, and the activities arising therefrom which constitute the real and eternal life. This is mediated by Christ (Rom 5 10). It is in Christ (Rom 6 11). It is the free gift of God (6 23). It is also mediated or imparted to us through the Spirit (Rom 8 2, 6, 9, 10; 2 Cor 2 16; 3 6; Gal 6 8). It comes through obedience to the word (Rom 7 10; Phil 2 16); and through faith (1 Tim 1 16). It may be apprehended in this life (1 Tim 6 12, 19). It is brought to light through the gospel (2 Tim 1 10). It is a reward to those who by patience in well-doing seek it (Rom 2 7). It gives conquering power over sin and death (Rom 5 17, 18, 21). It is the end or reward of a sanctified life (Rom 6 22). It is a present possession and a hope (Tit 1 2; 3 7). It will be received in all its fulness hereafter (Rom 2 7; 2 Cor 5 4). Thus Paul's use of the word substantially agrees with the teaching in the Gospels, and no doubt was largely based upon it.

In the Johannine Epp. and Rev, the contents of the term "life" are the same as those in the Fourth Gospel. Life in certain passages (1

5. In the Writings of John Jn 3 16; Rev 8 9; 11 11; 12 11) is mere physical vitality and existence upon earth. The source of life is Christ Himself (1 Jn 1 1f; 5 11f, 16).

The blessed eternal life in Christ is a present possession to all those who are in fellowship with the Father and the Son (1 Jn 5 11, 12). Here is an echo of the words of Jesus (Jn 17 3) where John describes the life, the eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us. It is virtually fellowship with the Father and with the Son (1 Jn 1 2, 4). Life is promised to those who are faithful (Rev 2 7); and the crown of life is promised to those who are faithful unto death (Rev 2 10). The crown of life doubtless refers to the realization of all the glorious possibilities that come through fellowship with God and the Son. The thirsty are invited to come and drink of the water of life freely (Rev 21 6; 22 17). The river of life flows through the streets of the New Jerusalem (22 1), and the tree of life blooms on its banks, bearing twelve manner of fruit (22 1, 4). See TREE OF LIFE.

The Ep. to the He speaks of our lifetime or periods of existence upon earth (2 15; 7 3), likewise of the power of an indissoluble life (7 16); James promises the crown of life to the faithful (1 12). This reward is the fulness of life's possibilities hereafter. Our lifetime is mentioned in 4 14 and represented as brief as a vapor. Peter in 1 Pet 3 7 speaks of man and wife as joint-heirs of the grace of life, and of loving life (3 10), referring to the totality of relationships and activities. The "all things that pertain unto life and godliness" (2 Pet 1 3) constitute the whole Christian life involving the life eternal.

LIFE, TREE OF. See TREE OF LIFE.

LIFT: To make lofty, to raise up. A very common word in EV representing a great variety of Heb and Gr words, although in the OT used chiefly as the tr of נָסָא, nāsā'. Of none of these words, however, is "lift" used as a technical tr, and "lift" is interchanged freely with its synonyms, esp. "exalt" (cf Ps 75 5; 89 24) and "raise" (cf Eccl 4 10; 2 S 12 17). "Lift" is still perfectly good English, but not in all the senses in which it is used in EV; e.g. such phrases as "men that lifted up axes upon a thicket" (Ps 74 5), "lift up thy feet unto the perpetual ruins" (Ps 74 3, etc.), and even the common "lift up the eyes" or "hands" are distinctly archaic. However, almost all the uses are perfectly clear, and only the following need be noted. "To lift up the head" (Gen 40 13, 19, 20; 2 K 25 27; Ps 3 3; Sir 11 13; Lk 21 28) means to raise from a low condition (but on Ps 24 7, 9 see GATE). To "lift up the horn" (Ps 75 5) is to assume a confident position, the figure being taken from fighting oxen (see HORN). "Lift up the face" may be meant lit. (2 K 9 32), or it may denote the bestowal of favor (Ps 4 6); it may mean the attitude of a righteous man toward God (Job 22 26), or simply the attitude of a suppliant (Ezr 9 6).

The creation of light was the initial step in the creation of life. "Let there be light" (Gen 1 3) was the first word of God spoken after His creative Spirit "moved" upon the primary material out of which He created the heavens and the earth, and which lay, until the utterance of that word, in the chaos of darkness and desolation. Something akin, possibly, to the all-pervasive

1. Origin of Light electro-magnetic activity of the aurora borealis penetrated the chaotic night of the world. The ultimate focusing of light (on the 4th day of creation, Gen 1 14) in suns, stars, and solar systems brought the initial creative process to completion, as the essential condition of all organic life. The origin of light thus finds its explanation in the purpose and very nature of God whom John defines as not only the Author of light but, in an all-inclusive sense, as light itself: "God is light" (1 Jn 1 5).

The word "light" is Divinely rich in its comprehensiveness and meaning. Its material splendor is used throughout the Scriptures as the symbol and synonym of all that is luminous and radiant in the mental, moral and spiritual life of men and angels; while the eternal God, because of His holiness and moral perfection, is pictured as "dwelling in light unapproachable" (1 Tim 6 16). Every phase of the word, from the original light in the natural world to the spiritual glory of the celestial, is found in Holy Writ.

(1) Natural light.—The light of day (Gen 1 5); of sun, moon and stars; "lights in the firmament" (Gen 1 14-18; Ps 74 16; 136 7; 148 3; Eccl 12 2; Rev 22 5). Its characteristics are beauty, radiance, utility. It "rejoiceth the heart" (Prov 15 30); "Truly the light is sweet" (Eccl 11 7); without it men stumble and are helpless (Jn 11 9,10); it is something for which they wait with inexpressible longing (Job 30 26; cf Ps 130 6). Life, joy, activity and all blessings are dependent upon light.

Light and life are almost synonymous to the inhabitants of Pal, and in the same way darkness and death. There is the land of sunshine. When they go to other lands of clouded skies their only thought is to return to the brightness and sunshine of their native land. In Pal there is hardly a day in the whole year when the sun does not shine for some part of it, while for five months of the year there is scarcely an interruption of the sunshine. Time is reckoned from sunset to sunset. The day's labor closes with the coming of darkness. "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening" (Ps 104 23).

The suddenness of the change from darkness to light with the rising sun and the disappearance of the sun in the evening is more striking than in more northern countries, and it is not strange that in the ancient days there should have arisen a worship of the sun as the giver of light and happiness, and that Job should mention the enticement of sun-worship when he "beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness" (Job 31 26). The severest plague in Egypt next to the slaying of the firstborn was the plague of darkness which fell upon the Egyptians (Ex 10 23). This love of light finds expression in both OT and NT in a very extensive use of the word to express those things which are most to be desired and most helpful to man, and in this connection we find some of the most beautiful figures in the Bible.

(2) Artificial light.—When natural light fails, man by discovery or invention provides himself with some temporary substitute, however dim and inadequate. The ancient Hebrews had "oil for the light" (Ex 25 6; 35 8; Lev 24 2) and lamps (Ex 35 14; Mt 5 15). "There were many lights [λαμπάς, lampáis] in the upper chamber" at Troas, where Paul preached until midnight (Acts 20 8); so Jer 25 10 RV, "light of the lamp," AV "candle."

(3) Miraculous light.—When the appalling plague of "thick darkness," for three days, enveloped the Egyptians, terrified and rendered them helpless, "all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings" (Ex 10 23). Whether the darkness was due to a Divinely ordered natural cause or the light was the natural light of day, the process that preserved the interspersed Israelites from the encompassing darkness was supernatural. Miraculous, also, even though through natural agency, was the "pillar of fire" that gave light to the Israelites escaping from Pharaoh (Ex 13 21; 14 20; Ps 78 14), "He led them . . . all the night with a light of fire." Supernatural was the effulgence at Christ's transfiguration that made "his garments . . . white as the light" (Mt 17 2). Under the same category Paul classifies 'the great light' that 'suddenly shone round about him from heaven' on the way to Damascus (Acts 22 6; cf 9 3). In these rare instances the supernatural light was not only symbolic of an inner spiritual light, but instrumental, in part at least, in revealing or preparing the way for it.

(4) Mental, moral, spiritual light.—The phenomena of natural light have their counterpart in the inner life of man. Few words lend themselves with such beauty and appropriateness to the experiences, conditions, and radiance of the spiritual life. For this reason the Scriptures use "light" largely in the figurative sense. Borrowed from the natural world, it is, nevertheless, inherently suited to portray spiritual realities. In secular life a distinct line of demarkation is drawn between intellectual and spiritual knowledge and illumination. Education that enlightens the mind may leave the moral man untouched. This distinction rarely obtains in the Bible, which deals with man as a spiritual being and looks upon his faculties as interdependent in their action.

(a) A few passages, however, refer to the light that comes chiefly to the intellect or mind through Divine instruction, e.g. Ps 119 130, "The opening of thy words giveth light"; so Prov 6 23, "The law is light." Even here the instruction includes moral as well as mental enlightenment.

(b) Moral: Job 24 13,16 has to do exclusively with man's moral attitude to truth: "rebel against the light"; "know not the light." Isa 5 20 describes a moral confusion and blindness, which cannot distinguish light from darkness.

(c) For the most part, however, light and life go together. It is the product of salvation: "Jeh is my light and my salvation" (Ps 27 1). "Light," figuratively used, has to do preeminently with spiritual life, including also the illumination that floods all the faculties of the soul: intellect, conscience, reason, will. In the moral realm the enlightenment of these faculties is dependent wholly on the renewal of the spirit. "In thy light . . . we see light" (Ps 36 9); "The life was the light of men" (Jn 1 4).

Light is an attribute of holiness, and thus a personal quality. It is the outshining of Deity.

(1) God.—"God is light, and in him

3. An Attribute of Holiness is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1 5). Darkness is the universal symbol and condition of sin and death; light the symbol and expression of holiness.

"The light of Israel will be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame" (Isa 10 17). God, by His presence and grace, is to us a "marvellous light" (1 Pet 2 9). The glory of His holiness and presence is the "everlasting light" of the redeemed in heaven (Isa 60 19,20; Rev 21 23,24; 22 5).

(2) Christ, the eternal Word (λόγος, logos, Jn 1 1), who said "Let there be light" (Gen 1 3), is Himself the "effulgence of [God's] glory" (He 1 3), "the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world" (Jn 1 9) (cf the statements concerning Wisdom in Wisd 7 25 f and concerning Christ in He 1 3; and see CREEDS; LOGOS; JOHANNINE THEOLOGY; WISDOM). As the predicted Messiah, He was to be "for a light of the Gentiles" (Isa 42 6; 49 6). His birth was the fulfilment of this prophecy (Lk 2 32). Jesus called Himself "the light of the world" (Jn 8 12; 9 5; 12 46). As light He was "God . . . manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim 3 16 AV). "The Word was God" (Jn 1 1). Jesus as λόγος is the eternal expression of God as a word is the expression of a thought. In the threefold essence of His being God is Life (ζωή, zōē) (Jn 5 26; 6 57); God is Love (ἀγάπη, agāpē) (1 Jn 4 8); God is Light (φῶς, phōs) (1 Jn 1 5). Thus Christ, the logos, manifesting the three aspects of the Divine Nature, is Life, Love and Light, and these three are inseparable and constitute the glory which the disciples beheld in Him, "glory as of the only begotten from the Father" (Jn 1 14). In revealing and giving life, Christ becomes "the light of men" (Jn 1 4). God gives "the light of the knowledge of [his] glory in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4 6), and this salvation is called "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ" (4 4). Christ is thus the Teacher, Enlightener ("Christ shall give thee light," Eph 5 14 AV), Guide, Saviour of men.

(3) All who catch and reflect the light of God and of Christ are called "light," "lights." (a) John the Baptist "a burning and a shining light" (Jn 5 35 AV). It is significant that this pre-Christian prophet was termed a λύχνος, lúchnos, while the disciples of the new dispensation are called φῶς, phōs (Mt 5 14): "Ye are the light of the world." (b) Henceforth Christians and saints were called "children of light" (Lk 16 8; Jn 12 36; Eph 5 8), and were expected to be "seen as lights in the world" (Phil 2 15). (c) The Jew who possessed the law mistakenly supposed he was "a light of them that are in darkness" (Rom 2 19).

(4) The church.—Zion was to "shine" because her 'light had come' (Isa 60 1). The Gentiles were to come to her light (60 3). Her mission as the enlightener of the world was symbolized in the ornamentations of her priesthood. The Urim of the high priest's breastplate signified light, and the name itself is but the pl. form of the Heb 'ôr. It stood for revelation, and Thummim for truth. The church of the Christian dispensation was to be even more radiant with the light of God and of Christ. The seven churches of Asia were revealed to John, by the Spirit, as seven golden candlesticks, and her ministers as seven stars, both luminous with the light of the Gospel revelation. In Eph, Christ, who is the Light of the world, is the Head of the church, the latter being His body through which His glory is to be manifested to the world, "to make all men see," etc (Eph 3 9, 10). "Unto him be the glory in the church" (ver 21), the church bringing glory to God, by revealing His glory to men through its reproduction of the life and light of Christ.

Light symbolizes: (1) the eye, "The light of the body is the eye" (Mt 6 22 AV; Lk 11 34); (2) watchfulness, "Let your lights [RV

4. Sym- "lamps"] be burning," the figure being bolism taken from the parable of the Virgins; (3) protection, "armor of light" (Rom 13 12), the garment of a holy and Christ-like life; (4) the sphere of the Christian's daily walk, "inheritance of the saints in light" (Col 1 12); (5) heaven, for the inheritance just referred to includes the world above in which "the Lamb is the light thereof"; (6) prosperity, relief (Est 8 16; Job 30 26), in contrast with the calamities of the wicked whose "light . . . shall be put out" (Job 18 5); (7) joy and gladness (Job 3 20; Ps 97 11; 112 4); (8) God's favor, "the light of thy countenance" (Ps 4 6; 44 3; 89 15), and a king's favor (Prov 16 15); (9) life (Ps 13 3; 49 19; Jn 1 4).

Expressive terms are: (1) "fruit of the light" (Eph 5 9), i.e. goodness, righteousness, truth; (2) "light in the Lord" (Eph 5 8), indicating the source of light (cf Isa 2 5); (3) "inheritance of the saints in light" (Col 1 12), a present experience issuing in heaven; (4) "Father of lights" (Jas 1 17), signifying the Creator of the heavenly bodies; (5) "marvellous light" (1 Pet 2 9), the light of God's presence and fellowship; (6) "Walk in the light" (1 Jn 1 7), in the light of God's teaching and companionship; (7) "abideth in the light" (1 Jn 2 10), in love, Divine and fraternal; (8) "Light of the glorious gospel of Christ"; "light of the knowledge of the glory of God" (2 Cor 4 4, 6 AV).

DWIGHT M. PRATT

what is small, slight, trivial, easy; "lightness" with the connotation of vacillation or lasciviousness. Thus in the OT, "a light thing," a small, easy, slight thing (לָקַל, kālal, 2 K 3 18; Isa 49 6; Ezk 8 17; 22 7, in the last case "to treat slightly"). "Lightness" (קֹל, kōl) occurs in Jer 3 9 ("the lightness of her whoredom"); in 23 32, RV changes "lightness" (a different word) to "vain boasting." In the NT the phrase occurs in Mt 22 5, "made light of it" (ἀμελέω, amelēō), i.e. "treated it with neglect"; and St. Paul asks (2 Cor 1 17), "Did I show lightness?" (RV "fickleness"). These examples sufficiently illustrate the meaning.

LIGHTNING, lit'ning (רָקַע, bārāk, רָאָה, kāziz; ἀστραπή, astrapē): Lightning is caused by the discharge of electricity between clouds or between clouds and the earth. In a thunder-storm there is a rapid gathering of particles of moisture into clouds and forming of large drops of rain. This gathers with it electric potential until the surface of the cloud (or the enlarged water particles) is insufficient to carry the charge, and a discharge takes place, producing a brilliant flash of light and the resulting thunder-clap. Thunder-storms are common in Syria and Pal during the periods of heavy rain in the spring and fall and are often severe. Lightning is usually accompanied by heavy rainfall or by hail, as at the time of the plague of hail (Ex 9 24). See HAIL.

In the Scriptures it is used: (a) indicating the power of God: The power of God is shown in His command of the forces of Nature, and He is the only one who knows the secrets of Nature: "He made . . . a way for the lightning" (Job 28 26); "He directeth . . . his lightning" (Job 37 3 AV); "Canst thou send forth lightnings, that they may go?" (Job 38 35); "Ask ye of Jeh . . . that maketh lightnings" (Zec 10 1). See also Ps 18 14; 97 4; 135 7; Job 36 32; Jer 10 13; (b) figuratively and poetically: David sings of Jeh, "He sent . . . lightnings manifold, and discomfited them" (Ps 18 14); used for speed: "The chariots . . . run like the lightnings" (Nah 2 4); "His arrow shall go forth as the lightning" (Zec 9 14); "The living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning" (Ezk 1 14). The coming of the kingdom is described by Jesus as the shining of the lightning from one part of heaven to another, even "from the east unto the west" (Mt 24 27; Lk 17 24); (c) meaning bright or shining: Daniel in his vision saw a man and "his face [was] as the appearance of lightning" (Dnl 10 6). See also Rev 4 5; 8 5; 16 18.

LIGURE, lig'tr (Ex 28 19; 39 12 AV, RV "jacinth"). See STONES, PRECIOUS.

LIKE, lik, LIKEN, lik'n, LIKENESS, lik'nes, LIKING, lik'ing: (1) As a noun, "like" in modern Eng. is virtually obsolete, except in the phrase "and the like," which is not found in EV. "The like," however, occurs in 1 K 10 20 || 2 Ch 9 19; 2 Ch 1 12; Ezk 5 9; 18 10 (RV "any one of these things"—the text is uncertain); 45 25; Joel 2 2; Wisd 16 1 (RV "creatures like those"); Sir 7 12. "His like" is found in Job 41 33; Sir 13 15; "their like" in Sir 27 9. "And such like" (Gal 5 21) is only slightly archaic, but "doeth not such like" (Ezk 18 14) is quite obsolete.

(2) As an adj. "like" is common in AV in such combinations as "like manner" (frequently), "like weight" (Ex 30 34), "like occupation" (Acts 19 25), etc. Modern Eng. would in most cases replace

"like" by "the same," as has been done in 1 Thess 2 14 RV (cf Rom 15 5; Phil 2 2). So RV has modernized the archaic "like precious faith" of 2 Pet 1 1 by inserting "a" before "like." AV's rendering of 1 Pet 3 21, "the like figure whereunto," could not have been very clear at any time, and RV has revised completely into "after a true likeness" (m "in the antitype").

(3) As an advb. "like" is used in Jer 38 9, "He is like to die"; Jon 1 4, "like to be broken." RV could have used "likely" in these verses. Most common of all the uses of "like" is the quasi-prepositional construction in "He is like a man," etc. This is of course good modern Eng., but not so when "like" is enlarged (as it usually is in EV) into the forms "like to" (Dnl 7 5), "like unto" (very common), "like as" (Isa 26 17, etc). These forms and the simple "like" are interchanged without much distinction, and the RV has attempted little systematizing beyond reducing the occurrences of "like as" (cf Mt 12 13, and ARV Isa 13 4; Jer 23 29).

(4) The vb. "like" has two distinct meanings, "be pleased with" and "give pleasure to." The latter sense occurs in Dt 23 16 (AV, ERV), "in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best," and in Est 8 8; Am 4 5 AV; Sir 33 13 (ARV has "pleaseth" in the three OT passages). The other use of "like" belongs also to modern Eng., although in a much weakened sense. On account of this weakening, 1 Ch 28 4 AV, "liked me to make me king" and Rom 1 28 AV, "did not like to retain God," have become in RV "took pleasure in" and "refused to" (m "did not approve"). It would have been better if Dt 25 7,8, "like not to take," had been modified also into "hath no wish to take." From this use of "like" is derived liking in the modern sense in Wisd 16 21, "tempered itself to every man's liking" (RV "choice"). In 1 Esd 4 39, "All men do well like of her works" is a further obsolete use.

(5) Liken and "make like" are common. To be noted only is that, in He 7 3, "made like unto the Son of God," the sense really is "likened to," "presented by the writer with the qualities of." Likeness normally means "a copy of," but in Ps 17 15 it means the actual form itself ("form" in ARV, ERV); cf Rom 6 5; 8 3; Phil 2 7, and perhaps Acts 14 11. Closely allied with "likeness" is an obsolete use of "liking" (quite distinct from that above) in Job 39 4 AV, ERV, "Their young ones are in good liking"; Dnl 1 10, "see your faces worse liking." The meaning is "appearance," "appearing," and ARV renders "their young ones become strong," "see your faces worse looking." Likewise varies in meaning from the simple conjunction "and" to a strong advb., "in exactly the same way." RV has made some attempt to distinguish the various forces (e.g. cf AV with RV in Lk 22 36; 15 7; 22 20). But complete consistency was not attainable, and in certain instances was neglected deliberately, in order to preserve the familiar wording, as in Lk 10 37, "Go, and do thou likewise." BRITTON SCOTT EASTON

LIKHI, lik'hi (לִּקְחִי, lik'hî): A descendant of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 19).

LILITH, lil'ith, lî'lith. See NIGHT-MONSTER.

LILY, lil'i (שִׁשְׁמֶן, shūshan [1 K 7 19], שִׁשְׁמֶן, shōshannāh [2 Ch 4 5; Cant 2 1 f; Hos 14 5]; pl. [Cant 2 16; 4 5; 5 13; 6 2 f; 7 2; Eccles 39 14; 50 8]; κρινον, krinon [Mt 6 28; Lk 12 27]): The Heb is probably a loan word from the Egypt, the original s-sh-n denoting the lotus-flower, Nymphaea lotus. This was probably the model of the architectural ornament, tr<sup>d</sup> "lily-work," which appeared upon the capitals of the columns in the temple porch (1 K 7 19), upon the top of the pillars (ver 22) and upon the turned-back rim of the "molten sea" (ver 26).

Botanically the word shōshannāh, like the similar modern Arab. Sūsan, included in all probability a great many flowers, and was used in a way at least as wide as the popular use of the Eng. word "lily." The expression "lily of the valleys" (Cant 2 1) has nothing to do with the plant of that name; the flowers referred to appear to have been associated with the rank herbage of the valley bottoms (Cant 4 5); the expression "His lips are as lilies" (5 13) might imply a scarlet flower, but more probably in oriental imagery signifies a sweet-scented flower; the sweet scent of the lily is referred to in Eccles 39 14, and in 50 8 we read of "lilies by the rivers of water." The beauty of the blossom is implied in Hos 14 5, where Jeh promises that repentant Israel shall "blossom as the lily." A "heap of wheat set about with lilies" (Cant 7 2) probably refers to the smoothed-out piles of newly threshed wheat on the threshing-floors decorated by a circlet of flowers.

The reference of Our Lord to the "lilies of the field" is probably, like the OT references, quite a general one.

The Heb and the Gr very likely include not only any members of the great order Liliaceae, growing in Pal, e.g. asphodel, squill, hyacinth, ornithogalum ("Star of Bethlehem"), fritillaria, tulip and colocynt, but also the more showy irises ("Tabor lilies," "purple irises," etc) and the beautiful gladioli of the N.O. Iridaceae and the familiar narcissi of the N.O. Amaryllidaceae.

In later Jewish lit. the lily is very frequently referred to symbolically, and a lotus or lily was commonly pictured on several Jewish coins.

LILY-WORK: The ornament of the capitals on the bronze pillars, Jachin and Boaz, in front of Solomon's temple (1 K 7 19,22). See LILY; TEMPLE; JACHIN AND BOAZ.

LIME, lim ([1] שִׁיד, sīdh; cf Arab. شَاد, shād, "to plaster"; [2] גִּיר, gīr; cf Arab. جَبْر, jīr, "gypsum" or "quick-lime"; [3] אֲבִנֵי-גִיר, 'abhne-gīr): Sīdh is tr<sup>d</sup> "lime" in Isa 33 12, "And the peoples shall be as the burnings of lime, as thorns cut down, that are burned in the fire," and in Am 2 1, "He burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime." It is tr<sup>d</sup> "plaster" in Dt 27 2, "Thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaster them with plaster," also in Dt 27 4. Gīr is tr<sup>d</sup> "plaster" in Dnl 5 5, "wrote . . . upon the plaster of the wall." In Isa 27 9 we have, "He maketh all the stones of the altar as chalkstones" ('abhne-gīr).

Everywhere in Pal limestone is at hand which can be converted into lime. The lime-kiln is a thick-walled, cylindrical or conical, roofless structure built of rough stones without mortar, the spaces between the stones being plastered with clay. It is usually built on the side of a hill which is slightly excavated for it, so that the sloping, external wall of the kiln rises much higher from the ground on the lower side than on the upper. The builders leave a passage or tunnel through the base of the thick wall on the lower side. The whole interior is filled with carefully packed fragments of limestone, and large piles of thorny-burnet and other shrubs to serve as fuel are gathered about the kiln. The fuel is introduced through the tunnel to the base of the limestone in the kiln, and as the fire rises through the mass of broken limestone a strong draft is created. Relays of men are kept busy supplying fuel day and night. By day a column of black smoke rises from the kiln, and at night the flames may be seen bursting from the top. Several days are required to reduce the stone to lime, the amount of time depending upon the size of the kiln and upon the nature of the fuel. At the present day, mineral coal imported from Europe is sometimes employed, and requires much less time than the shrubs which are ordinarily used. See CHALKSTONE; CLAY.

ALFRED ELY DAY

LIMIT, lim'it (גָּבַל, gbbul, "bound"): Occurs once in Ezk 43 12 ("limit" of holy mountain). "Limited" (Ps 78 41) and "limiteth" (δρῖζω, horizō, He 4 7) are changed in RV to "provoked" (m retains "limited") and "defineth" respectively.

LINE, līn (קוֹ, kaw, חֵבְלָה, hēbhēl): Usually of a measuring line, as Jer 31 39; Ezk 47 3; Zec 1 16 (kaw); Ps 78 55; Am 7 17; Zec 2 1 (hēbhēl). Other Heb words mean simply a cord or thread (Josh 2 18,21; 1 K 7 15; Ezk 40 3). In Ps 19 4 (kaw, "Their line is gone out through all the earth"), the reference is probably still to measurement (the heaven as spanning and bounding the earth), though the LXX, followed by Rom 10 18, takes it as meaning a musical cord (φθόγγος, phthōggos). The "line," as measure, suggests a rule of conduct (Isa 28 10). For "line" in Isa 44 13, RV reads "pencil," m "red ochre" (seredh), and in 2 Cor 10 16, "province," m "limit" (kanōn). See also MEASURING LINE; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

JAMES ORR

LINEAGE, lin'ē-āj (πατριά, patriá): Found only once in Lk 2 4 (AV, RV "family"), and signifying the line of paternal family descent. A word pregnant in meaning among the Jews, who kept all family records with religious care, as may be seen from the long genealogical records found everywhere in the OT.

LINEN, lin'en (בָּד, badh, "white linen," used chiefly for priestly robes, בִּצְרִי, būz, "byssus," a fine white Egypt linen, called in the earlier writings שֶׁשׁ, shēsh; פֶּשֶׁת, pesheth, "flax," שֶׁדֶּחַן, shādḥān; βύσσος, bússos, ὀθόνιον, othónion, λίνον, linon, σινδών, sindōn): Thread or cloth made of flax.

Ancient Egypt was noted for its fine linen (Gen 41 42; Isa 19 9). From it a large export trade was carried on with surrounding nations, including the Hebrews, who early learned the art of spinning from the Egyptians (Ex 35 25) and continued to rely on them for the finest linen (Prov 7 16; Ezk 27 7). The culture of flax in Pal probably antedated the conquest, for in Josh 2 6 we read of the stalks of flax which Rahab had laid in order upon the roof. Among the Hebrews, as apparently among the Canaanites, the spinning and weaving of linen were carried on by the women (Prov 31 13,19), among whom skill in this work was considered highly praiseworthy (Ex 35 25). One family, the house of Ashbea, attained eminence as workers in linen (1 Ch 4 21; 2 Ch 2 14).

Linen was used, not only in the making of garments of the finer kinds and for priests, but also for shrouds, hangings, and possibly for other purposes in which the most highly prized cloth of antiquity would naturally be desired.

The robes of the Heb priests consisted of 4 linen garments, in addition to which the high priest wore garments of other stuffs (Ex 28, 39; Lev 6 10; 16 4; 1 S 22 18; Ezk 44 17,18). Egypt priests are said to have worn linen robes (Herod. ii.37).

In religious services by others than priests, white linen was also preferred, as in the case of the infant Samuel (1 S 2 18), the Levite singers in the temple (2 Ch 5 12), and even royal personages (2 S 6 14; 1 Ch 15 27). Accordingly, it was ascribed to angels (Ezk 9 2,3,11; 10 2,6,7; Dnl 10 5; 12 6,7). Fine linen, white and pure, is the raiment assigned to the armies which are in heaven following Him who is called Faithful and True (Rev 19 14). It is deemed a fitting symbol of the righteousness and purity of the saints (Rev 19 8).

Garments of distinction were generally made of the same material: e.g. those which Pharaoh gave Joseph (Gen 41 42), and those which Mordecai wore (Est 8 15; cf also Lk 16 19). Even a girdle of fine linen could be used by a prophet as a means of attracting attention to his message (Jer 13 1). It is probable that linen wrappers of a coarser quality were used by men (Jgs 14 12,13) and women (Prov 31 22). The use of linen, however, for ordinary purposes probably suggested unbecoming luxury (Isa 3 23; Ezk 16 10,13; cf also Rev 18 12,16). The poorer classes probably wore wrappers made either of unbleached flax or hemp (Ecclus 40 4; Mk 14 51). The use of a mixture called sha'atnēz, which is defined (Dt 22 11) as linen and wool together, was forbidden in garments.

The Egyptians used linen exclusively in wrapping their mummies (Herod. ii.86). As many as one hundred yards were used in one bandage. Likewise, the Hebrews seem to have preferred this material for winding-sheets for the dead, at least in the days of the NT (Mt 27 59; Mk 15 46; Lk 23 53; Jn 19 40; 20 5 ff) and the Talm (Jerus Killayim 9 32b).

The use of twisted linen (shēsh moshzār) for fine hangings dates back to an early period. It was used in the tabernacle (Ex 26 1; 27 9; 35; 36; 38; Jos, Ant, III, vi, 2), in the temple (2 Ch 3 14), and no doubt in other places (Mish, Yōmā', iii.4). Linen cords for hangings are mentioned in the description of the palace of Ahasuerus at Shushan (Est 1 6).

Other uses are suggested, such as for sails, in the imaginary ship to which Tyre is compared (Ezk 27 7), but judging from the extravagance of the other materials in the ship, it is doubtful whether we may infer that such valuable material as linen was ever actually used for this purpose. It is more likely, however, that it was used for coverings or tapestry (Prov 7 16), and possibly in other instances where an even, durable material was needed, as in making measuring lines (Ezk 40 3).

LINTEL, lin'tel. See HOUSE, II, 1,(4).

LINUS, lī'nus (Λίνος, Línos [2 Tim 4 21]): One of Paul's friends in Rome during his second and last imprisonment in that city. He was one of the few who remained faithful to the apostle, even when most of the Christians had forsaken him. And writing to Timothy when he realized that his execution could not be very far distant—for he was now ready to be offered, and the time of his departure was at hand (2 Tim 4 6)—he sends greeting to Timothy from four friends whom he names, and Linus is one of them. There is a tradition that Linus was bishop of the church at Rome. "It is perhaps fair to assume, though of course there is no certainty of this, that the consecration of Linus to the government of the Rom church as its first bishop was one of the dying acts of the apostle Paul" (H.D.M. Spence, in Ellicott's NT Comm. on 2 Tim). Irenaeus—bishop of Lyons about 178 AD—in his defence of orthodox doctrine against the Gnostics "appeals esp. to the bishops of Rome, as depositaries of the apostolic tradition." The list of Irenaeus commences with Linus, whom he identifies with the person of this name mentioned by St. Paul, and whom he states to have been "entrusted with the office of the bishopric by the apostles. . . . With the many possibilities of error, no more can safely be assumed of Linus . . . than that he held some prominent position in the Rom church" (Lightfoot's "Dissertation on the Christian Ministry," in Comm. on Phil, 220 f).

"Considering the great rarity of this Gr mythological name as a proper name for persons, we can hardly doubt that here, as Irenaeus has directly asserted, the same Rom Christian is meant who, according to ancient tradition, became after Peter and Paul the first bishop of Rome. Among the mythical characters in Apos Const, vii, 46 occurs Linos ho Klaudias, who is declared to have been ordained by Paul as the first bishop of Rome. He is thus represented as the son or husband of the Claudia whose name comes after his in 2 Tim 4 21.

"These meager statements have been enlarged upon by Eng. investigators. The Claudia mentioned here is, they hold, identical with the one who, according to Martial, married a certain Pudens (85-90 A.D.), and she, in turn, with the Claudia Rufina from Britain, who is then made out to be a daughter of the British king, Cogidumnus, or Titus Claudius Cogidubnus. For a refutation of these assumptions, which, even chronologically considered, are impossible, see Lightfoot, St. Clement, I, 76-79" (Zahn, Intro to the NT, 20).

LION, l'ūn: (1) Occurring oftenest in the OT is אַרְיֵה, 'aryēh, pl. אַרְיֵהוֹת, 'ārāyōth. Another form, אָרִי, 'ārī, pl. אַרְיִים, 'ārāyim, is found less often.

Cf אַרְיֵה, 'ari'el, "Ariel" (Ezr 8 16; Isa 29 1.2.7); אֶרְאֵל, har'el, "upper altar," and אֶרְאֵל, 'ar'el, "altar hearth" (Zek 43 15 f); אֶרְיֵה, 'aryēh, "lioness" (2 K 15 25); אֶרְאֵל, 'ar'el, "Ariel" and "Archites" (Gen 46 16; Nu 23 17). (2) קֶפֶר, kephir, "young lion," often trd "lion" (Ps 35 17; Prov 19 12; 23 1, etc.). (3) שַׁהַל, shah'al, t.d "lierce lion" or "liona" (Job 4 10; 16 6; 23 8; Hos 5 11). (4) לַיִשׁ, layish, t.d "old lion" or "lion" (Job 4 11; Prov 30 30; Isa 30 6).

Cf Arab. لَيْث, laith, "lion"; لَيْش, layish, "Laish," or "Leshem" (Josh 19 47; Jgs 13 7.14.27.29); لَيْش, layish, "Laish" (1 S 25 41; 2 S 3 15).

(5) לִבְיָה, pl. לִבְיָהוֹת, libbi'ah, "lioness"; also לִבְיָה, lābhi, and לִבְיָה, lābhi'ā (Gen 49 9; Nu 23 21; 24 9); cf town in S. of Judah, Lebaoth (Josh 15 32) or Bethlebaoth (Josh 19 6); also Arab. لَبْوَة, labwat, "lioness";

لَبْوَة, Lebweh, a town in Coelo-Syria. (6) גֹּר, gūr, גֹּר, gōr, "whelp" with 'aryēh or a pronoun, e.g. "Judah is a lion's whelp," gūr 'aryēh (Gen 49 9); "young ones" of the jackal (Lam 4 3). Also לִבְיָה, bēnē lābhi, "whelps [sons] of the lioness" (Job 4 11); and קֶפֶר אַרְיֵהוֹת, kephir 'ārāyōth, "young lion," lit. "the young of lions" (Jgs 14 5). In Job 23 8, AV has "lion's whelps" for בְּנֵי שַׁהַל, bēnē shah'al, RV "proud boasts." RVm "sons of pride": cf Job 41 34 (Heb 26). (7) אֶרְיֵה, lān, "lion" (2 Tim 4 17; He 11 33; 1 Pet 5 8; Rev 4 7; 5 5; Wisd 11 17; Eccles 4 30; 13 19; Bel 31.32.34). (8) σκυμνος, skūmnos, "whelp" (1 Macc 3 4).

The lion is not found in Pal at the present day, though in ancient times it is known to have inhabited not only Syria and Pal but also Asia Minor and the Balkan peninsula, and its fossil remains show that it was contemporary with prehistoric man in Northwestern Europe and Great Britain.

Its present range extends throughout Africa, and it is also found in Mesopotamia, Southern Persia, and the border of India. There is some reason to think that it may be found in Arabia, but its occurrence there remains to be proved. The Asiatic male lion does not usually have as large a mane as the African, but both belong to one species, Felis leo.

Lion (Felis leo).

Lions are mentioned in the Bible for their strength (Jgs 14 18), boldness (2 S 17 10), ferocity (Ps 7 2), and stealth (Ps 10 9; Lam 3 10). Therefore in prophetic references to the millennium, the lion, with the bear, wolf, and leopard, is mentioned as living in peace with the ox, calf, kid, lamb and the child (Ps 91 13; Isa 11 6-8; 65 25).

The roaring of the lion is often mentioned (Job 4 10; Ps 104 21; Isa 31 4 [RV "growing"]; Jer 51 38; Ezk 22 25; Hos 11 10). Judah is a "lion's whelp" (Gen 49 9), likewise Dan (Dt 33 22). It is said of certain of David's warriors (1 Ch 12 8) that their "faces were like the faces of lions." David's enemy (Ps 17 12) "is like a lion that is greedy of his prey." "The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion" (Prov 19 12). God in His wrath is "unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah" (Hos 5 14). "The devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour" (1 Pet 5 8). "Lion" occurs in the figurative language of Ezk, Dnl, and Rev. The figures of lions were used in the decorations of Solomon's temple and throne (1 K 7 29.36; 10 19 f).

Nearly all references to the lion are figurative. The only notices of the lion in narrative are of the lion slain by Samson (Jgs 14 5); by David (1 S 17 34 f); by Benaiah (2 S 23 20; 1 Ch 11 22); the prophet slain by a lion (1 K 13 24; also 1 K 20 36); the lions sent by the Lord among the settlers in Samaria (2 K 17 25); Daniel in the lions' den (Dnl 6 16). In all these cases the word used is 'aryēh or 'ārī.

The Arab. language boasts hundreds of names for the lion. Many of these are, however, merely adjs. used substantively. The commonest Arab. names are sab', 'asad, laith, and labwat, the last two of which are identified above with the Heb layish and lābhi.

As in Arab., so in Heb, the richness of the language in this particular gives opportunity for variety of expression, as in Job 4 10.11:

"The roaring of the lion ['aryēh], and the voice of the fierce lion [shah'al].

And the teeth of the young lions [kephirim], are broken.
The old lion [layish] perisheth for lack of prey.
And the whelps of the lioness [benē lābhī] are scattered abroad."

In Jgs 14 5-18, not less than three different terms, kephīr 'arāyōth, 'aryēh, and 'drī, are used of Samson's lion.

LIP (לִפָּי, sūphāh, לִפְתָּי, sepheth, "lip," "language," "speech," "talk" [also "rim," "border," "shore," "bank," etc], לִפְתָּי, sāphām, "[upper] lip," "moustache," "beard"; χείλος, cheilos, "lip" [also once, "shore" in the quotation He 11 12= Gen 22 17]): (1) Lips stand in oriental idiom for speech or language, like "mouth," "tongue"; therefore they stand in parallelism. "The lip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment" (Prov 12 19). "To shoot out the lip" (Ps 22 7) means to make a mocking, contemptuous, scornful face. As the lips are the chief instrument of speech, we find numerous idiomatic phrases for "speaking," such as: "the utterance of the lips" (Nu 30 6,8), "to proceed out of the lips" (Nu 30 12), "to open the lips" (Job 32 20), "to go out of the lips" (Ps 17 1). These expressions do not convey, as a rule, the idea that the utterance proceeds merely out of the lips, and that it lacks sincerity and the consent of the heart, but occasionally this is intended, e.g. "This people draw nigh unto me, and with their mouth and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me" (Isa 29 13; cf Mt 15 8). The "fruit of the lips" (Isa 57 19=He 13 15) and "calves of the lips" (Hos 14 2 AV) designate the praise and thanksgiving due to God. "Fervent [AV "burning"] lips" (Prov 26 23) are synonymous with eloquence. "To refrain the lips" (Ps 40 9; Prov 10 19) means to keep silence, where the godless or unwise would wish to assert his rights.

Numerous other expressions need no further explanation, such as "perverse lips" (Prov 4 21), "uncircumcised lips" (Ex 6 12,30), "feigned lips" (Ps 17 1), "lying lips" (Ps 31 18; Prov 10 18; 12 22), "wicked [or false] lips" (Prov 17 4), "unclean lips" (Isa 6 5), "strange [AV "stammering"] lips" (Isa 28 11), "flattering lips" (Ps 12 2,3; Prov 7 21), "righteous lips" (Prov 16 13).

(2) The Heb word sāphām is found only in the phrase "to cover the lip or lips," which is an expression of mourning, submission and shame. The Oriental covers his lips with his hand or a portion of his garment, when he has been sunk into deep grief and sorrow. He expresses, thereby, that he cannot open his mouth at the visitation of God. Differently, however, from common mourners, Ezekiel was forbidden of God "to cover his lips" (Ezk 24 17; see also ver 22), i.e. to mourn in the usual way over Israel's downfall, as Israel had brought these judgments upon himself. The leper, victim of an incurable disease, walks about with rent clothes and hair disheveled, covering his lips, crying: "Unclean, unclean!" (Lev 13 45). The thought here is that even the breath of such a one may defile. The prophet calls upon all seers and diviners, to whom God has refused the knowledge of the future, to cover their lips in shame and confusion (Mic 3 7).

H. L. E. LUERING

LIQUOR, lik'er: Every sort of intoxicating liquor except the beverage prepared from the juice of the grape (yayin), according to the usage of the OT, is comprehended under the generic term שִׁכָּר, shēkhār (cf shākhār, to "be drunk"), rendered "strong drink" (cf Gr sikera in Lk 1 15). The two terms, yayin and shēkhār, "wine" and "strong drink," are often found together and are used by OT writers as an exhaustive classification of the beverages in use among the ancient Hebrews (Lev 10 9; 1 S 1 15; Prov 20 1, etc). See WINE; DRINK, STRONG.

LIST: A variant of "lust" (see LUST), meaning "to wish," found in AV of Mt 17 12 || Mk 9 13; Jn 3 8, as tr of θέλω, thēlō, and in Jas 3 4 as tr of βούλομαι, boúlomai. The last case ERV has rendered "will," and ARV has made the same change throughout. The word is obsolete in modern Eng., but Jn 3 8 is still used proverbially, "The wind bloweth where it listeth."

LITERATURE

The Sub-apostolic Age is usually held to extend from the death of St. John, the last surviving apostle, about 100 AD, to the death of Polycarp, St. John's aged disciple (155-56 AD). The Christian literature of this period, although as a whole of only moderate intrinsic value, is of historical interest and importance. This is owing to the light which it throws back on apostolic times, and the testimony borne to Christian life, thought, worship, work and organization during an age when the church was under the guidance, mainly, of men who had been associated with the apostles and who might be supposed, therefore, to know their mind. Some writings are omitted from this review, having been dealt with in previous articles. For the Protevangelium of James and the Gospel and Apocalypse of Peter see APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS; APOCRYPHAL ACTS. For an account of extant fragments of Basilides and Valentinus, see Gnosticism. For pseudo-Clementine writings see PETER, EPISTLES OF; SIMON MAGUS.

1. Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.—Only the larger part had previously been extant, when the complete ep. was recovered in

1. Author- 1875 by Bryennios, bishop of Nicome-ship and dia. The high honor in which it was
Date held by early Christendom is attested

(1) by its position in Codex A, at the end of the NT, and in an ancient Syr MS, between the Catholic and Pauline Epp.; (2) by its being publicly read in many churches down to the 4th cent. (HE, III, 16). The work is anonymous, but sent in the name of the Rom church. Dionysius of Corinth (170 AD) refers to it as written by the agency of (diá) Clement (HE, IV, 23); Clement of Alexandria states distinctly the Clementine authorship (Strom., iv.17). The writer is evidently a leading office-bearer of his church, and is identified with the Clement whom Eusebius designates as third "bishop" (or chief presbyter) of Rome after St. Peter, and as holding office between 92 and 101 AD (HE, III, 34). Clement is further identified by Origen (Comm. on St. John) and in HE, III, 15 with the Clement of Phil 4 3; but the name is too common and the interval too long to render this identity more than possible. Some conjecture the writer to be the consul, Flavius Clemens, whom Domitian (his cousin) put to death in 95 AD for alleged "atheism," i.e. probably, profession of Christianity (see Harnack, Gesch. Lit., I, 253, note 1). But Clement the "bishop" is never otherwise referred to as a martyr, and a member of the imperial family would hardly have been head of the Rom church without so signal a fact being noted by some contemporary or later writer. Lightfoot, with some probability, supposes (Apostolic Fathers, I, 61) that Clement was a "freedman or the son of a freedman, belonging to the household of Flavius Clemens." From St. Paul's time (Phil 4 22) the imperial household included Christians; and many slaves were men of culture. To such a Christian freedman's influence the consul's conversion may have been due. Internal evidence points to Clement having been a Hellenist Jew or proselyte of Judaism; for he writes with some classical culture and with knowledge of OT history and of the LXX; his style, moreover, has a "strong Hebraistic tinge" (Lightfoot, p. 59). The date of the ep. is fixed approximately by a reference to a persecution at Rome in progress or very recent; this persecution (during Clement's "episcopate") was doubtless that by Domitian in 95 AD. Clement's Ep. is thus not strictly within the Sub-apostolic Age, but it is uniformly included in sub-apostolic literature.

The occasion was a church feud at Corinth, and the expulsion of some faithful presbyters. The writer seeks to procure their restoration and
2. Occasion to heal the dissension. He quotes OT
and examples of the evil issue of envy and
Contents strife, and of the blessedness of humility, submission and concord. He adduces as a pattern the peace and harmony of Nature. In this connection occurs an anticipation of geographical discovery, when the author writes (ch xx) of "the impassable ocean and the worlds beyond it" (cf Seneca, Medea ii.375; Strabo i.4; Plut. Mor. ix.41). St. Paul's warnings in 1 Cor about party spirit are recalled; a not unworthy echo of 1 Cor 13 is embodied; and the erring community is solemnly admonished.

In the course of the letter, with obvious reference to 1 Cor 15, Clement introduces the resurrection, for which he argues from the OT and from natural analogies. He refers to the phoenix which lives 500 years, and, when dissolution approaches, builds a nest of spices into which it enters to die. As the flesh decays, however, a "worm is generated, which is nurtured from the dead bird's moisture and putteth forth wings." The fable is mentioned by Herodotus and Pliny.

A lengthy prayer of intercession for "all sorts and conditions of men" is abruptly introduced near the end, in order, presumably, to imbue Corinthian Christians with that charity which they needed and which is the chief incentive to intercession. The ep. closes with a hopeful anticipation of restored concord and peace.

Apologetic testimony is found to (1) books of the NT, viz. to the Pauline authorship of 1 Cor; to St. Mark's Gospel, through which
3. Apolo- (ch xv) he quotes Isa 29 13, repro-getic Testi- ducing St. Mark's variations from the
mony LXX; to Acts, through which he similarly quotes (ch xviii) 1 S 13 14; to Rom, Eph, 1 Tim, Tit, Jas, 1 Pet (chs xxxv, xlvi, xxi, ii, xlvi, xlix, respectively). The ||s between Clement and He are so numerous that the latter work has from early times been ascribed to him by some (HE, VI, 25). But the general type both of thought and of diction is dissimilar; (2) against the Tubingen theory of essential divergence between the doctrine of St. Peter and of St. Paul. The chief presbyter of Rome could not have been ignorant of such divergence; yet he refers the partisanship of which the two apostles were victims entirely to the Corinthians, not at all to the apostles (ch xlix).

Doctrinal testimony is found: (1) to the Trinity, "As God liveth and the Lord Jesus Christ liveth, and the Holy Spirit" (ch lviii); (2) to 4. Doctrinal the personality of Christ, "The Lord
Testimony Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory and the majesty forever." In union and communion with Christ we have life, are sanctified, possess love, manifest godliness (ch i, xxxvi); (3) to the atonement: Clement ascribes to Christ's death not merely subjective moral influence, but objective vicarious efficacy in securing our salvation, without any attempt, however, to explain the mystery. Christ hath "given his flesh for our flesh, his life for our lives" (ch xlix); (4) to justification which is distinctly enunciated as before God through faith (ch xxxii). But this faith (as in St. Paul's writings) is a "faith which worketh" (ch xxxv), and such justification is consistent with our being justified by works before men; (5) to the inspiration of Scripture, which is real ("the Holy Spirit saith"), but not verbal; for quotations are often inexact. Apocryphal books are quoted, but not with a formula indicating Divine authority.

(1) The basis of authority is not sacerdotal, but a combination of official succession and popular call; office-bearers are appointed "by

5. Office- the apostles or afterward by men of Bearers and the apostles or afterward by men of Organiza- repute with consent of the whole
tion ecclesia." (2) Clement indicates no distinction between presbyter and bishop. Office-bearers designated as presbyters (chs xlvii, liv) are referred to (chs xlii, xlv) as filling the office of bishop. Addressing a church on congregational strife and insubordination, he refers to no single bishop in authority over the church. Had the episcopate, in the post-NT sense of mono-episcopate, been apostolically enjoined, surely the injunction would have been obeyed or enforced in Corinth. (3) None the less we discern in Clement's own position and action the anticipation of the later episcopate. Clement is an example of how, through the personal qualities and ecclesiastical services of the man, the status of presiding presbyter developed out of seniority into superiority, out of representativeness into official authority. (4) The early germ of the papacy is disclosed in the passage: "If certain persons should be disobedient unto the words spoken by God through us, let them understand that they will entangle themselves in no slight transgression and peril" (ch lix).

Such assumption by a revered man like Clement might give no offence, and the Corinthians plainly needed correction. Still we have here the first stage in the process which ultimately issued in the Rom claim to universal spiritual supremacy. The assumption, however, is not grounded on Clement's own official position (he speaks always in the 1st person pl.), but on the superior dignity of the Rom church. The later theory of supremacy builds Rom authority on the primacy of St. Peter and his successors; but here the authority of the leading presbyter, in dealing with a provincial church, rests on the suggested primacy of the ecclesia in which he presides.

(1) The long prayer (chs lix-lxi) bears internal evidence of liturgical character, through its balanced and rhythmical style, its somewhat remote relevance to the special object of the ep., and greater suitability for congregational worship, than as part of a counsel to a sister church. This internal testimony is confirmed by the correspondence of the prayer in certain verbal details with the earliest extant liturgies, particularly those of St. Mark and St. James, pointing to the early use in the Rom church of forms of prayer afterward incorporated into these liturgies. While there is evidence that down at least to the time (148 AD) of Justin's 1st Apology (ch lxvii) a minister offered up prayers of his own composition, this prayer of Clement's Ep. indicates that before the close of the Apostolic Age, forms of supplication had begun to be introduced, not to the exclusion of "free prayer," but simply as a mode of congregational devotion countenanced by a venerated leader of the church at Rome. (2) In ch lvi Clement writes about "compassionate remembrance of them [i.e. the erring brethren] before God and the saints." By the saints, however, are most probably meant, not the beatified dead, but the living Christian brotherhood, as in 1 Cor 1 2; 2 Cor 8 4.

This ep. leaves on readers' minds two different yet mutually compatible impressions—impressions both apparently made on the early church, by which the letter was widely read at public worship and yet excluded from the Canon of Scriptures. We realize, on the one hand, the inferiority of this writing to epp. of apostles. Clement's mind is receptive, not creative; and the freshness of thought characteristic of NT writers is absent. What NT book, moreover, contains such a foolish legend as that of the phoenix? On the other hand, this ep. breathes much of the spirit, as it adopts in considerable measure the phraseology and style of apostolic writings. It is as if, although the sun of special inspiration had sunk below the horizon, there remained to the church for a while a spiritual afterglow.

II. The "Didache" or Teaching (longer title, "The Teaching of the Lord, by [did] the XII Apostles, to the Gentiles").—This work is quoted as "Scripture," without being named, by Clement of Alexandria (c 170 AD, in Strom., i.20). It is mentioned in HE, III, 25 as the "Teachings so-called of the Apostles," "recognized by most ecclesiastical writers," although "not a genuine" composition of apostles. Athanasius (Fest. Ep., 39) denies its canonicity, but acknowledges its utility. The latest ancient reference to the work from personal knowledge is by Nicephorus (9th cent.) who includes it among apocryphal writings. Thenceforth it disappears until its recent recovery in 1875 by Bryennios.

There is no reliable external testimony to date. Resemblances too considerable to be accidental exist between the Didache and the Ep. of Barnabas; but opinion is divided as to priority of composition. Lightfoot and others

1. Disappearance and Recovery favor a common lost source. As to internal evidence the simplicity of the Eucharist and of baptism as here described, with no formal admission to the catechumenate (ch vii); the use of "bishop" to denote the same office-bearer as presbyter; and the expectation of an impending Second Advent—point to an early date. On the other hand it is unlikely that a writing which professes to give the Teaching of the Twelve would be issued until all or most apostles had passed away; and the writer seems to be acquainted with writings of St. John (Did., ix.2; x.2; x.5; see Schaff, Oldest Church Manual, 90). Probably the document went through a series of recensions (Harnack in Sch-Herz; Bartlet in DB, V), and the date or dates of composition may be put between 80 and 120 AD.

The work does not profess to be written by apostles; but the author seems to be a Jewish Christian, for he calls Friday "Preparation Day," and the style and diction are Hebraic. The work is neither Judaistic nor Ebionite: circumcision, the Sabbath, and special Mosaic observances, are ignored. From the book in whole or in part being addressed specially, although not exclusively, to Gentiles, we infer that the community among whom it was composed, while mainly Jewish Christian, made special provision for conversion and instruction of Gentiles. The doctrinal standpoint is neither Pauline nor anti-Pauline, but resembles that of Jas. Canon Spence (Teaching) conjectures plausibly that the author may be Simeon, cousin of James the Lord's brother, who became chief presbyter of the Jewish Christian community, first at Jerus, afterward at Pella, until his martyrdom in 107 AD.

It was certainly in the writer's hands; for the Didache contains 22 quotations from, or reminiscences of, that Gospel, extending over ten chs of it. Particularly notable is Did., viii.2, "Neither pray ye as the hypocrites, but as the Lord commanded in His Gospel; after this manner pray ye, Our Father," etc (see also vii.1; ix.5; xvi.6). There are also references to the Gospel of Lk (Did., iii.5, 16); St. John's writings (see above); Acts (Did., iv.8), Rom (Did., iv.5), 2 Thess (Did., xiv.1), 1 Pet (Did., i.4). No extra-canonical saying of Our Lord is recorded.

The contents and notabilia may be examined as follows: (1) Didactic (chs i-vi), intended for catechumens in preparation for baptism.

5. Contents and Notabilia This catechetical manual (the earliest of its kind) opens with the words: "There are two ways: one of life and one of death" (suggested probably by Jer 21 8). From this text the writer gives a summary of Christian duty esp. toward our neighbor, based on the Decalogue, the Golden Rule, and the Sermon on the Mount, which is frequently quoted.

Among notable precepts is a command to fast as well as pray for enemies; a warning against infanticide which, in the case of sickly infants, heathenism approved, and against augury and astrology as generating idolatry; an admonition not to "stretch out one's hands for receiving and to draw them in for giving"; an injunction to "share all things with thy brethren, and not to say that they are thine own"; a command to "love some above thine own life"; and a quaint corrective against indiscriminate and ill-informed beneficence: "Let thine alms sweat into thy hands until thou know to whom thou shouldest give." A precept to "give with thy hands a ransom for sin" may not mean more than that sinful habits are subdued by good works, but it suggests and paves the way for the error of the atoning efficacy of almsgiving. The summary of duty relates chiefly to the second Table of the Law; duty toward God is afterward (so far) dealt with under "worship." This may account for obedience to parents being strangely omitted; for among the Jews the Fifth Commandment was included in the First Table.

(2) Devotional: worship and rites (chs vii-x, xiv).—The Lord's Prayer is to be used thrice a day. "Heaven" and "debt" are found instead of "heavens" and "debts." The Doxology is added (with "kingdom" omitted)—its earliest recorded use in this connection. Christians are to fast on Wednesday and Friday, the days of the betrayal and crucifixion. Fasting is enjoined for a day or two before baptism, both on baptizer and on baptized; it is recommended to "others who can." There is no mention of oil, salt, or exorcism. The baptismal formula, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," is commanded, confirming the historical trustworthiness of Mt 28 19. Triple immersion in "living water" is assumed to be normal; but where this is impracticable, other water and affusion are permitted (see TRINE IMMERSION). The Lord's Supper is dealt with only on its eucharistic side, the writer's object being not to expound the nature of the rite, but to give models of thanksgiving.

The phrase, "after being filled give thanks," suggests that the Agape was still associated with the sacrament: the dissociation had begun when Pliny wrote to Trajan in 112 AD. A liturgical element in sacramental worship is indicated by the prescription of forms of thanksgiving for the cup, the broken bread, and spiritual mercies.

Give thanks thus." The thanksgiving for the cup is as follows: "We give thanks to thee our Father, for the holy vine of David, thy servant, which thou hast made known to us through Jesus Christ." But nothing suggests that the entire service is liturgical, and the forms supplied are not rigidly imposed; for prophets are to offer thanks in such terms as they choose. On the Lord's Day congregational worship and eucharistic bread-breaking, after confession to God and reconciliation with men, are distinctly enjoined.

(3) Ecclesiastical (chs xi-xiii, xv).—Of church office-bearers, two classes are mentioned, ordinary and extraordinary. Of the former (essential to congregational organization) only bishops and deacons are mentioned, i.e. those intrusted with rule and oversight, with their assistants. Presbyter and bishop appear to be still identical, as the former is not specified (cf Phil 1 1). Popular election of these functionaries is indicated: "Elect for yourselves"; without denial, however, of those already in office having a share in the settlement. In the second class, apostles, prophets and teachers are included. "Apostle" is used, not in the narrower sense of men called to the office personally by Christ, but in the wider sense which embraces all whose call to be His ambassadors has been signalized by Divine gifts—specially accredited evangelists unconnected with any particular community. (Among Jewish Christians the designation survived to the 4th cent., for the Theodosian Code of that period refers to Jewish presbyters and to those "quos ipsi apostolos vocant.") These apostles were to be received "as the Lord," and hospitably entertained; but, unlike apostles in the special sense, they were not to remain anywhere longer than "one or two days." Their function was to scatter the seed widely, and any expression of desire to remain longer was to be discouraged, while a demand for salary from a particular community would be evidence of false apostleship. The special function of prophets and teachers, on the other hand, was the instruction and comfort of church members. They accordingly might be encouraged to settle in a community and receive "first-fruits" for their support. These prophets and teachers, however, were not to supersede the "bishops" or presbyters in ruling, but were to undertake only those functions for which they were specially qualified. On the other hand, bishops and deacons were not to be excluded from preaching and teaching by the settlement of prophets and official teachers in particular communities; and in the Did. may be traced the transition, then being gradually accomplished, of the preaching and teaching functions from extraordinary to ordinary office-bearers. "They also [the bishops and deacons] minister to you the ministry of prophets and teachers: therefore despise them not." Even before the close of St. Paul's ministry, the episkopos, whose essential function was rule and oversight, was expected, if not required, also to be didaktikós, "qualified to teach," i.e. along with teachers specially set apart for the purpose (1 Tim 3 2; 5 17). By the middle of the 2d cent., the prophets had disappeared, and their preaching function had been vested in the office of bishop or presbyter, assisted by the diaconate.

(4) Eschatological (ch xvi).—This concluding section consists chiefly of exhortations to watchfulness in view of the Second Advent. The premonitory signs of that Coming are given, with reminiscences from Christ's eschatological discourses, viz. rise of false prophets, decline of love, persecution, lawlessness, and the appearance of Antichrist, who is designated the World-deceiver. Without definitely stating chiliastic doctrine, the writer suggests it; for in referring to the immediate signals of Christ's advent (opening in heaven, voice of trumpet, resurrection of dead) he is careful to add "Not of all the dead; but the Lord shall come, and all the saints with Him"—implying that the general resurrection would take place at an after-stage, presumably, as Millennialists held, after the 1,000 years had expired. Without dogmatic authority, and with only moderate spiritual value, the Did. is important historically as a witness to the church's beliefs, usages and condition during the transition between the Apostolic and the Post-apostolic Age. During that transition period, we see much of the freedom of primitive Christianity mingled with rudiments of ecclesiastical regulations and formularies; and while we cannot assume that every belief and usage recorded in the Did. were sanctioned by apostles, we may reasonably ascribe them to apostolic times, and regard them as not opposed by those apostles within whose view they must have come.

III. Epistles of Ignatius.—Ignatius was bishop of Antioch early in the 2d cent. Origen (Hom. vi on Lk) refers to him as "second after 1. Author St. Peter"; Eusebius calls between and Date (HE, III, 22). As he called himself éktrōma, "untimely born" (cf 1 Cor 15 8), he was probably converted in mature life: the legend of his being the "child" of Mt 18 3 rests on misinterpretation of his designation "Theophoros." Traditions current in the 4th cent. represent him as a disciple of St. John (Eus., Chron.) and ordained by St. Paul (Apos Const, vii.46).

The Martyrium of Ignatius (6th cent.) dates his trial at Antioch in the 9th year of Trajan's reign (107-8 AD) and represents it as conducted before the emperor. Only one visit, however, of Trajan to Antioch is known, in 114-15; neither any Ignatian letter nor Eusebius, nor any other early writer refers to so memorable a circumstance as the presidency of an emperor over a Christian's trial, and Ignatius speaks of a proposed attempt by Roman friends to secure a reversal of the sentence, which would have been impossible had Trajan personally pronounced it. His alleged presence, therefore, must be rejected as a later embellishment.

The epp., so far as genuine, were written after Ignatius' condemnation, on his way to martyrdom at Rome.

The epp. are extant in 3 edd: (1) the longer Gr, of 15 letters now admitted to be largely spurious; (2) a Syr recension of three letters, now generally held to be a mere epitome; 2. Gen- (3) the shorter Gr ed, containing 7 uineness letters of intermediate length, to the Ephesians, Magnesians, Trallians, Philadelphians, Smyrnaeans, Romans, and Polycarp. Lightfoot, Zahn, and most recent critics accept the substantial genuineness of these seven. The chief external evidence is that of Polycarp (Phil., xiii), who, soon after Ignatius' death, writes of a letter addressed to himself, of another to the Smyrnaeans, and of "all the rest which we have by us." Now 2 Ignatian epp. are addressed to Polycarp and the Christians of Smyrna, while 4 profess to be written by Ignatius at Smyrna, harmonizing well with copies of these being in Polycarp's possession.

Further external evidence is supplied by Irenaeus (v.29) who quotes a saying from Ignat., Rom., iv, as that of a martyr, and who uses 8 notable phrases borrowed apparently from Ignatius. This external testimony (only got rid of by an arbitrary assumption of Polycarp's Ep. being wholly or partly spurious) is supported by strong internal and cumulative evidence:

(1) Frequent grammatical dislocation, natural in letters written on a journey but unaccountable on the supposition of a later forgery (Rom., i; Mag., ii; Eph., i).

(2) Geographical particulars: e.g. Ignatius goes by land from Antioch to Smyrna—an unusual route which a forger would hardly invent.

(3) Historical illustrations: e.g. conveyance of prisoners from distant provinces to Rome harmonizes with the account by Dion Cassius (lxviii.15) of the magnitude of amphitheatrical exhibitions under Trajan causing extensive orders for human victims from all parts.

(4) Theological evidence: e.g. these epp. refer to Judaistic error combined with a type of doctrine denying any real incarnation—a combination which ceased after Ignatius' time.

(5) Ecclesiastical usage: thus, the Agapē still includes the Eucharist (Smyr., viii), whereas soon after Ignatius' death these were separated (Pliny, Ep. 96; Just., 1 Ap., 65, 67).

(6) Personal references.—The writer shows an excess and affectation of self-depreciation—"last of Antiochene Christians" (Trall., xiii) "not worthy to be counted one of the brotherhood" (Rom., ix)—such as a later forger would hardly have introduced.

(1) Joy and glory of martyrdom.—Heroic courage and loyalty to Christ are united with fanatical craving after a martyr's death: "I

3. Leading Ideas would rather die for Christ than reign over the whole earth" (Rom., vi);

"He who is near the sword is near to God" (Smyr., iv). This is noble; but when he writes, "Entice wild beasts to become my sepulchre" (Rom., iv); "May I have joy of the wild beasts and find them prompt"; "Though they be unwilling I will force them" (Rom., iv.5), we realize how Aurelius (recalling perhaps some such case) was moved to write that "death was to be encountered, not as by the Christians like a military display, but solemnly, and not as if one acted in a tragedy" (Med. xi.3).

(2) Evil and peril of heresy and schism.—"Abstain from heresy"; "These heretics mix up Jesus Christ with their own poison" (Trall., vi); "Flee those evil outshoots, which produce death-bearing fruit" (Trall., xi); "Avoid all divisions as the beginning of evils"; "Nothing is better than unity" (To Polyc., i; Phil., iii).

(3) Submission to office-bearers, esp. to the bishop.—"Do nothing without your bishop, and be subject to the presbyters" (Mag., vii); "Be on your guard against heresy: and this will be, if ye continue in intimate union with Christ and with the bishop"; "He who does anything without the bishop's knowledge serveth the devil" (Smyr., ix). The bishop here is higher than "primus inter pares"; he is a new and separate office-bearer. Yet, without going beyond these epp., we discern that such an episcopate was not an express apostolic institution. For had Ignatius been able to magnify the office as apostolically enjoined, so zealous a champion of episcopal authority would have adduced such injunction as the most cogent reason for submission. His zeal for the episcopate apparently sprang only from its high ecclesiastical expediency as the most effective agency for maintaining the church's unity against heresy and schism.

(1) The Gospel of Jn is never quoted, but numerous phrases suggest that it was in the writer's hands. He speaks of Christ "proceeding from the Father," "doing nothing without the Father," "in all things pleasing Him who sent Him." Christ is the "Door of the Father" and "Living water." Satan is the "Prince of this world." "The Holy Spirit knoweth whence He cometh and whither He goeth."

(2) Doctrine.—Ignatius asserts emphatically Christ's true Divinity: "Our God" (Eph., xviii; Trall., vii). The Trinity is frequently suggested, although not expressly affirmed. Christians are "established in the Son, the Father, and the Spirit"; "subject to Christ and the Father, and the Spirit." With strong support of episcopal authority no sacerdotalism is united. "Priest" occurs only once. "The priests are good: but Christ, the High Priest, is better." Here, as the context shows, the imperfect Levitical priesthood is contrasted with the perfect high-priesthood of Christ.

(3) Ecclesiastical usage.—Ignatius contains one of the latest references to the Agapē as still conjoined with the Eucharist. The letter to Polycarp (ch iv) contains the earliest allusion to the practice of redeeming Christian slaves at the cost of the congregation. Slaves are not to "long to be set free," thus implying that such emancipation, while not required as a duty, was often conferred as a privilege.

(4) General characteristics.—Ignatius presents a striking contrast, as a writer, to Clement. Clement is calm, cultured, chaste in diction, but somewhat commonplace and deficient in originality; his best passages are echoes of Scripture. The diction and style of Ignatius are impassioned, rugged, turgid, but pithy, fresh and individualistic.

IV. Epistle of Polycarp.—Polycarp was born not later, perhaps considerably earlier, than 70 AD; for at his martyrdom, of which the 1. Date and now accepted date is 155 or 156

Genuine- (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, II, i, 629), he declared, when invited to ness abjure his faith, that he had "served Christ for 86 years" (Mart. Pol., ix). He was a disciple of St. John, who ordained him as bishop or leading presbyter of Smyrna before 100 AD (Iren., iii.3, 4). Of several letters by Polycarp, only this ep. remains: it professes (ch xiii) to have been written soon after the martyrdom of Ignatius.

The genuineness of the letter is attested by Irenaeus, Polycarp's own disciple (l.c.), whose evidence cannot be set aside on the ground of its testimony to the Ignatian letters without an obvious begging of the question. The supposition that the Ignatian letters and Polycarp's Ep. are parts of one great forgery is otherwise negatived by the very marked difference of style and standpoint between those writings (Lightfoot, l.c., 577).

The ep. replies to a letter from the Philipian church inviting his counsel, and asking for epp. of the recently martyred Ignatius. He and Con- with saintly fetters," who had "set a pattern of all patience." He sends tents what he has of the letters of Ignatius and asks in return for any information which they might possess. He commends to their careful study St. Paul's ep. to themselves, acknowledging his inability to attain to the apostle's wisdom. With much Scripture language, interwoven with his own matter, and giving to his letter the semblance of an apostolic echo, he exhorts his readers to righteousness and godliness, charity and mercy, and warns them against covetousness, evil-speaking and revenge. He dwells on the mutual relations and obligations of presbyters and deacons, on the one hand, and of the congregation on the other. He repeats St. John's admonition against teachers who denied the reality of the incarnation: "Every spirit that confesseth not," etc (1 Jn 4.3). He grieves over the lapse of a Philipian presbyter, Valens, who, along with his wife had flagrantly sinned; but he bids his readers not count such as enemies, but seek to recall them from their wanderings.

(1) Polycarp mentions only one book of the NT, viz. Phil, but within the brief compass of 200 lines he quotes verses or reproduces phrases from 12 NT writings, Mt, 1 Pet, 1 Jn, and 9 Pauline Epp., including three whose early date has been disputed in modern times (1 and 2 Tim and Eph). The absence of any quotation from the Gospel of Jn is notable, considering his relation to the apostle; but the shortness of the letter prevents any conclusion being drawn against the authenticity of that Gospel; and he quotes (as we have seen) from 1 Jn, which is a kind of appendix to the Gospel (Lightfoot).

(2) At a time when Ignatius had been emphasizing the paramount duty of submission to the bishop, Polycarp, even when enjoining subjection to presbyters, does not mention a bishop. These two inferences are irresistible: (a) there was then no episkopos, in the post-NT, sense, at Philippi; (b) Polycarp did not consider the defect (?) sufficiently important to ask the Philippians to supply it. Had St. John instituted the mono-episcopate as the one proper form of church government, surely his disciple Polycarp would have embraced the opportunity, when the Philippians invited his counsel, to inform them of the apostolic ordinance, and to enjoin its adoption.

V. Papias Fragments.—Papias is called by his younger contemporary Irenaeus (v.33) a "disciple of John and friend of Polycarp."

1. Author Eusebius writes (HE, III, 36) that he and Date was episkopos of Hierapolis in Phrygia.

The Chronicon Paschale (7th cent., but embodying materials from older documents) states that he was martyred about the same time as Polycarp (155–56). His work, Exposition of Our Lord's Sayings, was extant in the 13th cent., but only fragments quoted by Irenaeus, Eusebius, etc., remain. These bear out the twofold description of Papias by Eusebius, as a "man of little judgment" yet "most learned and well acquainted with the Scriptures" (HE, III, 39, 36). (But the words of praise in ver 36 may be a gloss.) Papias states that he subjoins to his expositions "whatsoever I learned carefully from the elders and treasured up in my memory . . . I was wont to put questions regarding the words of the elders [i.e. presumably men of an earlier generation], what Andrew or Peter said, or what Philip or Thomas, or James, or what John or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's disciples said, as well as regarding what Aristion, and the presbyter John, the disciple of the Lord, have to say."

It is disputed whether Papias here refers to two Johns, the apostle and another disciple of the same name; or to John the apostle in two different relations, i.e. first as one about whose testimony Papias heard from others, and second, as one with whom, also, he held personal communication. In favor of the first view is, (1) Eusebius' own opinion (l.c.); (2) the alleged unlikelihood of the same John being twice mentioned in one sentence; (3) a statement by Eusebius (HE, III, 39) that in his day two monuments (mnēmata) of "John" existed at Ephesus. For the latter view is, (1) no other writer until Eusebius hints the existence of a presbyter John distinct from the apostle; (2) the change in the quotation from "said" to "say" seems to give a reason for John being twice mentioned; some things stated by John having been heard by Papias through "elders," others having been told him by the apostle himself. The fact that John is called presbyter, instead of apostle, is no insuperable objection, since John so designates himself in 2 and 3 Jn; and Jerome denies that the two mnēmata were both tombs. See Lightfoot, Essay on Papias, and Nicol, Four Gospels, 187 ff., who come to divergent conclusions.

2. Testimony to St. Matthew and St. Mark On the testimony to St. Matthew and St. Mark see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF; MARK, GOSPEL OF.

(1) According to Eusebius, Papias relates the story of "a woman accused before Our Lord"—the story, presumably, which eventually crept into Jn 8; so that to him, in part, is due the preservation of a narrative, which, whether historical or not, finely illustrates the union in Our Lord of holy purity and merciful charity.

3. Other Notabilia (2) Papias is quoted by the Chronicler Georgius Hamartolos (in a MS of the 9th cent.) as declaring in his Exposition that St. John "was put to death by the Jews," and a similar quotation is made by Philip of Side (Eptome MS of the 7th–8th cent.). On the bearing of this upon the question of the apostle's residence at Ephesus see JOHN, THE APOSTLE.

(3) Irenaeus (v.32) quotes Papias as writing about a Post-resurrection millennium, and as reporting, on St. John's authority, how the Lord said, "The days will come when vines shall grow having each 10,000 branches, and on each branch 10,000 twigs, and on each twig 10,000 shoots," etc. This may be an exaggerated record (misunderstood by Papias) of some parabolic utterance of Christ, indicating prophetically the wonderful extension of the church.

VI. Epistle of Barnabas.—This book is first expressly quoted by Clement of Alexandria (c 190 AD) as the composition of Barnabas, companion of St.

Paul (Strom., ii.6). Origen concurs, and calls it a "Catholic ep." (Con. Celsum, i.63), thus suggesting canonical position; Eusebius (HE, III, 25) testifies to the widespread ascription of it to this Barnabas, although he himself regards it as "spurious."

1. Authorship Cod. Sin places it immediately after the NT, as being read in churches, and thus suggests its composition by a companion at least of apostles. Against this external testimony, however, to authorship by the Barnabas of Acts, is strong internal evidence: (1) apostolic sinfulness prior to discipleship is spoken of in exaggerated terms hardly credible in a writer who knew the Twelve—"exceedingly lawless beyond all [ordinary] sin" (ch v)—an echo apparently of St. Paul's "sinners of whom I am chief"; (2) ignorance of Jewish rites incomprehensible in a Levite who had lived in Jerus, e.g. the priests are said to eat goat's flesh on the great Day of Atonement; (3) extreme anti-Judaism (see below), inconsistent with the representation of Barnabas in Acts and Gal. The writer may have been some other Barnabas, a converted Alexandrine Jew, or, more probably, a converted gentile proselyte, trained in Philo's school, but ignorant of Jewish rites as practised at Jerus, and possessing little real sympathy with Judaism.

The ep. must be dated after 70 AD, as the destruction of Jerus is referred to (ch xvi); also after the publication of the Gospel of Jn, of which there are several reminiscences. But the absence of any reference to the rebuilding of Jerus under Hadrian, in 120 AD, in a passage (ch xvi) where such allusion might have been expected, suggests a date prior to that year. We may place the writing between 90 and 120 AD.

The object is to deter both Jewish and gentile Christians from Judaistic lapse by a bold application of the allegorizing method to the OT,

3. Object and Contents far beyond what Philo would have sanctioned. Jewish sacrifices, festivals, Sabbath enactments, temple-worship, distinction of clean and unclean food, are not only not of perpetual obligation, but never were binding at all, even on Jews. Belief in their obligatoriness rests on a slavishly liberal exegesis of the OT, which, properly interpreted, is not a preparation for Christ but Christianity itself in allegorical disguise.

Ceremonies are simply allegorical enforcements of spiritual worship; distinctions of clean and unclean are merely pictorial representations of the necessity of separation from vice and vicious men; interdict of swine's flesh means no more than "associate not with swinish men." The only circumcision really commanded by God is circumcision of the heart. Barnabas ignores what St. Paul realized, that Jewish laws and rites, even lit. interpreted, are a Divine discipline of wholesome self-restraint, neighborly consideration and obedience to God. Barnabas not only explains away OT enactments, but finds in trivial OT statements Christian fact and truth. Thus, in Abraham's circumcision of the 318 men of his house, the 10 and 8 are significantly denoted by the Gr letters I and H, the initial letters of Ἰησους (Jesus); while the 300 represented by the Gr T, points to the cross. The writer self-complacently intimates that "no one has been admitted by me to a more genuine piece of knowledge than this!" (ch ix).

When Barnabas, however, leaves obscure allegory for plain exhortation, he writes effectively of the "two ways" of light and darkness. Among edifying admonitions the following are outstanding: "Thou shalt not go to prayer with an evil conscience"; "Thou shalt not let the word of God issue from lips stained with impurity"; "Be not ready to stretch forth thine hands to take, while thou contractest them to give"; "Thou shalt not issue orders with bitterness to thy servant, lest thou fail in reverence to God who is above you both"; "Thou shalt not make a schism, but shalt bring together them who contend"; "The way of darkness is crooked"; "In this way are [among others mentioned] those who labor not to aid him who is overdone with toil" (chs xix, xx).

(1) The Divinity of Christ is emphasized: "Lord of all the world"; "Joint Creator, with the Father, of mankind" (ch v). (2) The writer, while following the Alexandrian method of allegorical interpretation, is free from the Alexandrian doctrine of the essential evil of matter; the necessity of a real incarnation is affirmed (ch v). (3) In ch xi, he writes, "We go down into the water full of sins and filth, and come up bearing fruit in our heart, having the fear of God and trust in Jesus in our spirit." This has been interpreted as involving the doctrine of baptismal regeneration; but the reference may be rather to the regeneration which baptism symbolizes. (4) In ch xv, the words, "We keep the 8th day with joy, the day on which Jesus rose again," are the earliest express testimony that the observance of the Lord's Day was a memorial of Our Lord's resurrection. This observance is distinguished from Jewish Sabbath-keeping which is called an error; the Sabbath really intended to be kept being a period of 1,000 years after the 6,000 years in which all things will be finished (ch xv). (5) Testimony to NT Books, (a) the existence and canonical authority of the Gospel of Mt are attested (ch iv) by the quotation of Mt 22 14, "Many are called, but few chosen," introduced by the formula, "It is written"; (b) various passages taken together testify to the writer having the Gospel of Jn in his hands: "Whoso eateth of these shall live for ever" (ch xi and Jn 6 58); "Abraham looking before in Spirit to Jesus" (ch ix and Jn 8 58); "the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ" (ch ii and Jn 13 34); a reference to the brazen serpent as a type of Christ's suffering, glory and healing power (ch xii and Jn 3 14); (c) "Thou shalt not say that anything is thine own" (ch xix) appears to be a reminiscence of Acts 4 32; (d) the passage in xv, "The day of the Lord shall be as a thousand years," seems to be an echo of 2 Pet 3 8, and, if so, is the earliest testimony to the existence of that writing, and thus proves its great antiquity, although not its canonicity.

VII. Pastor (Shepherd) of Hermas.—This work is the earliest example, on a large scale, of Christian allegory, and was hardly less popular

1. Author-ship and Date in the early church than the Pilgrim's Progress in later times. It was reckoned by many almost, by some altogether, as "Scripture." Irenaeus quotes it as "Scripture" (iv.20); Clement of Alexandria refers to it as "containing revelations Divinely imparted" (Strom., i.29); Origen regards it as "Divinely inspired" (Comm. on Rom 16 14). It is placed with the Ep. of Barnabas in the Cod. Sin at the close of the NT, and was read in many churches down to Jerome's time (Works, II, 846). The writer represents himself as a slave sold to a Rom Christian lady. He afterward obtained freedom, lived with his family in Rome, became earnestly religious, and saw visions which he imparted to the community in this book with a view to repentance and spiritual well-being.

Origen (followed by Eusebius, Jerome, etc) ascribes the work to the Hermes of Rom 16 14; but his opinion is pure conjecture (pulo). The Canon Muratori (170 AD) of Italian authorship describes the work as "recently composed at Rome by the brother of Pius during the latter's episcopate" (137-54). This distinct local testimony has been widely accepted (Hefele, Lightfoot, Charteris, Cruttwell, etc). Yet the writer represents himself (Vision, ii.4) as enjoined to send his book to Clement as a man in authority in the church, whom it is natural to identify with the chief presbyter of Rome between 92 and 101. This reference, along with the absence of any allusion to Gnosticism or to the mono-episcopate, has led Schaff, Zahn, and others to fix the date of the work at about 100 AD. The external and internal evidence, thus apparently divergent, may be reconciled by supposing (with Krüger and Harnack) that the book was not "written in a single draft"; that portions were issued successively during Clement's episcopate; and that under Pius (c 140) the separate issues were gathered into a volume under the title of The Pastor. In Rome, where the author was known, the Canon Muratori attested at once its religious usefulness as a "book to be read" and the absence of any claim to canonical authority.

The purpose of the book is not doctrinal but ethical; it is an allegorical manual of Christian duty with earnest calls to individual repentance and church revival in view of the near Advent.

2. Object and Contents The book consists of (1) Five Visions, (2) Twelve Mandates, (3) Ten Similitudes or Parables. In (1) the church appears to the writer as a venerable matron, then as a tower near completion, thereafter as a Holy Virgin. In the last vision, the Angel of Repentance, in pastoral garb, delivers to him the Mandates and Similitudes. The Mandates deal with chastity, truth, patience, meekness, reverence, prayer, penitence, and warn against grieving the Spirit. In the Similitudes the church is again a tower whose stones are examined for approbation or reprobation. Similitudes are also drawn from trees. The vine clinging to the elm signifies union of rich and poor in the church; a large willow from which a multitude receive branches or twigs, some of these blossoming or fruit-bearing, others dry or rotten, symbolizes the diverse effect of law and gospel on different souls. The author, although a Gentile, writes from the standpoint of James rather than of Paul. The closing words summarize his combined ethical and eschatological purpose: "Ye who have received good from the Lord, do good works, lest while ye delay, the tower be completed, and you be rejected."

(1) Montanistic affinity.—Hermas, indeed, differs from Montanists in permitting, though not encouraging, second marriage, and recognizing one possible repentance after post-baptismal flagrant sin; but he is also their forerunner, through his disallowance of readmission after second lapse, through emphatic expectation of an impending Advent, and through his rigorous view of fasting: "On the fast day taste nothing but bread and water."

(2) Fasting, however, is regarded not as an end but as a means—a discipline toward humility, purity, charity. Fasting for charity is illustrated by the injunction (Sim., v.3) to "reckon up the price of what you meant to eat, and give that to one in want."

(3) Absence of names "Jesus" and "Christ."—The names "Jesus" and "Christ" never occur. He is "Son of God" and "Lord of His people," whom "God made to dwell in flesh," by whom "the whole world is sustained," who "endured great sufferings that He might do away with the sins of His people" (Sim., v.6; ix.14).

(4) Church organization.—Hermas is charged (Vis., ii.4) to "read his writings to [or along with] the presbyters who preside over the church" in Rome. It is reasonable to conclude that no one in that community could then be called "bishop" in the later sense of the holder of an office distinct from and superior to the presbyterate. Episkopoi ("bishops") are mentioned (Sim., ix.27) as "given to hospitality," the description of the episkopos in 1 Tim 3 2, where admittedly bishop = presbyter.

VIII. Second Epistle of Clement.—This writing is doubly misnamed: it is neither an ep. nor a com-

1. Nature of Document position of Clement. Style, thought, and standpoint differ from those of the accepted Ep., and II E, III, 38, suggests that the Clementine authorship was not generally recognized. The recent recovery by Bryennios of the previously lost conclusion proves that the writing is a sermon (ch xix).

Antiquity is indicated by (1) the use, as an authority, of the lost heretical Gospel of the Egyptians, which by the time of the Canon Muratori (175 AD) had ceased to be regarded as Scripture by Catholics; (2) the adoption, without gnostic intention, of phrases which became notably associated, after 150 AD with Gnosticism: "God made male and female: the male is Christ, the female, the church" (ch xiv). The date usually

2. Date and assigned is 120-50 AD (Lightfoot, Part Authorship I, vol II, 201). The author is a gentle presbyter; he had "worshipped stocks and stones." The sermon was probably preached at Corinth, for the preacher describes many arriving by sea for the race-course, without mentioning a port, which would be appropriate in a sermon preached to Corinthians.

No text is given, but the sermon starts from Isa 54 1, without express quotation; this chapter had probably been read at the

3. Contents service. The discourse, without great literary merit, is earnest and practical. There are exhortations to repentance and good works, to purity, charity, prayer and fasting, with special reference to coming judgment. The standpoint is that of St. James. "Be not troubled [so the sermon concludes] because we see the unrighteous with abundance, and God's servants in straits. Let us have faith, brethren and sisters. Had God recompensed the righteous speedily, we should have had training not in piety but in bargaining; and our uprightness would be a mere semblance, since our pursuit would be not of godliness but of gain."

(1) The sermon is the oldest extant in post-NT times, and appears to have been read (ch xix) to a congregation.

(2) Sayings of Christ not in our Gospels are quoted: (a) "The Lord, being asked when His kingdom would come, answered:

When the two shall be one [i.e. when harmony shall prevail], and when the outside shall be as the inside [i.e. when men shall be as they seem]; and the male with the female, neither male nor female" (interpreted by this preacher ascetically as discountenancing marriage, presumably because "the time is short," but explained mystically by Clement of Alexandria in Strom. iii 13, as indicating the abolition of all distinctions in God's kingdom). Clement assigns the passage to the lost Gospel of the Egyptians. (b) "The Lord saith, ye shall be as lambs among wolves. Peter answered: What if the wolves tear the lambs? Jesus said: Let not the lambs fear the wolves; and ye, also, fear not them which kill you, and can do nothing more to you." (3) No episcopate, apparently, in the post-NT sense, existed in the church where this sermon was delivered. Unfaithful men are represented as confessing, "We obeyed not the presbyters when they told us of salvation." Had a bishop in the later sense been head of the community, obedience to his admonitions would surely have been inculcated. (4) The Christology is high; "We ought to think of Christ as of God." "When we think mean things of Christ, we expect to receive mean things" (ch i).

IX. Apology of Aristides.—Aristides was an Athenian philosopher, who (according to HE, IV, 3) presented an Apology to Hadrian, pre-

1. Recovery sumably when the emperor was at and Date Athens (125 AD). After disappearance in the 17th cent., a fragment in an Armenian version was discovered in 1878, and the entire Apology in Syr was found in 1889. It was then found that almost the whole treatise was imbedded anonymously in a Gr mediaeval romance, Barlaam and Josaphat. The Apology in the Syr is inscribed to Antoninus; it may have been addressed to both emperors successively, or the real date may be 137, when they were colleagues in the empire.

The treatise refers to oppression, imprisonment, and other maltreatment endured by Christians, and pleads for their protection against

2. Contents persecution, because of their true and noble creed, and their pure and benevolent lives. The writer compares the Christian doctrine of Godhead with that of barbarians, Greeks, Egyptians, Jews, and dwells on the elevating influence of Christian belief in Jesus Christ and in a future life. He refers to the abstention of Christians from unchastity, dishonesty and other vices; to their abounding charity and brotherliness which are shown particularly to the widow, the orphan, the poor, the stranger, the oppressed, and even their oppressors. All who become Christians, of however low a station, are brethren. This bright picture has, however, its shadows: "If Christians see that one of their number has died in his sins, over him they weep bitterly as over one about to go into punishment." This frank acknowledgment of some black sheep gives point to his general testimony, "Blessed is the race of Christians above all men."

(1) A distinct reference to a collection of Christian writings, and esp. of Gospels, designated the Gospel, and indicating the existence of a kind of rudimentary NT Canon. (2) Similar indication of a rudimentary Apostles' Creed.

3. Notabilia Christians are said to believe in God, "the Maker of Heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ who was born of a Heb virgin, who was transfixed by the Jews; he died and was buried; and Christians state that after three days he rose again and ascended into heaven." In this early time the virgin birth was apparently a settled matter—part of the Creed. (3) Aristides describes a familiar custom among poor Christians of fasting two or three days, so as to supply with needful food Christians poorer still (Comp. Hermas). (4) The Apology is interesting as the earliest known literary tribute of a philosopher to Christianity, and probably the earliest extant defence of the faith, if the Ep to Diognetus be not ancient. It is notable also as a treatise on Christian evidence drawn not from miraculous credentials, but from the self-evidencing excellence and effect of Christianity. Finally, it is interesting as the earliest detailed record of harvest reaped at Athens from seed sown by St. Paul 80 or 90 years before. Athens appeared at first a barren soil; but by and by this church in a university city took the lead, as this treatise and another lost apology by Quadratus show, in the literary defence of the Christian faith. Quadratus is stated in HE, IV, 3, to have presented his Apology to Hadrian, and is described by Jerome as "a disciple of the apostles." In a fragment preserved in HE, he attests the survival ("to our own day") of some whom Christ had healed.

X. Justin Martyr.—Born of pagan parents at Flavia Neapolis (Nablous), in Samaria about 100 AD—a seeker for truth, who, after

1. Incidents trying Stoic, Peripatetic, Pythagorean of Life and Platonic philosophies, found in Christ and Christianity the satisfaction of philosophic cravings and spiritual needs. He became a Christian apostle and apologist, wearing still the philosopher's mantle in token of continued quest after wisdom, but making it now his life-work, not as presbyter, but as itinerating Christian teacher, to impart to pagan, to Jew and also to heretic the truth which he himself had found and prized. After long Christian service, he suffered martyrdom under Aurelius in 166 AD.

It is addressed to Antoninus and dated 138-48. He approaches the emperor without flattery, and asks judgment after searching inquiry.

2. First He answers three charges against Apology Christians: (1) atheism: Justin replies that Christians were atheists only as Socrates was; they disbelieved in so-called gods who were wicked demons or humanly fashioned images; but they worshipped the Father of Righteousness; (2) immorality: Justin admits the existence of pretended Christians who are evil-doers; but Christianity makes the evil good, the licentious chaste, the covetous generous, the revengeful forgiving; (3) disloyalty: this is calumny based on the preaching of Christ's kingdom which is spiritual, not temporal. Christians are taught and are wont to pay tribute promptly and to pray for rulers regularly. Justin then sets forth the credibility and excellence of Christianity, adducing, (1) its pure morality as contrasted with vices condoned by heathens, (2) its noble doctrines—immortality, resurrection, future judgment, incarnation, (3) OT prophecy regarding the Divinity and sufferings of the Christ. His reference to the prediction of a virgin bringing forth Emmanuel (ch xxxiii) shows that in his day the virgin birth was accepted, although Jews understood by virgin (in Isa) merely a young woman, (4) foreshadowings of Christian truth by philosophy, referring esp. to Plato's teaching about the Divine Logos and judgment to come. To refute prevalent calumny Justin describes Sunday service and administration of sacraments in his time. On the Lord's Day Christians assembled for worship; prophetic Scriptures and "memoirs" by apostles and their followers were read; prayers and thanksgivings were offered and an address delivered by the "president"; bread and wine were distributed and sent by deacons to those absent; and an offering for charitable purposes was made. "As many as believe what is taught, and undertake to live accordingly, are, after prayer and fast, baptized" (chs lxy, lxvii).

This is probably a postscript to the first; Eusebius quotes from both as from one work. After a protest against a recent summary

3. "Second Apology" proper trial, Justin deals with two popular taunts: (1) "If at death they went to heaven, why did they not commit suicide?": "We do not shrink from death but from opposing God's will." (2) "If God is really on the Christians' side, why does He allow them to be persecuted?": "The world by Divine decree is meanwhile under the dominion of angels who have become demons." Justin here contrasts Christ with Socrates, whom yet he describes as a preacher of the "true but then unknown God" (ch xi): "No one put such faith in Socrates as to die for his convictions." Christ hath won the faith, "not only of philosophers, but of simple folk who through faith can despise death." Justin, however, testifies clearly and warmly to the Christian element by anticipation, in the higher teachings and aspirations of heathen philosophy through an implanted seed of the Divine Logos; and he recognizes thus a pre-advent ministry of the Son of God, not only in the sheltered fold of Judaism, but in the broad open of heathendom.

This Dialogue indicates the attitude of some cultured Jews of that day to Christianity, and the mode in which their objections to it

4. Dialogue were met. Trypho argued that Jesus with Trypho did not fulfil OT prophecy which represented the Messiah as establishing a glorious and everlasting kingdom; whereas Jesus was a humble peasant who died an ignominious death; Justin pleads Isa 53. Trypho charges Christianity with treason to the theocracy through exalting Jesus to Godhead, thus trenching on the Divine unity, and also through repudiating the perpetual obligation of the Law. Justin, in reply, quotes Genesis, "Let us make man," and also Pss 45, 72, 110, with Isa 7 about Emmanuel. The Mosaic Law was intended to be temporary, and was now superseded by the Law of Christ; moreover, the destruction of Jerus rendered complete fulfilment of the Jewish Law impracticable. The disputants part on friendly terms, "I have been particularly pleased with this conference," says Trypho. "If we could confer oftener we should be much helped in reading the Scriptures." "For my part," replies Justin, "I would have wished to repeat our conference daily; but since I am about to set sail, I bid you give all diligence in this struggle after salvation." Of other works ascribed to Justin, two (On the Resurrection and Appeal to the Greeks) may or may not be genuine; the others are spurious.

(1) Bearing of Justin's quotations from "memoirs" on the Age of Our Gospels (see GOSPELS).

(2) Testimony to harmony of apostolic doctrine. Justin is a disciple of St. Paul, and a strong anti-Judaist; yet he recognizes thoroughly the Twelve as the true source of Christian teaching, "sent by Christ to teach to all the Word of God" (1 Ap., 39, 49; Dial., 42, 109).

(3) From personal knowledge as a traveler, Justin testifies to the wide diffusion of Christianity: "No race of men exists among whom prayers are not offered up to the Father through the name of the crucified Jesus (Dial., 117).

(4) Authorship of Revelation: "John, one of the apostles, prophesied, by a revelation made to him, that believers would dwell 1,000 years in Jerus" (Dial., 81)—the earliest direct witness to Johannine authorship, by one who had resided at Ephesus.

(5) Belief of the primitive church in Our Lord's true Divinity: Writing in the name of Christians as a body, he declares, "Both Him [the Father] and the Son who came forth from Him we adore" (1 Ap., 5). He speaks also of some "who held that Jesus was a mere man" as a small and heretical minority (Dial., 48). He writes elsewhere (1 Ap., 13) of the Son as the object of worship "in the second place"; but this statement, made long before the Arian Controversy necessitated precision of language, does not invalidate his other testimonies.

(6) As to the Holy Spirit, Justin refers to baptism as administered in "the name of Father, Son, and Spirit" (1 Ap., 61), implying the Divinity of the Third Person; although elsewhere he appears to subordinate Him to the Son, as the Son to the Father. He is to be "worshipped in the third order" (1 Ap., 13).

(7) Millenarianism: "I and others are assured that there will be a resurrection of the dead and 1,000 years in Jerus which will be built, adorned and enlarged" (Dial., 80). He admits, however, that many pure and pious Christians think otherwise.

(8) Future punishment: On this subject Justin speaks with two voices. In 1 Ap., 8, he writes of "condemned souls suffering eternal punishment, not for a millennial period only." But in Dial., 5, he introduces an old man who was the immediate means of his conversion as saying that "the wicked shall be punished as long as God shall will them to exist."

(9) Angel-worship: In 1 Ap., 6, Justin, when refuting the charge of atheism, writes: "We reverence and worship the Father, and the Son, and the host of other good messengers (or angels), and the Prophetic Spirit." The context, however, shows that this cultus does not necessarily amount to what is usually meant by worship, but simply to veneration and homage. The Gr words here, sebomai and proskuneō, are often used in this lower sense; and the train of thought seems to be this: "You call us atheists; the charge is not true, for we not only believe in one God and Father of all, but in one who is preeminently the Son of God, who was sent by God. We believe further in other heavenly messengers from God, a host of angelic spirits; yea we believe in one who is preeminently God's Spirit, by whom prophets were inspired. All these are the object in different degrees of our veneration and homage." Undoubtedly, however, the statement is at best unguarded and misleading.

(10) Doctrine of the sacraments: Justin uses "regenerate" as the synonym of "baptized" (1 Ap., 61), but he identifies the two, not as essentially inseparable, but as uniformly associated. As regards the Lord's Supper, while emphasizing the ideas of commemoration, communion, and thanksgiving, he in one place speaks of the bread and wine being the flesh and blood of the Incarnate Jesus, "from which, by a transmutation, our flesh and blood are nourished" (1 Ap., 66). These words tend to transubstantiation; but, in the absence of any controversy at the time, may be no more than a strongly figurative representation of a spiritual participation.

XI. Epistle to Diognetus.—This short apologetic work is mentioned by no ancient writer, and was unknown until its discovery in 1592

1. Date and by Henry Stephens in a MS which Authorship perished in the Strassburg fire of 1870.

The MS appears to ascribe it to the author of another work (To the Greeks); and this, again, is attributed with some probability on the authority of a Syr document (600–700 AD) to one Ambrosius, "chief among the Greeks," otherwise unknown (see Birks in DCB, "Ep. to D."). If genuinely ancient, the ep. probably belongs to the Sub-apostolic Age, for it refers to Christianity as "having only now entered the world, not long ago"; and in ch xi (written, however, by a different hand or at a different time) the author calls himself a "disciple of the apostles." Diognetus was a very common Gr name, so that his identification with the tutor of Marcus Aurelius (130–40 AD) is a mere conjecture. Donaldson (Chr. Lit., II, 142) inclines to the belief that the work was composed by one of the many Greeks who came westward in the 14th cent. and that the author intended merely to write a "good declamation in the old style." The smart but superficial way in which heathenism and Judaism are dealt with is more befitting a mediaeval rhetorical exercise than the serious treatment, by a cultured writer, of prevalent religions.

The author, after welcoming the inquiry of Diogenetus about Christianity, pours contempt on the pagan worship of gods of wood, stone and metal, without any apparent realization that for cultured heathens of that time such images were not objects, but only symbolic media of worship; and he ridicules Mosaic observances without any recognition of their significance as a Divine educative discipline. But when he proceeds (chs vii-xii) to describe Christianity, the work merits Hefele's designation, praestantissima Epistola. Into a world, yea, into human hearts, which had become degenerate and wicked, "God sent no mere servant or angel, but His own Son," and Him, not as a condemning Judge, or fear-inspiring Tyrant, but as a gracious Saviour. To the inquiry, "If Christianity is so precious, why was Christ sent so late?" the author replies: "In order first to bring home to mankind their unworthiness to attain eternal life through their own works" and their incapacity for salvation apart from Him "who is able to save even what it was impossible (formerly) to save." But faith in the Son of God now revealed, would lead to "knowledge of the Father"; knowledge of God to "love of Him who hath first so loved us"; and love of God to "imitation of Him and of His loving-kindness." And wherein consists such imitation? Not in "seeking lordship over those weaker," or in "showing violence toward those below us"; but in "taking on oneself the burden of one's neighbor," even as "God took on Himself the burden of our iniquities, and gave His own Son as a ransom for us." "He who in whatsoever he may be superior is ready to benefit another who is deficient; he who, by distributing to the needy what he has received from God, becomes a god to those who receive his benefits: he is an imitator of God."

LITTLE GENESIS. See BOOK OF JUBILEES.

LIVELY, liv'li, LIVING, liv'ing (חַי, hay; ζάω, zāō): "Living," sometimes "lively," is the tr of hay (often also tr'd "life"); it denotes all beings possessed of life (Gen 1 21.24; 2 7.19; Ex 21 35, "live"); we have frequently the phrase, "the land of the living" (as contrasted with sh'ol, the abode of the dead), e.g. Job 28 13; Ps 27 13; 52 5; Isa 38 11; the characteristically Bib. expression, "the living God," also frequently occurs (Josh 3 10; 1 S 17 26.36; 2 K 19 4; Ps 84 2); also frequently in the NT as the tr of zāō (Mt 16 16; 26 63; Jn 6 57, "the living Father"; Acts 14 15); "lively" in Ex 1 19 (hāyich) and Ps 38 19 denotes fulness of life, vigor; hayyāh, "a living being," is mostly confined to Ezk, tr'd "living creatures" (1 5.13.14, etc.), also Gen 1 2s; 8 17, "living thing"; "living" is sometimes applied fig. to that which is not actually alive; thus we have the phrase "living waters" (Jer 2 13; 17 13; Zec 14 8, "Living waters shall go out from Jerus") in contrast with stagnant waters—waters that can give life; so Jn 4 10.11 (bubbling up from the spring at bottom of the well); 7 38; Rev 7 17 AV; "living bread" (Jn 6 51); "a new and living way" (He 10 20), perhaps equivalent to "ever-living" in Christ; "living stones" (1 Pet 2 4 5) are those made alive in Christ; a "living hope" (a hope full of life), 1 Pet 1 3; "living" (zāō) is sometimes also "manner of life" (Lk 15 13; Col 2 20); diāgō, "to lead or go through" is also so tr'd (Tit 3 3); bios is "means of life," tr'd "living" (Mk 12 44; Lk 8 43); "living," in this sense, occurs in Apoc as the tr of zōē, "Defraud not the poor of his living" (Ecclus 4 1).

RV has "living" for "alive" (Lev 14 4), for "the lively" (Acts 7 3s), for "quick" (He 4 12), for "lively" (1 Pet 1 3; 2 5), for "conversation" (1 Pet 1 15; 2 Pet 3 11); "living creatures" for "beasts" (Rev 4 6; 5 6, etc.); "every living thing" for "all the substance" (Dt 11 6); "living things" for "beasts" (Lev 11 2.47 his); for "living" (Ps 55 9), "the green" (thorns under the pots), m "Wrath shall take them away while living as with a whirlwind"; for "the book of the living" (Ps 69 28), "the book of life"; for "[I am] he that liveth" (Rev 1 18), "the Living one"; for "living fountains of waters" (Rev 7 17), "fountains of waters of life"; for "trade" (Rev 18 17), "gain their living," m "work the sea"; for "Son of the living God" (Jn 6 69), "the Holy One of God" (emended text).

LIVER, liv'ēr (כֶּבֶד, kābhēdh, derived from a root meaning "to be heavy," being the heaviest of the viscera; LXX ἥπαρ, hēpar): The word is usually joined with the Heb yōthereth (see CAUL) (Ex 29 13.22; Lev 9 10.19) as a special portion set aside for the burnt offering.

This represents the large lobe or flap of the liver, λοβὸς τοῦ ἥπατος, lobōs toū hēpatos (thus LXX and Jos. Ant. III. ix. 2, [228]). Others, however, interpret it as the membrane which covers the upper part of the liver, sometimes called the "lesser omentum." Thus the Vulg. reticulum icoris. It extends from the fissures of the liver to the curve of the stomach. Still others consider it to be the "fatty mass at the opening of the liver, which reaches to the kidneys and becomes visible upon the removal of the lesser omentum or membrane" (Driver and White, Leviticus, 65).

As in the scholastic psychology of the Middle Ages, the liver played an important part in the science of Sem peoples. It was the seat of feeling, and thus became synonymous with temper, disposition, character (cf Assy kabittu, "liver," "temper," "character," and Arab. كَبِد, kabid, vulgar kibdi). Thus Jeremiah expresses his profound grief with the words: "My liver is poured upon the earth, because of the destruction of the daughter of my people" (Lam 2 11). The liver is also considered one of the most important and vital parts of the body (cf Virgil, cerebrum, iecur domicilia vitae). A hurt in it is equivalent to death. So we find the fate of a man enticed by the flattering of a loose woman compared to that of the ox that "goeth to the slaughter . . . till an arrow strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life" (Prov 7 22, 23; the rest of the verse is obscure as to its meaning).

In a few passages of the OT, kābhēdh ("liver") and kābhōdh ("glory") have been confounded, and we are in uncertainty as to the right tr. Several authors, to give but one example, would read kābhēdh in Ps 16 9, for reasons of Heb poetical parallelism: "Therefore my heart is glad and my liver [EV "glory"] rejoiceth." While this is quite possible, it is not easy to decide, as according to Jewish interpretation "my glory" is synonymous with "my soul," which would present as proper a parallelism.

The liver has always played an important rôle in heathen divination, of which we have many examples in old and modern times among the Greeks, Etrurians, Romans and now among African tribes. The prophet Ezekiel gives us a Bib. instance. The king of Babylon, who had been seeking to find out whether he should attack Jerus, inquired by shaking "arrows to and fro, he consulted the teraphim, he looked in the liver" (Ezk 21 21 [Heb ver 26]; cf Tob 6 4 ff; 8 2). See ASTROLOGY, 3; DIVINATION.

LIVING CREATURE, liv'ing krē'tūr: (1) נֶפֶשׁ, nephesh hayyāh, or נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה, nephesh hayyāh [nephesh, "breath" or "living things"; hayyāh, "living"; cf Arab. نَفْس, nefs, "breath," حَيّ, hayy, "living"]): In the account of the creation this term is used of aquatic animals (Gen 1 21), of mammals (Gen 1 24) and of any animals whatsoever (Gen 2 19).

(2) חַיָּיתִים, hayyōth, pl. of חַיָּה, hayyāh): The name of the "living creatures" of Ezk 1 5-25, which had wings and the faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle; cf Ezk 10 1-22. (3) שָׂרָפָה, šārah, "living thing," "animal": The four "living creatures" (AV "beasts") of Rev 4 6, etc., the first like a lion, the second like a calf, the third having a face as of a man, and the fourth like an eagle, having each six wings. LIZARD, liz'ard: The list of unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11 29.30 contains eight names, as follows:

(1) חֹלֶד, hōledh, EV "weasel" (q.v.); (2) עֶכְבֵּר, 'akhbār, EV "mouse" (q.v.); (3) צָבָה, ṣābh, AV "tortoise," RV "great lizard" (q.v.); (4) אֲנָקָה, 'dnākāh, AV "ferret," RV "gecko" (q.v.); (5) כֹּסֶה, kōṣh, AV "chameleon," RV "land-crocodile" (q.v.); (6) לָטְאָה, lētā'ah, EV

"lizard"; cf Arab. لَطَأَ, laṭa', "to cling to the ground"; (7) חֹמֶט, hōmeṭ, AV "snail," RV "sand-lizard" (q.v.); (8) תִּנְשֵׁמֶת, tinshemeth, AV "mole," RV "chameleon" (q.v.). In Prov 30 28, we find (9) שְׂמָמִית, semāmīth, AV "spider," RV "lizard."

Since (1), (3), (4), (5), (6) and (7) occur as names of animals only in this passage, and as the philological evidence available is in most cases not very convincing, their determination is difficult and uncertain. RVm to "gecko" (Lev 11 30) has "Words of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting four kinds of lizards."

Among the many lizards of Pal, the monitor and thorny-tailed lizard are remarkable for their size, and the chameleon for its striking appearance and habits. On etymological grounds,

2. Lizards of Palestine
kōṣh, AV "chameleon," RV "land-crocodile," LXX chamailōn, has been taken to be the monitor; ṣābh, AV "tortoise," RV "great lizard," LXX krokōdeilos chersaios, to be the thorny-tailed lizard; and tinshemeth, AV "mole," RV "chameleon," LXX aspālar, to be the chameleon. On the same grounds, hōledh, EV "weasel," LXX galē, might be the mole-rat. See CHAMELEON; TORTOISE; WEASEL.

The commonest lizard of Pal is the rough-tailed agama, Agama stellio, Arab. hirdhaun or hirdaun, which is everywhere in evidence, running about on the ground, rocks or walls, frequently lying still basking in the sun, or bobbing its head up and down in the peculiar manner that it has.

Gecko (Ptyodactylus lobatus).

The gecko, Ptyodactylus lobatus, is common in houses. By means of adhesive disks on the under sides of its toes, it clings with ease to smooth walls which other lizards cannot scale. Although perfectly harmless, it is believed to be poisonous, and is much feared. It is called abu-bras, "father of leprosy," either on account of its supposed poisonous qualities or because it has a semi-transparent and sickly appearance, being of a whitish-yellow color with darker spots. It utters a little cry, which may be the reason why RV has "gecko" for 'dnākāh, AV "ferret."

Various species of the genus Lacerta and its allies, the true lizards, may always be found searching for insects on trees and walls. They are scaly, like all lizards, but are relatively smooth and are prettily colored, and are the most attractive members of the group which are found in the country. They are called by the Arabs sakkaiyeh or shammūsch.

The skinks include Scincus officinalis, and allied species. Arab. saḡankār = Gr σκινκος, skinkos (skinkos). They are smooth, light-colored lizards, and are found in sandy places. They cannot climb, but they run and burrow in the sand with remarkable rapidity. The dried body of Scincus officinalis is an important feature of the primitive oriental materia medica, and may be found in the shops (officinae) of the old-style apothecaries.

Smāmīth (Prov 30 28, AV "spider," RV "lizard") is one of the "four things which are little . . . but . . . exceeding wise." RV reads:

"The lizard taketh hold with her hands, Yet is she in kings' palaces."

LXX has καλαβώρης, kalabōlēis, which according to Liddell and Scott = ἀσκαλαβώρης, askalabōlēis, "a spotted lizard." There is no other

3. Identification
lizard which fits this passage as does the gecko. If Gesenius is correct in deriving smāmīth from the √ sāman (cf Arab. samma, "to poison"), we have another reason for making this identification, in which case we must rule out the rendering of RVm, "Thou canst seize with thy hands."

For none of the names in Lev 11 29.30 have we as many data for identification as for semāmīth. For lētā'ah, EV "lizard," LXX has χαλαβώτης, chalabōtēs, which is another variant of askalabōtēs. If we follow the LXX, therefore, we should render lētā'ah "gecko." Tristram quotes Bochart as drawing an argument that lētā'ah is "gecko" from the Arab. √ lātā, "to cling to the ground." This view is at least in accordance with LXX. It is of course untenable if dnākāh is "gecko," but (see FERRET) the writer thinks it quite possible that dnākāh may mean the shrew or field-mouse, which is also in agreement with LXX. It will not do to follow LXX in all cases, but it is certainly safe to do so in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary.

There seems to be little evidence available for deciding the identity of hōmeṭ, AV "snail," RV "sand-lizard." LXX has σαύρα, saūra, and Vulg lacerta, both words for lizard. Gesenius refers the word to an obsolete √ hāmāṭ, "to bow down," "to lie upon the ground." Tristram, NIB, cites Bochart as referring to a word meaning "sand." Hence perhaps the RV "sand-lizard." If by this is meant the skink, there is no inherent improbability in the identification.

We have thus more or less tentatively assigned various words of the list to the monitor, the thorny-tailed lizard, the chameleon, the gecko and the skink, but we have done nothing with the rough-tailed agama and the Lacertae, or true lizards, which are the commonest lizards of Pal, and this fact must be reckoned against the correctness of the assignment. The tr of RV has this to commend it, that it gives two small mammals followed by six lizards, and is therefore to that extent systematic. It is, however, neither guided in all cases by etymological considerations, nor does it follow LXX.

As none of the etymological arguments is very cogent, the writer can see no harm in consistently following LXX, understanding for (1), galē, weasel or pole-cat; for (2), mūs, mouse; for (3), krokodilos chersaios, some large lizard, either the monitor or the thorny-tailed lizard; for (4), mūgalī, shrew or field-mouse; for (5), chamaileōn, chameleon; for (6), chalabōtēs, gecko; for (7), saūra, a Lacerta or true lizard; for (8), aspalax, mole-rat. On the other hand, if etymological considerations are to be taken into account and LXX abandoned when it conflicts with them we might have (1) hōledh, mole-rat; (2) akhbār, mouse; (3) śāhh, thorny-tailed lizard; (4) dnākāh, field-mouse; (5) kō'h, monitor; (6) lētā'ah, gecko; (7) hōmeṭ, skink; (8) tinshemeth, chameleon.

Neither of these lists has the systematic arrangement of that of RV, but we must remember that the Bib. writers were not zoologists, as is seen in the inclusion of the bat among birds (Lev 11 19; Dt 14 18), and of the hare and coney among ruminants (Lev 11 5.6; Dt 14 7).

LOAF, lōf. See BREAD.

LO-AMMI, lō-am'ī (לֹא-אֲמִי, lō'-ammī, "not my people"): The 2d son and 3d child of Gomer bath-Diblain, wife of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1 9). An earlier child, a daughter, had been named Lo-ruhamah (לֹא-רַחֲמָה, lō'-ruḥāmāh, "uncompassionated"). The names, like those given by Isaiah to his children, are symbolic, and set forth Hosea's conviction that Israel has, through sin, forfeited Jeh's compassion, and can no longer claim His protection. Of the bearers of these names nothing further is known; but their symbolism is alluded to in Hos 2 1.23. This latter passage is quoted by Paul (Rom 9 25 f.). See HOSEA; JEZREEL.

LOCKS, loks ([1] לִצְיָת, līṣyāth, [2] פֶּרַע, pera', [3] מַהֲלָפָה, mahlāphāh, [4] קִרְצָה, kīrṣāh): See in general the article on HAIR. (1) The first word, līṣyāth, means really a tassel, such as is worn by the Jews on the four corners of the prayer-shawl or tallith and on the 'arba' kan'phōth (Dt 22 12), tr'd in the NT by κράσπεδον, kráspeдон (Mt 9 20; 14 36; 23 5; Mk 6 56; Lk 8 44). Once it is applied to a forelock of hair. The prophet Ezekiel, describing his sensations which accompanied his vision of Jerus, says: "He put forth the form of a hand, and took me by a lock of my head; and the Spirit lifted me up between earth and heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerus" (Ezk 8 3). (2) The word pera' signifies the unshorn and disheveled locks of the Nazirite (Nu 6 5) or of the priests, the sons of Zadok (Ezk 44 20). (3) The Book of Jgs employs the word mahlāphāh when speaking of the "seven locks" of Samson (Jgs 16 13.19), which really represent the plaited (etymologically, "interwoven") strands of hair still worn in our days by youthful Bedouin warriors. (4) Kīrṣāh (Cant 5 2.11) means the luxuriant hair of the Heb youth, who was careful of his exterior. It is called bushy (RVm "curling") and black as a raven. AV tr's also the word commāh with "locks" (Cant 4 1; 6 7; Isa 47 2), but RV has corrected this into "veil," leaving the word "locks" in Cant 4 1 m. H. L. E. LUERING

LOCUST, lō'kust: The tr of a large number of Heb and Gr words:

(1) אֲרָבָה, 'arbēh, from יָרָבָה, rābhāh, "to increase" (cf Arab. رَبا, raba', "to increase"). (2) סָלַם, sāl'am, from obsolete יָסַל, gal'am, "to swallow down," "to consume." (3) חָרָגַל, har-gol (cf Arab. حَرَجَلَ, harjal, "to run to the right or left," حَرَجَلَة, harjalat, "a company of horses" or "a swarm of locusts," حَرَجَوَان, harjawān, a kind of locust). (4) הָגַב, hāghābh (cf Arab. حَجَب, hajab, "to hide," "to cover"). (5) גָּזַם, gāzām (cf Arab. جَزَم, jazam, "to cut off"). (6) יֵלֶק, yelek, from לָקַק, lākaḳ, "to lick" (cf Arab. لَقَلَق, laklak, "to dart out the tongue" [used of a serpent]). (7) הָסִיל, hāsīl, from יָסַל, hāsāl, "to devour" (cf Arab. حَوَّصَل, hawṣal, "crop" [of a bird]). (8) גָּבַח, gūbh, from obsolete יָגַבָה, gābhāh (cf Arab. جَابِي, jābi, "locust," from يَجِبُ, jaba', "to come out of a hole"). (9) גָּב, gēbh, from same √. (10) צָלַל, ṣāl'al, from צָלַל, ṣāl'al (onomatopoeitic), "to tinkle," "to ring" (cf Arab. صَلَّ, ṣall, "to give a ringing sound" [used of a horse's bit]; cf also Arab. طَنَّ, ṭann, used of the sound of a drum or piece of metal, also of the humming of flies). (11) ἀκρίς, akris (gen. ἀκρίδος, akridos; dim. ἀκριδιον, akridion, whence Acridium, a genus of locusts).

(1), (2), (3) and (4) constitute the list of clean insects in Lev 11 21 f, characterized as "winged creeping things that go upon all fours, which have legs above their feet, wherewith to leap upon the earth."

This manifestly refers to jumping insects of the order Orthoptera, such as locusts, grasshoppers and crickets, and is in contrast to the unclean "winged creeping things that go upon all fours," which may be taken to denote running Orthoptera, such as cockroaches, mole-crickets and ear-wigs, as well as insects of other orders.

3 17. 'Arbeh occurs (Ex 10 4-19) in the account of the plague of locusts; in the phrase "as locusts for multitude" (Jgs 6 5; 7 12); "more than the locusts . . . innumerable" (Jer 46 23);

"The locusts have no king, Yet go they forth all of them by bands" (Prov 30 27).

'Arbeh is referred to as a plague in Dt 28 38; 1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Ps 78 46; in Joel and in Nah. These references, together with the fact that it is the most used word, occurring 24 t, warrant us in assuming it to be one of the swarming species, i.e. Pachtylus migratorius or Schistocerca peregrina, which from time to time devastate large regions in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.

(3) Oedipoda migratoria.

Sal'am (2), EV "bald locust," occurs only in Lev 11 22. According to Tristram, NBH, the name "bald locust" was given because it is said in the Talm to have a smooth head. It has been thought to be one of the genus Trypalea (T. unguiculata or T. nasula), in which the head is greatly elongated.

Hargol (3), AV "beetle," RV "cricket," being one of the leaping insects, cannot be a beetle. It might be a cricket, but comparison with the Arab. (see supra) favors a locust of some sort. The word occurs only in Lev 11 22. See BEETLE.

Haghābh (4) is one of the clean leaping insects of Lev 11 22 (EV "grasshopper"). The word occurs in four other places, nowhere coupled with the name of another insect. In the report of the spies (Nu 13 33), we have the expression, "We were in our own sight as grasshoppers"; in Eccl 12 5, "The grasshopper shall be a burden"; in Isa 40 22, "It is he that sitteth above the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers." These three passages distinctly favor the rendering "grasshopper" of EV. In the remaining passage (2 Ch 7 13), "... if I command the locust [EV] to devour the land," the migratory locust seems to be referred to. Doubtless this as well as other words was loosely used. In Eng. there is no sharp distinction between the words "grasshopper" and "locust."

The migratory locusts belong to the family Acridiidae, distinguished by short, thick antennae, and by having the organs of hearing at the base of the abdomen. The insects of the family Locustidae are commonly called "grasshoppers," but the same name is applied to those Acridiidae which are not found in swarms. The Locustidae have long, thin antennae, organs of hearing on the tibiae of the front legs, and the females have long ovipositors. It may be noted that the insect known in America as the seventeen-year locust, which occasionally does extensive damage to trees by laying its eggs in the twigs, is a totally different insect, being a Cicada of the order Rhynchoa. Species of Cicada are found in Pal, but are not considered harmful.

The Book of Joel is largely occupied with the description of a plague of locusts. Commentators differ as to whether it should be interpreted literally or allegorically (see JOEL). Four names 'arbeh (1), gāzām (5), yelek (6) and hāsīl (7), are found in Joel 1 4 and again in 2 25.

For the etymology of these names, see 1 above. Gāzām (Am 4 9; Joel 1 4; 2 25) is in RV uniformly tr'd "palmer-worm" (LXX καμνη, kāmpē, "caterpillar"). Hāsīl in RV (1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Ps 78 46; Isa 33 4; Joel 1 4; 2 25) is uniformly tr'd "caterpillar." LXX has indifferently brouchos, "wingless locust," and ἐρυσιβή, erusbē, "rust" (of wheat). Yelek (Ps 105 34; Jer 51 14, 27; Joel 1 4b; 2 25; Nah 3 15b 16) is everywhere "canker-worm" in RV, except in Ps 105 34, where ARV has "grasshopper." AV has "caterpillar" in Ps and Jer and "canker-worm" in Joel and Nah. LXX has indifferently akris and brouchos. "Palmer-worm" and "canker-worm" are both Old Eng. terms for caterpillars, which are strictly the larvae of lepidopterous insects, i.e. butterflies and moths.

While these four words occur in Joel 1 4 and 2 25, a consideration of the book as a whole does not show that the ravages of four different insect pests are referred to, but rather a single one, and that the locust. These words may therefore be regarded as different names of the locust, referring to different stages of development of the insect. It is true that the words do not occur in quite the same order in 1 4 and in 2 25, but while the former verse indicates a definite succession, the latter does not. If, therefore, all four words refer to the locust, "palmer-worm," "canker-worm," "caterpillar" and the LXX erusbē, "rust," are obviously inappropriate.

Gōbh (8) is found in the difficult passage (Am 7 1), "... He formed locusts [AV "grasshoppers," AVm "green worms," LXX akris] in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth"; and (Nah 3 17) in "... thy marshals [are] as the swarms of grasshoppers [Heb gōbh gōbhay; AV "great grasshoppers"], which encamp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth they flee away, and their place is not known where they are." The related gōbh (9) occurs but once, in Isa 33 4, also a disputed passage, "And your spoil shall be gathered as the caterpillar [hāsīl] gathereth: as locusts [gēbhām] leap shall men leap upon it." It is impossible to determine what species is meant, but some kind of locust or grasshopper fits any of these passages.

In Dt 28 42, "All thy trees and the fruit of thy ground shall the locust [EV] possess," we have (10) ślāḥal (LXX erusbē). The same word is tr'd in 2 S 6 5 and Ps 160 5 bis "cymbals," in Job 41 7 "fishspears," and in Isa 18 1 "rustling." As stated in 1, above, it is an onomatopoeic word, and in Dt 28 42 may well refer to the noise of the wings of a flight of locusts.

In the NT we have (11) akris, "locust," the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6); the same word is used fig. in Rev 9 3, 7; and also in Apoc (Jth 2 20; Wisd 16 9; and see 2 Esd 4 24).

The swarms of locusts are composed of countless individuals. The statements sometimes made that they darkened the sky must not be taken too literally.

They do not produce darkness, but their effect may be like that of a thick cloud. Their movements are largely determined by the wind,

3. Habits and while fields that are in their path may be laid waste, others at one side may not be affected. It is possible by vigorous waving to keep a given tract clear of them, but usually enough men cannot be found to protect the fields from their ravages.

Large birds have been known to pass through a flight of locusts with open mouths, filling their crops with the insects. Tristram, NHB, relates how he saw the fishes in the Jordan enjoying a similar feast, as the locusts fell into the stream. The female locust, by means of the ovipositor at the end of her abdomen, digs a hole in the ground, and deposits in it a mass of eggs, which are cemented together with a glandular secretion. An effective way of dealing with the locusts is to gather and destroy these egg-masses, and it is customary for the local governments to offer a substantial reward for a measure of eggs. The young before they can fly are frequently swept into pits or ditches dug for the purpose and are burned.

The young are of the same general shape as the adult insects, differing in being small, black and wingless. The three distinct stages in the metamorphosis of butterflies and others of the higher insects are not to be distinguished in locusts. They molt about six times, emerging from each molt larger than before. At first there are no wings. After several molts, small and useless wings are found, but it is only after the last molt that the insects are able to fly. In the early molts the tiny black nymphs are found in patches on the ground, hopping out of the way when disturbed. Later they run, until they are able to fly.

In all stages they are destructive to vegetation. Some remarkable pictures of their ravages are found in Joel 1 6 7. "For a nation is come up upon my land, strong, and without number; his teeth are the teeth of a lion, and he hath the jaw-teeth of a lioness. He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree; he hath made it clean bare, and cast it away; the branches thereof are made white" (see also 2 2-9 20).

Locusts are instruments of the wrath of God (Ex 10 4-19; Dt 28 38 42; 2 Ch 7 13; Ps 78 46; 105 34; Nah 3 15-17; Wisd

4. Figure 16 9; Rev 9 3); they typify an invading army (Jer 51 14, 27); they are compared with horses (Joel 2 4; Rev 9 7); in Job 39 20, Jeh says of the horse: "Hast thou made him to leap as a locust?" AV "Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper?" Locusts are among the "four things which are little upon the earth, but . . . are exceeding wise" (Prov 30 27). Like the stars and sands of the sea, locusts are a type of that which cannot be numbered (Jgs 6 5; 7 12; Jer 46 23; Jth 2 20). Grasshoppers are a symbol of insignificance (Nu 13 33; Eccl 12 5; Isa 40 22; 2 Esd 4 24).

The Arabs prepare for food the thorax of the locust, which contains the great wing muscles. They pull off the head, which as it comes away brings with it a mass of the viscera, and they remove the abdomen (or "tail"), the legs and the wings. The thoraxes, if not at once eaten, are dried and put away as a store of food for a lean season. The idea of feeding upon locusts when prepared in this way should not be so repellent as the thought of eating the whole insect. In the light of this it is not incredible that the food of John the Baptist should have been "locusts and wild honey" (Mt 3 4). See INSECTS.

LOD, LYDDA (לֹד, lōdh; Λῳδα, Lūdā): Ono and Lod and the towns thereof are said to have been built by Shemed, a Benjamite

1. Scriptural Notices (1 Ch 8 12). The children of Lod, Hadid and Ono, to the number of 725, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37 [721]). The town lay in the Shephelah, perhaps in gē hā-hārāshīm, "the valley of craftsmen" (Neh 11 35). In the NT it appears as Lydda. Here the apostle Peter visited the saints and healed the palsied Aeneas (Acts 9 32). Hence he was summoned by messengers from Joppa on the death of Dorcas.

The three governments of Aphaerema, Lydda and Ramathaim were added to Judaea from the country of Samaria by King Deme-

Jerus, into which Judaea was divided (BJ, III, iii, 5). After the death of Julius Caesar the inhabitants of Lydda and certain other towns, having failed to pay the contributions Cassius demanded, were by him sold into slavery. They were freed by Antony (Ant, XIV, xi, 2; xii, 2). Lydda suffered severely under Cestius Gallus (BJ, II, xix, 1). Along with Jamnia it surrendered to Vespasian (BJ, IV, viii, 1). After the fall of Jerus it was noted as a seat of rabbinical learning. The classical name of the city was Diospolis. In the 4th cent. it was connected with the trade in purple. It became the seat of a bishopric, and the bishop of Lydda was present at the Council of Nicaea. At Lydda, in 415 AD, took place the trial of Pelagius for heresy.

Under the Moslems it became capital of the province of Filastin, but later it was superseded by er-Ramleh, founded by Khalif Suleiman, whither its inhabitants were removed (Yā'kūbi, c 891 AD). Mukaddasi (c 985) says that in Lydda "there is a great mosque in which are wont to assemble large numbers of people from the capital [er-Ramleh] and from the villages around. In Lydda, too, is that wonderful church [of St. George] at the gate of which Christ will slay the antichrist" (quoted by Guy le Strange, Pal under the Moslems, 493). It was rebuilt by the Crusaders; but was destroyed by Saladin after the battle of Hattin, 1191 AD. It was again restored; but in 1271 it was sacked by the Mongols, and from this blow it has never recovered.

The ancient Lod or Lydda is represented by the modern village of Ludd, on the road to Jerus, about 11 miles S. E. of Yāfā. It is a station on the Jaffa-Jerus Railway. It occupies a picturesque hollow in the plain of Sharon, and is surrounded by gardens and orchards, the beauty of which intensifies by contrast the squalor of the village. It was the reputed birthplace of St. George, and here he is said to have been buried. The one ruin of importance in the place is that of the church which perpetuates his name.

The town stood on the great caravan road between Babylon and Egypt, near its intersection with that from Joppa to Jerus and the East. Its position on these great arteries of commerce meant trade for the inhabitants. "The manufacture and repair of such requisites for the journey as sacks, saddles and strappings would create the skilled labor in cloth, leather, wood and metal that made the neighborhood once the valley of craftsmen" (Mackie, HDB, s.v.). Like many other once prosperous cities on these and similar caravan routes, Lydda suffered from diversion of traffic to the sea; and it may be that for none of them is any great revival now possible. LODDEUS, lod-ē'us (Λοδδεύς, Loddeús; Swete reads Laadaios with Doldaios as variant in A; AV Daddeus, Saddeus): The captain, who was in the place of the treasury. Ezra sent to him for men who "might execute the priests' office" (1 Esd 8 46); called "Iddo" in Ezr 8 17.

LO-DEBAR, lō'dē-bār, lō-dē'bār (לֹד דְּבָר, lō dhrbār): A place in Gilead where dwelt Machir, son of Ammiel, who sheltered Mephibosheth, son of Saul, after that monarch's death (2 S 9 4), until he was sent for by David. This same Machir met David with supplies when he fled to Gilcad from Absalom (17 27 f). Possibly it is the same place as Lidebir in Josh 13 26 (RVm). No certain identification is possible; but Schumacher (Northern 'Ajlūn, 101) found a site with the name Ibdar about 6½ miles E. of Umm Keis, N. of the great aqueduct, which may possibly represent the ancient city. Lidebir, at least, seems to be placed on the northern boundary of Gilead. The modern village stands on the southern shoulder of Wady Samar. There is a good spring to the E., a little lower down, while ancient remains are found in the neighborhood. W. EWING

LODGE, loj (לֹדֶה, lin; κατασκηνόω, kataskēnōō, etc): To stay or dwell, temporarily, as for the night (Gen 32 13.21; Nu 22 8; Josh 2 1 AV; 4 3; Lk 13 19; Mt 21 17, aulizomai), or permanently (Ruth 1 16). In Isa 1 8, "a lodge [m'ānāh] in a garden of cucumbers," the meaning is "hut," "cottage." "Evil thoughts" are said to "lodge" in the wicked (Jer 4 14).

LOFT: In 1 K 17 23, changed in RV to "chamber."

LOFTILY, lof'ti-li, LOFTINESS, lof'ti-nes, LOFTY: The first form is only in Ps 73 8, where it means "haughtily," as if from on high. The second is found only in Jer 48 29, where the loftiness of Moab also means his haughtiness, his groundless self-conceit.

Lofty likewise means "haughty," "lifted up" (cf Ps 131 1; Isa 2 11; Prov 30 13). In Isa 26 5 it refers to a self-secure and boastful city. In 57 15 it is used in a good sense of God who really is high and supreme. Isaiah uses the word more than all the other sacred writers put together.

LOG, log, lōg (לֹג, lōgh, "deepened," "hollowed out" [Lev 14 10-24]): The smallest liquid or dry measure of the Hebrews, equal to about 1 pint. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

LOGIA, log'i-a, THE (Λόγια, Lōgia): The word logion, which is a dimin. of lógos, was regularly used of Divine utterances. There

The are examples in the classics, the LXX, Word the writings of Josephus and Philo and "Logia" and in four passages in the NT (Acts 7 38; Its History Rom 3 2; He 5 12; 1 Pet 4 11) where it is uniformly rendered both in AV and RV "oracles." It is not, therefore, surprising that early Christian writers, who thought of Christ as Divine, applied this term to His sayings also. We find this use, according to the usual interpretation, in the title of the lost work of Papias as preserved by Eusebius, Logiōn kuriakōn exēgēsis, "Exposition of the Lord's Logia" (HE, III, 39), in that writer's obscure reference to a Heb or Aram. writing by the apostle Matthew (ib), and in Polycarp's Ep. (§7), "the logia of the Lord." The modern use of the word is twofold: (a) as the name of the document referred to by Papias which may or may not be the Q of recent inquirers; (b) as the name of recently discovered sayings ascribed to Jesus. For the former of GOSPELS. The latter is the theme of this article.

About 9½ miles from the railway station of Beni Mazar, 121 miles from Cairo, a place now called Behnesa marks the site of an

2. The Dis- ancient city named by the Greeks covery of Oxyrhynchus, from the name of a the Logia sacred fish, the modern binni, which had long been known as a great Christian center in early times and was therefore selected by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt for exploration in behalf of the Egypt Exploration Fund. They began work on the ruins of the town, January 11, 1897, and on the following day discovered a papyrus leaf inscribed with a number of sayings introduced by the formula lēgei Iēsoús, "saith Jesus," some of which were at once seen to be quite new. When excavation was resumed in February, 1903, a second fragment was discovered, which must have belonged to the same or a similar collection, as the formula "saith Jesus" is employed in exactly the same way, and the sayings exhibit the same mixed character. The first of these two fragments was named by the discoverers logia, but the short preface to the second fragment suggests that the word used in the original title may have been logoi, which is found in Acts 20 35 as the title perhaps of a collection of sayings of Jesus used by the apostle Paul. It is convenient, however, to retain logia, at any rate for the present. Other remains of early Christian texts have been found on the same site (cf AGRAPHÆ) but none of precisely the same character.

The first fragment, found and published in 1897, afterward referred to as A, is a leaf from a papyrus book measuring in its present state 5¼ X 3¼ inches and having 42 lines on the two pages. As it is broken at the bottom it is impossible, in the absence of another leaf, to ascertain or even conjecture how much has been lost. At the top right-hand corner of one page are the letters iota, alpha, used as numerals, that is 11, and it has been suggested that this, with other characteristics, marks the page as the first of the two. The uncial writing is assigned to the 3d cent., perhaps to the early part of it. The text is fairly complete except at the end of the third logion, for the five following lines, and at the bottom. The second fragment, henceforth referred to as B, found in 1903 and published in 1904, has also 42 lines, or rather parts of lines, but on only one page or column, the Christian text being written on the back of a roll the recto of which contained a survey list. The characters of this, too, are uncial, and the date, like that of A, seems to be also the 3d cent., but perhaps a little later. B is unfortunately very defective, the bit of papyrus being broken vertically throughout, so that several letters are lost at the end of each line, and also horizontally for parts of several lines at the bottom.

Seven of these sayings, or logia, inclusive of the preface of B, have or contain canonical parallels, namely:

(1) A1, which coincides with the usual text of Lk 6 42; (2) A5a (according to the editio princeps, Ga), which comes very close to Lk 4 24; (3) A6 (or 7), a variant of Mt 5 14; (4) the saying contained in the preface of B which resembles Jn 8 52; (5) B2, ll. 7 f., "The kingdom of heaven is within you," which reminds us of Lk 17 21; (6) B3, ll. 4 f., "Many that are first shall be last; and the last first," which corresponds to Mk 10 31; cf Mt 19 30; Lk 13 30; (7) B4, ll. 2-5, "That which is hidden from thee shall be revealed to thee: for there is nothing hidden that shall not be made manifest," which is like Mk 4 22 (cf Mt 10 26; Lk 12 2). These parallels or partial parallels—for some of them exhibit interesting variations—are, with one exception, of synoptic character.

The other seven or eight logia, although not without possible echoes of the canonical Gospels in thought and diction, are all non-canonical and with one exception new.

Three of them, namely B2 and 3 (apart from the canonical sayings given above) and 5, may be set aside as too uncertain to be of any value. What is preserved of the first ("Who are they that draw you [MS. us] to the kingdom?" etc) is indeed very tempting, but the restoration of the lost matter is too precarious for any suggestion to be more than an ingenious conjecture. This is seen by comparing the restoration of this logion by the discoverers, Dr. Swete and Dr. C. Taylor, with that proposed by Deissmann (Licht vom Osten, 329). While the Eng. scholars take hēlkō in the sense of "draw," the German takes it in the sense which it has in the NT, "drag," with the result of utter divergence as to the meaning and even the subject of the logion. The logia which remain are undeniably of great interest, although the significance of at least one is exceedingly obscure. The number of the sayings is not certain. Dr. Taylor has shown that in A2f "and" may couple two distinct utterances brought together by the compiler. If this suggestion is adopted, and if the words after A3 in the editio princeps are regarded as belonging to it and not as the remains of a separate logion, we get the following eight sayings:

(1) "Except ye fast to the world [or "from the world"], ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God" (A2a); (2) "Except ye keep the sabbath [Taylor "sabbatize the sabbath"], ye shall not see the Father" (A2b); (3) "I stood in the midst of the world, and in flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them" (A3a); (4) "My soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart and see not their wretchedness and their poverty" (the last clause restored by conjecture) (A3b); (5) "Wherever there are two they are not without God, and where there is one alone I say I am with him [after Blass]. Raise the stone and [there] thou shalt find me: cleave the wood [Taylor, "the tree"] and there am I" (A4); (6) "A physician does not work cures on them that know him" (A5b); (7) "Thou hearest with one ear but the other thou hast closed" (largely conjectural but almost certain) (A6); (8) "[There is nothing] buried which shall not be raised" (or "known") (B4, l. 5).

Attempts have been made to trace the collection represented by these fragments (assuming

6. Origin and Character of the Logia

some lost gospel—the Gospel according to the Egyptians (Harnack, Van der Maaten), the Gospel of the Ebionites or the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles (Zahn), or the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Batiffol), but without decisive result. That there is a connection of some kind with the last-mentioned apocryphal work is evident from the fact that B1 ("Jesus saith, Let not him who seeks . . . cease until he find Him; and having found Him, let him be amazed; and being amazed he shall reign, and reigning shall rest") is ascribed by Clement of Alexandria to this writing, but that cannot have been the only source. It was probably one of a number drawn on by the compiler. The latter, so far as B is concerned, represents the sayings as spoken by Jesus to ". . . and Thomas." In whatever way the gap is supplied—whether by "Philip," or "Judas" or "the other disciples"—one of the Twelve known as Thomas is clearly referred to as the medium or one of the media of transmission. It is possible that the short preface in which this statement is made belongs not to the whole collection but to a part of it. The whole work may, as Swete suggests (Expos T, XV, 494), have been entitled "Words of Jesus to the Twelve," and this may have been the portion addressed to Thomas. The other fragment, A, might belong to a section associated with the name of another apostle. In any case the Logia must have formed part of a collection of considerable extent, as we know of material for 24 pages or columns of about 21 or 22 lines each. So far as can be judged the writing was not a gospel in the ordinary sense of that term, but a collection of sayings perhaps bearing considerable resemblance as to the form to the Logia of Matthew mentioned by Papias.

The remains of B5, however, show that a saying might be prefaced with introductory matter. Perhaps a short narrative was sometimes appended. The relation to the canonical Gospels cannot be determined with present evidence. The sayings preserved generally exhibit the synoptic type, perhaps more specifically the Lukan type, but Johannine echoes, that is, possible traces of the thought and diction represented in the Fourth Gospel, are not absent (cf A, logia 2/, and preface to B). It seems not improbable that the compiler had our four Gospels before him, but nothing can be proved. There is no distinct sign of heretical influence. The much-debated saying about the wood and the stone (A4b) undoubtedly lends itself to pantheistic teaching, but can be otherwise understood.

Under these circumstances the date of the compilation cannot at present be fixed except in a very general way. If our papyri which represent two copies were written, as the discoverers think, in the 3d cent., that fact and the indubitably archaic character of the sayings make it all but certain that the text as arranged is not later than the 2d cent. To what part of the cent. it is to be assigned is at present undiscoverable. Sanday inclines to about 120 AD, the finders suggest about 140 AD as the terminus ad quem, Zahn dates 160–70 AD, and Dr. Taylor 150–200 AD. Further research may solve these problems, but, with the resources now available, all that can be said is that we have in the Logia of Oxyrhynchus a few glimpses of an early collection of sayings ascribed to Jesus which circulated in Egypt in the 3d cent. of great interest and possibly of considerable value, but of completely unknown origin.

LITERATURE.—Of the extensive literature which has gathered round the Logia—as many as fifty publications relating to A only in the first few months—only a few can be mentioned here. A was first published in 1897 as a pamphlet and afterward as No. 1 of Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Valuable articles by Cross and Harnack appeared in Expos, ser. V, vol VI, 257 ff, 321 ff, 401 ff, an important lecture by Swete in Expos T, VIII, 544 ff, 568, and a very useful pamphlet by Sanday and Lock in the same year. B appeared in 1904 in pamphlet form and as No. 654 of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, with a fuller comm. Dr. C. Taylor's pamphlets on A and B issued respectively in 1899 and 1905, and Swete's lecture on B, Expos T, XV, 488 ff, are of exceptional significance for the study of the subject. #### LITERATURE

The doctrine of the Logos has exerted a decisive and far-reaching influence upon speculative and Christian thought. The word has a long history, and the evolution of the idea it embodies is really the unfolding of man's conception of God. To comprehend the relation of the Deity to the world has been the aim of all religious philosophy. While widely divergent views as to the Divine manifestation have been conceived, from the dawn of Western speculation, the Gr word logos has been employed with a certain degree of uniformity by a series of thinkers to express and define the nature and mode of God's revelation.

Logos signifies in classical Gr both "reason" and "word." Though in Bib. Gr the term is mostly employed in the sense of "word," we cannot properly dissociate the two significations. Every word implies a thought. It is impossible to imagine a time when God was without thought. Hence thought must be eternal as the Deity. The tr "thought" is probably the best equivalent for the Gr term, since it denotes, on the one hand, the faculty of reason, or the thought inwardly conceived in the mind; and, on the other hand, the thought outwardly expressed through the vehicle of language. The two ideas, thought and speech, are indubitably blended in the term logos; and in every employment of the word, in philosophy and Scripture, both notions of thought and its outward expression are intimately connected.

In this art. it will be our aim to trace the evolution of the doctrine from its earliest appearance in Gr philosophy through its Heb and Alexandrian phases till it attained its richest expression in the writings of the NT, and esp. in the Fourth Gospel.

The doctrine may be said to have two stages: a Hellenistic and a Heb; or, more correctly, a pre-Christian and a Christian. The theory of Philo and of the Alexandrian thinkers generally may be regarded as the connecting link between the Gr and the Christian forms of the doctrine. The Gr or pre-Christian speculation on the subject is marked by the names of Heraclitus, Plato and the Stoics. Philo paves the way for the Christian doctrine of Paul, Hebrews and the Johannine Gospel.

I. Greek Speculation.—The earliest speculations of the Greeks were occupied with the world of Nature, and the first attempts at philosophy take the shape of a search for some unitary principle to explain the diversity of the universe.

Heraclitus was practically the first who sought to account for the order which existed in a world of change by a law or ruling principle. This principle was the Logos. Heraclitus and his followers saw everything in a condition of flux. Everything is forever passing into something else and has an existence only in relation to this process. We cannot say things are: they come into being and pass away. To account for this state of perpetual becoming, Heraclitus was led to seek out a new and primary element from which all things take their rise. This substance he conceived to be, not water or air as previous thinkers had conjectured, but something more subtle, mysterious and potent—fire. This restless, all-consuming and yet all-transforming activity—now darting upward as a flame, now sinking to an ember and now vanishing as smoke—is for him at once the symbol and essence of life. But it is no arbitrary or lawless element. If there is flux everywhere, all change must take place according to "measure." Reality is an "attunement" of opposites, a tension or harmony of conflicting elements. Heraclitus saw all the mutations of being governed by a rational and unalterable law. This law he calls sometimes "Justice," sometimes "Harmony"; more frequently "Logos" or "Reason," and in two passages at least, "God." Fire, Logos, God are fundamentally the same. It is the eternal energy of the universe pervading all its substance and preserving in unity and harmony the perpetual drift and evolution of phenomenal existence. Though Heraclitus sometimes calls this rational principle God, it is not probable that he attached to it any definite idea of consciousness. The Logos is not above the world or even prior to it. It is in it, its inner pervasive energy sustaining, relating and harmonizing its endless variety.

Little was done by the immediate successors of Heraclitus to develop the doctrine of the Logos, and as the distinction between mind and matter became more defined, the term nous superseded that of Logos as the rational force of the world. Anaxagoras was the first thinker who introduced the idea of a supreme intellectual principle which, while independent of the world, governed it. His conception of the nous or "mind" is, however, vague and confused, hardly distinguishable from corporeal matter. By the artificial introduction of a power acting externally upon the world, a dualism, which continued throughout Gr philosophy, was created. At the same time it is to the merit of Anaxagoras that he was the first to perceive some kind of distinction between mind and matter and to suggest a teleological explanation of the universe.

In Plato the idea of a regulative principle reappears. But though the word is frequently used, it is nous and not Logos which determines his conception of the relation of God and the world. The special doctrine of the Logos does not find definite expression, except perhaps in the Timaeus, where the word is employed as descriptive of the Divine force from which the world has arisen. But if the word does not frequently occur in the dialogues, there is not wanting a basis upon which a Logos-doctrine might be framed, and the conception of archetypal ideas affords a philosophical expression of the relation of God and the world. The idea of a dominating principle of reason was lifted to a higher plane by the distinction which Plato made between the world of sense and the world of thought, to the latter of which God belonged. According to Plato, true reality or absolute being consisted of the "Ideas" which he conceived as thoughts residing in the Divine mind before the creation of the world. To these abstract concepts was ascribed the character of supersensible realities of which in some way the concrete visible things of the world were copies or images. Compared with the "Ideas," the world of things was a world of shadows. This was the aspect of the Platonic doctrine of ideas which, as we shall see, Philo afterward seized upon, because it best fitted in with his general conception of the transcendence of God and His relation to the visible world. Three features of Plato's view ought to be remembered as having a special significance for our subject: (1) While God is regarded by Plato as the intelligent power by which the world is formed, matter itself is conceived by him as in some sense eternal and partly intractable. (2) While in the Philebus Plato employs the expression, "the regal principle of intelligence in the nature of God" (νοῦς βασιλικὸς ἐν τῇ τοῦ Διὸς φύσει, noûs basilikós en tē tou Diós phýsei), it is doubtful if reason was endowed with personality or was anything more than an attribute of the Divine mind. (3) The ideas are merely models or archetypes after which creation is fashioned.

The doctrine of the Logos cannot be said to occupy a distinctive place in the teaching of Aristotle, though the word does occur in a variety of senses (e.g., ὁρθὸς λόγος, orthós lógos, "right insight," the faculty by which the will is trained to proper action). Aristotle sought to solve the fundamental problem of Gr philosophy as to how behind the changing multiplicity of appearances an abiding Being is to be thought by means of the concept of development. Plato had regarded the "ideas" as the causes of phenomena—causes different from the objects themselves. Aristotle endeavored to overcome the duality of Plato by representing reality as the essence which contains within itself potentially the phenomena and unfolds into the particular manifestations of the sensible world. This conception has exerted a powerful influence upon subsequent thought, and particularly upon the monotheistic view of the world. At the same time in working it out, the ultimate "prime-mover" of Aristotle was not materially different from the idea of "the Good" of Plato. And inasmuch as God was conceived as pure thought existing apart from the world in eternal blessedness, Aristotle did not succeed in resolving the duality of God and the universe which exercised the Gr mind.

It is to the Stoics we must look for the first systematic exposition of the doctrine of the Logos. It is the key to their interpretation of life, both in the realms of Nature and of duty. Interested more in ethical than physical problems, they were compelled to seek a general metaphysical basis for a rational moral life. Some unitary idea must be found which will overcome the duality between God and the world and remove the opposition between the sensuous and supersensuous which Plato and Aristotle had failed to reconcile. For this end the Logos-doctrine of Heraclitus seemed to present itself as the most satisfactory solution of the problem. The fundamental thought of the Stoics consequently is that the entire universe forms a single living connected whole and that all particulars are the determinate forms assumed by the primitive power which they conceived as never-resting, all-pervading fire. This eternal activity or Divine world-power which contains within itself the conditions and processes of all things, they call Logos or God. More particularly as the productive power, the Deity is named the λόγος σπερματικός, lógos spermatikós, the Seminal Logos or generative principle of the world. This vital energy not only pervades the universe, but unfolds itself into innumerable logoi spermatikoi or formative forces which energize the manifold phenomena of Nature and life. This subordination of all particulars to the Logos not only constitutes the rational order of the universe but supplies a norm of duty for the regulation of the activities of life. Hence in the moral sphere "to live according to Nature" is the all-determining law of conduct.

II. Hebrew Anticipation of Doctrine.—So far we have traced the development of the Logos-doctrine in Gr philosophy. We have now to note a parallel movement in Heb thought. Though strictly speaking it is incorrect to separate the inner Reason from the outer expression in the term Logos, still in the Hellenistic usage the doctrine was substantially a doctrine of Reason, while in Jewish lit. it was more esp. the outward expression or word that was emphasized.

The sources of this conception are to be found in the OT and in the post-canonical literature. The God who is made known in Scripture

1. Word as Revelation is regarded as one who actively reveals Himself. He is exhibited therefore as making His will known in and by His spoken utterances. The "Word of God" is presented as the creative principle (Gen 1 3; Ps 33 6); as instrument of judgment (Hos 6 5); as agent of healing (Ps 107 20); and generally as possessor of personal qualities (Isa 55 2; Ps 147 15). Revelation is frequently called the "Word of the Lord," signifying the spoken as distinct from the written word.

In particular, we may note certain adumbrations of distinction of persons within the Being of God. It is contended that the phrase "Let us make" in Gen points to a plurality of persons in the God-Personal head. This indefinite language of Distinctions Gen is more fully explained by the in Deity priestly ritual in Nu (6 23-26) and in the Psalter. In Jer, Ezr and the vision of Isa (6 2-8) the same idea of Divine plurality is implied, showing that the OT presents a doctrine of God far removed from the sterile monotheism of the Koran (cf Liddon, Divinity of Our Lord, and König).

Passing from these indefinite intimations of personal distinction in the inner life of God, we may mention first that series of remarkable apparitions commonly known as the theophanies of the OT. These representations are described as the "Angel of Jeh" or of "the Covenant"; or as the "Angel of his presence." This angelic appearance is sometimes identified with Jeh (Gen 16 11,13; 32 29-31; Ex 3 2; 13 21), sometimes distinguished from Him (Gen 22 15; 24 7; 28 12); sometimes presented in both aspects (Ex 3 6; Zec 1 11). We find God revealing Himself in this way to Abraham, Sarah, Lot, Hagar, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Manoah. Who was this angel? The earliest Fathers reply with general unanimity that He was the "Word" or "Son of God." But while the earlier church teachers distinguished between the "Angel of the Lord" and the Father, the Arians sought to widen the distinction into a difference of natures, since an invisible Being must be higher than one cognizable by the senses. Augustine insists upon the Scriptural truth of the invisibility of God as God, the Son not less than the Father. He will not presume, however, to say which of the Divine persons manifested Himself in this or that instance; and his general doctrine, in which he has been followed by most of the later teachers of the church, is that the theophanies were not direct appearances of a Person of the Godhead, but self-manifestations of God through a created being.

A further development of the conception of a personal medium of revelation is discernible in the description of Wisdom as given in some of the later books of the OT. The wisdom of Jewish Scripture is more than a human endowment or even an attribute of God, and may be said to attain almost to a personal reflex of the Deity, reminding us of the archetypal ideas of Plato. In Job, wisdom is represented as existent in God and as communicated in its highest form to man. It is the eternal thought in which the Divine Architect ever beholds His future creation (Job 28 23-27). If in Job wisdom is revealed only as underlying the laws of the universe and not as wholly personal, in the Book of Prov it is coeternal with Jeh and assists Him in creation (Prov 8 22-31). It may be doubtful whether this is the language of a real person or only of a poetic personification. But something more than a personified idea may be inferred from the contents of the sapiential books outside the Canon. Sir represents Wisdom as existing from all eternity with God. In Bar and still more in Wisd the Sophia is distinctly personal—"the very image of the goodness of God." In this pseudo-Solomonic book, supposed to be the work of an Alexandrian writer before Philo, the influence of Gr thought is traceable. The writer speaks of God's Word (me'mra) as His agent in creation and judgment.

Finally in the Tgs, which were popular interpretations or paraphrases of the OT Scripture, there was a tendency to avoid anthropomorphic terms or such expressions as involved a too internal conception of God's nature and manifestation. Here the three doctrines of the Word, the Angel, and Wisdom are introduced as mediating factors between God and the world. In particular the chasm between the Divine and human is bridged over by the use of such terms as me'mra ("word") and shekhinah ("glory"). The me'mra proceeds from God, and is His messenger in Nature and history. But it is significant that though the use of this expression implied the felt need of a Mediator, the Word does not seem to have been actually identified with the Messiah.

III. Alexandrian Synthesis.—We have seen that according to Gr thought the Logos was conceived as a rational principle or impersonal energy by means of which the world was fashioned and ordered, while according to Heb thought the Logos was regarded rather as a mediating agent or personal organ of the Divine Being. The Hellenistic doctrine, in other words, was chiefly a doctrine of the Logos as Reason; the Jewish, a doctrine of the Logos as Word.

In the philosophy of Alexandria, of which Philo was an illustrious exponent, the two phases were combined, and Hellenistic speculation was united with Heb tradition for the purpose of showing that the OT taught the true philosophy and embodied all that was highest in Gr reflection. In Philo the two streams meet and flow henceforth in a common bed. The all-pervading Energy of Heraclitus, the archetypal Ideas of Plato, the purposive Reason of Aristotle, the immanent Order of the Stoics are taken up and fused with the Jewish conception of Jeh who, while transcending all finite existences, is revealed through His intermediary Word. As the result of this Philonic synthesis, an entirely new idea of God is formulated. While Philo admits the eternity of matter, he rejects the Gr view that the world is eternal, since it denies the creative activity and providence of God. At the same time he separates Divine energy from its manifestations in the world, and is therefore compelled to connect the one with the other by the interposition of subordinate Powers. These Divine forces are the embodiment of the idéai, idéai, of Plato and the ἄγγελοι, aggeloi, of the OT. The double meaning of Logos—thought and speech—is made use of by Philo to explain the relation subsisting between the ideal world existing only in the mind of God and the sensible universe which is its visible embodiment. He distinguishes, therefore, between the Logos inherent in God (λόγος ἐνδύθετος, lógos endúthetos), corresponding to reason in man, and the Logos which emanates from God (λόγος προφορικὸς, lógos prophorikós), corresponding to the spoken Word as the revelation of thought. Though in His inner essence God is incomprehensible by any but Himself, He has created the intelligible cosmos by His self-activity. The Word is therefore in Philo the rational order manifested in the visible world.

Some special features of the Philonic Logos may be noted: (1) It is distinguished from God as the instrument from the Cause. (2) As instrument by which God makes the world, it is in its nature intermediate between God and man. (3) As the expressed thought of God and the rational principle of the visible world, the Logos is "the Elders or First-born Son of God." It is the "bond" (δεσμός, desmós) holding together all things (De Mundi, 1.592), the law which determines the order of the universe and guides the destinies of men and nations (ib). Sometimes Philo calls it the "Man of God": or the "Heavenly man," the immortal father of all noble men; sometimes he calls it "the Second God," "the Image of God." (4) From this it follows that the Logos must be the Mediator between God and man, the "Intercessor" (ἱκέτης, hikétēs) or "High Priest," who is the ambassador from heaven and interprets God to man. Philo almost exhausts the vocabulary of Heb metaphor in describing the Logos. It is "manna," "bread from heaven," "the living stream," the "sword" of Paradise, the guiding "cloud," the "rock" in the wilderness.

These various expressions, closely resembling the NT descriptions of Christ, lead us to ask: Is Philo's Logos a personal being or a pure abstraction? Philo himself seems to waver in his answer, and the Greek and the Jew in him are hopelessly at issue. That he personifies the Logos is implied in the figures he uses; but to maintain its personality would have been inconsistent with Philo's whole view of God and the world. His Jewish faith inclines him to speak of the Logos as personal, while his Gr culture disposes him to an impersonal interpretation. Confronted with this alternative, the Alexandrian wavers in indecision. After all has been said, his Logos really resolves itself into a group of Divine Ideas, and is conceived, not as a distinct person, but as the thought of God which is expressed in the rational order of the visible universe.

In the speculations of Philo, whose thought is so frequently couched in Bib. language, we have the gropings of a sincere mind after a truth which was disclosed in its fulness only by the revelation of Pentecost. In Philo, Gr philosophy, as has been said, "stood almost at the door of the Christian church." But if the Alexandrian thinker could not create the Christian doctrine, he unconsciously prepared the soil for its acceptance. In this sense his Logos-doctrine has a real value in the evolution of Christian thought. Philo was not, indeed, the master of the apostles, but even if he did nothing more than call forth their antagonism, he helped indirectly to determine the doctrine of Christendom.

IV. Christian Realization.—We pass now to consider the import of the term in the NT. Here it signifies usually "utterance," "speech" or "narrative." In reference to God it is used sometimes for a special utterance, or for revelation in general, and even for the medium of revelation—Holy Scripture. In the prologue of the Fourth Gospel it is identified with the personal Christ; and it is this employment of the term in the light of its past history which creates the interest of the problem of the NT doctrine.

The author of the Fourth Gospel is not, however, the first NT writer who represents Jesus as the

1. Pauline Doctrine Logos. Though Paul does not actually use the word in this connection, he has anticipated the Johannine conception. Christ is represented by St. Paul as before His advent living a life with God in heaven (Gal 4 4; Rom 10 6). He is conceived as one in whose image earthly beings, and esp. men, were made (1 Cor 11 7; 15 45-49); and even as participating in the creation (1 Cor 8 6). In virtue of His distinct being He is called God's "own Son" (Rom 8 32).

Whether Paul was actually conversant with the writings of Philo is disputed (cf Pfeiderer, Urchristentum), but already when he wrote to the Colossians and Ephesians the influence of Alexandrian speculation was being felt in the church. Incipient Gnosticism, which was an attempt to correlate Christianity with the order of the universe as a whole, was current. Most noticeable are the pointed allusions to gnostic watchwords in Eph 3 19 ("fulness of God") and in Col 2 3 ("Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden"), where Paul shows that everything sought for in the doctrine of the Pleroma is really given in Christ. The chief object of these epp. is to assert the unique dignity and absolute power of the Person of Christ. He is not merely one of the Aeons which make up the Pleroma, as gnostic teachers affirm, but a real and personal Being in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells. He is not merely an inferior workman creating glory for a higher Master. He creates for Himself. He is the end as well as the source of all created things (Col 1 15-20). Though throughout this ep. the word "Logos" is never introduced, it is plain that the εἰκὼν, eikōn, of Paul is equivalent in rank and function to the Logos of John. Each exists prior to creation, each is equal to God, shares His life and coöperates in His work.

In the Ep. to the He we have an equally explicit, if not fuller, declaration of the eternal Deity of Christ. Whatever may be said of

2. Doctrine in Hebrews Paul there can be little doubt that the author of He was familiar with the Philonic writings. Who this writer was we do not know; but his Philonism suggests that he may have been an Alexandrian Jew, possibly even a disciple of Philo. In language seemingly adapted from that source ("Son of God," "Firstborn," "above angels," "Image of God," "Agent in Creation," "Mediator," "Great High Priest," "Melchizedek") the author of He speaks of Christ as a reflection of the majesty and imprint of the nature of God, just as in a seal the impression resembles the stamp. The dignity of His title indicates His essential rank. He is expressly addressed as God; and the expression "the effulgence of his glory" (RV ἀπαύγασμα, apauγasma) implies that He is one with God (He 1 3). By Him the worlds have been made, and all things are upheld by the fiat of His word (ver 3). In the name He bears, in the honors ascribed to Him, in His superiority to angels, in His relationship as Creator both to heaven and earth (ver 10), we recognize (in language which in the letter of it strongly reminds us of Philo, yet in its spirit is so different) the description of one who though clothed with human nature is no mere subordinate being, but the possessor of all Divine prerogatives and the sharer of the very nature of God Himself.

In the Fourth Gospel the teaching of Paul and the author of He finds its completest expression.

3. Doctrine in the Fourth Gospel "The letter to the He stands in a sense half-way between Pauline and Johannine teaching" (Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, V, 11). It is, however, too much to say that these three writers represent the successive stages of a single line of development. While all agree in emphasizing the fact of Christ's Divine personality and eternal being, Paul represents rather the religious interest, the Ep. to the He the philosophical. In the Johannine Christology the two elements are united.

In discussing the Johannine doctrine of the Logos we shall speak first of its content and secondly of its terminology.

(1) Content of doctrine.—The evangelist uses "Logos" 6 t as a designation of the Divine preëxistent person of Christ (Jn 1 1.14; 1 Jn 1 1; Rev 19 13), but he never puts it into the mouth of Christ. The idea which John sought to convey by this term was not essentially different from the conception of Christ as presented by Paul. But the use of the word gave a precision and emphasis to the being of Christ which the writer must have felt was esp. needed by the class of readers for whom his Gospel was intended. The Logos with whom the Fourth Gospel starts is a Person. Readers of the Synoptics had long been familiar with the term "Word of God" as equivalent to the Gospel; but the essential purport of John's Word is Jesus Himself, His Person. We have here an essential change of meaning. The two applications are indeed connected; but the conception of the perfect revelation of God in the Gospel passes into that of the perfect revelation of the Divine nature in general (cf Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, V, ii, 320).

In the prologue (which, however, must not be regarded as independent of, or having no integral connection with, the rest of the book) there is stated: (a) the relation of the Logos to God; and (b) the relation of the Logos to the world.

(a) Relation of Logos to God: Here the author makes three distinct affirmations: (i) "In the beginning was the Word." The evangelist carries back his history of Our Lord to a point prior to all temporal things. Nothing is said of the origin of the world. As in Gen 1 1, so here there is only implied that the Logos was existent when the world began to be. When as yet nothing was, the Logos was. Though the eternal preëxistence of the Word is not actually stated, it is implied. (ii) "The Word was with God." Here His personal existence is more specifically defined. He stands distinct from, yet in eternal fellowship with, God. The preposition prós (bei, Luther) expresses beyond the fact of coexistence that of perpetual intercommunion. John would guard against the idea of mere self-contemplation on the one hand, and entire independence on the other. It is union, not fusion. (iii) "The Word was God." He is not merely related eternally, but actually identical in essence with God. The notion of inferiority is emphatically excluded and the true Deity of the Word affirmed. In these three propositions we ascend from His eternal existence to His distinct personality and thence to His substantial Godhead. All that God is the Logos is. Identity, difference, communion are the three phases of the Divine relationship.

(b) Relation of Logos to the world: The Logos is word as well as thought, and therefore there is suggested the further idea of communicativeness. Of this self-communication the evangelist mentions two phases—creation and revelation. The Word unveils Himself through the mediation of objects of sense and also manifests Himself directly. Hence in this section of the prologue (vs 3–5) a threefold division also occurs. (i) He is the Creator of the visible universe. "All things were made through him"—a phrase which describes the Logos as the organ of the entire creative activity of God and excludes the idea favored by Plato and Philo that God was only the architect who molded into cosmos previously existing matter. The term ἐγένετο, egéneto ("becomes," werden), implies the successive evolution of the world, a statement not inconsistent with the modern theory of development. (ii) The Logos is also the source of the intellectual, moral and spiritual life of man. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." He is the light as well as the life—the fountain of all the manifold forms of being and thought in and by whom all created things subsist, and from whom all derive illumination (cf 1 Jn 1 1–3; also Col 1 17). But inasmuch as the higher phases of intelligent life involve freedom, the Divine Light, though perfect and undiminished in itself, was not comprehended by a world which chose darkness rather than light (vs 5.11). (iii) The climax of Divine revelation is expressed in the statement, "The Word became flesh," which implies on the one hand the reality of Christ's humanity, and, on the other, the voluntariness of His incarnation, but excludes the notion that in becoming man the Logos ceased to be God. Though clothed in flesh, the Logos continues to be the self-manifesting God, and retains, even in human form, the character of the Eternal One. In this third phase is embodied the highest manifestation of the Godhead. In physical creation the power of God is revealed. In the bestowal of light to mankind His wisdom is chiefly manifested. But in the third esp. is His love unveiled. All the perfections of the Deity are focused and made visible in Christ—the "glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn 1 14).

Thus the Word reveals the Divine essence. The incarnation makes the life, the light and the love which are eternally present in God manifest to men. As they meet in God, so they meet in Christ. This is the glory which the disciples beheld; the truth to which the Baptist bore witness (ver 7); the fulness whereof His apostles received (ver 16); the entire body of grace and truth by which the Word gives to men the power to become the sons of God.

There is implied throughout that the Word is the Son. Each of these expressions taken separately have led and may lead to error. But combined they correct possible misuse. On the one hand, their union protects us from considering the Logos as a mere abstract impersonal quality; and, on the other, saves us from imparting to the Son a lower state or more recent origin than the Father. Each term supplements and protects the other. Taken together they present Christ before His incarnation as at once personally distinct from, yet equal with, the Father—as the eternal life which was with God and was manifested to us.

(2) Origin of terminology.—We have now to ask whence the author of the Fourth Gospel derived the phraseology employed to set forth his Christology. It will be well, however, to distinguish between the source of the doctrine itself and the source of the language. For it is possible that Alexandrian philosophy might have suggested the linguistic medium, while the doctrine itself had another origin. Writers like Reuss, Keim, Holtzmann, Weizsäcker, Schmiedel, etc., who contend for the Alexandrian derivation of the prologue, are apt to overlook two considerations regarding the Johannine doctrine: (1) There is no essential difference between the teaching of John and that of the other apostolic writers; and even when the word "Logos" is not used, as in Paul's case, the view of Christ's person is virtually that which we find in the Fourth Gospel. (2) The writer himself affirms that his knowledge of Christ was not borrowed from others, but was derived from personal fellowship with Jesus Himself. "We beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten." This is John's summary and witness upon which he proceeds to base the vivid memories of Jesus which follow. The Johannine doctrine is not to be regarded merely as a philosophical account of the nature of God and His creation of the world, but rather as the statement of a belief which already existed in the Christian church and which received fresh testimony and assurance from the evangelist's own personal experience.

But the question may still be asked: Even if it was no novel doctrine which John declared, what led him to adopt the language of the Logos, a word which had not been employed in this connection by previous Christian writers, but which was prevalent in the philosophical vocabulary of the age? It would be inconceivable that the apostle lighted upon this word by chance or that he selected it without any previous knowledge of its history and value. It may be assumed that when he speaks of the "Word" in relation to God and the world, he employs a mode of speech which was already familiar to those for whom he wrote and of whose general import he himself was well aware.

The truth that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ was borne in upon St. John. The problem which confronted him was how he could make that truth real to his contemporaries. This he sought to do by using the language of the highest religious thought of his day.

We have seen that the term "Logos" had undergone a twofold and to some extent parallel evolution. On the one hand, it had a Heb and, on the other, a Hellenic history. In which direction are we to look for the immediate source of the Johannine terminology?

(a) Hebrew source: As a Palestinian Jew familiar with current Jewish ideas and forms of devout expression, it would be natural for him to adopt a word, or its Gr equivalent, which played so important a part in shaping and expressing the religious beliefs of the OT people. Many scholars consider that we have here the probable source of Johannine language. In the OT, and particularly in the Targums or Jewish paraphrases, the "Word" is constantly spoken of as the efficient instrument of Divine action; and the "Word of God" had come to be used in a personal way as almost identical with God Himself. In Rev 19 13, we have obviously an adoption of this Heb use of the phrase. Throughout the Gospel there is evinced a decided familiarity and sympathy with the OT teaching, and some expressions would seem to indicate the evangelist's desire to show that Jesus is the fulfilment of Jewish expectation (e.g. 1 14.29.31; 2 19; 3 14; 6 32.48-50), and the living embodiment of Israelitish truth (1 16; 8 12; 11 25; 14 6). But as against this it has been pointed out by Weizsacker (Apostolisches Zeitalter) that the Word of God is not conceived in the OT as an independent Being, still less as equivalent for the Messiah, and that the rabbinical doctrine which identifies the memra with God is of much later date.

At the same time the Heb cast of thought of the Johannine Gospel and its affinities with Jewish rather than Hellenic modes of expression can hardly be gainsaid. Though John's knowledge of and sympathy with Palestinian religion may not actually account for his use of the term "Logos," it may have largely colored and directed his special application of it. For, as Neander observes, that name may have been put forward at Ephesus in order to lead those Jews, who were busying themselves with speculations on the Logos as the center of all theophanies, to recognize in Christ the Supreme Revelation of God and the fulfilment of their Messianic hopes.

(b) Hellenic source: Other writers trace the Johannine ideas and terms to Hellenic philosophy and particularly to Alexandrian influence as represented in Philo. No one can compare the Fourth Gospel with the writings of Philo without noting a remarkable similarity in diction, esp. in the use of the word "Logos." It would be hazardous, however, on this ground alone to impute conscious borrowing to the evangelist. It is more probable that both the Alexandrian thinker and the NT writer were subject to common influences of thought and expression. Hellenism largely colors the views and diction of the early church. St. Paul takes over many words from Gr philosophy. "There is not a single NT writing," says Harnack (Dogmen-Geschichte, I, 47, n.), "which does not betray the influence of the mode of thought and general culture which resulted from the Hellenizing of the East." But, while that is true, it must not be forgotten, as Harnack himself points out, "that while the writers of the NT breathe an atmosphere created by Gr culture, the religious ideas in which they live and move come to them from the OT."

It is hardly probable that St. John was directly acquainted with the writings of Philo. But it is more than likely that he was cognizant of the general tenor of his teaching and may have discovered in the language which had floated over from Alexandria to Ephesus a suitable vehicle for the utterance of his own beliefs, esp. welcome and intelligible to those who were familiar with Alexandrian modes of thought.

But whatever superficial resemblances there may be between Philo and St. John (and they are not few or vague), it must be at once evident that the whole spirit and view of life is fundamentally different. So far from the apostle being a disciple of the Alexandrian or a borrower of his ideas, it would be more correct to say that there is clearly a conscious rejection of the Philonic conception, and that the Logos of John is a deliberate protest against what he must have regarded as the inadequate and misleading philosophy of Greece.

(c) Contrast between Philo and John: The contrast between the two writers is much more striking than the resemblance. The distinction is not due merely to the acceptance by the Christian writer of Jesus as the Word, but extends to the whole conception of God and His relation to the world which has made Christianity a new power among men. The Logos of Philo is metaphysical, that of John, religious. Philo moves entirely in the region of abstract thought, his idea of God is pure being; John's thought is concrete and active, moving in a region of life and history. Philo's Logos is intermediate, the instrument which God employs in fashioning the world; John's Logos is not subsidiary but is Himself God, and as such is not a mere instrument, but the prime Agent in creation. According to Philo the Deity is conceived as an architect who forms the world out of already existent matter. According to John the Logos is absolute Creator of all that is, the Source of all being, life and intelligence. In Philo the Logos hovers between personality and impersonality, and if it is sometimes personified it can hardly be said to have the value of an actual person; in John the personality of the Logos is affirmed from the first and it is of the very essence of his doctrine, the ground of His entire creative energy. The idea of an incarnation is alien to the thought of Philo and impossible in his scheme of the universe; the "Word that has become flesh" is the pivot and crown of Johannine teaching. Philo affirms the absolute incomprehensibility of God; but it is the prime object of the evangelist to declare that God is revealed in Christ and that the Logos is the unveiling through the flesh of man of the self-manifesting Deity. Notwithstanding the personal epithets employed by Philo, his Logos remains a pure abstraction or attribute of God, and it is never brought into relation with human history. John's Logos, on the other hand, is instinct with life and energy from the beginning, and it is the very heart of his Gospel to declare as the very center of life and history the great historical event of the incarnation which is to recreate the world and reunite God and man.

From whatever point of view we compare them, we find that Philo and St. John, while using the same language, give an entirely different value to it. The essential purport of the Johannine Logos is Jesus Christ. The adoption of the term involves its complete transformation. It is baptized with a new spirit and henceforth stands for a new conception. From whatsoever source it was originally derived—from Heb tradition or Hellenic speculation—on Christian soil it is a new product. It is neither Gr nor Jewish, it is Christian. The philosophical abstraction has become a religious conception. Hellenism and Hebrewism have been taken up and fused into a higher unity, and Christ as the embodiment of the Logos has become the creative power and the world-wide possession of mankind.

The most probable view is that Philo and John found the same term current in Jewish and gentile circles and used it to set forth their respective ideas; Philo, following his predilections for Gr philosophy, to give a Hellenic complexion to his theory of the relation of Divine Reason to the universe; John, true to his Heb instincts, seeing in the Logos the climax of that revelation of God to man of which the earlier Jewish theophanies were but partial expressions.

There is nothing improbable in the surmise that the teaching of Philo gave a fresh impulse to the study of the Logos as Divine Reason which was already shadowed forth in the Bib. doctrine of Wisdom (Westcott). Nor need we take offence that such an important idea should have come to the Bib. author from an extra-Bib. writer (cf Schmiedel, Johannine Writings), remembering only that the author of the Johannine Gospel was no mechanical borrower, but an entirely independent and original thinker who gave to the Logos and the ideas associated with it a wholly new worth and interpretation. Thus, as has been said, the treasures of Greece were made contributory to the full unfolding of the Gospel.

V. Patristic Development.—The Johannine Logos became the fruitful source of much speculation in gnostic circles and among the early Fathers regarding the nature of Christ. The positive truth presented by the Fourth Gospel was once more broken up, and the various elements of which it was the synthesis became the seeds of a number of partial and one-sided theories respecting the relation of the Father and the Son. The influence of Gr ideas, which had already begun in the Apostolic Age, became more pronounced and largely shaped the current of ante-Nicene theology (see Hatch, Hibbert Lectures).

Gnosticism in particular was an attempt to reconcile Christianity with philosophy; but in gnostic systems the term "Logos" is only sparingly employed. According to Basilides the "Logos" was an emanation from the nous as personified Wisdom, which again was directly derived from the Father. Valentinus, in whose teaching Gnosticism culminated, taught that Wisdom was the last of a series of Aeons which emanated from the Primal Being, and the Logos was an emanation of the first two principles which issued from God—Reason, Faith. Justin Martyr, the first of the sub-apostolic Fathers, sought to unite the Scriptural idea of the Logos as Word with the Hellenic idea of Reason. According to him God produced in His own nature a rational power which was His agent in creation and took the form in history of the Divine Man. Christ is the organ of all revelations, and as the λογος σπέρματος, lógos spermaticós, He sows the seeds of virtue and truth among the heathen. All that is true and beautiful in the pagan world is to be traced to the activity of the Logos before His incarnation. Tatian and Theophilus taught essentially the same doctrine; though in Tatian there is a marked leaning toward Gnosticism, and consequently a tendency to separate the Ideal from the historical Christ. Athenagoras, who ascribes to the Logos the creation of all things, regarding it in the double sense of the Reason of God and the creative energy of the world, has a firm grasp of the Bib. doctrine, which was still more clearly expressed by Irenaeus, who held that the Son was the essential Word, eternally begotten of the Father and at once the interpreter of God and the Creator of the world.

The Alexandrian school was shaped by the threefold influence of Plato, Philo and the Johannine Gospel. Clement of Alexandria views the Son as the Logos of the Father, the Fountain of all intelligence, the Revealer of the Divine Being and the Creator and Illuminator of mankind. He repudiates the idea of the inferiority of the Son, and regards the Logos not as the spoken but as the creative word. Origen seeks to reconcile the two ideas of the eternity and the subordination of the Logos, and is in this sense a mediator between the Arian and more orthodox parties and was appealed to by both. According to him the Son is equal in substance with the Father, but there is a difference in essence. While the Father is "the God" (ὁ θεός, ho theós) and "God Himself" (αὐτόθεος, autótheos), the Logos is "a second God" (δεύτερος θεός, deútēros theós). In the Nicene Age, under the shaping influence of the powerful mind of Athanasius, and, to a lesser degree, of Basil and the two Gregories, the Logos-doctrine attained its final form in the triumphant statement of the Nicene Creed which declared the essential unity, but, at the same time, the personal distinction of the Father and Son. The Council of Nicaea practically gathered up the divergent views of the past and established the teaching of the Fourth Gospel as the doctrine of the church.

LOINS, loinz (לֵּילָץ, hālāc, Aram. לְרִץ, hārāc, מֹתֵן, mōthen, כֶּסֶל, kešel, יָרֵךְ, yārēkh; οσφύς, osphús): This variety of Heb synonyms seems to be used rather promiscuously for the loins, though there is no little difference in the secondary meanings of these words. They represent various modes of expressing the loins as the seat of strength and vigor (Job 40 16, Heb mōthen, here used of Behemoth), the center of procreative power, the portion of the body which is girded about, and is considered as specially needful of covering, even under primitive conditions of life (Job 31 20), and where painful disease most effectually unfits a man for work and warfare.

Jacob receives the Divine promise that "kings shall come out of [his] loins" (hālāc, Gen 35 11), and we read of 66 souls "that came out of his loins" (yārēkh) which went into Egypt (46 26). The Ep. to the He speaks of the Levites as having come out of the loins of Abraham (He 7 5).

As the seat of strength (cf LEG; THIGH), the loins are girded with belts of leather (2 K 1 8; Mt 3 4), or cloth, often beautifully embroidered (Ex 28 39), or of costly material (39 29; Jer 13 1f). Girded loins are a sign of readiness for service or endeavor (Ex 12 11; 1 K 18 46; 2 K 4 29; Job 38 3; Prov 31 17; Lk 12 35; 1 Pet 1 13). Of God it is said that "he looseth the bond of kings, and bindeth their loins with a girdle," i.e. strengthens them (Job 12 18). On the loins the sword is worn (2 S 20 8). It is a sign of mourning to gird the loins with sackcloth (1 K 20 32; Isa 32 11; Jer 48 37; Am 8 10; see also the First Papyrus of Elephantine, l. 20). A man whose strength is in his attachment to truth, in other words is faithful, is spoken of as having his loins girt about with truth (Eph 6 14). Thus the Messiah is described: "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins" (Isa 11 5). One of the most primitive modes of clothing consisted of a fleece tied around the loins (Job 31 20).

The condition of unfitness for service is described in that the loins (kešel) are filled with a burning (Ps 38 7, AV "loathsome disease"), or that "a sore burden" is laid upon the "loins" (mōthen, 66 11). Thus the loins are made "continually to shake" (69 23), "the joints of [the] loins" (hārāc) are loosed (Dnl 5 6), the "loins are filled with anguish" (Isa 21 3). It is very likely that originally a disabling lumbago or the painful affections of the gall or the bladder (calculus, etc.) are meant, but very soon the expression becomes merely metaphorical to express personal helplessness, esp. that which can but rely upon assistance and help from God.

LOIS, lō'is (Λῳῖς, Lōis [2 Tim 1 5]): The grandmother of Timothy, and evidently the mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother. The family lived at Lystra (Acts 16 1). It was on the occasion of Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 14) that Eunice and Timothy were converted to Christ, and it was, in all likelihood, on the same occasion that Lois also became a Christian. Paul speaks of the unfeigned faith that there was in Timothy, and he adds that this faith dwelt at the first in "thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice." This is the only passage where Lois is mentioned; but by comparing 2 Tim 1 5 with 2 Tim 3 15 (AV), where Paul refers to Timothy's having "from a child known the holy scriptures," it would appear that Lois was associated with Eunice, both in a reverent faith in God and in the careful instruction in the OT which was given to Timothy. See EUNICE; TIMOTHY.

LONGEVITY, lon-jev'i-ti: In the part of Gen ascribed to P, the names and genealogies of the patriarchs are given (Gen 5, 11). In the three VSS which are our chief sources, MT, LXX and Sam, the age-numbers given for these patriarchs are hopelessly at variance. It is in accord with what we find in the earliest legend of most races that in these chapters a great length of life is ascribed to these; thus Berosus attributes to the first 10 kings of Babylonia a span of 430,000 years, and Hesiod (Works and Days, 129) says that in the Silver Age childhood lasted 100 years, during which a boy was reared and grew up beside his mother. On the other hand the evidence of prehistoric archaeology shows that the rate of development of the individual in the early Stone Age differed very little from that of humanity at the present day. It is possible that, in the case of the Heb record, the names of certain pre-Abrahamic patriarchs were derived from an ancient tradition, and that in the desire to fill up the chronology of the period before the call of Abraham, these names were inserted and the time which was supposed to have elapsed was divided among them, on the basis of some such hypothesis as that which is said to have existed among the Jews, that the Messiah should come 4,000 years after Adam.

We know from the archaeological evidence that the antiquity of primitive man extends to a date very much farther back than 4,000 years. Indeed, we can prove that before 4000 BC there were settled nationalities both in the valley of the Nile and that of the Euphrates, and that among these the duration of individual life was much the same as at the present day. The first three dynasties in Egypt, starting at or about 4400 BC, consisted of 25 consecutive kings, the average length of whose several reigns was about 30 years. The biographic sketches of Bib. persons other than those in Gen showed that their longevity did not exceed that of our contemporaries. Eli was at 98 blind and feeble. David at 70 was bedridden and frail. Manasseh, the king of Judah whose reign was longest, died at 67; Uzziah at 68. The statement in Ps 90 10 attributed to Moses is a correct estimate of what has been the expectation of life at all time.

At the present day among Palestinian fellahin very old men are uncommon. I have never seen anyone among them who could prove that he was 80 years of age; the rate of infant mortality is appallingly high. Maturity is earlier, and signs of senility appear among them sooner than among the same class in Great Britain.

LONGSUFFERING, long-suf'er-ing (אָנְדֵּרְלִידִיג, 'erekh 'appayim; μακροθυμία, makrothumia): The words 'erekh 'appayim, tr<sup>d</sup> longsuffering, mean lit. "long of nose" (or "breathing"), and, as anger was indicated by rapid, violent breathing through the nostrils, "long of anger," or "slow to wrath." The adj. is applied to God (Ex 34 6 AV, in the name of Jeh as proclaimed to Moses; Nu 14 18 AV; Ps 86 15 AV; RV "slow to anger," which is also the tr in other places; AV and RV Neh 9 17; Ps 103 8; 145 8; Prov 15 18; 16 32; Joel 2 13; Jon 4 2; Nah 1 3); it is associated with "great kindness" and "plenteous in mercy." The subst. occurs in Jer 15 15: "Take me not away in thy longsuffering." In Eccl 7 8, we have 'erekh rū'ah, AV and RV "patient in spirit."

The word in the NT rendered "longsuffering," makrothumia (once makrothumēō, "to be long-suffering"), which is the rendering of 'erekh 'appayim in the LXX, is lit. "long of mind or soul" (regarded as the seat of the emotions), opposed to shortness of mind or soul, irascibility, impatience, intolerance. It is attributed to God (Rom 2 4; 9 22; 2 Pet 3 9), of His bearing long with sinners and slowness to execute judgment on them. It is, therefore, one of "the fruits of the Spirit" in man (Gal 5 22) which Christians are frequently exhorted to cherish and show one toward the other (Eph 4 2; Col 1 11; 3 12, etc); it belongs, Paul says, to the love, without which all else is nothing: "Love suffereth long [makrothumēi], and is kind" (1 Cor 13 4). The vb. makrothumēō is sometimes tr<sup>d</sup> by "patience" (Mt 18 26, 29, "Have patience with me"). Lk 18 7 has been variously rendered; AV has "And shall not God avenge his own elect . . . though he bear long with them"; RV "and yet he is longsuffering over them," AKV m "and is he slow to punish on their behalf?" Weymouth (NT in Modern Speech) has "although he seems slow in taking action on their behalf," which most probably gives the sense of the passage; in Jas 5 7, 8 the vb. occurs thrice, AV "be patient," "hath long patience"; RV also tr<sup>d</sup> by "patient"; this, however, as in Mt 18 26, 29, seems to lose the full force of the Gr word. According to Trench (Synonyms of the NT, 189), the difference between hupomonē ("patience") and makrothumia is that the latter word expresses patience in respect to persons, and the former in respect to things; hence hupomonē is never ascribed to God; where He is called "the God of patience," it is as He gives it to His servants and saints. But in Jas 5 7 it is used with reference to things, and in Col 1 11 it is associated with patience (cf He 6 12, 15), suggesting patient endurance of trials and sufferings. In Col 1 11 it is also associated with "joy," indicating that it is not a mere submissiveness, but a joyful acceptance of the will of God, whatever it may be. In Wisd 15 1; Ecclus 5 4, we have "longsuffering" (makrothumias) ascribed to God; also in Ecclus 2 11, RV "mercy."

LOOK, look: (1) The uses of the simple vb. in EV are nearly all good modern Eng. In Isa 5 2, however, "He looked that it should bring forth grapes"—"look" is used in the sense of "expect." Cf AV of Sir 20 14; Acts 28 6, "They looked when he should have swollen" (RV "They expected that he would have swollen"). In 1 Macc 4 54, AV has inserted "look" (omitted in RV) as a simple interjection, without a corresponding word in the Gr. (2) "Look upon" means "fix one's attention on," and is often so used in EV without further significance (Eccl 2 11; Lk 22 56, etc); but in 2 Ch 24 22 AV and RV, "Jeh look upon it" means "remember." However, continual attention given to an object usually denotes that pleasure is found in it, and from this fact such uses as those of Prov 23 31, "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red," are derived. In particular, God's "looking upon" a person becomes a synonym for "showing favor unto," as in Dt 26 7 AV; Ps 84 9 AV and RV; 119 132 AV; Lk 1 48 RV only, etc (RV usually re-words in such passages). On the other hand, "look on" may be weakened, as in such phrases as "fair to look upon" (Gen 12 11, etc), where it means only "fair to the sight." Or, as in modern Eng., "look on" may describe the attitude of the passive spectator, even when applied to God. So Ps 35 17, "Lord, how long wilt thou look on?" (3) "Look to" usually means "pay attention to," as in Prov 14 15; Jer 39 12; 2 Jn ver 8, etc, and RV occasionally uses this phrase in place of AV's "look upon" (Phil 2 4). The reverse change is made in AV's 1 S 16 12, "goodly to look to"; Ezk 23 15, "all of them princes to look to," but in the latter verse a more drastic revision was needed, for the meaning is "all of them in appearance as princes." "Look out" may mean "search for" (Gen 41 33; Acts 6 3), but may also be used lit. (Gen 26 8, etc). AV's "looking after those things" in Lk 21 26 has been changed by RV into "expectation of the things." "Look one another in the face" in 2 K 14 8.11 means "meet in battle."

LOOKING-GLASS, lōōk'ing-glas (Ex 38 8 AV, m "brassen glasses"). See GLASS; MIRROR.

LOOM, lōōm. See WEAVING.

LOOP, lōōp (in pl. לולָאֵם, lulā'ōth [Ex 26 4 f. 10 f; 36 11 f.17]): A ring or fold made of blue thread to fasten into the corresponding golden clasps, or taches upon the curtains of the tabernacle, joining them in sets, or pairs. See TABERNACLE.

LORD, lōrd, THE LORD: This Eng. word in our Bible represents one Aram., 3 Gr and 9 Heb words, two of them in two forms. It thus expresses all grades of dignity, honor, and majesty. It is not always possible to be sure of the sense in which the term is to be taken. In Gen 18 3; 19 18, the translators waver between interpreting of the Divine Person and a finite angel (cf marginal readings). It represents the most sacred Heb name for God, as their covenant God, Yāh, Yahweh, and the more usual designation of Deity, 'Ādhōnāy, 'Ādhōn, a term which they adopted to avoid pronouncing the most holy designation. They had placed on Lev 24 16 an interpretation that aroused such a dread that they seldom dared use the name at all. When two of the words usually tr<sup>d</sup> "Lord," both referring to God, occur together, AV renders "Lord God," and ARV "Lord Jehovah." ARV has adopted the rule of using the covenant name transliterated, instead of the term "Lord," in which AV adopts the rule of the Hebrews to avoid the holy name.

The Aram. designation, Mārē, occurs only in Dnl (e.g. 2 47; 5 23), and the same word refers to a man (4 24).

Of the Gr words, Kūrios is freely used of both the Deity and men. Despōtēs, of men in classic usage, occurs only of God, including the ascended Jesus, and is employed only 5 t. Megistānes (pl) is found once, of men (Mk 6 21). Rabboni (Heb in Gr letters) is applied only to the Christ, and is simply transliterated in RV, but rendered "Lord" in AV (cf Mk 10 51).

Our Eng. VSS distinguish the 3 main uses of the term thus: (1) "Lord" represents the Heb Yahweh, LXX Kūrios, except where 'Ādhōnāy or 'Ādhōn is combined with Yahweh (= "Lord God"); ARV has in these examples employed the name as it is found in the Heb, simply transliterated. (2) "Lord" corresponds to 'Ādhōnāy, 'Ādhōn, Mārē, also Gr Kūrios (see (1)), and Despōtēs, for which ARV has always "Master" in either the text or the margin. (3) "Lord" ("lord") translates all the remaining 8 Heb words and the Gr words except Despōtēs. It is thus seen that Kūrios corresponds to all three forms of writing the Eng. term. See JEHOVAH.

WILLIAM OWEN CARVER

LORD OF HOSTS: A name or title of God frequently used in the OT, always tr<sup>d</sup> "Jeh of Hosts" (יהוה צבאות, Yēhōwāh ṣ'bhā'ōth) in ARV, since Yēhōwāh, never 'Ādhōnāy, is used in this phrase. Evidently the meaning of the title is that all created agencies and forces are under the leadership or dominion of Jeh, who made and maintains them (Gen 2 1; Isa 45 12). It is used to express Jeh's great power. See GOD, NAMES OF, III, 8.

LORD'S DAY (ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα, hē kuriakē hēmēra): Formerly it was supposed that the adj. kuriakos (tr<sup>d</sup> "the Lord's") was a purely Christian word, but recent discoveries have proved that it was in fairly common use in the Rom Empire before Christian influence had been felt. In secular use it signified "imperial," "belonging to the lord"— the emperor—and so its adoption by Christianity in the sense "belonging to the Lord"—to Christ—was perfectly easy. Indeed, there is reason to suppose that in the days of Domitian, when the issue had been sharply defined as "Who is Lord? Caesar or Christ?" the use of the adj. by the church was a part of the protest against Caesar-worship (see LORD). And it is even possible that the full phrase, "the Lord's day," was coined as a contrast to the phrase, "the Augustean day" (ἡ σεβαστὴ ἡμέρα, hē sebastē hēmēra), a term that seems to have been used in some parts of the Empire to denote days esp. dedicated in honor of Caesar-worship.

"Lord's day" in the NT occurs only in Rev 1 10, but in the post-apostolic literature we have the following references: Ignatius, Ad 2. Post-Apostolic Mag., ix.1, "No longer keeping the Sabbath but living according to the Lord's day, on which also our Light arose"; Ev. Pet., ver 35, "The Lord's day began to dawn" (cf Mt 28 1); ver 50, "early on the Lord's day" (cf Lk 24 1); Barn 15 9, "We keep the eighth day with gladness," on which Jesus arose from the dead." I.e. Sunday, as the day of Christ's resurrection, was kept as a Christian feast and called "the Lord's day," a title fixed so definitely as to be introduced by the author of Ev. Pet. into phrases from the canonical Gospels. Its appropriateness in Rev 1 10 is obvious, as St. John received his vision of the exalted Lord when all Christians had their minds directed toward His entrance into glory through the resurrection.

This "first day of the week" appears again in Acts 20 7 as the day on which the worship of the "breaking of bread" took place, and

3. In the NT the impression given by the context is that St. Paul and his companions prolonged their visit to Troas so as to join in the service. Again, 1 Cor 16 2 contains the command, "Upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store," where the force of the form of the imperative used (the present for repeated action) would be better represented in Eng. by "lay by on the successive Sundays." Worship is here not explicitly mentioned (the Gr of "by him" is the usual phrase for "at home"), but that the appropriateness of the day for Christian acts involves an appropriateness for Christian worship is not to be doubted. Indeed, since the seven-day week was unknown to Gr thought, some regular observance of a hebdomadal cycle must have been settled at Corinth before St. Paul could write his command. Finally, the phrase, "first day in the week" is found elsewhere in the NT only in Mt 28 1; Mk 16 2; Lk 24 1; Jn 20 1.19. The word in all passages for "first" is poor Gr (μία, μία, "one," for πρώτη, πρώτη, a Hebraism), and the coincidence of the form of the phrase in Acts 20 7 and 1 Cor 16 2 with the form used by all four evangelists for the Resurrection Day is certainly not accidental; it was the fixed Christian base, just as "Lord's day" was to the writer of Ev. Pet.

The hebdomadal observance of Sunday points back of Corinth to Jewish-Christian soil, but it is impossible to say when the custom

4. Origin first began. Not, apparently, in the earliest days, for Acts 2 46 represents the special worship as daily. But this could not have continued very long, for waning of the first enthusiasm, necessity of pursuing ordinary avocations, and increasing numbers of converts must soon have made general daily gatherings impracticable. A choice of a special day must have become necessary, and this day would, of course, have been Sunday. Doubtless, however, certain individuals and communities continued the daily gatherings to a much later date, and the appearance of Sunday as the one distinctive day for worship was almost certainly gradual.

Sunday, however, was sharply distinguished from the Sabbath. One was the day on which worship was offered in a specifically Christian form, the other was a day of ritual and the rest to be observed by all who were Sabbath subject to the Law of Moses through circumcision (Gal 5 3; cf Acts 21 20). Uncircumcised Gentiles, however, were free from any obligation of Sabbath observance, and it is quite certain that in apostolic times no renewal of any Sabbath rules or transfer of them to Sunday was made for gentile converts. No observance of a particular "day of rest" is contained among the "necessary things" of Acts 15 28,29, nor is any such precept found among all the varied moral directions given in the whole epistolary literature. Quite on the contrary, the observance of a given day as a matter of Divine obligation is denounced by St. Paul as a forsaking of Christ (Gal 4 10), and Sabbath-keeping is condemned explicitly in Col 2 16. As a matter of individual devotion, to be sure, a man might do as he pleased (Rom 14 5,6), but no general rule as necessary for salvation could be compatible with the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Evidently, then, the fact that the Christian worship was held on Sunday did not sanctify Sunday any more than (say) a regular Wednesday service among us sanctifies Wednesday, noting esp. that the apostolic service was held in the evening. For it was felt that Christian enthusiasm would raise every day to the highest religious plane, the decay of that enthusiasm through the long delay of the Parousia not being contemplated.

The delay occurred, however, and for human beings in the ordinary routine of life there are necessary, not only set periods of worship, but

6. Later set periods of relaxation from routine History to make worship profitable. And the Christian fundamental doctrine of mercy demands that Christianity, where she has the power, shall give to men relief from the drain of continuous toil.

The formulation of general rules to carry these principles into effect, however, belongs to a period outside NT times, and so does not come within the scope of this Encyclopaedia. It is enough to say that the ecclesiastical rules for Sunday were felt to be quite distinct from the laws for Sabbath observance, and that Alcuin (733?-804) is the first to hold that the church had transferred the Sabbath rules as a whole to Sunday. This principle is still maintained in Roman Catholic theology, but at the Reformation was rejected uncompromisingly by both Lutherans (Augsb. Conf., II, 7) and Calvinists (Helvet. Conf., XXIV, 1-2) in favor of a literally apostolic freedom (Calvin even proposed to adopt Thursday in place of Sunday). The appearance of the opposite extreme of a genuinely "legalistic" Sabbatarianism in the thoroughly Evangelical Scotch and English Puritanism is an anomaly that is explained by reaction from the extreme laxity of the surroundings.

Sunday was fixed as the day for Christian worship by general apostolic practice, and the academic possibility of an alteration hardly seems worth discussing. If a literal apostolicity is to be insisted upon, however, the breaking of bread must be made part of the Sunday service.

7. Practical Rest from labor for the sake of worship, public and private, is intensely desirable, since the reigning of the general apostolic enthusiasm seems unattainable, but the NT leaves us quite free as to details. Rest from labor to secure physical and mental renewal rests on a still different basis, and the working out of details involves a knowledge of sociological and industrial conditions, as well as a knowledge of religious principles. It is the task of the pastor to combine the various principles and to apply them to the particular conditions of his people in their locality, in accordance with the rules that his own church has indubitably the right to lay down—very special attention being given, however, to the highly important matter of the peculiar problem offered by children. In all cases the general principles underlying the rules should be made clear, so that they will not appear as arbitrary legalism, and it is probably best not to use the term

"Sabbath" for Sunday. Under certain conditions great freedom may be desirable, and such is certainly not inconsistent with our liberty in Christ. But experience, and not least of all the experience of the first churches of the Reformation, has abundantly shown that much general laxness in Sunday rules invariably results disastrously. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

LORD'S PRAYER, THE (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4): Prayer occupied an important place in the life and the teachings of Jesus. He was emphatically a man of prayer, praying frequently in private and in public, and occasionally spending whole nights in communion with His heavenly Father. He often spoke to His disciples on the subject of prayer, cautioning them against ostentation, or urging perseverance, faith and large expectation, and He gave them a model of devotion in the Lord's prayer.

This prayer is given by the evangelists in two different forms and in two entirely different connections. In Mt's account the prayer

1. Twofold Form is given as a part of the Sermon on the Mount and in connection with a criticism of the ostentation usual in the prayers of the hypocrites and the heathen. Lk introduces the prayer after the Galilean ministry and represents it as given in response to a request from one of His disciples, "Lord teach us to pray, as John taught his disciples." It gives us, however, no note of time or place, and it is quite possible that the incident which it records took place much earlier. The later form is much shorter than that of Mt and the common parts differ materially in language.

In view of the differences, the reader instinctively inquires whether the prayer was given on two different occasions in these different connections, or the evangelists have presented the same incident in forms derived from different sources, or modified the common source to suit their immediate purposes.

If the prayer was given only on one occasion, there is little doubt that Lk preserves the true historical circumstances, though not necessarily the accurate point of time or place, or the exact form of language. Such a request made at the close of the prayer of Jesus would be natural, and the incident bears every mark of reality. On the other hand, it would be reasonable to assume that the author of Mt's source, remembering the incident, incorporated the prayer in the Sermon on the Mount as an illustration of the injunctions concerning prayer.

There are many reasons for regarding the Sermon as a collection of sayings spoken on different occasions and summarized for convenience in teaching and memorizing. There is, however, no proof that the prayer was given but once by Jesus. We need not suppose that His disciples were always the same, and we know that He gave instruction in prayer on various occasions. He may have given the model prayer on one occasion spontaneously and at another time on the request of a disciple. It is probable that the two evangelists, using the same or different sources, presented the prayer in such connection as best suited the plan of their narratives. In any case, it is rather remarkable that the prayer is not quoted or directly mentioned anywhere else in the NT.

In addition to the opening salutation, "Our Father who art in heaven," the Lord's Prayer consists of six petitions. These are arranged in three equal parts. In the first part, the thought is directed toward God and His great purposes.

2. Arrangement In the second part, the attention is directed to our condition and wants. The two sets of petitions are closely related, and a line of progress runs through the whole prayer. The petitions of the first part are inseparable, as each includes the one which follows. As the hallowing of God's name requires the coming of His kingdom, so the kingdom comes through the doing of His will. Again, the first part calls for the second, for if His will is to be done by us, we must have sustenance, forgiveness and deliverance from evil. If we seek first the glory of God, the end requires our good. While we hallow His name we are sanctified in Him. The doxology of Mt and our rituals is not found in the leading MSS and is generally regarded as an ancient liturgical addition. For this reason it is omitted by RV.

The sources of the two accounts cannot be known with certainty. It is hardly correct to say that one account is more original than the

3. Sources other. The original was spoken in Aram., while both of the reports are certainly based on Gr sources. The general agreement in language, esp. in the use of the unique term ἐπιούσιος, epiousios, shows that they are not independent trs of the Aram. original.

Three expressions of the prayer deserve special notice. The words, "Our Father," are new in the Bible and in the world. When God

4. Special Expressions is called Father in the OT, He is regarded as Father of the nation, not of the individual. Even in the moving prayer of Isa 63 16 (AV), "Doubtless thou art our father," the connection makes clear that the reference is to God in the capacity of Creator. The thought of God as the Father of the individual is first reached in the Apoc: "O Lord, Father and Master of my life" (Sir 23 1; cf Wisd 2 16; 14 3). Here also the notion is veiled in the thought of God as Creator. It was left for Jesus the Son to give us the privilege of calling God "Our Father."

Of the adj. epiousion, "daily" or "needful," neither the origin nor the exact meaning is or is likely to be known. Whether it is qualitative or temporal depends on its derivation from ἐπιέναι, epinai, or ἐπιέναι, epinai. Our translators usually follow the latter, translating "daily." ARV gives "needful" as a marginal rendering.

The phrase ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ, apō toū ponērou, is equally ambiguous. Since the adj. may be either masc. or neut., it is impossible to decide whether "from the evil one" or "from the evil" was intended. The probability is in favor of the masc. The Oriental naturally thought of evil in the concrete, just as we think of it in the abstract. For this reason the Authorized rendering "from evil" is more real to us. The evil deprecated is moral, not physical.

The Lord's Prayer was given as a lesson in prayer. As such this simple model surpasses all precepts about prayer. It suggests to the

5. Purpose child of God the proper objects of prayer. It supplies suitable forms of language and illustrates the simple and direct manner in which we may trustingly address our heavenly Father. It embraces the elements of all spiritual desire summed up in a few choice sentences. For those who are not able to bring their struggling desires to birth in articulate language it provides an instructive form. To the mature disciple it ever unfolds with richer depths of meaning. Though we learn these words at our mother's knee, we need a lifetime to fill them with meaning and all eternity to realize their answer.

LITERATURE.—The lit. of this subject is very extensive. For brief treatment the student will consult the relative sections in the comms. on the Gospels of Mt and Lk and in the Lives of Christ and the arts. on the Lord's Prayer in the several Bible dicts. A collection of patristic comment is given by G. Tillmann in his Das

Gebet nach der Lehre der Heiligen dargestellt, 2 vols, Freiburg, 1876. The original comments may be found in any of the standard collections of the Church Fathers.

Among historical studies may be mentioned, F. H. Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church, Cambridge, 1891, and G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, I, Leipzig, 1898, ET, Edinburgh, 1902.

LITERATURE

I. Definition.—Eucharist.—The distinctive rite of Christian worship, instituted by Our Lord Jesus Christ upon the eve of His atoning death, being a religious partaking of bread and wine, which, having been presented before God the Father in thankful memorial of Christ's inexhaustible sacrifice, have become (through the sacramental blessing) the communion of the body and blood of Christ (cf Jn 6 54; Acts 2 42; 20 7.11; Rom 15 16; 1 Cor 10 16; 11 23-26).

II. The NT Sources.—The NT sources of our knowledge of the institution of the Eucharist are fourfold, a brief account thereof being found in each of the Synoptic Gospels and in St. Paul's First Ep. to the Cor (Mt 26 26-29; Mk 14 22-25; Lk 22 14-20; 1 Cor 11 23-26; cf 10 16.17).

The text of these narratives has been found to need little amendment, save the dropping of a word or two, from each account, that had crept in

1. Textual Considerations through the tendency of copyists, consciously or unconsciously, to assimilate the details of parallel passages. The genuineness of Lk 22 19b.20 is absolutely beyond question. Their omission in whole or part, and the alterations in the order of two or three verses in the whole section (vs 14-20), characteristic of a very small number of MSS, are due to confusion in the minds of a few scribes and translators, between the paschal cup (ver 17) and the eucharistic cup (ver 20), and to their well-meant, but mistaken, attempt to improve upon the text before them.

The briefest account of the institution of the Eucharist is found in Mk 14 22-24. In it the Eucharist is not sharply distinguished from its setting, the paschal meal: "And as they were eating, he took bread, and when he had blessed, he brake it, and gave to them, and said, 'Take ye: this is my body.' And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave to them: and they all drank of it. And he said unto them, 'This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many.' This represents a tradition settled within 20 years of the event described.

2. Narratives Compared

Mt 26 26-28 gives a few touches by way of revision, apparently from one then present. He adds the exhortation "eat" at the giving of the bread, and puts the personal command, "Drink ye all of it," in place of the mere statement, "and they all drank of it." He adds also of the blood that, as "poured out for many," it is "unto remission of sins."

The Pauline account, 1 Cor 11 23-26 (the earliest written down, c 55 AD), was called forth in rebuke of the scandalous profanation of the Eucharist at Corinth. It gives us another tradition independent of, and supplementary to, that of Mk-Mt. It claims the authority of the Saviour as its source, and had been already made known to the Corinthians in the apostle's oral teaching. The time of the institution is mentioned as the night of the betrayal. We note of the bread, "This is my body, which is for you," of the cup, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood," and the redoubled command, "This do in remembrance of me."

The narrative given in Lk 22 14-20 is the latest (c 80 AD) of our NT records. St. Luke had taken pains to follow up everything to its source, and had redited the oral tradition in the light of his historical researches (1 2 3), and thus his account is of the highest value. Writing for a wider circle of readers, he carefully separates and distinguishes the Eucharist from the paschal meal which preceded it, and puts the statement of Christ about not drinking "from henceforth of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come," in its proper place as referring to the paschal cup (cf Mt 26 29; Mk 14 25; and Lk 22 15-18). In describing the actual institution of the Eucharist, he gives us an almost verbal identity with the account given by St. Paul (1 Cor 11 23-25).

We should note the statement appended by St. Paul to his account of the Institution, wherein he emphasizes the memorial aspect and evidential value of the witness the eucharistic observance would give throughout the ages of the Christian dispensation (ver 26). We should also note the fact upon which the apostle bases his rebuke to the profane Corinthians, namely, the real, though undefined, identity of the bread and wine of the Eucharist with the body and blood of Christ (vs 27-29); an identity established through the blessing pronounced upon them, so that the bread and cup have come to be the "communion of the body of Christ," and the "communion of the blood of Christ," respectively (10 15-17). To receive the Eucharist, and also to partake of sacrifices offered to idols, is utterly incompatible with Christian loyalty. To receive the Eucharist after a gluttonous, winebibbing agapè, not recognizing the consecrated elements to be what the Lord Christ called them, is likewise, a defiance of God. Both acts alike provoke the judgment of God's righteous anger (vs 21, 22; 11 21, 22, 27-29).

3. Other Pauline Data

III. Preparation for the Eucharist.—The institution of the Eucharist had been prepared for by

1. The Miracles

Christ through the object-lesson of the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14 13-21; Mk 6 35-44; Lk 9 12-17; Jn 6 4-13), which was followed up by the discourse about Himself as the Bread of Life, and about eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood as the nourishment of eternal life. This again was clinched by the second object-lesson of the feeding of the four thousand afterward (Mt 15 32-39; Mk 8 1-9). The Lord Christ's thanksgiving, and His blessing of the loaves and fishes—acts not elsewhere recorded of Him, except at the institution of the Eucharist, and at the self-revealing meal at Emmaus (Lk 24 30)—deeply impressed those present, as indicating the source whence came His power to satisfy the hunger of the multitude (cf Mt 14 19; 15 36; Mk 6 41; 8 6, 7; Lk 9 16; Jn 6 11, 23).

In the discourse at Capernaum (Jn 6 26-58) Christ led the thought of His hearers from earthly to heavenly food, from food that perished to the true bread from heaven. He declared Himself to be the living bread, and, further, that it is through eating His flesh and drinking His blood that they shall possess true life in themselves, and be raised by Him at the last day.

2. The Discourse The difficulties raised by this discourse Christ did not solve at the time. His ascension would but add to them. He asked of His disciples acceptance of His words in faith. Under the administration of the Spirit would these things be realized (vs 60-69). The institution of the Eucharist, later, gave the clue to these otherwise "hard" words. Today the Eucharist remains as the explanation of this discourse. A hardy mountaineer, e.g. who had read Jn 6 many times, could form no notion of its purport. When first privileged to be present at the eucharistic service of the Book of Common Prayer, the meaning of feeding upon Christ's flesh and blood forthwith became apparent to him (see The Spirit of Missions, July, 1911, 572-73).

IV. Historical Setting of the Eucharist.—We should note the setting in which the institution of the Eucharist was placed. Though

1. Acts and Words of Christ the Fourth Gospel does not record this, it gives us many otherwise unknown data of the words of Christ spoken upon the eve of His death, in which historically the institution of the Eucharist was set. The symbolic washing of the feet of the disciples (Jn 13 3-10), the "new" commandment (ver 34), Christ as the means of access to the Father (14 6), love for Christ to be shown by keeping His commandments (vs 15, 21, 23, 24), the sending of the Paraclete Spirit (vs 16, 17, 26; 15 26; 16 13, 14), the intimate fellowship of Christ and His disciples, shown in the metaphor of the vine and its branches (15 1-9, 13-16)—all these throw their illumination upon the commandment, "This do in remembrance of me" (Lk 22 19; 1 Cor 11 24, 25). The efficacy of prayer "in Christ's name" (Jn 16 23, 24, 26-28) after His final withdrawal from the midst of His disciples, and His great prayer of self-oblation and intercession for His church throughout time (Jn 17, esp. 9-26) must not be forgotten in considering, "This is my body which is given for you" (Lk 22 19), and, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28).

The sacrificial connotation of many of the words used in the narratives of institution should be noted:

2. Sacrificial Language e.g. "body," "blood," "covenant," "given," "poured out," "for you," "for many," "unto remission of sins," "memorial" (cf Ex 24 6-8; Lev 2 2, 9, 16; 4 5-7, 16-18, 34; 17 11, 14; 24 7; Nu 10 10; He 9 11-28; 10 4-10, 19, 20). The very elements of bread and wine also suggested the idea of sacrifice to those accustomed to their use in the older system of worship (cf Ex 29 38-42; Nu 15 4-10; 28 and 29 passim).

The general background, moreover, out of which the institution of the Eucharist stands forth, is the sacrificial system of the older dispensation. The chosen people of God, as a priestly race, a holy nation (Ex 19 5, 6; Dt 7 6), worshipped God with a sequence of offerings, Divinely molded and inspired, which set forth the sovereign majesty and overlordship of God, His holiness, and the awe and penitence due from those who would draw nigh unto Him, and their desire for communion with Him.

3. Jewish System The more immediate background of the Eucharist is the Passover, and that without prejudice as to whether the Lord Christ ate the paschal meal with His disciples before He instituted the Eucharist, as seems most probable (cf Lk 22 7-18), or whether He died upon the day of its observance (see art. "Preparation," DCG, II, 409). The Pass-

4. The and a covenant-renewing sacrifice, and Paschal the Eucharist, as corresponding to it,
Background was instituted at the time of its yearly observance, and of the immolation of the true paschal lamb, of whose death it interpreted the value and significance (Ex 12 3-28; cf 13 3-10; Dt 16 1-8; 1 Cor 5 7; Jn 6 51; 10 10.11.15.17.18; 15 13; 17 19).

V. Sequence of the Institution.—Let us put before ourselves clearly the sequence of the Lord Christ's acts and words at the institution of the Eucharist ere we proceed to examine the church's mode of celebrating this ordinance.

At the close of the paschal Supper, (1) the Lord Christ "took" the bread and cup, respectively, for use in His new rite; (2) He "gave thanks" over them, constituting them a thank offering to God; (3) He "blessed" them to their new and higher potency; (4) He "gave" them to the apostles (the breaking being a requisite preliminary to distribution of the bread); (5) He bade them "Take, eat," and "Drink ye all of it," respectively; (6) He declared, of the bread, "This is my body given for you," of the cup, "This is my blood of the covenant," or, "This is the new covenant in my blood which is poured out for you," "unto remission of sins"; (7) He adds the reiterated command, "This do for my memorial."

It is obvious that we are bidden to follow out the same series of acts, and statements, as those of Christ Himself. We should take bread and wine, set them apart by rendering thanks to God over them, presenting them to Him as symbols of Christ's body and blood, once for all "given" and "poured out" for us; bless them by asking God's blessing upon them (cf Gen 14 19; Nu 6 23-27; Mk 8 7; Lk 2 34; 9 16; 24 50); and receive and give them as the body and blood of Christ; for, "the cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" (1 Cor 10 16). It is obvious that we shall not forget, in this connection, the distinction between the natural body of Christ which He took of the Blessed Virgin, and the bread which He held in His hand, and blessed and made to function as His body for our participation and inheritance in Him thereby—His sacramental body. The church with her many members united to the Head, and thus to each other, is also called His body mystical (1 Cor 10 17; 12 27; Eph 1 22.23; Col 1 24).

VI. The Church's Observance of the Eucharist.—

We should remember the priestly character of the church of Christ, whose sacrifices are

1. Heavenly made under the dispensation of the Background Holy Spirit (1 Pet 2 5.9; Rev 1 6; cf Acts 1 2.8); and also the eternal priesthood in the heavens of our risen, ascended and ever-living Lord Christ. He laid down His life in order to take it again (Jn 10 17), and now in the perfection of His glorified human nature, by His very presence in heaven, He is forever the propitiation inexhaustible for our sins (He 2 17-3 3; 4 14-5 10; 7 1-8 7; 9 11-28; 10 1-25; cf 1 Jn 2 1.2). As the Lamb slain once for all but alive for evermore, the Lord Christ is the focus of the worship of angels and the redeemed (Rev 1 17.18; 5 6-14; 7 9.10), and the Christian disciple has the privilege of feeding upon that eternal Priest and Victim (He 13 10; 1 Cor 10 16).

The celebration of the Eucharist was characteristic of the pentecostal church (Acts 2 42), esp. upon the Lord's Day (20 7). Its

2. Day of observance was preceded by the agapē
Celebration (1 Cor 11 20.34) on the eve (for the circumstances of the institution were closely imitated, and the day was reckoned as beginning at sunset after the Jewish fashion), and thus the Eucharist proper came late into the night, or toward morning (Acts 20 11).

It should be noted that the name, "Lord's Supper," belongs to the agapē rather than to the Eucharist; its popular use is a misnomer of mediaeval and Reformation times.

The name "Eucharist" is derived from the eucharistias

("gave thanks") of the institution and was the most widely used term in primitive times, as applied to the whole service, to the consecration of the bread and wine or to the consecrated elements themselves (cf 1 Cor 14 16).

3. Names The term "breaking of bread" (Acts 2 of the 42; 20 7.11) had little vogue after NT
Eucharist times.

"Communion" obviously is derived from 1 Cor 10 16.

In connection with the early and frequent use of the word "oblation" (prosphora) and its cognates, we should note St. Paul's description of his ministry in terms that suggest the rationale of the prayer of consecration, or eucharistic prayer, as we know it in the earliest liturgical tradition: "that I should be a minister of Christ Jesus unto the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be made acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit" (Rom 15 16).

VII. Post-apostolic Church.—The same Spirit who guided the church in the determination of the Canon of the NT Scriptures, the same

1. Holy Spirit who guided the church in the Spirit's working out of her explicit formulation Guidance of the Christian doctrine of the God-head, and of the Christ—that self-same Spirit guided the church in the formation and fashioning of her great eucharistic prayer into its norm in the same 4th cent. The historic churches of the East, by their faithful adherence to this norm, have been almost undisturbed by the dissensions and disputes of Western Christendom touching the Eucharist.

The glimpses given us in the earlier Fathers of the Eucharist are in entire accord with the more articulate expression of the church's

2. The corporate eucharistic worship, which
Early we find in the liturgical documents
Fathers and writings of the Nicene era.

(1) The Ignatian Epp. show us the Eucharist as the focus of the church's life and order, the source of unity and fellowship. The Eucharist consecrated by the prayer of the bishop and church is the Bread of God, the Flesh and Blood of Christ, the communication of love incorruptible and life eternal (cf Ephesians, 5.13.20; Trallians, 7.8; Romans, 7; Philadelphians, 4; Smyrnaeans, 7.8; Magnesians, 7).

(2) Justin Martyr tells us that the Eucharist was celebrated on the Lord's Day, the day associated with creation and with Christ's resurrection. To the celebrant were brought bread and wine mixed with water, who then put up to God, over them, solemn thanksgiving for His lovingkindness in the gifts of food and health and for the redemption wrought by Christ. The oblations of bread and wine are presented to God in memorial of Christ's passion, and become Christ's body and blood through prayer. The Eucharist is a spiritual sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving commemorative of Christ's death; and the consecrated elements the communion of Christ's body and blood, by reason of the sacramental character bestowed upon them by the invocation of the Divine blessing (cf 1 Apol., 13.65, 66, 67; Dial. with Trypho, 41.70, 117).

(3) Irenaeus, also, emphasizes the fact that Christ taught His disciples to offer the new oblation of the New Covenant, to present in thank offering the first-fruits of God's creatures—bread and wine—the pure sacrifice prophesied before by Malachi. The Eucharist consecrated by the church, through the invocation of God's blessing, is the communion of the body and blood of Christ, just as He pronounced the elements to be at the institution (cf Against Heresies, i.13.2; iv.17.5; 18.1-6; 33.2; v.22.3).

(4) Cyprian, too, gives evidence of the same eucharistic belief, and alludes very plainly to the "Lift up your hearts," to the great thanksgiving, and to the prayer of consecration. This last included the rehearsal of what Christ did and said at the institution, the commemoration of His passion, and the invocation of the Holy Spirit (cf. Ep. to Caecilius, §§1, 2, 4, 9, 10, 14, 17; Ep. to Epictetus, §§2, 4; On the Unity of the Church, I, 17; On the Lord's Prayer, §31; Firmilian to Cyprian, §§10, 17).

VIII. Liturgical Tradition.—When we proceed to examine the early liturgical remains we find the articulate expression of the church's sacrifice following along these lines.

1. The Eucharistic Prayer After an introductory summons to the worshippers to "lift up their hearts," the great eucharistic prayer goes on to pour forth sublime praises to God for all the blessings of creation, and for the fruits of the earth; aligning the praises of the church with the worship of the heavenly host around the throne of God. The love of God in bringing about the redemption of fallen man through the incarnation, and through the self-oblation of His only Son upon the cross is then recalled in deep thankfulness. The institution of the Eucharist in the night of the betrayal is next related, and then, taking up, and fulfilling the command of Christ ('Do this for my memorial') therein recited, most solemn memorial is made before God, with the antitypical elements, of the death and of the victorious resurrection and ascension of the Lord Christ. Then, as still further carrying out this act of obedience, most humble prayer is made to the Eternal Father for the hallowing of the oblations, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, to be the body and blood of Christ, and to be to those who partake of them, for the imparting of remission of sins, and the bestowal of life eternal. To this great act of praise and prayer the solemn "Amen" of the assembled congregation assents, and thereafter the sacramental gifts are received by the faithful present, with another "Amen" from each recipient to whom they are administered.

The great eucharistic prayer, as outlined, was the first part of the liturgy to crystallize into written form, and of its component parts the invocation of the Divine blessing upon the elements was probably the first to be written down.

Around the simplicity and the depth of such a truly apostolic norm of eucharistic worship, alone,

2. Its Unifying Significance can be gathered into one the now dispersed and divided followers of the Christ, for therein subsist in perfect harmony the Godward and the manward aspects of the memorial He commanded us to make as complementary, not contradictory; and the identity of the consecrated bread and wine with the body and blood of Christ is manifested to be in the realm of their spiritual function and potency.

This name of the Lord's Supper is derived from eucharistia, the prayer of consecration, and this in turn points back to Mt 26 27, "And he took a cup, and gave thanks" (eucharistēsas). The most common name is "Lord's Supper" (deipnon kuriou [1 Cor 11 20]). It is also called "Lord's table" (trápeza kuriou [10 21 AV]); while the cup is called "the cup of blessing" (potérion tēs eulogias [ver 16]) and "the cup of the Lord" (potérion kuriou [ver 21]). The word koinōnia points both to the bread and the cup, whence our common term "communion." In post-apostolic days it became known as leitourgia, a sacred ministration, whence our word "liturgy." It was also named thusia, a sacrifice, and mustérion, from its mystic character and perhaps from the fact that it was celebrated only in the closed circle of believers. The Roman Catholic church calls it missa or "mass," from the words congregatio missa est, whereby in post-apostolic times the first part of worship, called the missa catechumenorum, was closed, and whereby the second part of worship was ushered in, known as the missa fidelium, the sacramental part of worship, only destined for believers.

The origin of the Eucharist is described in Mt 26; Mk 14, and Lk 22. Paul introduces his

1. Original Institution simple and comprehensive recital of the origin of the institution—the earliest written record of it—with the words: "For I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you" (1 Cor 11 23). A comparison between the Gospels and Ex 12 indicates a considerable modification of the original Passover ritual in the days of Jesus (see Smith's DB, art. "Lord's Supper"). The composite Gospel-picture of the institution of the Eucharist shows us the Saviour in the deep consciousness of the catastrophe about to overwhelm Him, surrounded by treason on the part of Judas and a strange and total lack of appreciation of the true situation on the part of the other disciples. He had greatly 'desired to eat this passover with them before he suffered' (Lk 22 15), and yet they are wholly unresponsive, the chief question apparently in their minds being the old contention of rank and pre-eminence. Whether or not Judas was present at the eating of the Supper is a moot point, which we will not discuss here. Neither will we touch the question whether or not this Passover-meal was the true Jewish festive meal or an anticipation of it, called pascha only, in allusion to the great feast, which had brought the hundreds of thousands of Jews to Jerus (cf Mt 26; Mk 14 with Jn 12 1; 13 1.2.29; 18 28; 19 14.31).

Both Mt and Mk leave the exact place of the institution of the Supper in the festive meal indefinite, "as they were eating" (Mt 26 26; Mk 14 22); the words of Lk, "after supper" (22 20), may be a hint in regard to this matter (see Jn 13 1; 1 Cor 11 25). But the custom of the early church of celebrating the Eucharist after the agapē or "love feast" appears to be strong evidence that the original institution was separate from the paschal festival and followed it. The entire subject of the Eucharist has been called in question by the radical German critics, who point to the absence of the whole matter in Jn and to the omission of the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," in Mt and Mk. Its occurrence in Lk is ascribed to Paul's influence over him and to his familiarity with the story of the institution as described by the apostle. But this position is utterly untenable in the light of the unquestioned fact that the Lord's Supper as a fixed part of worship was firmly established from the earliest days of the Christian church. The doctrine of Christ's vicarious suffering is nowhere so clearly enunciated as in the words of the institution of the Supper, "This is my body which is given for you" (Lk 22 19); "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28). Small wonder that those who have utterly done away with the doctrine of the vicarious atonement or of substitution should attack the historicity of the Eucharist and should seek by all means to wipe it from the record.

Jesus bids His followers to observe the new institution "in remembrance of" Him. As Dr. Bavinck says, "The Lord's Supper is instituted by Christ as a permanent benefit to His church; it is a blessing added to all other blessings to signify and to seal them" (Gerf. Dogm., IV, 310).

As to the elements used in the original institution of the Supper, they were bread and wine. The bread of course was the unleavened

2. The Elements. bread of the Passover, during which feast every trace of leaven was removed (Ex 12 19). The Eastern church, perhaps influenced by the bitter Ebionite spirit of the Judaizers, later adopted the use of common bread (koinós artos); the Western church used unleavened bread. Protestantism left the matter among the adiaphora.

As regards the wine, the matter has been in dispute from the beginning (see Kitto's Cyclopaedia of Bib. Lit.). The early church always used mixed wine, wine and water, following the Jewish custom. Whether the wine used at the institution of the Lord's Supper was fermented or unfermented wine, must of course be determined by the Jewish Passover-customs prevailing at that time. The matter is in dispute and is not easily settled.

Modern Jews quite generally use raisin-wine, made by steeping raisins over night in water and expressing the juice the next day for use at the Passover-meal. The ancient Jews, we are told, used for this purpose a thick boiled wine, mixed with water (Mish, Terūmāth, xi). Whether oinos, the word used in the NT, stands literally, as the name indicates, for fermented wine, or figuratively for the mixed drinks, well known to ancient and modern Jews, is a debatable matter. As late as the 16th cent. the Nestorian Christians celebrated communion with raisin-wine, and the same is said of the Indian Christians ("St. Thomas Christians"). The word "new" used by Christ in Mt 26 29, is believed by some to indicate the character of the wine used by Christ at the institution of the Eucharist, viz. the juice of grapes fresh pressed out (see Clem. Alex., Paed., xi). On the other hand the third Council of Braga explicitly forbade this practice as heretical. It is evident that the whole subject is shrouded in much mystery. Some ancient sects substituted an entirely different element, water and milk, for instance, being used (Epiph., Haer., xlix; Aug., Haer., xxviii). Such customs were utterly condemned by the Council of Braga (675 AD). In general, however, the Christian church, almost from the beginning, seems to have used fermented red wine, either mixed or pure, in the administration of the Eucharist, in order to maintain the correspondence between the symbol and the thing symbolized.

Originally the apostolic church celebrated communion at every meeting for worship. They continued steadfastly in the apostle's

3. The Eucharist in the Apostolic Church teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers (Acts 2 42,46). Very soon, however, if we may judge from the Acts and the Pauline Epp., its administration was confined to the meeting on the first day of the week. The agapē always preceded communion, and at some part of the service the believers, the sexes after the plan of the synagogue being separated, would salute each other with the "holy kiss" (phylēma hágion) (1 Cor 16 20; 2 Cor 13 12). But the introduction of the sacrament, with all its accessories, had evidently occasioned grave abuses at Corinth (1 Cor 11 34). Paul corrects these in unmistakable language. Thus we received our first written record of the institution of the Supper. In Corinth it seems to have been restricted from the beginning to the first day of the week (Acts 20 7; 1 Cor 16 2). By a slow transition the deipnon was transferred from the midnight hour to the morning. At least we find that Paul kept it after midnight at Troas (Acts 20 11). It would appear as if the apostle had also partaken of the Lord's Supper, together with his Christian companions, on board the ship, toward the close of his fateful trip on the Adriatic (Acts 27 35).

In the post-apostolic church the Eucharist continued to be celebrated every Lord's day. But it separated itself from the preaching of the Word and from prayers, as in the previous period. 4. The Eucharist in the Post-apostolic Church It was invested with a mystic meaning, something too holy for the common eye, and thus the missa catechumenorum, the open church-meeting, was separated from the missa fidelium, the gathering of believers only, in which the Eucharist was celebrated. Bread, wine, oil, milk, honey,
